SHAKSPEARE.—The black letter copy of Holinshed's Chronicles, used by Shakspeare, with manuscript notes, and his own signature in full, has lately been found in England.

No doubt of it; and several other precious relics of the same nature will be found, we venture to say, and in due season offered by George Robins, or some other famous auctioneer, to the competition of a curious public. Did not the Common Council of London pay a hundred and forty five pounds sterling, a few weeks ago, for an autograph of Shakspeare, which one of the members, (who voted against the purchase) described as "a few doubtful, illegible, almost obliterated scratches of a pen"? When the ware commands such prices there will be no lack of it in the market.

TO THE RIGHT

Honorable and his singular good Lorde,

Sir VVilliam Cecill, Baron of Burghleygh, Knight of *the most noble order of the Garter, Lord high Treasou-*rer of England, Maister of the Courtes of Wardes and Lyueries, and one of the Queenes Maiesties priuie Counsell.

Onsidering with my selfe, right Honorable and my singular good Lorde, how ready (no doubt) many wil be to accuse me of vayne presumptiõ, for enterprising to deale in this so weighty a worke, and so farre aboue my reache to accomplish: I haue thought good to aduertise your Honour, by what occasion I was first induced to vndertake the same, although the cause that moued mee thereto, hath (in parte) ere this, bene signified vnto your good Lordshippe.

Where as therfore, that worthie Citizen Reginald VVolfe late Printer to the Queenes Maiestie, a man well knowen and beholden to your Honour, meant in his life time to publish an vniuersall Cosmographie of the whole worlde, and therewith also certaine perticular Histories of euery knowen nation, amongst other whome he purposed to vse for performance of his entent in that behalfe, he procured me to take in hande the collection of those Histories, and hauing proceeded so far in the same, as little wanted to the accomplishment of that long promised worke, it pleased God to call him to his mercie, after .xxv. yeares trauell spent therein, so that by his vntimely deceasse, no hope remayned to see that performed, whiche we had so long trauayled aboute: those yet whome he left in trust to dispose his things after his departure hence, wishing to the benefite of others, that some fruite might follow of that whereabout he had imployed so long time, willed me to continue mine endeuour for their furtherance in the same, whiche although I was ready to do, so farre as mine abilitie would reach, and the rather to answere that trust which the deceassed reposed in me, to see it brought to some perfection: yet when the volume greue so great, as they that were to defray the charges for the Impression, were not willing to go through with the whole, they resolued first to publishe the Histories of Englande, Scotlande, and Irelande, with their descriptions, whiche descriptions, bycause they were not in such readinesse, as those of forreyn countreys, they were enforced to vse the helpe of other better able to do it than I.

William Harison, and Richard Stanyhurst.

Moreouer, the Chartes wherein Maister VVolfe spent a greate parte of his time, were not founde so complete as wee wished: and againe, vnderstanding of the great charges and notable enterprice of that worthie Gentleman maister Thomas Sackeforde in procuring the Chartes of the seuerall prouinces of this Realme to be sette forth, wee are in hope that in tyme he will deliniate this whole lande so perfectly, as shal be comparable or beyonde any deliniation heretofore made of any other region, and therefore leaue that to his well deserued prayse. If any well willer will imitate him in so prayse worthie a worke for the two other regions, we will be gladde to further his endeuour with all the helpes we may.

The Histories I haue gathered according to my skill, and conferred the greatest parte with Maister VVolfe in his life time, to his liking, who procured me so many helpes to the furtherance thereof, that I was lothe to omit any thing that might encreace the Readers knowledge, whiche causeth the booke to grow so great. But receyuing them by partes, and at seuerall times (as I might get them) it may be, that hauing had more regard to the mater than to the apt penning, I haue not so orderly disposed them, as otherwise I ought, choosing rather to want order, than to defraude the Reader of that whiche for his further vnderstanding might seeme to satisfie his expectation. I therefore moste humbly beseeche your Honour to accept these Chronicles of Englande vnder your protection, and according to your wisedome and accustomed benignitie to beare with my faultes, the rather bicause you were euer so especiall good Lord to Maister VVolfe, to whome I was singularly beholden, and in whose name I humbly presente this rude worke vnto you, beseeching God, that as he hath made you an instrument to aduaunce his truth, so it may please him to increace his good giftes in you to his glorie, the furtheraunce of the Queenes Maiesties seruice, and comforte of all hir faithfull and louing subiectes.

Your honours moſt humble to commaunde,
RAPHAEL HOLINSHED.

THE PREFACE
to the Reader.

T is dangerous (gẽtle Reader) to range in ſo large a fielde as I haue here vndertaken, vvhile ſo many ſundry men in diuers things may be able to controll mee, and many excellent vvittes of our countrey (as vvell or better occupied I hope) are able herein to ſurpaſſe me: but ſeing the beſte able do ſeeme to neglect it, let me (though leaſt able) craue pardon to put thẽ in minde not to forget their natiue coũtreis praiſe (vvhich is theyr dutie) the encouragement of theyr vvorthie countrie men, by elders aduauncements and the dauntyng of the vicious, by foure penall examples, to vvhiche ende I take Chronicles and Hiſtories ought chiefly to be vvritten. My labour may ſhevv mine vttermoſt good vvill, of the more learned I require their further enlargement, and of faultfinders diſpenſatiõ till they be more fully enfourmed. It is too commõ that the leaſt able are readieſt to finde fault in maters of leaſt vveight, and therfore I eſteeme the leſſe of their carping, but humbly beſeech the skilfull to ſupplie my vvant, and to haue care of their dutie: and eyther to amend that vvherin I haue fayled, or be content vvith this mine endeuour. For it may pleaſe them to conſidet, that no one can be eye vvitneſſe to all that is vvritten vvithin our time, much leſſe to thoſe things vvhiche happened in former times, and therefore muſt be content vvith reportes of others. Therein I haue bene ſo careful, that I haue ſpared no paynes or helpe of frendes to ſearch out either vvritten or printed auncient Authours, or to enquire of moderne eye vvitneſſes, for the true ſetting dovvne of that vvhiche I haue here deliuered: but I finde ſuch vvant in vvriters for the neceſſary knovvledge of things done in times paſt, and lacke of meane to obtayne ſufficient inſtructions by reporters of the time preſent, and herevvith the vvorthie exploytes of our countrey men ſo many, that it greeueth me I coulde not leaue the ſame to poſteritie (as I vviſhed) to their vvel deſerued praiſe. But I haue here imperted vvhat I could learne, and craue that it may be takẽ in good part. My ſpeech is playne, vvithout any Rethoricall ſhevve of Eloquence, hauing rather a regarde to ſimple truth, than to decking vvordes. I vviſhe I had bene furniſhed vvith ſo perfect inſtructions, and ſo many good gifts, that I might haue pleaſed all kindes of men, but that ſame being ſo rare a thing in any one of the beſt, I beſeech thee (gentle Reader) not to looke for it in me the meaneſt.

But novv for thy further inſtruction to vnderſtand the courſe of theſe my labors. Firſt cõcerning the Hiſtorie of Englãd, as I haue collected the ſame out of many and ſundry Authours, in vvhome vvhat contrarietie, negligence, and raſhneſſe, ſomtime is founde in their reportes, I leaue to the diſcretion of thoſe that haue peruſed theyr vvorkes: for my parte, I haue in things doubtfull rather choſen to ſhevve the diuerſitie of their vvritings, than by ouer ruling them, and vſing a peremptory cenſure, to frame them to agree to my liking: leauing it neuertheleſſe to eche mans iudgement, to controlle thē as he ſeeth cauſe. If ſome vvhere I ſhevv my fancie vvhat I thinke, and that the ſame diſlyke them, I craue pardon, ſpecially if by probable reaſons or playner matter to be produced, they can ſhevv mine errour, vpō knovvledge vvher-of I ſhalbe ready to reforme it accordingly. VVhere I do beginne the Hiſtorie from the firſt inhabitation of this Iſle, I looke not to content eche mans opinion concerning the originall of them that firſt peopled it, and no maruell: for in matters ſo vncertayne, if I can not ſufficiently content my ſelfe (as in deede I cannot) I knovve not hovv I ſhould ſatisfie others. That vvhiche ſeemeth to me moſt likely, I haue noted, beſeeching the learned (as I truſt they vvill) in ſuch pointes of doubtfull antiquities to beare vvith my skill. Sith for ought I knovv, the matter is not yet decided among the learned, but ſtill they are in controuerſie about it: Et adhuc ſub iudice lis eſt. VVell hovv ſoeuer it came firſt to be inhabited, likely it is that at the firſt the vvhole Iſle vvas vnder one Prince and Gouernour, though aftervvardes, and long peraduenture before the Romaines ſet any foote vvithin it, the Monarchie thereof vvas broken, euen vvhen the multitude of the inhabitants grevv to bee great, and ambition entred amongſt them, vvhich hath brought ſo many good policies and ſtates to ruyne and decay.

The Romaines hauing ones got poſſeſsion of the continent that faceth this Iſle, coulde not reſt (as it appeareth) till they had brought the ſame alſo vnder theyr ſubiection: and the ſooner doubtleſſe, by reaſon of the factions amongſt the Princes of the lande, vvhiche the Romaynes (through their accuſtomed skill) coulde turne very vvell to their moſte aduauntage. They poſſeſſed it almoſte fiue hundreth yeares, and longer might haue done, if eyther their inſufferable tiranny had not taken avvay from them the loue of the people, aſvvell here as elſvvhere, either that their ciuill diſcorde aboute the chopping and chaunging of their Emperours, had not ſo vveakened the forces of their Empire, that they vvere not able to defende the ſame againſt the impreſsion of barbarous nations. But as vvee may coniecture by that vvhiche is founde in Hiſtories, aboute that tyme, in vvhiche the Romaine Empire beganne to decline, this lande ſtoode in very vveake ſtate: being ſpoyled of the more parte of all hir able menne, vvhiche vvere ledde avvay into forreine regions, to ſupplie the Romayne armies: and likevviſe perhaps of all neceſſarie armour, vveapon, and treaſure: vvhiche being perceyued of the Saxons, after they vvere receiued into the Ile to ayde the Britons againſt the Scottes and Pictes, then inuading the ſame, miniſtred to them occaſion to attempt the ſeconde conqueſt, vvhiche at length they brought to paſſe, to the ouerthrovv not onely of the Brittiſh dominion, but alſo to the ſubuerſion of the Chriſtian religion, here in this lande: vvhiche chanced as appeareth by Gildas, for the vvicked ſinnes and vnthankefulneſſe of the inhabitants tovvardes God, the chiefe occaſions and cauſes of the tranſmutations of kingdomes, Nam propter peccata, regna tranſmutantur à gente in gentem. The Saxons obteyning poſſeſsion of the lande, gouerned the ſame being deuided into ſundry kingdomes, and hauing once ſubdued the Brytons, or at the leaſt vviſe remoued them out of the moſt parte of the Iſle into odde corners and mountaynes, fell at diuiſion among themſelues, and oftentimes vvith vvarre purſued eche other, ſo as no perfect order of gouernement could be framed, nor the Kings grovv to any great puiſſance, eyther to moue vvarres abroade, or ſufficiently to defende themſelues againſt forreyne forces at home: as manifeſtly vvas perceyued, vvhen the Danes and other the Northeaſterne people, being then of great puyſſance by ſea, beganne miſerably to afflict this lande: at the firſt inuading as it vvere but onely the coaſtes and countreys lying neare to the ſea, but aftervvardes vvith mayne armies, they entred into the middle partes of the lande: and although the Engliſhe people at length came vnder one King, and by that meanes

vvere the better able to reſiſt the enimies, yet at length thoſe Danes ſubdued the vvhole, and had poſſeſsiō thereof for a time, although not long, but that the crovvne returned againe to thoſe of the Saxon line: till ſhortly after by the inſolent dealings of the gouernours, a deuiſion vvas made betvvixt the King and his people, through iuſte puniſhmente decreed by the prouidence of the Almightie, determining for their ſinnes and contempt of his lavves, to deliuer them into the handes of a ſtranger, and therevpon vvhen ſpite and enuie had brought the title in doubte, to vvhom the right in ſucceſsion apperteyned, the Conquerour entred, and they remayned a pray to him and his: vvho plucked all the heades and chiefe in authoritie, ſo clearely vp by the rootes, as fevve or none of them in the ende vvas lefte to ſtande vp againſt him. And herevvith altering the vvhole ſtate, hee planted lavves and ordinaunces as ſtoode moſte for his auayle and ſuretie, vvhich being after qualified vvith more milde and gentle lavves, tooke ſuche effect, that the ſtate hath euer ſithence continued vvhole and vnbroken by vviſe and politike gouernement, although diſquieted, ſometime by ciuill diſſention, to the ruyne commonly of the firſte mouers, as by the ſequele of the hiſtorie ye may ſee.

For the Hiſtorie of Scotlande, I haue for the more parte followed Hector Boece, Iohannes Maior, and Iouan, Ferreri Piemonteſe, ſo farre as they haue continued it, interlaced ſometimes vvith other Authours, as Houeden, Fourdon and ſuch like, although not often, bicauſe I meante rather to deliuer vvhat I founde in their ovvne Hiſtories extant, than to correct them by others, leauing that enterprice to their ovvne countreymen: ſo that vvhat ſoeuer ye reade in the ſame, conſider that a Scottiſhman vvritte it, and an Engliſhman hath but onely tranſlated it into our language; referring the Reader to the Engliſh Hiſtorie, in all maters betvvixte vs and them, to be confronted therevvith as he ſeeth cauſe. For the continuation thereof I vſed the like order, in ſuche copies and notes as Maiſter VVolfe in his life time procured me, ſauing that in theſe laſte yeares I haue inſerted ſome notes, as concerned matters of vvarre betvvixte vs and the Scottes, bicauſe I gotte them not till that parte of the Engliſh Hiſtorie vvas paſte the preſſe.

For Irelande I haue ſhevved in mine Epiſtle Dedicatorie in vvhat ſorte, and by vvhat helpes I haue proceeded therein, onely this I forgotte, to ſignifie that Giraldus Cambrenſis, and Flatsbury, I had not till that parte of the Booke vvas vnder the preſſe, and ſo being conſtreyned to make poſte haſte, coulde not exemplifie out of them all that I vviſhed, neither yet diſpoſe it ſo orderly as had bene conuenient, nor penne it vvith ſo apte vvordes as might ſatisfie either my ſelfe, or thoſe to vvhoſe vevve it is novv like to come. And by reaſon of the like haſte made in the Impreſſion, vvhere I vvas determined to haue tranſpoſed the moſte parte of that vvhiche in the Engliſhe Hiſtorie I had noted, concerning the Conqueſte of Irelande by Henry the ſeconde out of Houeden and others, I had not time thereto, and ſo haue lefte it there remayning, vvhere I firſte noted it, before I determined to make any particular collection of the Iriſhe Hiſtories, bicauſe the ſame commeth there vvell inough in place, as to thoſe that ſhall vouchſafe to turne the Booke it may appeare.

For the computation of the yeares of the vvorlde, I hadde by Maiſter VVoulfes aduiſe followed Functius, but after his deceaſſe Maiſter VVilliam Hariſon made mee partaker of a Chronologie, vvhiche hee had gathered and compiled vvith moſte exquiſite diligence, followvyng Gerardus Mercator, and other late Chronologers, and his ovvne obſeruations, according to the vvhiche I haue reformed the ſame. As for the yeares of our Lorde, and the Kings, I haue ſette them dovvne accordyng to ſuche Authours as ſeeme to bee of beſte credite in that behalfe, as I doubte not but to the learned and skilfull in Hiſtories, it ſhal appeare: Moreouer, this the Reader hath to conſider, that I do beginne the yeare at the natiuitie of our Lorde, vvhiche is the ſureſt order in my fantaſie that can bee followved.

For the names of perſons, tovvnes and places, as I haue bene diligent to reforme the errours of other (vvhich are to be aſcribed more to the imperfect copies thā to the Authours) ſo may it be that I haue ſome vvhere committed the like faultes, either by negligence or vvant of skill to reſtore them to their full integritie as I vviſhed, but vvhat I haue performed aſvvell in that behalfe, as others, the skilful Reader ſhall eaſily perceyue, and vvithal cōſider (I truſt) vvhat trauel I haue beſtovved to his behofe in theſe tvvo volumes, craving onely, that in recompence thereof, he vvill iudge the beſt, and to make a frendly cōſtruction of my meanings, vvhere ought may ſeeme to haue eſcaped, either my penne or the Printers preſſe, othervviſe than vve could haue vviſhed for his better ſatisfaction. Many things being taken out as they lie in Authours may be thought to giue offence in time preſent, vvhiche referred to the time paſt vvhen the Authour vvritte, are not onely tollerable but alſo allovvable. Therefore good Reader I beſeech thee to vvay the cauſes and circumſtances of ſuch faultes and imperfections, and conſider that the like may creepe into a far leſſe volume than this, and ſhevv me ſo much fauour as hath bene ſhevved to others in like cauſes: and ſithēce I haue done my good vvil, accept the ſame, as I vvith a free and thākful minde do offer it thee, ſo ſhall I thinke my labour vvell beſtovved. For the other Hiſtories vvhiche are already collected, if it pleaſe God to giue abilitie, ſhall in time come to light, vvith ſome ſuch briefe deſcriptions of the forreyn regions, vvhereof they treate, as may the better ſuffiſe to the Readers contentation, and vnderſtanding of the maters conteyned in the ſame Hiſtories, reduced into abridgements out of their great volumes. And thus I ceaſſe further to trouble thy pacience, vviſhing to thee (gentle Reader) ſo much profite, as by reading may be had, and as great cōfort as Goddes holy ſpirite may endue thee vvith.

AN HISTORICALL DEscription of the Iſlande of Britayne, with a briefe rehearſall of the nature and qualities of the people of Englande, and of all ſuch commodities as are to be founde in the

ſame.

In the firſt Booke of the Deſcription of Britayne, theſe Chapters are contayned that enſue.

1. Of the ſcituation and quantitie of the Iſle of Britayne.
2. Of the auncient names of this Iſlande.
3. What ſundry nations haue dwelled in this countrey.
4. Whether it be likely that euer there were any Gyants inhabiting in this Iſlande.
5. Of the generall language vſed ſometime in Brytaine.
6. Into howe many kingdomes at once this Iſle hath bene deuided.
7. Of the auncient religion vſed in Brytaine, from the firſt comming of Samothes, before the conuerſion of the ſame vnto the faith of Chriſt.
8. Of the number and names of ſuch Salt Iſlandes as lye diſperſed rounde about vpon the coaſt of Brytaine.
9. Of the ryſing and falles of ſuch ryuers and ſtreames as deſcende into the ſea, without alteration of their names, & firſt of thoſe that lye betweene the Thames and the Sauerne.
10. Of the Sauerne ſtreame, and ſuch falles of ryuers as go into the Sea betweene it and the Humber.
11. Of ſuch riuers as fall into the ſea, betwene Humber & the Thames.
12. Of the fower high waies ſometime made in Brytaine by the Princes of this lande.
13. Of the ayre and ſoyle of the country.
14. Of the generall conſtitution of the bodies of the Brytons.
15. How Brytaine grew at the firſt to be deuided into three porcions.
16. That notwithſtanding the former particion made by Brute, vnto his children, the ſouereinety of the whole Iſlande, remained ſtyll to the Prince of Lhoegres and his poſteritie after him.
17. Of the Wall ſometime builded for a particion betweene Englande and the Pictes.

To the Right Honorable, and his singular good Lord and maister, S. William Brooke Knight, Lord warden of the cinque Portes, and Baron of Cobham, all increase of the feare and knowledge of God, firme obedience towarde his Prince, infallible loue to the common wealth, and commendable renowme here in this worlde, and in the worlde to come; lyfe euerlasting.

HAVING had iust occasion, Right Honourable, to remayne in London, during the tyme of Midsomer terme last passed, and being earnestlye required of diuers my friends, to set downe some briefe discourse of parcell of those thinges, which I had obserued in the reading of such manifold antiquities as I had perused toward the furniture of a Chronologie, which I had then in hande, I was at the first very loth to yeelde to their desires: first, for that I thought my selfe vnable for want of witte and iudgement, so sodainly and with such speede to take such a charge vppon me: secondly, by cause the dealing therin might proue an impechement vnto mine owne Treatize: and finallye for that I had giuen ouer all study of hystories, as iudging the tyme spent about the same, to be an hinderaunce vnto my more necessarie dealings in that vocation & function whereunto I am called in the myniſtery. But when they were so importunate with me, that no reasonable excuse coulde serue to put by this trauaile, I condescended at the length vnto their yrkesome sute, promising that I woulde spende such voyde time as I had to spare, whyleſt I shoulde be inforced to tarie in the citie, vpon some thing or other that shoulde stande in lieu of a description of my Country. For their partes also they assured me of such helpes as they coulde purchase, and thus with hope of good although, no gaie successe, I went in hande withall, then almost as one leaning altogither vnto memorie, sith my bookes and I were parted by fourtie myles in sonder. In this order also I spent a part of Michaelmas and Hillarie termes insuing, being inforced thereto I say by other businesses which compelled me to keepe in the citie, and absent my selfe from my charge, though in the meane season I had some repaire vnto my librarie, but not so great as the dignitie of the matter required, & yet farre greater then the Printers haste woulde suffer. One helpe, and none of the smalleſt that I obtayned herein was by such commentaries as Leland had collected sometime of the state of Britaine, bookes vtterly mangled, defaced with wet, and weather, and finally imperfite through want of sundrie volumes: secondly, I gate some knowledge of things by letters and pamphlettes, from sundrie places and shires of Englande, but so discordaunt nowe and then amongeſt themselues, especially in the names and courses of riuers and scituation of townes, that I had oft greater trouble to reconcile them, then to penne the whole discourse of such pointes as they contayned: the thirde ayde did grow by conference with diuers, eyther at the table or secretly alone, wherein I marked in what things the talkers did agree, and wherein they impugned eche other, chooſing in the end the former, and reiecting the later, as one desirous to set forth the truth absolutely, or such things in deede as were most likely to be true. The laſt comfort arose by mine owne reading of such writers as haue heretofore made mention of the condition of our country, in speaking whereof, yf I shoulde make account of the successe, and extraordinary comming by sundrie treatizes not supposed to be extaunt, I shoulde but seeme to pronounce more then may well be sayde with modestie, and say farder of my selfe then this Treatize can beare witnesse of. Howbeit, I referre not this successe wholly vnto my purpose in this Description, but rather giue notice thereof to come to passe in the penning of my Chronologie, whose cromes as it were fell out very well in the framing of this Pamphlete. In the processe therefore of this Booke, if your Honour regarde the substaunce of that which is here declared, I must needes confesse that it is none of mine: but if your Lordshippe haue consideration of the barbarous composition shewed herein, herein, that I may boldely clayme and chalenge for myne owne, sith there is no man of any so slender skill, that will defraude me of that reproche, which is due vnto me, for the meere negligence, disorder, and euill disposition of matter, comprehended in the same. Certes I protest before God and your Honour, that I neuer made any choise of stile, or picked wordes, neither regarded to handle this Treatize in such precise order and methode as many other woulde: thinking it sufficient, truely & plainly to set forth such things as I minded to intreate of, rather then with vaine affectation of eloquence to paint out a rotten sepulchre, neither comendable in a writer nor profitable to the reader. How other affayres troubled me in the writing hereof many know, & peraduenture the slackenesse shewed herein can better testifie: but howsoeuer it be done, & whatsoeuer I haue done, I haue had an especiall eye vnto the truth of things, & for the reast, I hope that this foule frizeled Treatize of mine, will prooue a spurre to others, better learned in more skilfull maner to handle the selfe same argument. As for faultes escaped herein as there are diuers, I must needes confesse, both in the penning and printing, so I haue to craue pardon of your Honour, & of all the learned readers. For such was my shortnesse of time allowed in the writing, & so great the speede made in the Printing, that I could seldome with any deliberation peruse, or almost with any iudgement deliberate exactly vpon such notes as were to be inserted. Sometimes in deede their leysure gaue me libertie, but that I applyed in following my vocation, many times their expedition abridged my perusall, and by this later it came to passe, that most of this booke was no sooner penned then printed, neither well conceyued before it came to writing. But it is now to late to excuse the maner of doing. It is possible that your Honour will mislyke hereof, for that I haue not by myne owne trauaile and eyesight viewed such thinges, as I doe here intreate of. In deede I must needes confesse that except it were from the parish where I dwell, vnto your Honour in Kent, or out of London where I was borne, vnto Oxforde and Cambridge where I haue beene brought vp, I neuer trauailed 40. miles in all my lyfe, neuertheless in my report of these thinges, I vse their authorities, who haue performed in their persons whatsoeuer is wanting in mine. It may be in like sort that your Honour will take offence at my rashe and rechlesse behauiour vsed in the composition of this volume, and much more that being scambled vp after this maner, I dare presume to make tendoure of the protection thereof vnto your Lordships handes. But when I consider the singular affectiō that your Ho. doth beare to those that in any wise will trauaile to set forth such things as lye hidden of their countries, without regarde of fine & eloquent handling, & therinto do weigh on mine owne behalfe my bounden duetie and gratefull minde to such a one as hath so many and sundrie wayes profited and preferred me, that otherwise can make no recompence, I can not but cut of all such occasion of doubt, and thereupon exhibite it, such as it is, and so penned as it is vnto your Lordships tuition, vnto whome if it may seeme in any wyse acceptable, I haue my whole desire. And as I am the first that (notwithstanding the great repugnauncie to be seene among our writers) hath taken vpon him so particularly to describe this Isle of Britaine, so I hope the learned and godly will beare withall and reforme with charity where I do treade amisse. As for the curious, & such as can rather euill fauouredly espy then skilfully correct an errour, & sooner carpe at another mans doings then publish any thing of their owne, keping themselues close with an obscure admiration of learning & knowledge among the cōmon sort) I force not what they say hereof, for whether it doe please or displease them, all is one to me, sith I referre my whole trauaile in the gratification of your Honour; & such as are of experience to consider of my trauaile, and the large scope of things purposed in this Treatize, of whome my seruice in this behalfe may be taken in good part, that I will repute for my full recompence, & large guerdon of my labours. The Almighty God preserue your Lordship in cōtinuall health, wealth, and prosperitie, with my good Lady your wyfe, your Honours children, whome God hath indued with a singular towardnesse vnto all vertue & learning, and the rest of reformed familie vnto whome I wish farder increase of his holy spirit, vnderstanding of his worde, augmentation of honour, & finally an earnest zeale to follow his commaundements.

Your Lordships humble seruant, and houshold Chaplein. W. H.

¶ Of the scituation and quantitie of the Isle of Britayne.

Cap. 1.

How Britaine lyeth from the mayne.

BRITANIA, or Britaine, as we nowe terme it in our Englishe tongue, is an Isle lying in the Ocean sea, directly against that part of Fraunce, which conteyneth Picardie, Normandie, and therto the greatest part of little Britaine, called in time past Armorica of the scituation thereof vpon the sea coast, and before such time as a companie of Britons (eyther led ouer by some of the Romayne Emperours, or flying thither from the tyrannie of such as oppressed them here in this Iland) did settle themselues there, & called it Britaine, after the name of their owne country, from whence they aduentured thither. It hath Irelande vpon the West side, on the North the mayne sea, euen vnto Thule and the Hyperborean, and on the East side also the Germaine Ocean, by which we passe daily thorowe by the trade of merchandise, not only into ỹ low countries of Belgie, but also into Germanie, Frizelande, Denmarke, and Norway, carying from hence thither, and bringing from thence hither, all such necessarie commodities as the seuerall Countries doe yelde: thorow which meanes, and besides common amitie conserued, traffike is maintayned, and the necessitie of eche party abundantly relieued.

The longitude and latitude of this Isle.

It containeth in longitude taken by the middest of the Region 19. degrees exactly: and in latitude 53. degrees, and 30. min. after the opinions of those that haue diligently obserued the same in our dayes, and the faithfull report of such writers as haue left notice therof vnto vs, in their learned treatises to be perpetually remembred. Howbeit wheras some in setting downe of these two lines, haue seemed to vary about the placing of the same, eche of them diuerslie remembring the names of sundrie Cities and townes, whereby they affirme thē to haue their seueral courses: for my part I haue thought good to proceede somewhat after another sort, that is, by deuiding the latest and best Cardes eche way into two equall partes, (so neare as I can possibly bring the same to passe) whereby for the middle of latitude, I produce Caerleil and Newcastell vpon Tyne (whose lōgest day consisteth of 16. houres, 48. minuts) & for the longitude, Newbery, Warwicke, Sheffeld, Skiptō, &c. which dealing in mine opinion, is most easie & indifferent, and lykeliest meane to come by the certayne standing and scituation of our Iland.

The compasse of Britaine.

In lyke maner it hath in breadth from the Piere or poynt of Douer, vnto the farthest part of Cornewall westwardes 320. myles: from thence agayne vnto the poynt of Cathnesse by the Irishe sea, 800. Whereby Polidore and other doe gather that the circuite of the whole Iland of Britaine is 1720. myles, which is full 280. lesse than Cæsar doth sette downe, except there be some difference betweene the Romaine and Britishe myles, whereof heafter I maye make some farther conference.

The forme

The forme and facion of this Isle is lyke vnto a Triangle, Bastarde sworde, Wedge, or Partesant, being broadest in the South part, and gathering still narrower and narrower, till it come to the farthest poynt of Cathnesse Northwarde where it is narrowest of all, and there endeth in maner of a Promontorie, which is not aboue 30. myles ouer, as daply experience doth confirme.

The distance frō the mayne.

The shortest & most vsuall cut that we haue out of our Iland to the maine, is from Douer (the farthest part of Kent eastward) vnto Calice in Picardie, where the breadth of the sea is not aboue 30. myles. Which course as it is now frequented and vsed for the most cōmon & safe passage of such as come into our coūtrie out of Fraunce and diuers other Realmes, so it hath not bene vnknowne of olde time vnto the Romaynes, who for the most part vsed these two hauens for their passage and repassage to and fro, although we finde that nowe and then, diuers of them came also from Bullen and landed at Sandwiche, or some other places of the coast, as to auoyde the force of the wynde and weather, that often molested them in these narrowe seas, best liked for their safegardes. Betweene the part of Hollande also, which lyeth nere the mouth of the Rhene, and this our Iland, are 900. furlonges, as Solinus sayeth, besides diuers other writers, which being conuerted into Englishe myles, doe yelde one hundred and twelue, and foure odde furlongs, whereby the iust distaunce of Britayne from that part of the mayne also, doth certainly appeare to be much lesse than the common Mappes of our Countrie haue hitherto set downe.

Lib. 4.

Of the auncient names of this Iland.

Cap. 2.

IN the diligent perusal of their treatises that haue written of the state of this our Iland, I finde that at the first it seemed to be a percel of the Celtike kingdome, whereof Dis otherwyse called Samothes, one of the sonnes of Ja-phet was the Saturne or originall beginner, and of him thencefoorth for a long time called Samothea. Afterwarde in processe of tyme when as desire of rule began to take holde in the myndes of men, & ech Prince endeuored to enlarge his owne dominiõs: Albion the sonne of Neptune surnamed Mareoticus (whose mother also was called Amphitrite) hearing of the commodities of the Countrie, and plentifulnesse of soyle here, made a voyage ouer, & finding the thing not onely correspondent vnto, but also farre surmounting the report that went of this Iland, it was not long after ere he inuaded ỳ same by force of armes, brought it to his subiection, and finally chaunged the name therof into Albion, whereby the former denomination after Samothes did fall into vtter forgetfulnesse. And thus was this Iland bereft at one time both of hir auncient name, and also of hir lawfull succession of Princes descended of the lyne of Iaphet, vnder whome it had continued by the space of 341. yeres and ix. Princes, as by the Historie folowing shall easily appeare.

Neptunus. Amphitrite Albion.

Britaine vnder the Celts 341. yeares.

To speake somewhat also of Neptune, (sith I haue made mention of him in this place) it shall not be impertinent. You shal vnderstand therefore that for his excellent knowledge in the Arte of Nauigation, he was reputed the most skilful Prince that liued in his time. And therefore, and likewyse for his courage and boldnesse in aduenturing to and fro, he was after his decease honoured as a god, and the protection of such as trauayled by sea committed to his charge. So rude also was ỳ making of shippes wherewith to sayle in his tyme, that for lacke of better experience to calke and trimme the same after they were builded, they vsed to nayle them ouer with rawe hydes, and with such a kinde of Nauie: first Samothes, and then Albion arriued in this Iland.

Neptune God of the sea.

The manner of dressinge of shippes in olde time.

But to proceede, when the sayde Albion had gouerned here in this Countrie by the space of vij. yeares, it came to passe that both he and his brother Bergion were killed by Hercules at the mouth of Rhodanus, as the sayd Hercules passed out of Spaine by the Celtes to go ouer into Italy, and vpõ this occasion (as I gather amõg the writers) not vnworthy to be remembred. It happened in tyme of Lucus king of the Celtes, that Lestrigo and his issue (whõ Dyzis his grandfather had placed ouer the Ianigenes) dyd exercise great tyrannie, not onely ouer his owne kingdome, but also in molestation of such Princes as inhabited rounde about him in most intollerable maner. Moreouer he was not a little incouraged in these his doinges by Neptune his father, who trusted greatly to leaue his xxtij. sonnes settled in the mightiest kingdomes of the worlde, as men of whom he had already conceyued this opinion, that if they had once gotten foote into any Region whatsoeuer, it woulde not be long ere they did by some meanes or other, not onelye establishe their seates, but also increase their limites to the better maintenance of themselues and their posteritie for euermore. To be short therefore, after the Gyantes, and great Princes, or mightie men of the world had conspired and slaine the aforesayd Dyzis: Hercules his sonne, surnamed Libius, in the reuenge of his fathers death, proclaymed open warres agaynst them all, and going from place to place, he ceased not to spoyle their kingdomes, and therewithall to kill them that fell into his handes. Finally, hauing among other ouercome the Lomnimi or Geriones in Spayne, and vnderstanding that Lestrigo & his sonnes did yet remayne in Italie, he directed his voyage into those parts, and taking the kingdome of the Celtes in his waye, he remayned for a season with Lucus the king of that Countrie, where he also maried his daughter Galathea, and begat a sonne by hir, calling him after his mothers name Galates, of whome in my Chronologie I haue spoken more at large. In the meane time Albion vnderstanding howe Hercules intended to make warres agaynst his brother Lestrigo, he thought it good to stop him that tyde, and therefore sending for hys brother Bergion, out of the Dzehades (where he also reygned as supreme Lorde and gouernour) they ioyned their powers, & sayled ouer into Fraunce. Being arriued there, it was not long ere they met with Hercules and his armie, neare vnto the mouth of the riuer called Rhodanus, where happened a cruell conflicte betweene them, in which Hercules and hys men were lyke to haue lost the daye, for that they were in maner wearyed with lõg warres, and their munition sore wasted in the last voiage that he had made for Spaine. Herevppon Hercules perceyuing the courages of his souldiours somewhat to abate, & seeing the want of munition likely to be the cause of his fatall day and present ouerthrowe at hande, it came sodenly into his mynde to will eche of them to defende himselfe by throwing of stones at hys enimie, wherof there lay great store then scattered in the place. The policie was no sooner published than put in execution, whereby they so preuayled in thende, that Hercules wan the fielde, their enemies were put to flight, and Albion and his brother both slayne, and buried in that plot. Thus was Britaine ridde of a tyrant, Lucus king of the Celtes deliuered frõ an vsurper (that daily incroched vpon him also euen in his owne kingdome on that side) and Lestrigo greatly weakened by the slaughter of his brethren. Of this invention of Hercules in like sort it commeth, that Jupiter father vnto Hercules (who in deede was none other but Osyris) is feygned to throw downe stones from heauen vpon Albion and Bergion, in the defence of Hercules his son: which came so thick vpon them as if great drops of raine or hayle should haue descended from a boue, no man well knowing which waye to turne him from their violence, they came so fast and with so great a strength.

But to go forwarde, albeit that Albion and his power were thus discomfited and slayne, yet the name that he gaue vnto thys Iland dyed not, but still remained vnto the time of Brute, who arriuing here in the 1127. before Christ, and 2840. after the creation, not only chaunged it into Britayne (after it had bene called Albion, by the space of 595. yeares) but to declare his souereigntie ouer the reast of the Ilandes also that are about the same, he called them all after the same maner, so that Albion was sayde in tyme to be Britanniarum insula maxima, that is, the greatest of those Iles that bare the name of Britayne.

It is altogither impertinent to discusse whether Hercules came into thys Iland after the death of Albion, or not, although that by an auncient monument seene of late, and the Cape of Hartland in the West countrie, called Promontorium Herculis in olde tyme, diuers of our Bytishe writers doe gather great likelyhode that he shoulde also be here. But syth hys presence or absence maketh nothing wyth the alteration of the name of this our Region and Countrie, I passe it ouer as not incident to my purpose. Neyther will I spend any time in the determination, whether Britayne hath bene sometyme a pereell of the mayne, although it shoulde well seeme so to haue bene, because that before the generall flouode of Noah, we doe not reade of Ilandes. As for the speedie and timely inhabitation thereof, this is myne opinion, that it was inhabited shortly after the diuision of the earth. For I reade that when ech Captayne and his company had their portions assigned vnto them by Noah in the partition that he made of the whole earth among hys posteritie, they neuer ceased to trauayle and search out the vttermest boundes of the same, vntill they founde out their parts allotted, and had seene and vewed the limites thereof, euen vnto the very poles. It shall suffice therefore only to haue touched these things in this manner a farre of, and in returning to our purpose, to procéede with the reast concerning the denomination of our Iland, which was known vnto most of the Grékes for a long time, by none other name than Albion, and to say the truth, euen vnto Alexanders daies: notwithstanding that Brute, as I haue sayde, had chaunged the same into Britayne, manye hundred yeares before.

After Brutus I doe not find that any man attempted to chaunge it agayne, vntill the tyme that one Valentinus a rebell, in the dayes of Valentinianus and Valens endeuored to reygne there, and thereuppon as Ierome sayth, procured it to be called Valentia. The like also dyd Theodosius in the remembraunce of the two aforesayde Emperours, as Marcellinus saith, but as neyther of these tooke anye holde among the common sort, so it retayned stil the name of Britaine, vntill the reygne of Ecbert, who about the 800. yeare of grace, gaue forth an especiall Edict, dated at Wyncheſter, that it shoulde be called Angles land, or Angellandt, for which in our time we doe pronounce it England. And this is all, right Honourable, that I haue to say, touching the seuerall names of this Iland, vtterly misliking in the meane season their deuises, which make Hengist the only parent of the later denomination, whereas Ecbert, bicause his auncestours descended from the Angles (one of the seauen Nations that came wyth the Saxons into Britayne, for they were not all of one, but of diuers countries, as Angles, Saxons, Germaynes, Switchers, Norwegiens, &c. and all comprehended vnder ỹ name of Saxons, bicause of Hengist the Saxon & his cõpany that first arryued here before any of the other) and therto hauing now the monarchie & preheminẽce in manner of this whole Iland, called the same after the name of his Countrie from whence his originall came, neyther Hengist, neyther any Quéene named Angla, neyther whatsoeuer derivation ab angulo, as from a corner of the worlde bearing swaye, or hauing ought to doe at all in that behalfe.

AS fewe or no Nations can iustly boaste themselues to haue continued sithence their countrie was first replenished, wythout any myxture, more or lesse, wyth other people, no more can this our Iland, whose manifolde commodities haue oft allured sundry Princes and famous captaynes of the world to conquere and subdue the same vnto theyr owne subiection. Many sorts of people therefoꝛe haue comen hither and ſettled thẽſelues here in thys Ile, and firſt of all other a perſell of the linage and poſteritie of Japheth, Samothe-ans. bꝛought in by Samothes in the 1910. after the creation of Adam. Howbeit in pꝛoceſſe of tyme, and after they had indifferently repleniſhed and furniſhed this Iſlande with people (which was done in the ſpace of 335. yeares) Albion the Gyaunt afoꝛe mencioned repayꝛed hither with a companye of his owne race pꝛoceꝺing from Cham, and not onely Chemmi-nites. ſubued the ſame to his owne dominion, but bꝛought all ſuch in lyke ſoꝛt as he found here of the lyne of Japhet, into miſerable ſeruitude and thꝛaldome. After hym alſo, and wythin leſſe than fiue hundꝛed yeares came Bꝛitaines Bꝛute with a great traine of the poſteritie of the diſperſed Troianes in 324. ſhyppes: who rendꝛing the lyke curteſie vnto the Chemmi-nites as they had done afoꝛe vnto the ſeede of Japhet, bꝛought them alſo wholye vnder his rule and gouernaunce, and diuided the whole lande among ſuch Pꝛinces and Captaynes as he in his arriuall here had led out of Greeia with him.

Romaines. From hencefoꝛth I doe not finde any ſound repoꝛt of other natiõ, whatſoeuer that ſhuld aduenture hither to dwell, vntill the Romane Emperours ſubdued it to their dominion, ſauing of a fewe Galles, (and thoſe peraduẽture of Belgie) who firſt comming ouer to robbe and pilfer vpon the coaſtes, did afterwarde plant themſelues foꝛ altogither neare vnto the ſea, and there buylded ſundꝛy cities and townes which they named after thoſe of the maine, from whence they came vnto vs. But after the comming of the Romaynes, it is harde to ſay with how many ſoꝛtes of people we were daply peſtered, almoſt in euery ſeede. Foꝛ as they planted their foꝛwoꝛne Legions in the moſt fertile places of the Realme, and where they might beſt lye foꝛ the ſafegarde of their conqueſtes: ſo their armies did commonly conſiſt of many ſoꝛts of people, and were as I may call them, a confuſed mixture of all other coũtries. Howbeit, I thinke it beſt, bicauſe they did all beare the tytle of Romaynes, to retayne onely that name foꝛ them all, albeit they were wofull gueſtes to this our Iſlande: ſith that wyth them came in all maner of vice and vicious liuing, all ryot and exceſſe of behauioꝛ, which their Legions bꝛought hyther from eche coꝛner of their dominions, foꝛ there was no pꝛouince vnder them from whence they had not ſeruitours.

Scottes Pictes. Howe and when the Scottes ſhould arriue here out of Irelande, and from whence the Pictes ſhoulde come vnto vs, as yet it is vncertaine. Foꝛ although their hiſtoꝛies doe carie great countenance of their antiquitie and continuance in this Iſlande: yet (to ſay fꝛeely what I thinke) I iudge them rather to haue ſtolle in hither, not much afoꝛe the Saxons, than that they ſhould haue bene ſo long here, as from the one hundꝛeth yeare after Chꝛiſt. Reynulph Higden is of the opinion that the Pictes did come into this Iſland in the days of Seuerus, and that Fulgentius their captayne was bꝛother to Martia, the mother of Baſsianus. He addeth furthermoꝛe howe the Pictes foꝛſoke Baſsianus, and held with Caraũſius, who gaue thẽ a poꝛtion of Scotlande to inhabite, and thus wꝛyteth he. But if Herodian be well reade, you ſhal find that ẏ Pictes were ſettled in thys Ile, afoꝛe the time of Seuerus, & yet not ſo ſone as that Tacitus can make any mention of thẽ in the cõqueſt that Agricola his father in law made of ẏ Noꝛth parts of this Iſland. Neyther doe I reade of the Scots oꝛ Pictes afoꝛe the time of Antoninus Verus, in the begynning of whoſe thirde yere (which concurred with the yere of Lucius king of Bꝛitaine) they inuaded thys South part of the Ile, and were reduced to obedience by Trebellius the Legate. Certes the tyme of Samothes and Albion haue ſome likely limitation, and ſo we maye gather of the cõming in of Bꝛute. The voyage that Cæſar made likewyſe is certainely knowne to fall out in the 54. afoꝛe the birth of Chꝛiſt. In lyke ſoꝛt that the Saxons arryued here in the 449. The Danes, and with them the Gothes, Vandales, Noꝛwegians, &c. in the 791. Finally the Noꝛmans in 1066. And Flemminges in the tyme of Henry the firſt (although they came not in by conqueſt, but vppon their humble ſute had a place in Wales aſſigned them to inhabite in, by king Henry then reigning, after the dꝛowning of their countrie) it is eaſie to be pꝛoued. Li. 4. ca. 19.

But when the Pictes and Scottes ſhould enter, neither doe our hyſtories make any repoꝛt, neyther their owne agrée among thẽſelues by manye hundꝛeth yeares. Wherefoꝛe as the tyme of their arriuall here is not to be founde out, ſo it ſhall ſuffice to gyue notice that they are but ſtrangers, and ſuch as by obſcure inuaſion haue neſtled in thys Iſlande.

Saxons. The Saxons became firſt acquainted with thys Ile, by meanes of the pyꝛacie which they daily pꝛactiſed vpon our coaſtes (after they had once begunne to aduenture themſelues alſo vpon the ſeas, thereby to ſeeke out moꝛe wealth then was nowe to begotten in theſe weſt partes of the mayne, which they & their neighboꝛs had alreadie ſpoyled in moſt lamentable and barbarous maner) howbeit they neuer durſt preſume to inhabite in this Iſland, vntill they were ſent for by Uortiger to ſerue him in his warres agaynſt ỹ Pictes & Scottes: after that the Romaines had giuen vs ouer, & left vs wholy to our owne defence & regiment. Being therefore comen in thyer bottomes or kéeles, & in ſhort time eſpying the ydle & negligent behauiour of ỹ Brytons and fertilitie of our ſoyle, they were not a little inflamed to make a full conqueſt of ſuch as they came to ayde and ſuccour. Herevpon alſo they fell by little and little to the winding in of greater nũbers of their countrymen with their wyues and children into this region, ſo that within a whyle they began to moleſt the homelings (for ſo I finde ỹ word Indigena, to be engliſhed in an old booke that I haue, wherin Aduena is tranſlated alſo an homeling) and ceaſed not from time to time to cõtinue their purpoſe, vntill they had gotten poſſeſſion of the whole, or at the leaſt wiſe the greateſt part of our coũtry, the Britons in the meane ſeaſon being driuen eyther into Wales & Cornewall, or altogither out of the Iſlande to ſéeke newe inhabitations.

Danes. In like maner the Danes (the next nation that ſucceéded) came at the firſt onely to pilfer & robbe vpon the frontiers of our Iſland, till that in the end being let in by the Welchmen or Brytons to reuenge them vpon the Saxons, they no leſſe plagued the one then the other, their friendes, then their aduerſaries, ſéeking by all meanes poſſible, to eſtabliſh themſelues in the ſure poſſeſſiõ of Brytayne. But ſuch was their ſucceſſe, that they proſpered not long in their deuiſe, for ſo great was their lordlineſſe, their crueltie, and inſatiable deſire of riches, beſide their deteſtable abuſing of chaſt matrones, & young virgines (whoſe huſbandes and parentes were daily inforced to become their drudges and ſlaues whyleſt they ſate at home and fed like Drone bées of the ſweet of their trauayle & labours) that God I ſay would not ſuffer thẽ to continue any whyle ouer vs, but when he ſaw his time he remoued their yoke, and gaue vs libertie, as it were to breath vs, thereby to ſée whether this his ſharpe ſcourge coulde haue moued vs to repentaunce and amendement of our lewde and ſinneſull liues, or not. But whẽ no ſigne therof appeared in our hearts, he called in an other nation to vexe vs;

The Normans. I meane the Normans, a people of whom it is worthily doubted, whether they were more harde and cruell to our countrymen then the Danes, or more heauye and intollerable to our Iſlande then the Saxons or Romaynes, yet ſuch was our lotte, in theſe dayes by the deuine appointed order, that we muſt néedes obey, ſuch as the Lorde dyd ſet ouer vs, & ſo much the rather, for that all power to reſiſt was vtterly taken from vs, and our armes made ſo weake and feéble, that they were not now able to remoue the importable loade of the Normanes from our ſurburdened ſhoulders: And this onely I ſay agayne, becauſe we refuſed grace offred in time and woulde not heare when God by his Preachers did call vs ſo fauourably vnto him.

Thus we ſée howe from time to time this Iſlande hath not onely bene a praye, but as it were a common receptacle for ſtraungers, the naturall homelinges being ſtill cut ſhorter and ſhorter, as I ſayde before, till in the ende they came not onely to be driuen into a corner of this region, but in tyme alſo verie like vtterly to haue ben extinguiſhed. For had not king Edward ſurnamed the ſaint in his time after grieuous warres, made vppon them (wherein Earle Harald, ſonne to Godwine & after king of Englande was his generall) permitted the remnaunt of their women to ioyne in marryage with the Engliſhmen (when the moſt part of their huſbandes & male children were ſlayne with the ſworde) it coulde not haue bene otherwyſe choſen, but their whole race muſt néedes haue ſuſtayned the vttermoſt confuſion, and thereby the memorie of the Britons vtterly haue periſhed.

Whether it be likely that there were euer any Gyaunts inhabiting in this Iſle or not. Cap. 4.

BEſides theſe aforeſayde nations, which haue crept as you haue hearde into our Iſlande, we reade of ſundry Gyaunts that ſhoulde inhabite here, which report as it is not altogither incredible, ſith the poſterities of diuers princes were called by ỹ name: ſo vnto ſome mens eares it ſéemeth ſo ſtraunge a rehearſall, that for the ſame onely they ſuſpect the credite of our whole hyſtorie and reiect it as a fable, vnworthy to be read. For this cauſe therefore I haue nowe taken vpon me to make thys briefe diſcourſe inſuing, therby to proue, that the opiniõ of Gyaunts is not altogither grounded vpon vayne & fabulous narrations, inuented only to delite the eares of the hearers with the report of marueilous things. But that there haue bene ſuch men in déede, as for their hugeneſſe of perſon haue reſembled rather * highe towers then mortall men, although their poſterities are now conſumed, and their monſtrueus races vtterly worne out of knowledge.

* Eſay. 30. verſ. 25.

I dee not meane herin to diſpute, whether this name was giuen vnto them, rather for their tyrannie and oppreſſion of the people, then for their greateneſſe of bodie, or whether the worde Gygas doeth onelye ſignifie Indigenas, or homelinges, borne in the lande or not, neyther whether all men were of like quantitie in ſtature and farre more greater in olde tyme then at this preſent they be, and yet abſolutely I denie neyther of theſe, ſith very probable reaſons may be brought for eche of thē, but eſpecially the laſt rehearſed, whoſe confirmation dependeth vpon the authorityes of ſundrie auncient writers, who make diuers of Noble race, equall to the Gyauntes in ſtrength, and manhode, and yet doe not gyue the ſame name vnto them, bycauſe their quarels were iuſt, and commonly taken in hande, for defence of the oppreſſed. Example hereof, alſo we may take of Hercules and Antheus, whoſe wreſtling declareth that they were equall in ſtature & ſtomacke, ſuch alſo was the cōurage of Antheus, that being often ouercome, and as it were vtterly vanquiſhed by the ſayde Hercules, yet if he did eſtſones returne agayne into his kingdome, he furthwith recouered his force, returned & helde Hercules tacke, till he gate at the laſt betweene him & home, ſo cutting of the farder hope of the reſtoring of his army, and killing finally his aduerſarie in the field. The like doe our hiſtories repoꝛt of Corineus and Gomagot, who fought a combate hande to hande, till one of them was ſlayne, & yet for all this no man reputeth Corineus for a Gyaunt. But ſith I ſaye it is not my purpoſe to ſtande vppon theſe pointes, I paſſe ouer to ſpeake any more of them, and where as alſo I might haue proceeded in ſuch order, that I ſhoulde firſt ſet downe by many circumſtances, whether any Gyauntes were, then whether they were of ſuch huge & incredible ſtature, as the authours doe remember, and finally whether any of them haue beene in this our ylande or not, I proteſt playnly that my minde is not nowe bent to deale in any ſuch maner, but rather generally to confirme and by ſufficient authoritie that there haue bene mightye men of ſtature, and ſome of them alſo in Britaine, as by particular examples ſhalbe manifeſtly confirmed without ỹ obſeruation of any methode, or ſuch diuiſiō in the rehearſal hereof as ſound order doth require.

Antheus.

Corineus. Gomagot.

Moſes the Prophet of the Lord, writing of the ſtate of things before the floud hath theſe wordes in his booke of generations. In theſe daies ſaith he, there were Giaūts vpō ỹ erth, Beroſus, alſo the Chalde, writeth that nere vnto Libanus there was a city called Denon (which I take to be Henoch, builded ſomtime by Cham) wherein Gyauntes dyd inhabit, who truſting to the ſtrength and hugeneſſe of their bodies, dyd berye great oppreſſion and miſchiefe in the worlde. The Hebrues called them generally by the name of Enach peraduenture of Henoch the ſonne of Cain, frō whom that peſtilēt race at the flud deſcēded.

Anti.li.1.

And of theſe mōſters alſo ſome families remained vnto the time of Moſes, in compariſon of whom the children of Iſraell confeſſed themſelues to be but Graſhoppers, which is one noble teſtimonie that the word Gygas or Enach is ſo well taken for a man of huge ſtature, as for an homeborne childe, wicked tyraunt, and oppreſſour of the people.

Nu.cap.13 verſ.33.& 34.

Furthermore, there is mention made alſo of Og, ſometyme king of Baſan, who was the laſt of the race of the Gyaunts, that was left in the lande of promiſe to be ouercome by the Iſraelites, whoſe bedde was afterwarde ſhewed for a wonder at Rabbath (a citie of the Ammonites) and conteyned 9. cubites in length and 4. in breedth, which cubites I take to be geometricall, that is, eache one fyue of the ſmaller, as dyd thoſe alſo whereof the Arke was made, as our Diuines affirme.

Deut.3. verſ.11. Og of Baſan.

In the firſt of Samuell you ſhall reade of Goliath a philiſtine, the weight of whoſe Target or iacke was of fiue hundreth ſicles, or ſo many ounces, that is, 312. pounde after the rate of a ſicle to an ounce, his ſpeare was like a weauers beame, the onelye head whereof weighed 600. ounces of yron, or 37. pounde and a halfe engliſh, his height alſo was meaſured at 6. cubites and an hande breedth, all which do importe that he was a notable Gyaunt, and a man of great ſtrength to weare ſuch an armour & beweld ſo heauy a launce.

Cap.17. ver.4.5.6. Goliath.

In the ſecond of Samuell, I finde repoꝛt of 4. Gyaunts borne in Geth, of which the third was like vnto Goliath, & the fourth had 24. fingers and toes, whereby it is euident, that the generation of Gyaunts were not extinguiſhed in Paleſtine, vntill the tyme of Dauid, which was 2890. after the floude, nor vterly conſumed in Og, as ſome of our expoſitours woulde haue it.

Cap.21. ver.16. 17.&c.

Now to come vnto our chriſten writers, for although the authorities already alleged out of the worde, are ſufficient to confirme my purpoſe at the full, yet will I not let to ſet downe ſuch other notes as experience hath reuealed, onelye to the ende that the reader ſhall not thinke the name of Gyaunts, with their quantities, and other circumſtaunces, mentioned in the ſcriptures, rather to haue ſome miſticall interpretation, depending vpon them, then that the ſence of the text in this behalfe is to be taken ſimple as it lyeth.

S. Auguſtine

De ciuitate dei lib.15. cap.9. S. Augustine noteth how he saw the toth of a man, wherof he toke good aduisement & pronounced in the ende that it would haue made 100. of his owne, or any other mans that lyued in his tyme. The like hereof also doeth

Iohannes Boccatius. Iohn Bocase set downe, in the 48. Chapter of his fift boke, saying that in ỹ caue of a moũtayne, not farre from Drepanum, (a towne of Sicilia) the body of an exceeding high Gyaunt was discouered, thre of whose teeth did weigh 100. ounces, which being conuerted into English poise, doth yelde 8. pounde and 4. ounces, after twelue ounces to the pounde.

Mat. Westmon. The body of Pallas was founde in Italy, in the yeare of grace. 1038. and being measured it conteined 20. foote in legth, this Pallas was cõpanion with Æneas. There was a carcase also laid bare in England vpõ the shore, (where the beating of the sea had washed away ỹ yearth from the stone wherein it lay) & when it was taken vp, it conteined, 50. foote in measure, as our histories doe reporte. The lyke was seene in Wales, in the yeare. 1087. of 14 foote. In Perth moreouer a village in Scotlande another was taken vp, which to this day they shewe in a Church, vnder the name of little Iohn, being also 14. foote in length as diuers doe affirme which haue beholden the same. In the yeare of grace. 1475. the body of Tulliola daughter vnto Cicero, was taken vp and found higher by not a fewe feete then the common sorte of women liuing in those dayes.

Iohannes Leland. Masseus. &c.

Geruasius Tilberiensis. Geruasius Tilberiensis, hedde Marshall to the King of Arles writeth, in his Chronicle dedicated to Otho. 4. howe that at Isoretum, in the suburbes of Paris, he sawe the body of a man that was twentye foote long, beside the heade and necke, which was missing and not founde, the owner hauing peraduenture bene beheadded for some notable trespasse committed in times past.

Thomas Eliot. A carkasse was taken vp at Iupe Church nere Salisburye but of late to speake of, almost 14 foote long.

Leland. In Gilleland in Come Whitton paroche not far from the chappell of the Moze, fyue miles by East from Carleill, a coffin of stone was founde, and therein the bones of a man, of moze then incredible greatnes.

Richard Grafton. Richarde Grafton, in his Manuell telleth of one whose shinne bone conteined fyue foote, & his scul so great that it was able to receiue 5. peckes of wheate, wherefore by coniecturall symmetrye of these partes, his body must nedes be of 28. foote, or rather moze, if it were diligently discussed.

Siluester Gyraldus. The body of king Arthur being found in the yere 1189. was two foote higher than any man that came to behold ỹ same, finally the carcas of William conqueror was seene not many yeares since, in the Citie of Cane, twelue yn-ches longer, by ỹ iudgment of such as saw it, thã any man which dwelled in the countrey. Al which testimonies I note togither bicause they procede from Christian writers, from whome nothing shoulde bee farther or moze distant, then of set purpose to lie, & feede the world with Fables. Nowe it resteth furthermoze ỹ I set downe, what I haue read therof in Pagane writers, who had alwayes great regarde of their credit, and so ought all men that dedicate any thing vnto posteritie, least in going about otherwise to reape renowme and praise, they doe procure vnto themselues in the ende nothing else but mere contempt and infamy: for my part I will touch rare thinges, and such as to my selfe doe seeme almost incredible: howbeit as I find them, so I note them, requiring your Honour in reading hereof, to let euery Author beare hys owne burden, and euery one his bundle.

Constans fama Galorum.

Plutarche telleth howe Sertorius being in Libia, nere vnto the streetes of Maroco, caused the Sepulchre of Antheus, afore remembred to be opened, for hearing by common report that the saide Gyaunt lay buryed there, whose corps was 50. cubits long at the least, he was so far of frõ crediting the same, that he would not beleue it, vntil he saw the coffin open wherein the bones of the aforesaid prince did rest. To be short therefore, he caused his souldiers to cast downe the hil made somtime ouer the tombe, and finding the bodie in the bottome, after the measure thereof taken, he sawe it manifestly, to be 60. cubits in length, which were ten moze then the people made accompt of.

Philostrate in Heroices sayth, how he sawe the body of a Gyant 30. cubits in length, also the carkasse of another of 22. and the thirde, of 12.

Philostrate

Plinie telleth of an Earthquake at Creta, which discouered the body of a Gyant, which was 46. cubits in length after the Romaine standerde, and by dyuers supposed to be the bodye of Orion or Ætion.

Lib. 7.

Trallianus writeth howe the Athenienses digging on a time in the grounde to laye the foundatiõs of their new walles in the dayes of an Emperour, did finde the bones of Macrosyis in a coffin of harde stone, of 10. cubites in length after the accompt of the Romaine cubite, which was then a foote and an halfe & not much difference from halfe a yarde of our measure nowe in Englande. In the time of Hadriane the emperour the body of a Gyaunt was take vp at Messana conteining 20. foote in length, & hauing a double row of teeth, yet ſtanding whole in his chaps, In Dalmatia, manye graues were ſhaken open with an earthquake, in one of which aboue the reſt, a carcaſſe was found whoſe ribbe conteined 16. elles, after the Romaine meaſure, wherby ẏ whole body was iudged to be 64. ſith ẏ lõgeſt rib is cõmonly about ẏ fourth part of a man, as ſome Simmetricies affirme, Arrhian⁹ ſaith that in the time of Alexander the bodies of ẏ Aſianes were generally of huge ſtature, and commonly of 5. cubits, ſuch was the height of Pozus of Inde, whome Alexander vanquiſhed and ouerthrew in battaile. Sudas ſpeaketh in like maner of Ganges, killed likewiſe by the ſayd prince, who farre exceéded Pozus foz he was 10. cubits lõg. But of al theſe this one example ſhall paſſe, which I doe reade alſo in Trallianus ẏ he ſetteth downe in fozme and manner following.

A mouth of 16. foote wide.

In the daies of Tiberius themperoz ſaith he a cozps was left bare oz layde open after an erthquake of which eche toth cõteined 12. ynches ouer at ẏ leſt, now fozaſmuch as in ſuch as bée full mouthed eche chap hath 16. tæth at the leaſt, which is 32. in ẏ whole, néedes muſt the wydeneſſe of this mannes chappes be ſixetéene foote, and the opening of his lippes 10. A large mouth in mine opinion and not to fæde with Ladies of my time, beſides that if occaſion ſerued, it was able to receiue the whole bodye of a man, I meane of ſuch as flouriſh in our daies. Whẽ this carcaſſe was thus founde, euery man marueyled at it and good cauſe why, a meſſenger alſo was ſente vnto Tiberius themperour to know his pleaſure, whether he wold haue the ſame brought ouer vnto Rome oz not, but he fozbade them, willing his Legate not to remoue the deade out of his reſting place, but rather to ſende him a toth out of his head, which being done, he gaue the ſame to a cunning wozkeman, commanding him to ſhape a carcaſſe of light matter, after the pzopozcion of the toth, that at the leaſt by ſuch meanes he might ſatiſfie his curious minde, and the fantaſies of ſuch as are delited with newes.

A counterfeite made of a monſtrous carcaſſe by one toth taken out of ẏ head.

This man was moze fauozable to this mõſter then our paſtis were to the bodies of the dead who tare them in péeces to make money of thẽ.

To be ſhozt whẽ the ymage was once made and ſet vp an end, it appeared rather an huge colloſſy then the true repzeſentation of the carcaſſe of a man, and when it had ſtande in Rome vntill the people were wearye of it and thozowly ſatiſfied with the ſight thereof, he cauſed it to bé broken all to péeces, and the toth ſent againe to the carcaſſe from whence it came, willing them moreouer to couer it diligently, ẏ in any wiſe not to diſmẽber the cozps, noz from thenceforth to bée ſo hardie as to open the ſepulchze any moze. I could rehearſe many mo examples of the bodies of ſuch men, out of Solinus, Sabellicus Cooper, and other, but theſe here ſhall ſuffiſe to pzoue my purpoſe with all. I might tell you in like ſozte of the ſtone which Turnus thzewe at Æneas, which was ſuch as that 12. choſen and picked men (Qualia nunc hominum producit corpora tellus.) were not able to ſturre and remoue out of the place, but I paſſe it ouer, ẏ diuers of the like, concluding that theſe huge blockes were ozdeined and created by God: firſt foz a teſtimonie vnto vs, of his power and myght, ſecondly foz a confirmation that hugeneſſe of bodye is not to be accompted, of as a part of our felicitie, ſith they which poſſeſſed ẏ ſame, were not onely tyzauntes, doltyſh, and eupll men, but alſo oftentimes ouercome euen by the weake and feéble. Finally they were ſuch in déede as in whome the Lozde delited not, accozding to the ſaying of the Pzophet Baruch.

Vis vnita fortior eſt eadem diſperſa.

Ibi fuerunt gigantes nominati, illi qui ab initio fuerunt ſtatura magna, ſcientes bellum, hos non elegit dominus, neque illis viam diſciplinæ dedit, propterea perierunt, & queniam nõ habuerunt ſapientiam, interierunt propter ſuam inſipientiam. &c. Cap. 3. 36.

There were the Gyants, famous from the beginning, that were of ſo great ſtature ẏ ſo expert in warre. Thoſe did not the Lozde chooſe neither gaue he the way of knowledge vnto them. But they were deſtroied, becauſe they had no wiſedome, and periſhed thzough their owne folliſhneſſe.

Of the generall Language vſed from time to time in Britaine. Chap. 5.

Bzytiſh.

WHat language came firſt wyth Samothes ẏ afterwarde with Albion, ẏ the Gyants of his cõpanie, it is hearde foz me to determine, ſith nothing of ſound credit remayneth in wzitting which maye reſolue vs in the truth hereof, yet of ſo much are we certeine, that the ſpeach of ẏ auncient Bzitons, and of the Celtes had great affinitie one with another, ſo that they were either all one, oz at the leaſt wyſe ſuch as eyther nation wyth ſmal helpe of interpzeters might vnderſtand other, and readily diſcerne what the ſpeaker did meane.

Small difference betwene ẏ bzittiſh ẏ Celtike languages.

The Bzittiſh tongue doth yet remayne in that part of the Iſlande, which is nowe called Wales, whether the Bzitons were dzuẽ after the Saxons had made a full conqueſt of the other, which we nowe call Englande, although the pziſtinate integritie thzof be not a little a little diminiſhed by mixture of the Latine & Saxon ſpeaches, howbeit, many poeſies and writings, (in making whereof that nation hath euermore excelled) are yet extant in my time, whereby ſome difference betweene the auncient & preſent language, may eaſily be diſcerned, notwithſtanding that amõg all theſe there is nothing to be founde, which can ſet downe any ſounde teſtimonie of their owne originall, in remembraunce whereof, their Bardes & cunning men haue bene moſt ſlacke and negligent. It is a ſpeache in mine opinio much sauouring of that, which was ſometime vſed in Grecia, and learned by the reliques of the Troyanes, whyleſt they were captiue there, but how ſoeuer the matter ſtandeth, after it came once ouer into this Iſlande, ſure it is, that it could neuer be extinguiſhed for all the attẽpts that the Romains, Saxons, Normans, and Engliſhmen coulde make againſt that nation, in any maner of wyſe.

Petigrées & genealogies alſo the Welche Britons haue plentie in their owne tongue, inſomuch that many of them can readily deriue the ſame, eyther from Brute or ſome of his bande, euen vnto Æneas and other of the Troyanes, and ſo forth vnto Noah without any maner of ſtoppe, but as I know not what credite is to be giuen vnto them in this behalfe, ſo I dare not abſolutely impugne their aſſertions, ſith that in times paſt all nations (learning it no dout of the Hebrues) did very ſolemnely preſerue the Cataloges of their diſcent, thereby eyther to ſhew themſelues of auncient and noble race, or elſe to be diſcended from ſome one of the goddes.

Latine.

Next vnto the Britiſhe ſpeache, the latine tongue was brought in by the Romaines, whereof I will not ſay much, becauſe there are few which be not ſkilfull in ỹ ſame. Howbeit as the ſpeache it ſelfe is eaſie and delectable, ſo hath it peruerted the names of the auncient ryuers, regions, and cities of Britayne in ſuch wyſe, that in theſe our dayes their olde Britiſh denominations are quite growen out of memorie, and thoſe of the new latine, left as moſt incertayne. This remayneth alſo vnto my tyme, borowed from the Romaynes that all our dedes, euidences, charters, and writinges of recorde, are ſet downe in the latine tongue, and thereunto the copies and courtrolles, and proceſſes of courtes and leetes regiſtred in the ſame.

The Saxon tong.

The third language apparauntly knowen is the Scythian or highe Dutche, brought in at the firſt by the Saxons, an hard and rough kinde of ſpeach god wotte, when our nation was brought firſt into acquaintance withall, but now chaunged with vs into a farre more fine and eaſie kind of vtteraunce, and ſo poliſhed, and helped with new and milder wordes that it is to be auouched howe there is no one ſpeache vnder the ſonne ſpoken in our time, that hath or can haue more varietie of words, copie of phraſes, or figures or floures of eloquence, thẽ hath our Engliſhe tongue, although ſome haue affirmed vs rather to barke as dogs, then talke like men, becauſe the moſt of our wordes (as they doe in dede) incline vnto one ſyllable.

The Frẽche tong.

After the Saxon tongue came the Normã or Frenche language, ouer into our countrey and therein were our lawes written for a lõg tyme, our children alſo were by an eſpeciall decree taught firſt to ſpeake the ſame, and all to exile the Engliſhe and Britiſhe ſpeaches out of the coũtry, but in vaine, for in the time of king Edwarde the firſt, and towarde the latter ende of his reigne, the Frenche it ſelfe ceaſed to be ſpoken generally, and then beganne the Engliſhe to recouer and growe in more eſtimation then before, notwithſtãding that amõg our artificers, ỹ moſt part of their implements & tooles reteine ſtil their French denominatiõs to theſe our daies, as the language it ſelf, is vſed likewiſe in ſũdry courts, bookes and matters of law, whereof here is no place to make any farder rehearſall. Afterward alſo, by the diligent trauaile of Geffray Chauſer, and John Gowre in the time of Richard the ſecond, & after thẽ of John Scogã, & John Lydgate monke of Berry, our tong was brought to an excellent paſſe, notwithſtanding that it neuer came, vnto the type of perfection, vntill the time of Quẽne Elizabeth, wherein many excellent writers haue fully accompliſhed the ornature of the ſame, to their great prayſe and immortall commẽdation. But as this excellencie of the Engliſh tongue is founde in one, and the ſouth part of this Iſlande, ſo in Wales the greateſt nũber as I ſayde retayne ſtill their owne auncient language, that of the North part of the ſayd countrey, being leſſe corrupted then the other, and therefore reputed for the better in their owne eſtimation and iudgement.

The Cornish tõgue.

The Cornish and Deuonſhire men, haue a ſpeach in like ſorte of their owne, and ſuch as hath in dede more affinity with the Armoricane tongue, then I can well diſcuſſe of, yet in mine opinio they are both but a corrupted kinde of Britiſh, albeit ſo farre degenerating in theſe dayes, that if eyther of them do mete with a Welch man, they are not able at the firſt to vnderſtand one another, except here and there in ſome odde wordes, without the helpe of interpretours. And no marueile

in mine opinion that the Brittiſh of Cornewall is thus corrupted, ſith the Welch tong that is ſpoken in the north and ſouth part of Wales, doth differ ſo much in it ſelfe as the Engliſh vſed in Scotlande, doth from that which is ſpoken among vs here in this ſide of the Iſlande, as I haue ſaide already.

Scottiſhe engliſh. The Scottiſh engliſhe is much broader and leſſe pleaſaunt in vtterance, then ours, becauſe that nation hath not hitherto indeuoured to bring the ſame to any perfit order, and yet it is ſuch in maner, as Engliſhmen themſelues doe ſpeake; for the moſt part beyonde the Trent, whether the aforeſayde amendement of our language, hath not as yet very much extended it ſelfe.

Thus we ſée how that vnder the dominion of the kinge of Englande, and in the ſouth partes of the realme, we haue three ſeuerall tongues, that is to ſay, Engliſh, Brytiſh, & Corniſh, and euen ſo many are in Scotland, if you accompt the Engliſhe ſpeach for one: notwithſtanding that for breadth and quantitie of the Region, it be ſomewhat leſſe to ſée to then the other. For in the North part of the Region, where the wilde Scottes, otherwyſe called the Redſhankes, or Rough footed Scottes (becauſe they go bare footed & clad in mantels ouer their ſaffron ſhirtes after the Iriſhe maner) doe inhabite, they ſpeake good Iriſhe, whereby they ſhew their originall to haue in times paſt bene fetched out of Irelande.

The wilde Scottes.

Redſhāks. Rough footed Scots.

Iriſh ſpeche.

In the Iſles of the Orcades, or Orkeney, as they now call them, and ſuch coaſtes of Britaine as doe abutte vpon the ſame, the Gottiſh or Dainſh ſpeach is altogither in vſe, by reaſon as I take it, that the princes of Norway helde thoſe Iſlandes ſo long vnder their ſubiection, albeit they were otherwyſe reputed, rather to belong vnto Irelande, becauſe that the very ſoyle of them is enemie to poyſon, as ſome write, although for my part I had neuer experience of the truth hereof. And thus much haue I thought good to ſpeake of theſe fiue languages nowe vſually ſpoken within the limites of our Iſlande.

Into how many kingdomes the Iſle of Britaine hath bene deuided at once in olde time. Cap. 6.

Brittaine at the firſt one entier kingdome.

IT is not to be doubted, but that at the firſt the whole Iſlande was ruled by one onely prince, and ſo continued from time to time, vntill ciuile diſcorde, grounded vpon ambitions deſire to reigne, cauſed the ſame to be gouerned by diuers. And this I meane ſo wel of the time before the comming of Brute, as after the extinction of his whole race and poſterity. Howbeit as it is incerteine, into how many regions it was ſeuered after the firſt partition, ſo it is moſt ſure that this latter diſturbed eſtate of regiment, continued in the ſame, not onely vntill the time of Cæſar, but alſo in maner vnto the dayes of Lucius, with whome the whole race of the Britons had an ende, and the Romaynes full poſſeſſiō of this Iſlande, who gouerned it by Legates after the maner of a prouince. It ſhould ſeme alſo ỹ within a whyle after the time of Dunwallon (who rather brought thoſe 4. Princes that vſurped in his tyme to obedience, then extinguiſhed their titles, and ſuch partition as they had made of the Iſlande among thēſelues) eche great citie had hir frēdome and ſeuerall kinde of regiment, proper vnto hir ſelfe, beſide a large circuite of the country appertinent vnto the ſame, wherin were ſundrye other cities alſo of leſſe name, which ought homage & all ſubiection vnto the greater ſorte. And to ſay truth hereof, it came to paſſe, that eache region, whereinto this Iſlande was than deuided, toke his name of ſome one of theſe as many appeare by that of the Trinobantes, which was ſo called of Trinobantum the chiefe citie of that portion, whoſe Territories, contayned all Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Hertfordſhire, euen as the iuriſdictiō of the Biſhop of London is now extēded, for the ouerſight of ſuch things as belong vnto the Church. Eche of the gouernours alſo of theſe regions, called themſelues kings, and therevnto eyther of them daily made warre vpon other, for the inlarging of their limites. But foraſmuch as I am not able to ſaye howe many dyd chalenge this authoritie at once, and howe long they reigned ouer their ſeuerall portions, I will paſſe ouer theſe auncient times, and come nēerer vnto our owne, I meane the 600. yere of Chriſt, whereof we haue more certayne notice, & at which ſeaſon there is euident proofe, that there were 12. or 13. kinges reigning in this Iſlande.

Wales deuided into three kingdomes.

We finde therefore for the firſt, howe that Wales had hir three ſeuerall kingdomes, although that portion of the Iſlande extended in thoſe dayes no farder thē about 200. miles in length, & one hundred in breadth, and was cut from Lhoegres by the riuers Sauerne & Dée, of which two ſtreames this doth fall into the Iriſh ſea at Cheſter, the other into the mayne Ocean, betwixt Somerſetſhire and Southwales, as their ſeuerall courſes doe witneſſe more at large.

In the beginning it was deuided into two kingdomes onely, that is to ſay, Venedotia, Gwinhed, Gwinhed. Gwinhed, and Demetia, for which we now vſe moſt commonlye the names of South and North Wales, but in proceſſe of tyme a thirde ſprange vp in the verye middeſt betwéne them both, which from thencefoorth was called Powyſy, as ſhalbe ſhewed hereafter.

The firſt of theſe thrée, being called as I ſayd Northwales or Venedotia (or as Paulus Iouius ſaith Malfabrene, for he deuideth wales alſo into thrée regions, of whiche he calleth ỹ firſt Dumbera, the ſeconde Berfrona, & the third Malfabrene) lyeth directly ouer againſt ỹ Iſle of Angleſey. It containeth 4. regions, of which the ſayde Iſland is the firſt, & whereof in the chapter inſuing I wil intreate more at large. The ſeconde is called Arfon, and ſituate betwéne two ryuers, the Segwy & the Conwy: The thirde is Merioneth, & as it is ſeuered from Arfon by the Conwy, ſo is it ſeparated from Tegenia, (otherwyſe called Stradcluyd & Igenia the fourth regiõ) by the riuer Cluda. Finally the limits alſo of thys latter: are extended alſo, euen vnto the Dée it ſelfe, and of theſe 4. Regions, conſiſteth the kingdome of Venedotia, wherof in times paſt the region of the Canges was not the ſmalleſt portion.

Powyſy. The kingdome of Powyſy, laſt of all erected, as I ſayde, hath on the north ſide Gwinhed on the Eaſt (from Cheſter to Hereforde, or rather the Deane forreſt) Englande: on the ſouth and weſt the ryuer Wy, and very highe hilles, whereby it is notablye ſeuered from Southwales, the chiefe citie thereof being Shroplhyre, that nowe is inhabited with mére Engliſh, and where, in olde time the kinges of Powyſy dyd dwell and holde their pallaces. Upon the limits of this kingdome, and not farre from Holt caſtell, vpon eache ſide of the riuer, as the chanell nowe runneth, ſtode ſometime the famous Monaſtery of Bãgor, whyleſt the abated glory of the Britons, yet remayned vnextinguiſhed, & herin were 2100. monkes, of which, the learned ſort dyd preache the Goſpell, and the vnlearned laboured with their hands, therby to mainteyne themſelues, and to ſuſtaine their preachers. This Region was in lyke ſort deuided afterward in twaine, of which, the one was called Mailor or Mailroſſe, the other retayned ſtill hir olde denomination, & of theſe the firſt lay by ſouth, and the latter by north of the Sauerne, whereof let this ſuffice, ſith mine intent is not as nowe to make any preciſe deſcriptiõ, of the particulars of Wales, but onely to ſhewe, howe thoſe regions laye, which ſometime were knowen to be gouerned in that countrey.

Bangor.

The third kingdome is Demetia, or Southwales, ſometime knowen for the region of the Syllures, whereunto I alſo am perſwaded, that the Ordolukes lay in the Eaſt part thereof, and extended their region, euen vnto the Sauerne: but howſoeuer that matter falleth out, Demetia hath the Sauerne on hir ſouth, the Iriſh ſea on hir weſt partes, on the eaſt the Sauerne only, and by North the land of Powyſy, whereof I ſpake of late. Demetia.

Of this region alſo Caermarden, which the olde writers call Maridunum, was the chiefe pallace, vntill at the laſt thorowe forren and ciuill inuaſions of enimies, that the Princes thereof were conſtrayned to remoue theyr courts to Dinefar (which is in Cantermawr, and ſituate neuertheleſſe vppon the ſame ryuer Towye whereon Caermarden ſtandeth) where it is farre better defended with high hilles, thicke woodes, craggy rockes, and dœpe mariſes. In this region alſo lyeth Pembroke shyre, whoſe hauens haue bene in olde time very much regarded, and there in likewyſe is Milforde hauen, whereof the Welch wyſards doe dreame ſtraunge toyes, which they beléeue, ſhall one daye come to paſſe.

That Scotlande had in theſe dayes two kingdomes, (beſides that of the Orchades) wherof the one conſiſted of the Pictes, & was called Pightland or Pictlande, the other of the Scottiſh race, & named Scotland: I hope no wiſe man will readily denie. The whole regiõ or portion of the Iſle beyonde the Scottiſh ſea alſo was ſo diuided that ỹ Pictes lay on the Eaſt ſide, and the Scots, on the Weſt, eche of them being ſeuered from other, eyther by huge hilles or great lakes and riuers, that ran out of the South into the north betwéne them: Wherefore the caſe being ſo playne, I will ſay no more of theſe two but proceéde in order wyth the rehearſall of the reſt of the particular kingdoms of this our ſouth part of ỹ Ile, limiting out ỹ ſame by shyres as they now lye, ſo nere as I cã, for otherwiſe it ſhalbe impoſſible for me to leaue certaine notice of the likelieſt quantities of theſe their ſeuerall portions. Pictland. Scotland. Pictes. Scottes.

The firſt of theſe kingdomes therfore was begonne in Kent by Henghiſt in the 456. of Chriſt, and thereof called the kingdome of Kent: and as the limites thereof extended it ſelf no farther then the ſayde countie (ỹ chiefe Citie whereof was Dorobernia or Canterbury) ſo it endured well nere by the ſpace of 400. yeares, before it was made an Earledome, and vnited by Inas vnto that of the Weſt Saxons, Athelſtane his ſonne, being ỹ firſt Earle or heretoche of the ſame. Maiſter Kẽt Henghiſt.

Lambert,

Lambert in his hyſtorie of Kent doth gather, by very probable coniectures, that this part of the Iſlande was firſt inhabited, by Samothes, and afterwarde by Albion: but howſoeuer that caſe ſtandeth, ſure it is that it hath bene the onely doore, whereby the Romaines and Saxons made their entrie vnto the conqueſt of the region. And as this cannot be denyed, ſo it was the onelye place by which the knowledge of Chriſt was firſt brought ouer vnto vs, whereby we became partakers of ſaluation, and from the darkneſſe of miſty errour, true conuerts vnto the light, & bright beames of the ſhining truth, to our eternall benefit, and endleſſe comforts hereafter.

Southſax. Ella. The ſeconde kingdome conteined only Suſſex & a part of Surrey, which Ella the Saxon firſt helde: who alſo erected his chiefe pallace at Chichester, whē he had deſtroied Andredſwalde in the 492. of Chriſt, and after it had continued by the ſpace of 232. yeares, it ceaſed being the very leaſt kingdome of all the reſt, which were founded in this yle after the comming of the Saxons.

Eſtſax. Erkenwyn. The third regiment was of the Eaſt Saxons, or Trinobātes. This kingdome began vnder Erkenwyne, whoſe chiefe ſeate was in Londō (or Colcheſter) & cōteined whole Eſſex, & part of Herfordſhyre. It indured alſo much about the prieke of 303. yeres, & was diuided frō that of the Eaſt angles onely by the riuer Stour, as Houeden & other doe report, & ſo it continueth ſeperated from Suffolke euen vnto our times, although the ſayde riuer be growne very ſmall, and not of ſuch greatnes as it hath bene in times paſt, by reaſon that our Country men make ſmall accompt of riuers, thinking carriage made by horſe & cart to be the leſſe chargeable waye. But herein how far they are deceyued, I will elſewhere make manifeſt declaration.

Weſtſax. The fourth kingdome was of ỹ Weſt Saxons, and ſo called becauſe it lay in the Weſt part of the realme, as that of Eſſex did in the Eaſt, of Suſſex and South. It began in the Cerdȳc. yeare of grace 519. vnder Cerdyc, & indured vntil the comming of ỹ Normanes, including Wiltſhyre, Barkeſhyre, Dorſet, Southampton, Sūmerſetſhyre Glocterſhyre, ſome part of Deuonſhyre (which the Britons occupied not) Cornewal and the reſt of Surrey, as the beſt authours do ſet downe. The chiefe Citie of this kingdome alſo was Wincheſter, except my memory doe fayle me.

Bȳrnicia, alias Northumberland, Ida. The fift kingdome beganne vnder Ida, in the 548. of Chriſt being called now Northūberland becauſe it laye by North of the riuer Humber, it conteined all that region which as it ſhoulde ſeeme, was in time paſt eyther wholly appertaining to ỹ Brigants, or where of the ſayde Brigants, did poſſeſſe the greater part. The chiefe Citie of the ſame in like maner was Yorke, as Leyland and other doe ſet downe, who adde thereto that it extended frō the humber vnto the Scottiſh ſea.

Deira, Ella. Afterwarde in the yeare of grace 560. it was parted in twaine, vnder Adda, that yelded vp all hys portion, which laye betweene humber and the Tine vnto his Brother Ella (according to their Fathers appointment) who called it Deira, or Southumberlande, but reteyning the reſt ſtil vnto his owne vſe, he diminiſhed not his title, but wrote himſelf as before king of al Northumberland. Howbeit after 91. yeres, it was reunited againe, & ſo continued vntill Alfrede united the whole to his kingdome, in the 331. after Ida, or 878. after the birth of Jeſus Chriſt our Sauiour.

Eaſtangles Offa, a quo offelinge. The 7. kingdome, called of the Eaſtangles began at Norwitch in the 561. after Chriſt, vnder Offa, of whom they were lōg time after called Offelings. This included all Norfolke, Suffolke, Cābridgeſhyre, & Ely, & cōtinuing 228. yeres it flouriſhed only 35. yeres in perfite eſtate of Liberte, the reaſt being conſumed vnder the trybute and vaſſallage of the mercias, who had ỹ ſouereigntye therof, & helde it with great honour. Some take this region to be all one with that of the Iceues, but as yet for my part I cannot yelde to their aſſertions, I meane it of Lelande, himſelfe, whoſe helpe I vſe altogither in theſe collections, albeit in this behalfe I am not reſolued, that he doth iudge aright.

Mertia. Creodda. The 8. and laſt was that of Mercia, which indured 291. yeares, and for greatneſſe of circuit, exceeded all the reaſt. It toke the name eyther of Meare the Saxon word, becauſe the limits of moſt of the other kingdomes abutted vpō the ſame, or elſe for that the lawes of Mercia, were firſt vſed in that part of the Iſlande. But as the later is but a mere coniecture of ſome, ſo it began vnder Creodda, in ỹ 585. and indured well nere 300. yeres, before it was vnited to that of the Weſt Saxons by Alfrede, then reigning in the kingdome. Before him the Danes had gotten holde thereof, and placed one Ceolulphe an Ideote in the ſame, but as he was ſone reiected for his folly, ſo it was not long after ere the ſayde Alfrede annexed it to his kingdome.

Limits of Mercia. The limites of the Mertian dominiōs, conteined Lincolne, Northamptō, Cheſter, Darby, Nottingham, Stafford, Huntington Rutlande, Oxford, Buckingham, Worceſter, Bedforde ſhyres, and the greateſt part of Shropſhyre (which the Welch occupied not) Lancaſter, Gloceſter, Hereford (alias Hurchford) forde) Marwyc and Hertforde ſhyres, the reſt of whoſe territories were holden by ſuch princes of other kingdomes thorow force as bordered vpõ the ſame. And thus much haue I thought good to leaue in memorye of the aforeſaid kingdomes, not omitting in ỳ meane time somewhat here to remember of the diuiſion of the Iſland alſo into Prouinces, as the Romaines ſeuered it whiles they remayned in theſe parts. Which being done, I hope that I haue fullye diſcharged whatſoeuer is promiſed in the title of this Chapter.

The Romaines therefore hauing obteined the poſſeſſion of this Iſland, deuided the ſame at ỳ laſt into fiue Prouinces. The firſt whereof was named Britãnia prima, & conteined the eaſt part of England (as ſome doe gather) frõ ỳ Trent vnto ỳ Twede. The ſecond was called Valentia, & included the Weſt ſide as they note it, frõ Lirpole vnto Cokermouth. The thirde hight Britannia ſecunda, and was that portion of the Ile which laye Southwardes, betweene the Trent and the Thames. The fourth was ſurnamed Flauia Ceſarienſis: and contayned all the countrey which remayned betweene Douer & the Sauerne, I meane by ſouth of the Thames, and wherevnto in lyke ſort, Cornewall and Wales were orderly aſſigned. The fift and laſt part was then named Maxima Ceſarienſis, now Scotland. The moſt barren of all the reſt, & yet not vnſought out of the Romaines, becauſe of the great plentie of fiſhe and foule, fine Alabaſtar and harde Marble, that are ingendred and to be had in the ſame, for furniture of houſholde and curious buylding, wherein they much delited.

Of the auncient Religion vſed in this Iſland, from the comming of Samothes vnto the conuerſion of the ſame vnto the faith of Chriſt. Cap 8.

IT is not to be doubted, but at the firſt and ſo long as the poſteritie of Japhet onelye, reigned in this Iſlande, that the true knowledge and forme of religion brought in by Samothes, was exerciſed among the Britains. And although peraduenture in proceſſe of time, either thorow curioſitie, or negligence (ỳ onely corrupters of true pietie and godlyneſſe) it might a little decay, yet when it was at the worſt, it farre exceeded the beſt of that which afterwarde came in with Albion, and his Chemminites, as maye be gathered by vewe of the ſuperſticious rites, which Cham and hys ſucceſſours dyd plant in other countries, yet to be found in Authors.

Samothes.

What other learning Magus the ſonne of Samothes taught after his fathers death whẽ he alſo came to the kingdome, beſide thys which concerned the true honoring of God, I can not eaſily ſaye, but that it ſhoulde bee naturall Philoſophie, and Aſtrology (wherby his diſciples, gathered a kinde of foreknowledge of thinges to come) the verye vſe of the worde Magus, among the Perſians doth yeeld no incertaine teſtimony.

Magus.

In lyke maner, it ſhoulde ſeeme that Sarron ſonne vnto the ſayde Magus, diligentlye followed the ſteppes of hys father, & thereto opened Schooles of learning in ſundrie places, both among the Celtes and Britaines, whereby ſuch as were his Auditours, grewe to be called Sarronides, notwithſtanding, that aſwell the Sarronides as the Magi, (otherwiſe called Maguſei) & Druiydes, were generally called Samothei, or Semnothei, of Samothies ſtil among the Grecians, as Ariſtotle in his de magia, doth confeſſe, and calling them Galles, hee addeth thereunto that they firſt brought the knowledge of Letters, and good learning vnto the Greekes.

Sarron.

Samothei. Semnothei.

Druiyus the ſonne of Sarron (as a ſcholler of his fathers owne teaching) ſeemed to be exquiſite in all thinges, that pertayned vnto the deuine or humaine knowledge: and therfore I may ſafely pronounce, that he excelled not onely in the ſkill of Philoſophie: and the Quadriuialles, but alſo in the true Theologie, whereby the right ſeruice of God was kept & preſerued in puritie. He wrote moreouer ſundry precepts, and rules of religious doctrine, which among the Celtes were reſerued very religiouſly, and had in great eſtimation among ſuch as ſought vnto them.

Druiyus.

Howbeit and in what order this Prince left the ſtate of religiõ, I meane for thoſe publike orders in adminiſtration of particular rites and ceremonies, as yet I do not reade: howbeit this is moſt certayne that after he dyed, the purity of his doctrine began ſomewhat to decaye, for ſuch is the nature of man that it will not ſuffer any good thing long to remaine as it is left, but (either by additiõ or ſubſtraction of this or that, to or from the ſame) ſo to chop & chaunge withal, frõ time to time, that there is nothing of more difficulty, for ſuch as doe come after thẽ, then to find out the puritie of the originall and reſtore the ſame againe vnto hir former perfection.

Corrupters of religion.

In the beginning this Druiyus did preach vnto his hearers, that the ſoule of man is immortall, that God is omnipotent, merciefull as a father in ſhewing fauor vnto the godly, and iuſt as an vpright Iudge, in puniſhing of the wicked. That the ſecrets of mans hart are not vnknowen, and only knowen to him, and that as the worlde and all that is therein had their beginning by him, at his owne will, so shall all things likewise haue an end, when he shal see his time. He taught them also howe to obserue the courses of ỹ heauens, and motions of the planetes, to finde out the true quantities of the celestiall bodyes, and thereto the compasse of the earth, and hidden natures of thinges contayned in the same. But alas this integritie continued not long among his successours, for vnto the immortalitie of the soule, they added, that after death it went in to another bodye, the seconde or succedent, being alwayes, eyther more noble, or more vile than the former, as the partie deserued by his merites, whyleſt he liued here on earth. For said they (of whō Pythagoras also had, and taught this errour,) if the soule appertayned at ỹ firſt to a king, & he in this estate did not leade his lyfe worthie of this calling, it should after his decease be shut vp in ỹ bodie of a slaue, begger, cocke, Owle, Dogge, Ape, Horse, Asse, Worme, or Monster, there to remaine as in a place of purgation & punishmēt, for a certaine periode of time. Beside this, it should peraduēture sustaine often translation from one bodie vnto another, according to the quantitie and qualitie of his dooinges here on earth, till it should finally be purified, and restored againe to another humaine bodie, wherein if it behaued it selfe more orderly then at the firſt: after the next death, it shoulde be preferred, eyther to the bodie of a king, or other great estate. And thus they made a perpetuall circulation, or reuolution of our soules, much like vnto the continuall motion of the heauens, which neuer standeth stil, nor long yeld one representatiō and figure. They brought in also the worshipping of many goddes, and their seuerall sacrifices, they honoured likewyse the Oke, wheron the Mistle groweth, and daily deuised infinitie other toyes, (for errour is neuer assured of hir owne dooinges) wherof neyther Samothes, nor Barron, Magus, nor Dzuipus did leaue them any preſcription.

Strabo.li.4. Socion.lib. succeſſ. Cicero diuinat.1.

Plinius.lib. 16.cap.vltimo.

Oke honored wheron mistle did grow, & so doe our sorcerers euen to this day thinking some spirits to bealle about the same, for hidden treasure.

These things are partly touched by Cicero, Strabo, Plinie, Sotion, Laertius, Theophrast, Aristotle, and partly also by Cæsar, and other authours of later time, who for the most part do cōfesse, ỹ the chiefe schole of the Dzuipdes was holden here in Britaine, whether the Dzuipdes also themselues, that dwelt amōg the Galles, would often resorte to come by the more skill, and sure vnderstanding of the misteries of that doctrine.

Furthermore, in Britaine, and among the Galles, and to saye the truth, generally in all places where the Dzuipsh religion was frequented, such was the estimatiō of the Priestes of this profession, that there was little or nothing done without their skilfull aduise, no not in ciuill causes, pertayning to the regiment of the common wealth and countrey. They had the charge also of all sacrifices, publicke and priuate, they interpreted Dzacles, preached of religion, and were neuer without great numbers of yong men, that hearde thē with great diligence, as they taught, frō time to time.

Dzuipdes or Dzuipsh priestes.

Touching their persons also, they were exempt from all tempozal seruices, impositiōs, tributes, and exercise of the warres, which immunitie caused the greater companies of Scholliers to flocke vnto thē, from all places & learne their trades. Of these likewise, some remayned with them seuen, eyght, tenne, or twelue yeares, still learning the secretes of those vnwritten mysteries by heart, which were to be had amongst them, and commonly pronounced in verses. And this policie, as I take it, they vsed onely to preserue their religion from contempt, whereinto it might easye haue fallen, if any bookes thereof had happened into the hands of the commō sorte. It helped also not a little in ỹ exercise of their memories, whereunto bookes are vtter enemies, insomuch as he that was skilfull in the Dzuipsh religion, would not let readily to rehearse many hundzedes of verses, and not to fayle in one tytle, in the whole processe of this his laborious repetition. But as they dealt in this order for matters of their religiō, so in ciuill affaires, historical Treatises, & setting downe of lawes, they vsed like order and letters almost with the Grecians, wherby it is easy to be seene, that they retayned this kinde of writting frō Dzuipus (the originall founder of their religion) and that this yland hath not beene voyde of letters and learned men, euen sith it was firſt inhabited.

Immunitie of the clergy greater vnder Idolatry, then vnder the gospell.

After the death of Dzuipus, Bardus his sonne, and fift king of the Celtes succeeded not onely euer the sayde kingdome, but also in his fathers vertues, whereby it is very likely, that the winding and wrapping vp of the sayde Religion, after the afore remembred sorte into Verse, was firſt deuysed by hym, for he was an excellent Poet, and no lesse indued with a singular skill in the practise and speculatiō of Musicke, of which two many suppose him to be the very author and beginner, although vnluckily, sith both Poetry & Song, was in vse before the floude, as was also the Harpe and Pype, which Iubal inuented and coulde neuer be performed without great skil in musicke. But to proceede, as the chiefe estimation of the Druydes remained in the ende among the Britons only, for their knowledge in religion, so dyd the fame of the Bardes for their excellēt skill in musike, and Heroicall kind of song, which at the first contayned only the high misteries of their religion. There was little difference also betwæne them and the Druydes, till they so farre degenerated from their first institutiō, that they became to be minstrels at feastes, dronken mætings, and abhominable sacrifices of the Idols: where they sang most commonly no diuinitie as before, but the noble actes of valiaunt princes and fabulous narratiōs, of the adulteries of the gods. Certes in my tyme this fonde vsage, and therto the very name of the Bardes, are not yet extinguished amōg the Britons of Wales, where they call their Poetes & Musicions Barthes, as they doe also in Irelande. There is moreouer an Iland appertinent to the region of Venedotia, whervnto the Bardes of old time vsed to resorte, as out of the waye into a solitarie place, there to write and learne their songes by hearte, and meditate vppon such matters, as belonged to their practises. And of these Lucane in his first booke writeth thus, among other the like sayinges well towarde the latter ende also saying.

The Bardes degenerate.

Thus we see as in a glasse the state of religion, for a tyme after the first inhabitation of this Iland, but howe long it continued in such soundnesse, as the originall authors left it, in good soth I cā not say, yet this is most certaine, that after a time when Albion arriued here, the religion earst imbraced, fell into great decaye, for whereas Japhet and Samothes with their childrē taught nothing else then such doctrine as they had learned of Noah: so Cham the great grandfather of this our Albion, and his disciples vtterly renouncing to followe their steps, gaue their mindes wholly to seduce, and leade their hearers hedlong vnto all error. Wherby his posteritie not only corrupted this our Iland, with most filthie trades and practises, but also all mankinde, generally where they became with vicious life, and most vngodly behauiour.

What doctrine Chā and his disciples taught.

For from Cham and his successours, proceeded at the first all sorcery, witchcraft, and the execution of vnlawfull lust, without respect of Sexe, age, consanguinitie, or kinde: as braunches from an odious & abhominable rote, or streames deriued from most filthye and stinking puddles. Howbeit, and notwithstanding all these his manifolde lewdnesses, such was the folly of his Egiptians (where he first reigned and taught) that whilest he lyued they alone had him in great estimation, (whereas other Nations contemned and abhorred him for his wickednesse, calling hym Chemesenua, that is, the impudent, infamous and wicked Cham) and not onely builded a Citie vnto him which they called Chem Min, but also after his deth reputed him for a god, calling the highest of the seuen Planets after his name, as they dyd the next beneath it after Osyris hys sonne, whome they likewise honored vnder the name of Iupiter.

Chemesenua. Chemmyn. Chā made a god.

Certes it was a custome in Egypt of olde time, & generally in vse, (whē any of their famous worthy Princes dyed) to ascribe some forme or other of the starres vnto his persō, to thend his name might neuer weare out of memory. And this they called their translation in heauen, so that he which had any starres or forme of starres, dedicated vnto him, was properlye sayde to haue place amonge the goddes. A toye much lyke to the Catalogue of Romishe saintes, (although the one was written in the celestiall orbes, the other in sheepe skinnes, and verye brickle paper) but yet so estæmed that euery Prince woulde oft hazard & attempt the vttermost aduentures, thereby to winne such fame in his life, that after his death, he myght by merit haue such place in heauen, among the shining starres.

Translatiō of mortall men, men vnto heauē how it began.

Thus wee see how Idolatry and honoring of the starres was bredde and hatched at the first, which in procesle of tyme came also into Britaine, as dyd the names of Saturne, & Iupiter. &c. as shall appeare hereafter. And here sith I haue already somewhat digressed from my matter. I will go a little further, & shewe forth the originall vse of the worde Saturne, Iupiter, Hercules, &c. whereby your Honor shall see yet more into the errours of the Gentiles, and not onely that, but one poynt also, of the rote of all the confusion, that is to be found among the auncient histories.

Which were properly called, Saturnaloues, Iunones, and Hercules.

It was generallye vſed for a fewe yeres after the partition of the yearth, (which was made by Noah, in the 133. yere after floude,) that the beginners of ſuch kingdomes as were then erected ſhoulde be called Saturni. Hereby then it came to paſſe that Nimbrote was the Saturne of Babylon: Cham of Ægypt: and ſo forth other of other places.

Their eldeſt ſonnes alſo that ſucceéded them, were called Ioues, & their nephewes or ſonnes ſonnes, that reigned in ỹ thirde place Hercules, by which meanes it followed that euery kingdome had a Saturne, Iupiter & Hercules of hir owne, and not from anye other.

Iſis, Io and Iuno all one.

In lyke ſort they had ſuch another order among their daughters, whom they marryed as yet commonlye vnto their brethren (God himſelfe permitting the ſame vnto them for a time) as before the floude, to the ende the earth might be thorowly replenished, and the ſooner furniſhed with inhabitantes, in euery part therof. The ſiſter therefore & wife of euery Saturne was called Rhea, but of Iupiter, Iuno, Iſis, or Io. Beyonde theſe alſo there was no latter Herolde that woulde indeuour to deriue the petigrée of any Prince, or Potentate, but ſuppoſed his duety to be ſufficiently performed, when he had brought it orderly vnto ſome Saturne or other, whereat he might ceaſe, and ſhut vp all his trauaile. They had likewiſe this opinion grounded amongeſt them, that Heauen an Earth were onelye parentes vnto Saturne and Rhea, not knowing out of doubt, what they themſelues did meane, ſith theſe denominations, Heauen, Ogyges, the Sume, Pater Deorum, & ſuch like, were onely aſcribed vnto Noah: as Terra, (the Yearth) Veſta Aretia, the Moone, Mater deorum and other the lyke were vnto Tydea his wife, ſo that hereby we ſée, how Saturne is reputed in euery Nation for theyr eldeſt god, or firſt Prince, Iupiter for the next, and Hercules for the thirde: & therefore ſith theſe names were diſperſed in the beginning ouer all, it is no marueyle that there is ſuch confuſion in auncient hiſtories, and the doings of one of them ſo mixed with another, that it is now impoſſible to diſtinguiſh them in ſunder. Thys haue I ſpoken, to the ende that all men maye ſée what gods the Paganes honored, and thereby what religion the poſterity of Cham, did bring ouer into Britaine. For vntill their cõming, it is not likely that any groſſe Idolatry or ſuperſticion, did enter in among vs, as deifying of mortall men, honoring of the Starres, and erectiõ of huge Images, beſide ſorcery, witchcraft, and ſuch lyke, whereof the Chemminites are worthilye called the Autors. Neyther were theſe errors any thing amended, by the cõming in of Brute, who no doubt added ſuch deuiſes vnto ỹ ſame, as he and his company had learned before in Grecia, from whence alſo he brought, Helenus, the ſonne of Priamus, a man of exceéding age, and made him his Prieſt and biſhop, thorowout the newe conqueſt, that he had achieued in Britaine.

From whence Brute, did learne his religion.

After Brute, Idolatry and ſuperſticiõ ſtill increaſed more & more among vs, inſomuch that beſide the Druiyſh and Bardike ceremonies, and thoſe alſo that came in with Albion and Brute: our countrymen eyther brought hither frõ abroad, or daily inuented at home, new religion, and rites, whereby it came to paſſe that in the ſtead of the only & immortal God (of whome Samothes and his poſteritie dyd preache in times paſt) now they honored the ſayde Samothes himſelfe vnder the name of Dis: likewiſe Saturne, Iupiter, Mars, Minerua, Mercurie, Apollo, Diana, and diuers other. In lieu moreouer of ſhéepe and oxen, they offred mankind alſo vnto ſome of them, killing their offendours, priſoners, & oft ſuch ſtraungers as came from farre vnto them, by ſhutting vp great numbers of them togither in huge Images, made of wicker, or other matter: and then ſetting all on fire togither, they not onely conſumed the miſerable creatures to aſhes, but alſo reputed it to be the moſt acceptable ſacrifice that coulde be made vnto their Idols. Huge tẽples in like ſorte were builded vnto them, ſo that in the time of Lucius, when the light of ſaluatiõ began ſtrongly to ſhine in Britaine, thorowe the preaching of the Goſpell, the chriſtians diſcouered 25. Flamines or Idole churches, beſide three Arche Flamines, whoſe Prieſts were then as our Archebiſhops are nowe, in that they had ſuperiour charge of all the reſt, who were reputed as inferiours, and ſubiect to their iuriſdiction in caſes of religion, and ſuperſticious ceremonies.

Dis or Samothes, made a God.

Hitherto you haue heard of the time, wherin Idolatrie reigned and blinded the heartes of ſuch as dwelled in this Iſlande. Nowe let vs ſée the ſucceſſe of the Goſpell, after the death and paſſion of Ieſus Chriſt our Sauiour. And euen here will I beginne with an Allegation of Theodorete, whereupon ſome repoſe great aſſurance (conceyuing yet more hope therein by the wordes of Sophronius) that Paule the Apoſtle ſhoulde preache the worde of ſaluatiõ here, after his deliuerie out of captiuitie, which fell as I doe reade in the 57. of Chriſt. But ſith I cãnot verifie ỹ ſame by the wordes of Theodorete, to be ſpoken more of Paule then Peter, or the reaſt, I will paſſe ouer this coniecture, and deale with o-

Iosephus. That one Iosephus preached here in Englande, in the time of the Apostles, his sepulchre yet in Aualon, nowe called Glessenburg or Glastenbury, and Epitaphaffixed thereunto is prowe sufficient. Howbeit sith these things are not of cõpetent force to perswade all men, I wil adde in few, what I haue read elsewere of his arriual here. First of al therfore you shall note that he came ouer into Britaine, about the 64. after Christ, when the persecution began vnder Nero, at which time Phillip and diuers of the godly being in Fraunce (whether he came with other christians, after they had sowed the word of God in Scythia, by ye space of nyne yares) seuered themselues in sunder to make the better shift for their owne safegarde, and yet not otherwyse then that by their flight, the Gospell myght haue furtheraunce. Hereby then it came to passe, that the sayde Phillip vpõ good deliberation dyd sende Iosephus ouer, & with him Simon Zelotes to preach vnto the Britons, and minister the Sacramentes there according to the rites of the Churches of Asia and Greece, from whence they came not long before vnto the country of the Galles. And this is the effect in a litle rowme, of that which I haue reade at large in sundrye writers, although it may well be gathered that diuers Britains were conuerted to the fayth before this fyftiefoure of Christ. Howbeit wheras some write that they lyued, & dwelled in Britaine, it can not as yet take anye absolute holde in my iudgement, but rather that they were Baptized and remayned, eyther in Rome, or elsewhere. And of this sorte I suppose Claudia Ruffina the wyfe of Pudens to be one, who was a Brittish Lady in deede, and not only excellent in the Greeke & Latine tongues, but also with hir husbande highly commended by S. Paule, as one hauing had conuersation and conference with them at Rome, from whence he dyd write hys seconde Epistle vnto Timothy. Of this Lady moreouer Martial speaketh in reioysing that his Poesies were read also in Britaine, and onely by hir meanes, who vsed to cull out the finest of his Epigrammes and sende them to hir friends for tokens, saying, after this maner as himselfe doth set it downe.

Edita, cur Latiæ pectora plebis habet,

The names of hir three children were Pudentiana, Praxedes, and Nouatus, who after the deth of Pudens their father (which befell him in Cappadocia,) dwelled with their mother in Umbria, where they ceased not from time to time to minister vnto the Saincts. But to leaue this impertinẽt discourse, and procede with my purpose.

I find in the Chronicles of Burton (vnder the yeare of grace 141. and time of Hadriane the emperour) that nine Schollers or Clarkes of Grantha or Granta, nowe Cambridge, were Baptized in Britaine, & became Preachers of the Gospell there, but whether Taurinus Bishop, or Elder ouer the congregatiõ at Yorke (who as Vincentius sayth, was executed about this time for his fayth) were one of thẽ or not, as yet I doe not certeinly finde. Diuers other also imbraced the religion of Christ very zealously. Howbeit all this notwithstanding, the glad tidings of the Gospel had neuer free & open passage here, vntill the time of Lucius, in which the very enemies of the worde, became the apparant meanes (cõtrarie to their owne mindes) to haue it set forth amongst vs. For when Antoninus the emperour had giuen out a decree, that the Druiysh religion shoulde euery where be abolished, Lucius the king (whose syrname is nowe perished) toke aduise of his counsell what was best to be done, & wrought in this behalfe. And this dyd Lucius bycause he thought it impossible for man to lyue long without any religion at all. Finally finding his nobility and subiects vtter enemies to the Romaine deuotion (for ỹ they made so many gods as themselues listed & some to haue the regiment euen of their dyrt and dung) & thervnto being pricked forwards by such christians, as were conuersant about him, to chuse the seruice of the true God, that liueth for euer, rather then the slauish seruitude of any pagane Idole: he fully resolued with himself in the ende, to receyue & imbrace the Gospel. He sent also two of his learned christians and greatest Philosophers to Rome, vnto Eleutherus then Bishop there in the 177. of Christ not to promise any subiectiõ to his lie, which then was not required, but to sute with such as were picked in munde, Actes 2. vers. 37. Quid faciemus viri fratres, I meane that they were sent to be perfectly instructed, and with farder commission, to make earnest request vnto hym and the congregation there, that a competent number of Preachers might be sent ouer from thence, by whose diligent aduise

This is cõtrarie to ỹ common talk of our Atheistes who say let vs liue here in welth, credite & authoritie vpon earth, & let God take heede and his religion to himselfe to do withall what he listeth.

vse and trauayle, the foundation of the Gospell might surely be layde ouer all his kingdome, according to his minde.

The purpose of Lucius opened vnto ỹ cõgregation at Rome by Eleutherius.

When Eleutherus vnderstoode these things, he reioyced not a litle, for the great goodnesse which the Lord had shewed vpõ this our Ile & countrie. Afterwardes calling the brethren togither, they agreed to ordayne, euen those twa for Byshoppes, whome Lucius as you haue heard, had directed ouer vnto them. Finally making generall prayer vnto God and earnest supplication for the good successe of these men, they sent them home agayne, with no small charge, that they should be diligent in their function, and carefull ouer the flocke committed to their custody.

The first of these was called Eluanus a man borne in the Ile of Analon, and brought vp there vnder those godly Pastours and their Disciples, whom Phillip sent ouer at the first for the conuersion of the Britons. The other hight Medguinus, and was thereto surnamed Belga, because he was of ỹ towne of Welles, which then was called Belga. This man was trayned vp also in one schoole with Eluanus; both of them being ornaments to their borough ages, and men of such grauititie and godlinesse, that Eleutherus supposed none more worthy to support this charge, then they: after whose comming home also, it was not long ere Lucius and all his houshold with diuers of the nobility were Baptized, beside infinity numbers of the common people, which daily resorted vnto them and voluntarily renounced all their Idolatry and Paganisme.

In the meane time Eleutherus hearing of the successe of these learned Doctours & supposing with himself that they two only could not suffice to supporte so great a burden as should concerne the conuersion of the whole Iland. He directed ouer vnto them in the yeare insuing Faganus, Dinaw (or Dinauus,) Aaron and diuers other godly Preachers, as fellow labourers to trauayle with them in the Vineyarde of the Lord. These men therfore after their comming hyther, consulted with the other, and forthwith they wholly consented to make a diuision of thys Iland amongst themselues, appoynting what parcel eche Preacher should take, ỹ with the more profits and ease of the people, and somewhat lesse trauayle for themselues: the Doctrine of the Gospell might be preached and receaued. In this distribution also, they ordayned that there should be one congregation at London, where they placed Theonus as chiefe Elder and Byshop, for that present time. Another at Yorke whether they appoynted Theodosius. And the thirde at Caerlheon vpon the ryuer Vske, (which three cities had before time beene Archeflamines) to the end that the coũtries rounde about might haue indifferent accesse vnto those places, and therewith all vnderstande for certeintie, whether to resort for resolution, if after their conuersion they should happen to doubt of any thing.

Thus became Britaine the first Prouince, that generally receyued the faith, and where the Gospell was freely preached without inhibition of hir prince. Howbeit although that Lucius and hys princes and great numbers of his people imbraced the word with gredinesse, yet was not ỹ successe therof, eyther so vniuersal, that all men beleeued at the first: ỹ security so great, as that no persecution was to be feared from the Romaine empyre after his decease: or the proceeding of the king so seuere, as ỹ he inforced any man by publicke authoritie to forsake and relinquish his Paganisme: but only this fredom was enioyed, that who so would become a christian in his time, might without feare of his lawes profesſe the Gospel; in whose testimonie, if neede had beene, I doubt not to affirme, but that he would haue shed also his bloude, as dyd his Nece Emerita, who beyng constant aboue the common sort of women, refused not after his decease by fire, to yelde hir selfe to death as a sweete smelling sacrifice in the nostrels of the Lorde, beyonde the sea in Fraunce.

Britaine ỹ first Prouince that receyued ỹ Gospell generally.

Emerita nece vnto Lucius.

The fayth of Christ being thus planted in this Iland in the 177. after Christ and Faganus and Dinaw with the rest sent ouer frõ Rome, in the 178. as you haue heard: it came to passe in the thirde yeare of the Gospell receyued, that Lucius did sende agayne to Eleutherus the Byshop, requiring that he might haue some briefe Epitome of the order of discipline then vsed in the Churche. For he well considered that as it auayleth little to plant a costly Vineyarde, except it afterwarde be cherished, kept in good order, and such things as annoy, daily remoued from the same: so after Baptisme and entraunce into religion, it profiteth little to beare the name of christians, except we doe walke continually in the spirite, & haue such things as offende apparantly, corrected by seuere discipline. For otherwise it will come to passe, ỹ the wordes of vice, and vicious liuing, will so quickly abounde in vs that they will in the ende choke vp the good seede sowen in our mindes, & eyther inforce vs to returne vnto our former wickednesse with deeper security then before, or else to become meere Atheistes, which is a great deale worse.

Lucius sendeth againe to Rome.

Ro. 8. ver. 1

For this cause therefore dyd Lucius sende to Rome, the seconde tyme for a copie of such politicke politicke orders as were then vſed there, in their regiment of the Church. But Eleutherus conſidering wᵗ himſelfe, how that al nations are not of like condition, & therfore thoſe conſtitutions that are beneficiall to one, may now and then be preiudiciall to another: and ſeing alſo that beſide the worde no rites and orders can long continue, or be ſo perfect in all points, but that as time ſeruеth, they wil requyre alteration: He thought it beſt not to lay any more vpon the neckes of the newe conuerts of Britaine as yet, then chriſt & his Apoſtles had already ſet downe vnto al men. In returning therefore his meſſengers, he ſent letters by them vnto Lucius and hys nobilitie, dated in the Conſulſhips of Commodus and Veſpronius, wherein he tolde them that Chriſt had left ſufficient order in ỹ ſcriptures for the gouernement of his Church already in his worde, and not for that only, but alſo for the regimēt of his whole kingdome, if he woulde ſubmit himſelfe, to yelde & follow that rule. The Epiſtle it ſelfe is partly extaunt, and partly periſhed, yet ſuch as it is, and as I haue faithfullye tranſlated it out of ſundry copies, I doe deliuer it euen here, to the ende I will not defraude the reader of anye thing that may turne to his commoditie, in the hyſtorie of our nation.

„ to practiſe and put in vre within your realme
„ and kingdome. The Romaine lawes & thoſe

„ Gods mercy in the realme of Britaine the law and fayth of Chriſt, you haue with you both volumes of the Scriptures: out of them therefore by Gods grace and the Counſel of your realme take you a law, and by that law thorowe Gods ſufferaunce rule your kingdome, for you are Gods Vicar in your owne realme, as the royall Prophete ſayth. The earth is the Lords, and all that is therin, the cōpaſſe of the world, & they that dwell therein. Agayne thou haſt loued truth and hated iniquitie, wherfore God, euen thy God hath anoynted thée with oyle of gladneſſe aboue thy fellowes. And agayne, according to the ſaying of the ſame Prophete. Oh God giue thy iudgement vnto the king, and thy iuſtice vnto the kings ſonne. The kings ſonnes are the chriſtian people and flocke of the realme, which are vnder your gouernance, and liue, & continue in peace within your kingdome. * The Goſpell ſaith, as the Henne gathereth hir chickens vnder hir winges, ſo doth the king hys people. Such as dwell in the kingdome of Britaine are yours, whom if they be deuoyed you ought to gather into concorde and peace, to call them to the fayth and lawe of Chriſt, and to hys ſacred Church: to cheariſh and mainteyne, to rule alſo and gouerne them, defending eache of them from ſuch as woulde doe them wrong, and keeping them from the malice of ſuch as be their enemies. * Wo vnto the natiō whoſe king is a childe, & whoſe princes ryſe vp earely to banket & fēde, which is ſpoken not of a prince, that is within age, but of a prince that is become a childe, thorowe folly, ſinne and vnſtedfaſtneſſe, of whome the Prophete ſaith, the bloudthyrſty and deceitful men ſhall not lyue forth halfe their dayes. * By fēding alſo I vnderſtande glouttonie, by glouttonie, luſt, and by luſt all wickednеſſe, and ſinne, according to the ſaying of Salomon the king. Wyſedome entreth not into a wicked mind, nor dwelleth wyth a man that is ſubiect vnto ſinne. A king hath hys name of ruling, and not of the poſſeſſion of his realme, you ſhalbe a king whyleſt you rule well, but if you doe otherwyſe, the name of a king ſhall not remayne wyth you, but you ſhal vtterly forgo it, which God forbid. The Almyghty God graunt you ſo to rule the kingdome of Britaine, that you may reigne with hym for euer, whoſe Vicare (or Vicegerent) you are within your aforeſayd kingdome. Hitherto out of the Epiſtle that Eleutherus, ſent vnto Lucius, whereby many prety obſeruations are to be collected, if time and place, would ſeruе to ſtande thereon.

After theſe dayes, alſo the number of ſuch as were ordeined to ſaluation, increaſed dayly more and more, wherby as in other places of the worlde, the worde of God had good ſucceſſe in Britaine, in time of peace, and in heate of perſecutiō, there were no ſmal number of ſ Martyrs that ſuffered for the ſame, of which Albane, Amphibalus, Iulius and Aaron, are reputed to be the chiefe, becauſe of theyr Noble parentage.

There are which affirme our Lucius to renoun ce hys kingdome, and afterwarde become a Biſhop and Preacher of the Goſpell: but to thend theſe that holde his opinion may once vnderſtande the botome of their errors. I will ſet downe the matter at large whereby they may ſée (if they liſt to looke) how farre they haue bene deceiued.

I finde that Chlorus had by Helena thrée ſonnes, (beſide one daughter called Emerita) of which the name of the firſt is periſhed, the ſecond was called Lucion, and the thyrde

Constantine, that afterwarde was Emperour of Rome, by the election of the Soldiers. Now it happened that Lucion by meanes of a quarrell, that grew betweene him & his Elder brother did kil his said brother, either by a fray, or by some other meanes, wherupon his father exiled him out of Britō, & apointed him from thencefoorth to remayne in Fraunce. Lucion (or as some cal him also Lucius) being thus brought into worldly sorrowe, had now good leisure to meditate vpō Heauen, who before in his prosperity peraduenture, had neuer regard of hell. Finally he fel so far into ỹ cōsideratiō of his estate, ỹ at the last he renounced his Paganisme, and first became a christian, then an Elder, and last of all a Bysshop in the Church of Christ. He erected also, a place of prayer wherin to serue the liuing God, which after sundrye alterations, came in profesſe of tyme, to be an Abbay, and is still called euen to our time after Lucion or Lucius: the first founder thereof, and the originall beginner of anye such house in those partes.

In this also he & diuers other of hys friends, continued their times, in great contemplation and prayer, and from hence were translated as occasiō serued, vnto sondrye ecclesiasticall promotiōs in the time of Constatine his brother, so that euen by this short narration it is now easy to see that Lucius the kyng and Lucion the sonne of Chlorus, were distinct persons. Hereunto Hermānus Schedelius, addeth also howe he went into Rhetia, and there vnto the citie Augusta, conuerted the Curienses, vnto ỹ fayth of Christ, & there likewise lyeth buryed in the same towne, where his feast is holden vpon the thirde daye of December, as may redily be confirmed. That Schedelius erreth not herin also, the auncient monumets of the saide Abbaye, whereof he was the originall beginner, as I sayde, doe yelde sufficient testimonye, besides an Himne made in his commendation, intituled Gaude Luciomū &c. But for more of this you may resort vnto Boucher, in his first booke, & fifth chapter of the Annales of Aquiteine, who maketh the king of Britaine Grandfather to this Luciō. The said Schedelius in like sort setteth down, that his Sister was martyred in Trinecastell, nere vnto the place where the saide Lucion dwelled, wherby it appeareth in lyke sorte, that she was not sister to Lucius kyng of Britaine, of which prince Alexander Necham in his most excellent treatise de sapiencie Diuina setteth downe this Distichon.

But as eche Riuer the farder it runneth from the heade, the more it is increased, by small riuelettes, and corrupted with filthie puddles, and stinking gutters, that discend into the same: so the puritye of the Gospell, preached here in Britaine, in processe of time became first of all to be corrupted with a new order of religion, and most detestable heresy, both of them being first brought in at once, by Pelagius, of Wales, who hauing trauailed thorow Fraunce, Italy, Egypt, Syria, and the Easterlye regyons of the worlde: was there at the last made an Elder or Bishop, by some of the Monkes, vnto whose profession he had not long before addicted himselfe. Finally returning home againe, he dyd not onely erect an house of his owne order, at Bangor in Wales, vpon the riuer Dee, but also sowed the pestiferus seede of his heretical prauities, ouer all this Iland, whereby he seduced great numbers of the Britons, teaching them to preferre their owne merites, before ỹ free mercy of God, in Iesus Christ his son.

Bangor.

Thus haue ye seene howe newe deuises or orders of religion, and heresie came in together. I could shew also what Cometes, and strange signes appeared in Brytayne, much about the same time, the like of which with diuers other, haue beene perceiued also from time to time, sithence the death of Pelagius at the entrance of any newe kinde of religion into this Ile of Brytaine. But I passe them ouer, only for that I would not seeme in my tractation of Antiquities, to trouble my reader with the rehearsall of any newe inconueniences.

To proceede therfore with my purpose after these there followed in lyke sort, sundrye other kindes of monasticall life, as Anachorites, (or Ancres) Heremites, Cyrillines & Benedictines, albeit, that onely the heremiticall profession was allowed of in Brytaine, vntill the comming of Benedict Biscop, who erected the first house of Benedictines, that euer was heard of in this Ile. They also bare his name, and were so well liked of all men, ỹ there were few or no blacke monks in this Ile, but of his order. So fast also did these humaine deuises prosper after his time, that at their suppression in England & Wales only, there were founde 440. religious houses at the least, whereunto if you adde of those few ỹ are yet standing in Scotland, you shal sone see what nūbers of these drones of spirituall robbers were maintained here in Brytaine.

The number of religious houses in England & their dissolution.

As touching Pelagius the first Heretike that euer was breede in this Ile (notably knowen) and parent of Monachisme, it is certaine, that before his corruption and fall, he was taken for a man of singuler learning, deepe iudgement, and such a one, as vpon whome for his great gift in teaching and strictnesse

of lyfe, no small pece of the hope & expectation of the people did depend. But what is wisdome of the flesh, without the feare and true knowledge of God, and what is learning except it be handemaide to verifye and sounde iudgement. Wherfore euen of this man, we maye see it verifyed that one Roger Bakon pronounced long after. Of the corruption of his time, when all things were measured by witte and worldlye pollicye, rather then by the scriptures or Guidans of the spirit. Better it is saith hee, to heare a rude and simple Ideote preach the truth, without apparaunce of skill & learned eloquence, then a profound Clearke to set forth error, with great shewe of learning, & boast of filed vtterance. These follies of Pelagius, were blased abroade about the 400. of Christ, & from thencefoorth how his number of Monkes increased on the one side, & his doctrine on the other, there is almost no reader that is vnskilfull & ignorant.

Roger Bacon his saying of ỳ preachers of his time who were ỳ best layers & the worst Diuines.

This also is certaine, that within the space of 200. yeres and odde, there were more then 2100. monkes gathered togither in his house, whose trades notwithstanding the errors of founder, (who taught such an estimation of merite and bodily exercise, as Paule calleth it) as therby he sought not onely to impugne, but also preuent grace, which was in deede the originall occasion of the creation of hys house) were yet farre better and more godly, then all those religious orders, that were inuented of later time, wherein the professours lyued to themselues, their wombes and the licencious fruition of those partes, that are beneath the belly. For these laboured cõtinuallye for their owne liuings, at vacant times from prayer, and for the better maintenance, of such as were their appoynted Preachers. Their liues also were correspondent to their doctrine, so that herein onelye they seemed intollerable, in that they had confidence in their deedes, & that they had no warrant out of the worde for their succor & defece, but were such a plant, as the heauenly father had not planted, and therefore no meruaile, though afterwarde they were raysed by the rootes.

More the 2100 monkes in the Colledge or Abbay of Bangor

But as Pelagius and his adherentes, had a tyme to infect the Church of Christ in the Britaine, so the lyuing GOD hath had a season to purge the same, though not by a full reformation of doctrine, sith Germanus, Lupus, Palladius, Patricius, and such like leaning vnto the monasticall trades, did not remedy cõdemne the generall errors of Pellagius, one way as maintayne the same, or as euill optimõs another. For as Patricke seemed to like well of ỳ honoring of the dead, so Germanus being in Britaine erected a chappel to S. Albane, wherin Lupus prayed, as Palladius beheld the strictnesse of life, in monasticall profession to the vttermost of his power. Wherfore God purged his house, rather by taking away ỳ wicked, and pompous scholemaisters of errour, out of this lyfe: hoping that by such meanes, his people woulde haue giuen eare to the godly that remained. But when thys hys practyse coulde take no place, & the shepe of his pasture woulde receiue no wholesome admonition, it pleased his maiestie, to let thẽ runne on headlong from one iniquitie to another, insomuch that after the doctrine of Pelagius, it receiued that of Rome also, brought in by Augustine and his monkes, wherby it was to be seene, how they fell from the truth into heresye, & from one heresy still into another, till at the last they were drowned altegither, in the pitte of error, digged vp by Antichrist, as welles that holde no water, which notwithstanding to their followers seemed to be most sounde doctrine, and cisternes of liuing water to suche as imbraced the same.

Germanus, Lupus, Palladius, Patricius.

Augustine & Monke.

This Augustine after his arriuall, conuerted the Saxons in deede from Paganisme, but as the Prouerb sayth, bringing them out of Goddes kissing into the warme sunne, he also imbued them wyth no lesse hurtfull superstition, then they did knowe before: for beside the only name of Christ, and externall contempt of their pristinate Idolatrye, he taught them nothing at all, but rather I say made an exchange, from grosse to subtill trecherie, from open to secret Idolatry, and frõ the name of Paganes, to the bare title of christians, thinking this sufficient for theyr soules health, and the stablishment of hys monachisme, of which kynde of profession, the holye Scriptures of God can in no wyse allowe. But what cared he sith he got the great fish for which he did cast his hooke, & so great was the fishe that he caught in the end, that within the space of 1000. yeres, & lesse it deuoured the fourth parte and more, of the best soyle of the Iland, which was wholye bestowed vpon his monkes, and other religious brodes, ỳ were hatched since his time.

Augustine.

Whilest these things were thus in hande, in the south parte of Albion, the Meates, Pictes, and Caledonians, which lye beyonde the Scottish sea, receiued also the preaching of such christian elders, as aduentured thither daily, and not without great successe, and increase of perfit godlynesse, in that parte of the Ile. Certes this prosperous attempt, passed all mens expectatiõ, for that these nations were in those dayes reputed wild sauage, and more vnfaithfull and craftye, then well minded people, (as the wilde Irish are in my time) and such were they to say the truth, in deede, as neyther the sugred curtesye, nor sharpe swordes of the Romaines, coulde restreyne from their naturall fury or bring to any order. For this cause also in thend ỳ Romaine Emperours did vtterly cast them of as an vnprofitable, brutishe, and vntameable nation, & by an huge wall hereafter to be described, separated that rude companye from the milde and ciuill portion.

Scotlande conuerted to ỳ fayth of Chryst.

This conuersion of the north parts, fell out in the fyrst yeare before the warres that Seuerus had in those quarters, and 170. after ỳ death of our Sauiour Iesus Chryst. From thencefoorth also the christian religion contynued still among them, by the diligent care of their Pastors and Bysshops (after the vse of the churches of the south part of this Iland) tyll the Romaine shephearde sought them out, and founde the meanes to pull them vnto him in like sort with his long staffe as he had done our countrymen, whereby in in the ende he abolished the rites of the churches of Asia there also, as Augustine had done already in England: and in stede of the same did furnish it vp, with those of his pontificall Sie, although there was great contention, and no lesse bloudshed made amongst them, before it coulde be brought to passe, as by the Hystories, of both nations yet extaunt is easye to be seene.

Palladius.

In the time of Cœlestine Bishop of Rome, one Palladius, a Grecian borne, (to whome Cyrill wrote his Dialogue, de adoratione in spiritu) & sometime disciple to Iohn the 24. Bishop of Ierusalem, came ouer from Rome into Brytaine, there to suppresse the Pellagien heresye, which not a little molested the Orthodoxes of that Iland. And hauing done much good in the extinguishing of the afore sayd opinion there, he went at the last also into Scotlande, supposing no lesse, but after he had trauailed somewhat in confutation of the Pelagiens in those partes, he shoulde easilye perswade that crooked nation to admit and receiue the rytes of the church of Rome, as he woulde faine haue done before hande in the south. But as Fastidius Bishop of Londō, and his Suffragans resisted him here, so dyd the Scottish Prelates withstande him here also, in this behalfe: howbeit because of the authoritie of his commission, grauitie of personage, & the great gift which he had in the vayne of pleasaunt perswasion, (whereby he drewe the people after him, as Orpheus did the stones with his Harpe, and Hercules such as hearde him by his tongue,) they had hym in great admiration, & are nowe contented (& the rather also for that he came frō Rome,) to take him for their chiefe Apostle, reconing from hys comming vnto them, as from the fayth receiued, which was in the 431. yeare of Chryst, as the truth of theyr Hystory doth very well confirme.

The first attempt of the Bish. of Rome to bring Scotlande vnder hys obedience.

Fastidius Bishop of London.

Palladius, accompted for the Apostle of ỳ Scottes.

Thus wee see what religion hath from time to time beene receiued in this Iflande, and howe and when the faith of Chryst came first into our country. Howbeit as in processe of time it was ouershadowed, and corrupted with the dreames, and fantasticall imaginations of man, so it daily waxed worse & worse, till that it pleased God to restore the preaching of his Gospell againe in our dayes, whereby the man of sinne is nowe openly reuealed, and the puritye of the worde once agayne brought to light, to the vtter ouerthrowe of Sathan, and his Popish adherentes that honour him day and night.

Of the number and names of such salt Islands, as lye dispersed rounde about vppon the coast of Brytaine. Cap. 8.

There are neere vnto, or not verye farre from the coasts of Brytaine many faire Iflandes, whereof Irelande with hir neighbors, (not here handled) seeme to be the chiefe. But of ỳ reast, some are much larger or lesse then other, diuers in lyke sort enuironed continually with the salt sea, (whereof I purpose onely to intreate, although not a few of them be Ilands but at the flowde) & other finally be clypped partely by the fresh, and partly by the salt water, or by the freshe alone, whereof I may speake afterwarde.

Of these salt Iflandes, (for so I call them that are enuyroned with the Ocean waues) some are fruitefull in Wood, Corne, Wildefoule, and pasture grounde for Cattel, albeit that manye of them be accounted barren because they are only replenished with conies & those of sundry collors, (cherished of purpose by the owners, for their skinnes carcases, and prouision of housholde,) wythout eyther man, or woman, otherwise inhabitting in them. Furthermore, the greatest number of these Iflandes, haue Townes and parishe Churches, within theyr seuerall precinctes, some mo, some lesse: and beside all thys, are so inriched with commodities, that they haue pleasant hauens, freshe springes, great store of fishe, and plentye of Cattell, whereby the inhabitants doe reape no small aduantage. How many they are in nūber I cānot as yet determine, bycause myne informations are not so fully set down, as the promises of some on the one side, & myne expectation on the other, did did ertẽd vnto. Howbeit, ẏ firſt of al there are certeine which lie nẽere togither, as it were by heaps & cluſters, I hope man will redily deny. Of theſe alſo thoſe called ẏ Neſiadæ, Inſulę Scylurum, Sileuſtræ, Syllanæ, nowe ẏ ſorlings, and Iles of Silley, lying beyond Cornwall are one, and conteineth in number one hundred fourtye & ſeauen, (eche of them, bearing graſſe) beſides ſhelfes, and ſhallowes. In like ſort the company of the Hebrides are another which are ſayd to be 43. ſituate vpon the weſt ſide of this Iſland, betwẽne Ireland and Scotland, and of which there are ſome, that repute Angleſey, Mona Cæſaris, & other lying betwẽne them to be percell, in theyr corrupted iudgement. The thirde cluſter or bunche, conſiſteth of thoſe, that are called the Orchades, and theſe lye vpon the Northweſt point of Scotlande being 31. in number, as for the reaſt they lye ſcattered here and there, and yet not to be vntouched as theyr courſes ſhall come about.

Neſiadæ. Inſulę. Scylurum. Sileuſtræ. Syllanæ. Sorlingæ Sylley. Hebrides. Hebudes. Meuanie. Orchades.

There haue bẽne diuers that haue written of purpoſe, De inſulis Britanniæ, as Cæſar doth confeſſe. the lyke alſo maye be ſẽne by Plutarche who nameth one Demetrius, a Brytaine that ſhoulde ſet forth an exact treatiſe of eche of them in order, but ſith thoſe bookes are now perylhed, and the moſt of the ſayde Iſlandes remaine vtterly vnknowne, euen to our owne ſelues. I meane God willyng to ſet downe ſo many of them with their commodities, as I doe either knowe by Leland, or am otherwyſe inſtructed of, by ſuch as are of credite. Herein alſo I will touch at large ſuch as are moſt famous, and briefly paſſe ouer thoſe that are obſcure and vnknowen, making myne entraunce at the Thames mouth, and directing thys imagined courſe, (for I neuer ſailed it), by ẏ ſouth part of the Iland, into ẏ Weſt. Frõ thence in lyke ſort, I will proceede into the North, & come about againe by the eaſt ſide vnto ẏ fall of the aforeſaid ſtreame, where I will ſtrike ſayle, & ſafely be ſet a ſhore, that haue often in this voyage wanted water, but oftner bẽne ſet a groũde, eſpecially on the Scottiſh ſide.

In beginning therfore, with ſuch as lye in the mouth of the aforeſayde Riuer, I muſt nedes paſſe by the Hoo, whiche is not an Iſlande but (if I may giue ſuch pẽces a newname) a bylande, bycauſe we may paſſe thyther from the maine Ile, by an Iſthums or ſtrictlande, that is to ſay by lande, without anye veſſell, at the full Sea, or any horſe at the ebbe. It lyeth betwẽne Clyffe and the midway, that goeth alõg by Rochẽſter. Next vnto this we haue the Greane wherein is a towne of the ſame denomination, an Ile ſuppoſed to be foure miles in length, and two in breadth. Then come we to Shepey, which conteineth ſeauen myles in length, and three in breadth, wherein is a caſtell called Quinborowe, and a Parke, beſide foure Townes, of which one is named Minſter, another Caſtchurch, the thyrde Warden, & the fourth Leyden: the whole ſoyle being thoroughly fed with ſhẽpe, verye well wooded, and as I here belonging to the Lord Cheyney, as parcell of his his inheritaunce. It lyeth thirtẽne myles by water from Rochẽſter, but the Caſtle is fiftẽne, and by ſouth thereof are two ſmall Iſlandes, whereof the one is called Elmeſy, and the more eaſterly Herteſye. In this alſo is a towne called Hertie, or Hartie, and all in the Lathe of Scraie, notwithſtanding that Hartie lieth in the hundred of Fauerſham, and Shepey retaineth one eſpecyall Baily of hir owne.

Shepey.

Elmeſey. Hertſey.

From hence we paſſe by the Reculuers, (or territorie belonging in tyme paſt to one Raculphus, who erected an houſe of religion, or ſome ſuch thing there,) vnto a litle Iſland, in the ſtoure mouth. Herevpon alſo the Thanet abutteth, which is rather a bylande then an yland. Beda noteth it in times paſt to haue contayned 600. families, which are all one with Hidelandes * Plowghlandes, Carrucates or Temewares. He addeth alſo ẏ it is deuided from our continent, by the riuer called Wantſume, which is about three furlongs brode, & to be paſſed ouer in two places onely.

Sture ſey. Thanet.

* In Lincolnſhire the worde hyde or hidelande, was neuer in vſe in olde time as in other places but for hide they vſed the word Carucate or cartware, or Teme, and theſe were of no leſſe compaſſe then an hydeland.

But whereas Polidore ſayeth, the Tenet is nyne myles in length & not much leſſe in breadth, it is nowe reconed that it hath not much aboue ſeuẽ myles from Northmuth to Sandwiche, & foure in breadth, frõ the Stoure to Margate, or from the South to the North, the circuit of ẏ whole being 17. or 18. as Leylãd alſo noteth. This Iland hath no wood growing in it except it be forced, & yet otherwiſe it is very fruitfull, and beſide that, it wanteth fewe other commodities, the fineſt chalke is ſayde to be found there. Herin alſo dyd Auguſtine the Monke firſt arriue when he came to conuert the Saxons, & afterward in proceſſe of tyme, ſundry religious houſes were erected there, as in a ſoyle much bettered (as ẏ ſuperſticiors ſuppoſed) by ſteps of that holy man & ſuch as came ouer with him. There are at this tyme 10. Pariſh churches at the leaſt in ẏ Ile of Thanet, as S. Nicholas, Birchingtõ S. Iohns, Wood, or Wodchurch, S. Peters, S. Laurẽs, Mowntõ or Monketon, Minſter, S. Gyles and all Saints, whereof M. Lambert hath written at large in his deſcription of Kent, & placed the ſame in lath the of S. Auguſtine ſtine and hundred of Ringeſlow as may eaſily be ſéene to him that will peruſe it.

Rutupium, Sometyme Rutupium(or as Beda calleth it Reptaceſter)ſtode alſo in this Iſlande, but now thorowe alteration of the chanell of the Doure, it is ſhut quite out and annered to the maine. It is called in theſe daies Richeborow and as it ſhoulde ſéeme buylded vpon an indifferent ſoyle, or highe grounde. The large brickes alſo yet to be ſéene there, in the ruinous walles, declare eyther the Romayne or the old Brittiſh workemanſhip. But as time decayeth all things, ſo Rutupium is now become deſolate, & out of the duſt therof Sandwiche produced, which ſtandeth a full mile from the place, where Reptaceſter ſtode.

The olde writers affirme, how Ethelbert the firſt chriſtian king of Kent, did holde his pallace in this towne, and yet none of his coyne hath hitherto béene founde there, as is dayly that of the Romaynes, whereof many péces of ſilver and gold, ſo wel as of braſſe, copper, and other mettal haue often bene ſhewed vnto me. It ſhoulde appeare in lyke ſorte that of this place, all the whole coaſt of Kent therabout, was called Littus Rutupinum, which ſome doe not a little confirme by theſe words of Lucane, to be red in his firſt booke, ſome after the beginning.

Aut vaga cum Tethis, Rutupinaq; littora ferunt, Vnda Calidonios fallit turbata Brittannos.

The laſt verſe of one copie and firſt of another. Or when the wãdering Seas or Kentiſh coaſts doe worke, and Calidons of Brittiſhe bloude, the troubled waues beguyle. Meaning in like ſorte by the latter the coaſte néere Andredeſwalde, which in time paſt was called Littus Calidonium of that wood or foreſt, as Leland alſo confirmeth. But as it is not my minde to deale any thing curiouſly in theſe by matters, ſo in returning againe to my purpoſe, & taking my iorney toward the Wight, I muſt néeds paſſe by Seleſey, which ſometime as it ſhould ſéeme hath ben a noble yland, but now a Bylãd or Peninſula, wherin the chiefe Sée of the Byſhop of Chicheſter was holden by the ſpace of 329. yeres, & vnder 20. Biſhops.

Thorne. Next vnto this, we come vnto thoſe that lye betwéene the Wight and the mayne lande, of which the moſt eaſterly is called Thorne, & to ſay truth, ỹ very leaſt of al that are to be founde in that knotte. Being paſt the Thorne we touched vpon the Haling, which is bigger then the Thorne, and wherein one towne is ſcituate of the ſame denominatiõ beſide another, whoſe name I remember not. By weſt alſo of the Haling lieth the Port (the greateſt of the thrée already mencioned) & in this ſtandeth Portſmouth and Kingſtéed, wherof alſo our Lelande, ſayeth thus. Port Iſle is cut frõ the ſhore by an arme of the mainehauen, which breaketh out about thrée myles aboue Portſmouth & goeth vp two myles or more by north the grounde to a place called Portbridge, which is two myles frõ Portſmouth. Thẽ breaketh there out another Créke frõ the maine ſea, about Auant hauen, which gulleth vp almoſt to Portbridge, and thence is the ground diſcouered, ſo that Portſmouth ſtãdeth in a corner of this Iſle, which Iſland is in length fiue myles, and thrée myles in breadth, very good for graſſe & corne, not without ſome wood, and here and there incloſure. Beſide this there is alſo another Iſlãd north northweſt of port ile, which is now ſo worne and waſhed awaye with the working of the ſea, that at the ſpring tides it is wholly couered with water, and thereby made vnpaſſable. Finally being paſt all theſe, & in compaſſing this goulfe, we come by an other, which lyeth North of Hirſt caſtell, and ſouth eaſt of Kaie hauen, whereof I finde nothing worthy to be noted, ſauing that it wanteth wood as Ptolomie affirmeth in hys Geographicall tables of all thoſe Iſlands, which enuironne our Albion.

Port.

The Wight it ſelfe is called in latine Vectis, but in the Brytiſh ſpeach Guidh, that is to ſay éeſe or eaſie to be ſéene. It lieth diſtãt from the ſouth ſhore of Britaine (where it is narreſt of) by fiue myles & a halfe, but where it commeth néereſt, not paſſing a thouſande paces, and this at the cut ouer betwene Hirſt caſtell and a place called Whetwell chine, as the inhabitauntes doe report. It contayneth in length twentie myles, and in breadth tenne, it hath alſo the North pole eleuated by 50. degrées and 27. minutes, & is onely 18. degrées in diſtaunce, and 50. odde minutes, from the Weſt point as experience hath confirmed, contrarie to the deſcription of Ptolomie, and ſuch as followe his aſſertions in the ſame. In forme, it repreſenteth almoſt an egge, and ſo well is it inhabited with méere Engliſh at this preſent, that there are thirtie fiue Townes, Villages and Caſtels to be founde therin, beſide 27. Pariſh churches, of which 15. or 16. haue their Parſons, the reaſt eyther ſuch poore Vicares or Curates, as the liuings left are able to ſuſtayne. The names of the Pariſhes in the Wight are theſe.

It belongeth for temporall Jurisdiction to the countie of Hamshire, but in spirituall cases, it yeldeth obedience to the See of Chichester, whereof it is a Deanerie. As for the soyle of the whole Iland, it is very fruitful, for notwithstanding that the shore of it selfe be very full of rockes and craggy cliffes, yet there wanteth no plentie of cattell, corne, pasture, medow grounde, wildefoule, fish, fresh riuers, and pleasant woodes, wherby the inhabitants may lyue in ease and welfare. It was first ruled by a seuerall king, and afterwarde wonne from the Britons by Vespasian the Legate, at such tyme as he made a voyage into the West country. In processe of tyme also it was gotten frō the Romaines by Ceadwalla, who killed Aruald that reigned there, and reserued the souereingtie of that Ile to himselfe, and his successours. After Ceadwalla, Wolfride the Parricide was the first Saxon Prince, that aduentured into the Wight, whether he was driuen by Kenwalch of the West Saxons, who made great warres vpon him, and in the ende compelled hym to flye into this place for succour, as did also king Iohn, in the rebellious sturre of his Barons, practised by the clargie: the sayd Illād being as then in possessiō of the Fortes as some doe write that haue handled it of purpose. The first Earle of this Illande that I doe read of, was one Baldwijne de Betoun who maryed for his seconde wife, the daughter of William le Grosse Earle of Awmarle, but he dying without issue by this Lady, she was maryed ỳ second time to Earle Hawndeuile, and thirdlye to William de Fortes, who finyshed Shipton Castell, which hys wyues father had begunne about the time of king Richard ỳ first. Hereby it came to passe also, ỳ the fortes were Erles of Awmarle, Wight, and Deuonshyre a long time, till the Lady Elizabeth Fortes sole heire to all those possessions came to age, with whō king Edward the thirde so preuayled therow money and fayre wordes, that he gate the possession of the Wight wholly into his handes. After we be past the Wight, we go forwarde and come vnto Poole hauen, wherein is an Ile, called Brunt Keysi, in which was sometime a Parishe church, and yet a chappell at this present as I here. There are also two other Iles but I know not their names.

We haue after wee are passed by these another Ile, also vpō the coast named Portland not farre from Waymouth a prety fertile peece though wout wode, of 10. myles in circuite, now well inhabited, but much better heretofore, & yet are there about 80. householdes in it. There is also but one streete of houses therin, the reast are dispersed, howbeit they belong all to ons Parishe Church, whereas in time past there were two within the compasse of the same. There is also a Castell of the kings, who is Lord of the Ile, although the bishop of Winchester be patrone of the Church, the personage whereof is the fairest house in al the peece. The people there are excellent slingers of stones, which feate they vse for the defence of their Illande, and yet otherwise very couetous. And wheras in tyme past they lyued onely by fishing, now they fall to tillage, their fire bote is brought out of the wight, and other places, yet do they burne much cowdung, dryed in the sonne: for there is I say no wood in ỳ Ile, except a few elmes that be about the church. There would some growe there, no doubt if they were willing to plant it, although the soyle lye very bleake & open. It is not long since this was vnited to the mayne, and likely ere long to be cut of againe. Being past thys we rayse another, also in the mouth of the Sowy, betwene Colfforde & Lime, of which for the smalnesse therof I make no great accompt. Wherfore giuing ouer to intreate anye farder of it I call about to Gersey, and Gerneley, which Iles with their appurtenaunces appertayned in tymes past to the Dukes of Normandye, but now they remayne to our Quēne, as percell of Hamshyre and belonging to hir Crowne, by meanes of a composition made, betwēne king Iohn of England, & the king of Fraunce, when the Dominions of the said Prince began so fast to decrease, as Thomas Sulmo sayth.

Portland.

Gersey.

Garneley.

Of these two, Gersey is the greatest, as an Illād hauing 30. miles in cōpas, as most men doe cōiecture. There are likewise in the same twelue Parish Churches, wyth a Colledge, which hath a Deane and Prebendes. It is distaunt from Gerneley full 21. myles, or thereaboutes. In this latter also, there haue bene in times past, fiue religious houses and nyne Castelles, howbeit in these dayes there is but one Parish church left standing in the same. There are also certayne other small Illands, which Henry the second in his Donation calleth Insuletas (beside very many rocks) whereof one called S. Heleries (wherein sometyme was a Monastery) is fast vpon Gersey, another is named ỳ Cornet, which hath a Castell not not passing an arrow shote frō Gersey. The Serke also is betweene both, which is .ix. myles about, and hath another annexed to it by an Isthmus or Strialande, wherein was a religious house, and therewith all great store of conyes.

Serke.

Brehot. Gytho. Herme.

There is also the Brehot, the Gytho, and the Herme, which latter is foure myles in compasse, and therein was sometyme a Chanonry, that afterwarde was conuerted into an house of Franciscanes. There are two other likewyse nere vnto that of S. Helerie of whose names I haue no notice. There is also the rockye Isle, of Burhow, but nowe the Isle of Rattes (so called of the huge plentie of Rattes that are founde there, though otherwise it be replenished with infinite store of Conyes, betweene whome and the Rattes, as I coniecture those which we call Turkie conies are oftentimes produced among those few houses that are to be seene in this Iland.

Burho als. the Isle of Rattes.

Alderney. Beside this there is moreouer the Isle of Alderney a very pretie Plot, about seuen miles in compasse, wherein a Priest not long since did find a coffin of stone, in which lay ỳ body of and huge Gyaunt, whose fore teeth were so bygge as a mans fist, as Leland doth report.

Certes this to me is no marueile at al, sith I haue read of greater, and mencioned them already in the beginning of this booke. Such a one, also haue they in Spayne, whereunto they go in pilgrimage as vnto S. Christophers tooth, but it was one of his eye teeth, if Lodouicus Viues say true, who went hither to offer vnto ỳ same. S. August writeth in like sorte, of such another found vpō the cost of Vtica, and thereby not onely gathered that all men were not onely farre greater then they be now, but also the Giaunts farre exceeding the huge stature of the highest of them all. Homere complayneth that men in his time were but Dwarfes in comparison of such as lyued in the warres of Troy. See his fift Iliade, where he speaketh of Diomedes & how he threw a stone at Æneas, (which 14. men of his time were not able to turne) & therewith did hit hym on the thighe & ouerthrowe him. Virgile also noteth no lesse, but Iuuenall briefly comprehendeth all this in his 15. Satyra, where he sayth.

Saxa inclinatis per humum quæsita lacertis
Incipiunt torquere, domestica seditione
Tela, nec hunc lapidem, quali se Turnus, & Aiax,
Et quo Tytides percussit pondere coxam
Æneæ: sed quem valeant emittere dextræ
Illis dissimiles, & nostro tempore natæ.
Nam genus hoc vino iam decrescebat Homero.

Terra malos homines nunc educat, atq; pusillos.
Ergo Deus quicunq; aspexit, ridet, & odit.

But to returne agayne vnto the Isle of Alderney frōwhence I haue digressed. Herein also is a pretie towne with a Parish church, great plentie of Corne, Cattell, Conyes, and wildefoule, whereby the inhabitauntes doe reape much gayne and commoditie, onelye wood is theyr want, which they otherwyse supply. The language also of such as dwel in these Iles, is Frenche, but the attire of those ỳ liued in Gerneley & Gersey, vntil the time of King Henry the eyght, was al after the Irish guyse. The Isle of Gerneley also was sore spoyled by the Frenche 1371. & left so desolate that onely one castell remained therein vntouched.

Beyonde thys and nére vnto the coast of Englande (for these doe lye about the verye middest of the Brittish sea) we haue one Iſlande called the Bruch or the Bruchsey, lying about two myles from Pole, whether men sayle from the Fromouth, & wherin is nought else, but an olde Chappell, without other housing.

Bruchsey.

Next to this also are certaine rocks, which some take for Iles, as Illestō rocke nere vnto Peritozie, Horsan Isle a myle from Peritozie by South, Blacke rocke Isle, South east from Perytozie toward Tergnemouth, and also Chester, otherwyse called Plegynnidham: but howe (to saye truth) or where this latter lieth, I cānot make report, as yet, & sith Leland noteth them togither, I thinke it not my part to make separation of them.

From hence the next Isle is called Mount Iſland, otherwise Mowtland, scituate ouer against Lough, about two myles from the shore, and well nére, three myles in compasse. This Iſland hath no inhabitants, but onely the Warrenner & his dogge, who longeth vnto the Conies there: notwithstanding that vpō the coast therof in time of the yere, great store of Pylchardes is taken, and caryed from thence into many places of our coūtrey. It hath also a fresh Well comming out of the rockes, which is worthy to be noted in so small a cōpasse of ground. Moreouer in the mouth of the créeke that leadeth vnto Lough, or Low, as some call it, there is another little Iſlande of about eight Acres of groūde called S. Nicholas Isle, and midwaye betweene Falmouth, and Dudman, (a certayne Promontorie) is such another named the Grese, wherein is great store of Gulles & sea foule. As for Inis Prynin, it lyeth within the Baye about three myles from Lizardes, & containeth not aboue two Acres of groūd, from from which Newlyn is not farre distaunt, & wherein is a poze fysher towne and a fayze Welspring, whereof as yet no writer hath made mention. After these (omitting pendinant in ỳ point of Falmouth haue) we came at last to saint Michaels moũt, whrof I find this description readye to my handes in Lelande. The compasse of the rote of the Moũt of saint Michael is not much moze then halfe a myle, and of this the South part is pasturable and bzeedeth Conyes, the residue high and rocky. In the Nozth side thereof also is a Garden, with certayne houses and shoppes foz fishermen. Furthermoze, the way to the Mountaine lieth at the Nozth side, and is frequented from halfe ebbe to halfe floud, the entraunce beginning at the sote of the Hyll, & so ascending by steps and greces westward, first, and then Eastward to the vtterward of the Church. Within the same ward also is a Court strongly walled, wherin on the south side is a Chappell of S. Michaell, and in the East side another of our Lady. Many times a man maye come to the hill on sote. On the Nozth Nozthwest side hereof also, is a Piere foz botes and ships, and in the baye betwixt the Mount & Pensantz are séene at the lowe water marke, diuers rotes and stubbes of træs, beside hewen stone, sometimes of dozes and windowes, which are perceyued in the inner part of the Way, and import that there hath not onely béene buylding, but also firme ground there, whereas the Salt water doth now rule & beare the mastery. Beyond this is an other litle Ile, called S. Clemẽts Ile, of a Chappell there dedicated to that Saint. It hath a litle beyond it, Nowshole, which is not touched in any Card. As foz Nowshole it self it is a towne of the maine, called in Coznish poze Enis, that is, portus insule, & in tinne wozkes néere vnto the same, there hath bene founde of late, speare heddes, battaile axes, & swozds of Copper, wzapped vp in linnen and scarsely hurt with rust oz other hinderance. Certes the sea hath won very much in this corner of our Iland, but chiefly betwéene Nowshole Pensardes.

Hauing thus passed ouer very néere all such Iles, as lye vppon the south coast of Bzytaine, and nowe being come vnto the west part of our coũtry, a sodeyne Pirry catcheth holde of vs (as it did before, when we went to Cersy) and carpeth vs yet moze westerlye amõg the flattes of Sylly. Such foze doth the southeast winde often showe vpon poze trauelers in those parties, as the south & southwest, doth vpon straungers against the Bzytish coast, that are not skilfull of our rodes, and herbozowes. Howbeit such was our successe in this voyage, that we feared no rocks, (moze then did king Athelstane, when he subdued thẽ) noz any tempest of weather in those partes, that coulde annoy our passage. Perusing therefoze the periles whereinto we were pitifully plonged: we founde the Syllane Ilandes (places often robbed by the Frenchmen and Spanyardes) to lye distaunt from the poynt of Cornewall, about thzée oz foure houres sayling, oz twentie Englyshe miles, as some men doe account it. There are of these as I sayde, to the number of one hundzeth fozty seauen in sight, whereof eche one is greater oz lesse then other, and most of them sometime inhabited, howbeit, there are twentie of them, which foz their greatnesse & commodities, excéede all the reast. Therto (if you respect their position) they are scituate in manner of a circle, oz ring, hauing an huge lake, oz portion of the sea in the middest of them, which is not without perill, to such as with small aduisement enter into the same. Certes it passeth my cunning, either to name oz to describe all these one hundzeth fourtie seauen, accozding to their estate, neither haue I had any infozmation of them, moze then I haue gathered by Leyland, oz gotten out of a Mappe of their descriptiõ, which I had, sometyme of Reynolde Wolfe: wherefoze omitting as it were all the ragges, and such as are not wozthy to haue any time spent about their particular descriptions, I will only touch the greatest and those that ly togither, (as I said) in maner of a roundell.

King Athelstane hauing subdued the Syllane Iles, builded a Colledge of Priests at S. Burien, in perfourmance of his vowe, made whẽ he enterprised this voyage, foz his safe returne.

The first and greatest of these therefoze, called S. Maries Ile, is about fiue miles ouer, oz nyne myles in compasse. Therein also is a parishe Church, and a poze Towne belonging thereto, of thzéscoze houholdes, beside a castel, plẽtie of Cozne, Conies, wilde Swannes, Puffens, Gulles, Cranes, & other kindes of Foule, in great abundãce. This fertile Ilãd being thus viewed, we sailed southwards by the nozman rocke, & S. Maries founde vnto Agnus Ile, which is fiue myles ouer, & hath in lyke sorte one Towne oz Parishe within the same of fiue oz sixe houholdes, beside no small stoze of Hogs, & Conies, of sundzy coulours, very profitable to thyz owners. It is not long since this Ile was left desolate, foz whẽ ỳ inhabitãts therof, returned frõ a feast holden in S. Maries Ile, they were al dzowned and not one person left a liue. There are also two other small Ilandes, betwéene this & the Annot, wherof I finde nothing wozthy relation, foz as both of them ioyned together are not comparable, to the sayde Annot foz greatnesse and circuite, so they want both Hogges and Conies, whereof Annot hath great

There is moreouer the Minwiſand, from whence we paſſe by the Smithy ſounde, (leauing three little Iſlandes on the left hande, vnto the Suartigan Iſlande, then to Rouſuian, Rouſuiar, and the Cregwin, which ſeauen are for ỹ moſt part, replenished with Conies only, and wilde Carlike, but voyde of wood, and other commodities, ſauyng of a ſhort kinde of graſſe, or here or there ſome firzes whereon their Conies doe fede.

Leauing therefore theſe deſert peces, we incline a little towarde the northweſt, where we ſtumble or runne vppon, Moncarthat, Inis Welſeck, & Suethial. We came in like ſort vnto Ratte Iſlande (wherein are ſo many monſtrous Rattes, that if horſes, or other beaſts, happen to come thither, or be left there by negligence, they are ſure to be deuoured and eaten vp, without all hope of recouerye) the Anwall and the Brier, Iſlandes in lyke ſorte voyde of all good furniture, Conies only excepted, & that the Brier (wherein is a village, Caſtell, & pariſh Church) bringeth forth no leſſe ſtore of Hogges, and wyldefoule, then Ratte Iſland doth of Rats, whereof I greatly marueyle.

By north of the Brier, lyeth the Ruſco, which hath a Labell or Bylande ſtretching out toward the ſouthweſt, called Inis widdon. This Ruſco is verye neere ſo great as that of S. Maries. It hath moreouer an hold, & a Pariſh within it, beſide great ſtore of Conies and wildefoule, whereof they make much gayne in due tyme of the yeare. Nert vnto thys we come to the Rounde Iſland, then to S. Lides Iſland, (wherin is a Pariſh church, dedicated to that ſaint) the Notho, the Auing, (one of thē being ſituate by ſouth of another) and the Tyan, which later is a great Iſlande, furnyſhed with a Pariſh Church, & no ſmall plenty of Conies as I here. After the Tyan we come to S. Martines Iſle, betwixt which & S. Maries, are tenne other, ſmaller, which reach out of the northeaſt into the ſouthweſt, as Knolworth Sniuilliuer, Menwerham, Vollis. 1. Surwihe, Vollis. 2. Arthurs Iſland, Guiuliuer, Nenech and Gothrois, whoſe qualities are diuers: howbeit as no one of theſe, is to be accounted great in compariſon of the other, ſo they al yelde a ſhort graſſe, meete for ſheepe and Conies, as doe alſo the reaſt. In the greater Iſles likewiſe, (whoſe names are commonlye ſuch as thoſe of the Townes, or Churches ſtanding in the ſame) there are as I here ſundrye lakes, and thoſe neuer without great plentye of wildefoule, ſo that the Iſles of Sylly, are ſuppoſed to be no leſſe beneficiall to their Lordes, then anye other whatſoeuer, within the compaſſe of our Iſle, or neere vnto our coaſtes. In ſome of them alſo are wilde ſwine. And as theſe Iſles are ſuppoſed to be a notable ſafegard to the coaſt of Cornewall, ſo in diuers of them great ſtore of tinne, is to be founde. There is in like maner ſuch plenty of fiſhe taken among theſe ſame, that beſide the feeding of their ſwine wyth all, a man ſhall haue more there for a peny, then in London for ten Grotes: Howbeit their chiefe cōmodity is made by Reigh, which they dry and cutte in peces, and carying it ouer into little Britayne, they exchange it there, for Salt, Canuas, readye Money, or other Marchaundiſe which they doe ſtande in neede of. A like trade haue ſome of them alſo, with Buckehorne or dryed Whityng, as I here: but ſith the Authour of this report, did not flatly auouch it, I paſſe ouer that fiſhe as not in ſeaſon at this time. Thus haue we viewed the richeſt and moſt wealthy Iſles of Sylley, frō whence we muſt direct our courſe eaſtwardes, vnto the mouth of the Sauerne, & then go backe againe vnto the weſt poynt of Wales, cōtinuing ſtill our voyage along vpon the weſt coaſt of Britaine, till we come to the Soluey where at the kingdomes part, and from which forth on we muſt touch ſuch Iſlandes, as lye vpon the weſt and northſhore, till we be come againe vnto the Scottiſh ſea, and to our owne dominions.

From the poynt of Cornewall therefore, or Promontory of Helenus, (ſo called, as ſome think, becauſe Helenus the ſon of Priam[9] lyeth buried there, except ỹ ſea haue waſhed away his ſepulchre) vntill we come vnto the mouth of Sauerne, we haue none Iſlandes at all that I do knowe or here of, but one lytle Byland, Cape or Peninſula, which is not to be reckoned of in this place. And yet ſith I haue made mention of it, you ſhall vnderſtande, that it is called Pendinas, and beſide ỹ the compaſſe thereof is not aboue a myle, this is to be remembred farder how there ſtādeth a Pharos or light therein, for ſhippes which ſayle by thoſe coaſts in the night. There is alſo at the very poynt of the ſayde Pendinas, a chappell of S. Nicholas, beſide the church of S. Ia, an Iriſh woman Saint. It belōged of late to the Lorde Brooke, but nowe as I geſſe the Lorde Mountioy enioyeth it. There is alſo a Blockhouſe, and a pere in the eaſt ſide thereof, but the pere is ſore choked with ſande, as is the whole ſhore furthemore frō S. Ies vnto S. Carantokes, inſomuch that the greateſt parte of thys Byland is nowe couered with ſandes, which the ſea caſteth vp, & this calamity hath indured little aboue fiue yeares.

gell, all which many of the common sort doe repute and take for Iles: wherefore as one desirous to note all, I thinke it not best that these should be omitted, but to proceede. Whē we be come farder, I meane vnto ẏ Sauerne mouth, we mēte the two Holmes, of which one is called Stepholme, and the other Flatholme, of theyr formes.

It shoulde seeme by some that they are not worthy to be placed among Islands: yet other some are of the opinion, that they are not altogyther so base, as to bee reputed amongst flattes or rockes: but whatsoeuer they be, this is sure that they oft annoye such Passengers and Marchauntes as passe, and repasse vpon that riuer. Neyther doe I reade of any other Iles which lye by east of these same onely the Barri and Dunwen: the first of which is so called of one Barroc, a religious man as Gyraldus saith. And here in is a rock, standing at the very entraunce of the clyffe, which hath a little rift or chine vpon the side, wherevnto if a mā do lay his eare, he shal here a noyse, as if smithes did worke at the forge, sometimes blowing wyth theyr Bellowes, & sometimes striking and clinking with Hammers, whereof many men haue great wonder and marueyle. It is about a mile in compasse, scituate ouer against Aberbarry, and hath a chappel in it.

Barri.

Barri, is a slight shot from the shore.

Dunwen.

Dunwen, is so called of a Churche dedicated to a Welch woman saint, called Dunwen, that standeth there. It lyeth more then two miles from Henrosser, ryght against Neyen, and hath within it two fayre mylles, and great store of conies, and if the sande increase so fast hereafter as it hath done of late about it, it will be vnyted to the mayne, within a short season. Beyond these & toward the coast of Southwales, lye two other Islandes, larger in quantitie, then the Holmes, of which the one is called Caldee or Inis Pyr. It hath a Parishe Church wyth a spire steeple, and a pretty towne belonging to the county of Pembroke, and iurisdiction of S. Dauid in Wales. Lelande supposeth the ruines that are founde therein, to haue bene of an olde priorye sometimes called Lille, which was a celle belonging to the Monasterye of S. Dogmaell, but of this I can saye nothing. The other hyght Londy, wherein is also a village or towne, and of thys Islande the Parson of the sayde towne, is not onelye the captaine, but hath thereto welfe, disseasse, and all other commodities belonging to the same. It is little aboue sixteene myles, from the coast of Wales, and yet it serueth as I am informed Lord and king in Deuonshyre. Moreouer in thys Islande is great plentie of shéepe, but more of conies, and therewithall of very fine and short grasse, for their better foode and pasturage. And albeit that there be not scarslie fourtie households in the whole, yet the inhabitants there with huge stones (alreadye prouided) may kéepe of thousandes of theyr enemies, because it is not possible for any aduersaries to assayle them, but onelye at one place, and wyth a most daungerous entrance, Scalmey the greater and the lesse lye northwest of Milforde hauen a good way. They belong both to the king, but are not inhabited, bicause they be so often spoiled with pirates, Schoncold Isle ioineth vnto great Scalmey, & is bygger then it, onely a passage for shippes parteth them: wherby they are supposed to be one, & Leland toteth the to be in Milford haue. Limen as Ptolomy calleth it, is scituate ouer against S. Dauides in wales, where vnto we must nedes come, after we be past another litle one, which sommen do call Gresholme, In a late Mappe I finde this Limen to be called in English Ramsey: Leland also confirmeth the same, and I cannot learne more thereof, then that it is much greater than any of the other last mencioned, (sithence I described the holmes) and for temporall iurisdiction, a member of Penbrokshire, as it is vnto S. Dauides, for matters concerning ẏ church. Leland in his Commentaries of Englande Lib. 8 sayeth that it contayned three Illettes, where of the Bishop of S. Dauids is owner of the greatest, but ẏ Chanter of S. Dauids claymeth the second, as the Archedeacon of Cairmaiden doth the third. And in these is very excellent pasture for shéepe, and horses, but not for other horned beasts, which lacke their vpper teeth, by nature (whose substaunce is cōuerted into the nourishmēt of their hornes) and therefore cannot byte so low. Next vnto this Isle we came to Mawr, an Island in the mouth of Mawr, scant a bow shote ouer, and enuironned at the low water with fresh, but at the high salt, & here also is excellent catching of Herinses.

After this proceeding on stil with our course, we fetched a compasse, going out of the north towarde the west, and then turning againe (as the coast of the country leadeth) vntill we sayled full south, leauing the shore still on our right hande, vntyl we came vnto a couple of yles, which lye vpō the mouth of the Soch, one of them being distaunt, as we gessed a myle from the other, and neyther of them of anye greatnesse, almost worthy to remembred. The first that we came vnto is called Tudfal and therin is a Church, but without any Parishioners, except they be shéepe and Conies. The quantitie therof also is not much aboue, Penthlin. fyre acres of grounde, meaſured by the pole. The nert is Penthlin, or Myrach, ſcituate in maner betwixt Tudſall, or Tuidall and the ſhore, & herin is very good paſture for horſes, whereof as I take it that name is giuen vnto it. Nert vnto them, we come vnto Bardeſey, an Iſlande lying ouer againſt the Southweſt poynt or Promontorie of Northwales, and whether the reaſt of the Monkes of Bangor dyd flye to ſaue themſelues, when their fellowes were ſlayne by the Saxon Princes in the quarell of Auguſtine the monke, and the Citie of Caerleon or Cheſter, raced to the grounde. Ptolomie calleth this Iſland, Lymnos, the Britons Enlhi, and thereinalſo is a parith church, as the report goeth. From hence wee raſt about gathering ſtill towarde the Northeaſt, till we came to Caer Jerienrhod a notable rocke ſituate ouer againſt ỹ mouth of the Leuenni, wherin ſtandeth a ſtrong hold or fortreſſe, or elſe ſome Towne or Village. Certes we could no well diſcerne whether of both it was, becauſe the winde blew harde at Southweſt, the morning was miſtie and our mariners doubting ſome flats to be couched not farre from thence, hailed away vnto Angleſey, whether we went a pace, wyth a redy winde, euen at our owne deſire.

Angleſey cut from Wales by working of the ſea. This Iſlande (which Tacitus miſtaketh, no doubt for Mona Ceſaris) is ſcituate about two myles from the ſhore of Northwales. Paulus Iouius geſſeth that it was in time paſt ioyned to the continent, or maine of our Iſle, and only cut of by working of the Oceane, as Sicilia peraduenture was frō Italy by the violence of the Leuant: thereby alſo as he ſayth the inhabitants were conſtrayned at the firſt to make a bridge ouer into the ſame, till the breach waxed ſo great, that no ſuch paſſage could any longer be mainteyned, but as theſe things doe eyther not touche my purpoſe at all, or make ſmally with the preſent deſcription of this Iſle: ſo (in comming to my matter) Angleſey is founde to be full ſo great as the Wight, & nothing inferiour, but rather ſurmounting it, as that alſo which Cæſar calleth Mona in fruitefulneſſe of ſolle by manye an hundred folde. In olde time it was reputed and taken for the common granerie to Wales, as Sicilia was to Italy for their proviſion of Corne. In lyke maner the Welchmen themſelues called it the mother of theyr country, for giuing their mindes wholly to paſturage, as the moſt eaſie and leſſe chargeable trade, they vtterly neglected tyllage, as men that leaned wholly to the fertilitie of this Iſlande for their Corne, from whence they neuer fayled to receyue cōtinuall abundaunce. It contayned moreouer ſo manye townes welnere, as there be dales in a yere, which ſome conuerting into Cantredes haue accompted but for three, as Gyraldus ſayeth. Howbeit as there haue bene I ſay 363. townes in Angleſey, ſo now a great part of ỹ reconning is vtterly ſhronke, & ſo farre gone to decay, ỹ the very ruines of thē are vneth to be ſeene: and yet it ſeemeth to be meetely wel inhabited. Leland noting the ſmalneſſe of our hundredes in compariſon to that they were in tyme paſt, addeth ſo farre as I remember that there are fyre of them in Angleſey, as Menay, Maltraith, Liuon, Talbelliō, Torkalin, and Tindaithei: hereunto Lhoid ſaith alſo how it belonged in olde time, vnto the kingdome of Guinhed or Northwales, & that therin at a towne called Aberfraw, being on the Southweſt ſide of the Iſle, the kinges of Gwinhed helde euermore their pallaces, whereby it came to paſſe, that the kinges of northwales, were for a lōg time, called kings of Aberfraw, as ỹ Welchmē named ỹ kings of England kinges of London, till better inſtruction dyd bring them farder knowledge.

There are in Angleſey many townes and villages, whoſe names as yet I can not orderly attayne vnto: wherefore I will content my ſelfe with the rehearſall of ſo many as we viewed in ſayling about the coaſtes, and otherwyſe hearde report of by ſuch as I haue talked with all. Beginning therefore at the mouth of the Gefni (which ryſeth at Northeaſt aboue Gefni or Geuenni, 20. myles at ỹ leaſt into the land) we paſſed firſt by Hundwyn, then by Newborow, Port Hayton, Beaumarrais, Pennō, Elā, Almwoch, Burric (wherby runneth a rill into a creke) Cornew, Holyhed, (ſtanding in the promontorie) Gwifen, Aberfraw, and Cair Gadwaladar, of all which, the two latter ſtande, as it were in a nuke, betweene the Geuenni water, & the Fraw, wherupō Aberfraw is ſcituate. Within the Iland, we hard only of Gefni afore mētioned, of Griſtial ſtāding vpō ỹ ſame water of Tefri, of Lanerchimedh, Lachtenfarwy & Bodedrin, but of all theſe the chiefe is nowe Beaumarais, which was buylded ſometyme by king Edward the firſt, and therewithall a ſtrong Caſtell about the yeare 1295. to kepe that lande in quiet. There are alſo as Leland ſayth 31. Pariſhe churches beſide 69. chappelles, that is 100. in all: but hereof I can ſay litle, for lacke of ſuch inſtruction. In tymes paſt, the people of this Iſle vſed not to ſeuerall their groundes, but now they digge ſtony hillockes and with the ſtones thereof they make rude walles, much lyke to thoſe of Deuonſhyre, ſith they want hedges, fire bote, and houſebote, or to ſaye at one worde, timber & trees. As for wine, it is ſo plentifull & good cheape there moſt commonly as in London, thoꝛowe the great recourſe of marchaunts frō France, Spaine, and Italy vnto the aforeſayde Iſlande. The fleſhe likewyſe of ſuch Cattell as is bꝛedde there, is moſt delicate, by reaſon of their excellent paſture, & ſo much was it eſteemed by the Romaines in tyme paſt, ỹ Collumella did not onely commende & pꝛeferre them before thoſe of Liguria, but the emperours thēſelues alſo cauſed there pꝛouiſion to be made foꝛ nete out of Angleſey to fēde vppon at their owne tables as the moſt excellent bēfe. It taketh the name of Angles & Eye, which is to meane the Iſle of Engliſhmen, bycauſe they wan it in the conquerours tyme, vnder the leading of Hugh Earle of Cheſter, & Hugh of Shꝛewesbury. The Welchmē cal it Tiremone, and herein likewyſe is a Pꝛomontozie oꝛ Bylande, called Holly hed, (which hath in tyme paſt bene named Cair ky by, of Kyby a monke, that dwelled in that place) frō whence the readyeſt paſſage is commonly had out of Nozthwales to get ouer into Irelande. The Bꝛitons named it Enylſnach, oꝛ holy Iſle of the number of carkaſes of holy men, which they ſuppoſe to haue bēne buryed there. But herein I marueyle not a little what women had offended, that they myght not come thither, oꝛ at the leaſt wyſe returne from thence without ſome notable repꝛoche. And nowe to conclude with the deſcription of the whole Iſlande, this I will adde mozeouer vnto hir cōmodities, that as there are the beſt milſtones of white, redde, blewe, and greene grētes, (eſpecially in Tindaithin,) ſo there is great gaines to begotten by fiſhing, rounde about this Iſle, if the people there couldе vſe the trade: but they want both cunning and diligence to take that matter in hande. And as foꝛ tempoꝛall regimēt it appartayneth to the countye of Cairnaruon, ſo in ſpirituall caſes it belongeth to the Bythopꝛicke of Bangor. This is finally to be noted mozeouer of Angleſey, that ſundꝛy earthen pottes are often founde there of dead mens bones conuerted into aſhes, ſet with the mouthes downeward contrarie to the vſe of other nations, which turned the bꝛimmes vpwardes, whereof let this ſuffice.

Holy head, oꝛ Cair kiby.

Enilſnach, holy Iſle.

Hauing thus deſcrybed Angleſey, it reſteth to repoꝛt furthermoze, how that in our circuite about the ſame, we mette with other little Iſlettes, of which one lyeth Nozthweſt therof almoſt ouer againſt Butricke mouth, oꝛ the fall of the water, that paſſeth by Butricke. The Bꝛitons called it Ynis Ader, that is to ſay, the Iſle of Birdes in olde time, but now it hight Ynis Moil, oꝛ Ynis Rhomaid, that is ỹ Iſle of Pozpaſſes. It hath to name likewiſe Yſterifd, and Adros. Being paſt this, we came to the ſecond lying by Nozth eaſt, ouer againſt the Hillary point, called Ynis Ligod, that is to ſay, the Iſle of Miſe, and of theſe two th, is latter is the ſmalleſt, neyther of thē both beyng of anye greatneſſe to ſpeake of.

Ynis Seriall oꝛ Preſtholme, lieth ouer againſt Pennon, oꝛ the point called the hed of Mon, where I founde a towne (as I tolde you) of the ſame denominatiō. Ptolomy nameth not this Iſlande, whereof I marueyle. It is percell of Flintſhyꝛe, and of the iuriſdiction of S. Apſah, and in fertilitie of ſoyle, and bꝛēde of Cattell, nothing inferiour vnto Angleſey hir mother: although that foꝛ quantitie of groūd it come infinitely ſhoꝛt thereof, & be nothing cōparable vnto it. The laſt Iſland vpon ỹ coſt of Wales, hauing now left Angleſey, is called Credine, & although it lye not pꝛoperly within the compaſſe of my deſcription, yet I will not let to touch it by the waye, ſith the cauſey thither from Denbighlande, is commonly ouerflowen. It is partly made an Iſland by the Conwey & partly by the ſea. But to pꝛoceede, when we had viewed this place, we paſſed foꝛth without finding any mo Iſles to my remembꝛaunce, vntill we came to the Cape of Iſle Bꝛeē, oꝛ Hilbery & poynt of Wyꝛale, which is an Iſlande at the full ſea, a quarter of a myle from the lande, and foure fadame dēepe, as ſhippes boyes haue oft founded, but at a lowe water, a man may go ouer on the ſande. The Iſle of it ſelf is very ſandy a mile in compaſſe, & well ſtoꝛed with Conies, thither alſo went a ſoꝛt of ſuperſticious fooles in tymes paſt, in pylgrimage, to our Ladye of Hilbery by whoſe offrings a Cell of Monkes there, which belonged to Cheſter, were cheriſhed and maintayned.

The next Iſland vppon the coaſt of England is man, which the Welchmen doe commonly call Manaw. It lieth vnder 53. degrees of Latitude, and 30. minuts, and hath in longitude 16. degrees and 40. minutes, abutting on the Nozth ſide vpō S. Nimans in Scotland, Furneſſels on the Eaſt, Pꝛeſtholme & Angleſey on the South, and Wikher in Ireland on the Weſt. It is greater then Angleſey by a thirde part, and there are two ryuers in the ſame, whoſe heddes doe ioyne ſo nēere, that they doe ſeeme in maner to part the Iſle in twaine. Some of our auncient writers call it Euboina and other Meuania, howbeit after Beda and the Scottiſh hiſtories, the Meuaniæ are thoſe Iſles which we now call the Hebrides oꝛ Hebudes (whereof William Malſmebery Lib. 1. de regibus, will haue Angleſey to be one) wherfoꝛe it ſeemeth that a number of our late writers aſcribing the ſayde name vnto Mona, haue not bene a little deceaued. In this Iſlande were ſome time 1300. families, of which 960. were in the Weſt halfe, & the reaſt in the other. But nowe thorow ioyning houſe to houſe, and lande to land, (a cõmon plague & canker, which wil eate vp al, if prouiſion be not made in tyme to withſtande this miſchiefe) that number is halfe diminiſhed, and yet many of the riche inhabiters want roume & wote not howe & where to beſtow themſelues, to their quiet contentatiõs. Certes this impedimẽt groweth not by reaſon that men were greater in body, then they haue bene in tyme paſt, but onlye for ỹ their inſatiable deſire of inlarging their priuate poſſeſſions increaſeth ſtill vpon them, & will doe more, except they be reſtrayned: but to returne to our purpoſe. The kings of Scotlande had this Iſlande vnder their dominiõ, almoſt from their firſt arriual in this Iſland, and as Beda ſayeth till Edwine king of the Northumbers wanne it from them and vnited it to his kingdome. Hereof alſo I coulde bring better teſtimonie, for we finde that the kings of Scotlande, did not only giue lawes to ſuch as dwelled there, but alſo from tyme to tyme, appoint ſuch Byſhoppes as ſhoulde exerciſe Eccleſiaſtical Iuriſdiciõ in ỹ ſame. Finally how, after ſundry ſales bargains and cõtracts of Matrimony for I reade ỹ Willã Scroupe the kings Vicechamberleyne, did buy this Iſle and crowne therof of the Lord Willã Montacute Earle of Sarũ) it came vnto ỹ anceſtours of the Earles of Darby, who haue bene cõmonly ſayd to be kings of Man, the hyſtorie folowing as I ſuppoſe ſhal more at large declare. Cronica Tinemuthi. Gyraldus noteth how there was contention ſometyme betweene the kings of Englande, and Irelande, for the ryght of this Iſlande, but in the ende when by a cõpromiſe the tryall of the matter was referred to the liues or deathes of ſuch venemous Wormes as ſhoulde be brought into the ſame, and it was founde, that they dyed not at all, as the lyke dde in Irelande, ſentence paſſed with the kyng of Englande, and ſo he retayned the Iſlande. But howſoeuer this matter ſtandeth, & whether any ſuch thing was done at all or not, ſure it is that the people of the ſayde Iſle, were much giuen to Witchcraft, and Sorcerie (which they learned of the Scottes a people greatly bent to that horrible practiſe) inſomuch that theyr women, woulde oftentimes ſell winde to the mariners incloſed vnder certayne knots of threde, with this inunction, that they which bought the ſame, ſhoulde for a great gale vndoe manye, and for the leſſe a ſmaller number. The ſtature of the men & alſo fertilitie of this Iſlande are much commended & for the latter ſuppoſed verye nere to be equall with that of Angleſey, in all commodities. Tal men in Man.

There are alſo theſe townes therin, as they come now to my remẽbrance, Ruſhen Dunglaſſe, Holme towne S. Brids, Bala Cury (ỹ byſhops houſe) S. Mich. S. Andrew, kirk chriſt, kirk Louel. S. Machees, kirke Santã, Palq ſalla, kirk S. Mary, kirk Cõcane, kirk Malu. & Home. But of all theſe Ruſhen with ỹ caſtel is the ſtrõgeſt. It is alſo in recompẽce of the common want of woode, indued wyth ſundry pretty waters, as firſt of all the burne that ryſſeth in northſide of warchill botomes, & branching out by ſouthweſt of kirke Santan, it ſeemeth to cut of a great part of the eaſtſide thereof, from the reſidue of that Iland. From thoſe hylles alſo (but of the ſouth halfe) commeth the Home and Homey, by a towne of the ſame name, in the verry mouth whereof, lieth the Pile, afore mencioned. They haue alſo the Bala paſſing by Bala cury, on the weſtſide, and the Kame on the north, whoſe fall is named Kameſey hauen as I doe reade in Chronicles. Riuers.

There are moreouer ſundry great hylles therein. as that wherupõ S. Mathees ſtandeth, in the northeaſt parte of the Iſle, a parcell whereof commeth flat ſouth, betweene kirke Louell, and kirke Mary, yelding out of their botomes the water Bala, whereof I ſpake before. Beſide theſe and well toward the ſouth part of the Iſle, I finde the warchilles, which are extended almoſt, from the weſt coaſt ouerthwart vnto the burne ſtreame. It hath alſo ſundrye hauens, as Ramſey hauen, by north, Laxam hauen, by eaſt, Port Iris, by ſouthweſt, Port Home, and Port Michell, by weſt. In lyke ſort there are diuers Iſlettes annexed to the ſame, as the Calf of man on the ſouth, the Pile on the weſt, and finallye S. Michelles Iſle, in the Gulf called Ranoths way, in the eaſt. Moreouer the ſheepe of thys countrye are exceeding huge, wel woolled, and their tayles of ſuch greatneſſe as is almoſt incredible. In lyke ſorte theyr hogges are in maner monſtruous. They haue furthermore great ſtore of Barnacles, breeding vpõ their coaſts, (but yet not ſo great ſtore as in Ireland and thoſe (as there alſo) of olde ſhippes. Okes, Maſtes, and ſuch putryfied pytched ſtuffe, as by wracke hath happened to corrupt vpon that ſhore. Howbeit neyther the inhabytantes of thys Iſle, nor yet of Ireland can redily ſaye whether they be fiſh or fleſhe, for although the religious there vſed to eate the as fiſhe, yet elſewhere, ſome haue bene troubled, for eating them in times prohibited, as Heretikes, and Lollardes. Hylles. Hauens. Calf of mã. Thepple. S. Michelles Iſle. Sheepe. Hogges. Barnacles. Barnacles neyther fiſhe, nor fleſhe.

There

Bishop of Man.

There hath sometime bene, and yet is a Byshop of this Ile, who at the first was called Episcopus Sodorensis, when ye iurisdiction of all ye Hebrides belonged vnto him. Whereas now he ye is Byshop there, is but a Bishops shadow, for albeit ye he beare ye name of Byshop of Man, yet haue ye Earles of Darby, as it is supposed, al ye profite of his Sie, (sauing that they allowe him a little somewhat for a flourish) notwithstanding that they be hys patrons and haue hys nomination to that Sie.

Patrone of Man.

It is subiect to the Byshoppe of Yorke also, for spirituall Iurisdiction, & in time of Henry the seconde had a king, as Houeden saith, whose name was Cuthrede vnto whome Vinianus ye Cardinall came as Legate. 1177. but sith I can neyther come by the names, nor successions of those Princes that reigned there, I surcease to speake any more of them, and also of the Ile it selfe, whereof this may suffise.

After we haue in thus wise described the Ile of Man, with hyr commodities, we returned eastwardes back againe vnto ye point of Ramshed, where we founde to the number of fyre Ilettes of one sorte and other, whereof the first greatest and most easterly, is named the Wauay. It runneth out in length, as wee gessed about fiue myles from the south into ye north, and betweene the same and the maine lande lie two little ones, whose names I find not in anye writer so farre, as I remember. The fourth is called ye Fouldra, and being scituate southeast of the first, it hath a prety pile or blockhouse therin, which the inhabitaunts name the Pile of Fouldray. By east thereof in lyke sort lye the Fola and the Roa, plottes of no great compasse, and yet of al these fyre, the first and Fowldra are the fayrest and most fruitefull. From hence we went by Rauenglasse point, where lieth an Iland of the same denomination, as Reginalde Wolfe hath noted in his great Carde, not yet finished, nor lykely to be published. He noteth also two other Ilettes, betweene the same & the mayne lande, but Lelande speaketh nothing of them, (to my remembrance,) neyther anye other Carde, as yet set forth of England: and thus much of the Ilands that lie vpon our shore.

Wauay.

Fouldra. Fola. Roa.

Rauenglasse.

Hauing so exactlye as to me is possible, set downe the names & positions of such Iles as are to be found vpō the coastes of ye Quenes maiesties dominions. Nowe it resteth ye we procede orderly wyth those ye are scene to lye vpō the cost of Scotland, that is to say, in the Irish, the Deucalidon & the Germaines seas: But before we come at these, there are diuers other to be touched, which are scituate betweene the nuke of Galloway, & the Frith of Solue, whose names I find not as yet set downe by any writer, neyther is their number greate. Wherefore sith I may not doe in this their descriptiō what I would, I must be contented to doe therein what I may, and to ridde my hands of the one, that I may the sooner come vnto, and be dealing with the other. The first of these therefore, lyeth ouer against Dundrenaw, somewhat towarde the mouth of the streame, that goeth vnto Glanlaire. The second is scituate in ye Dee, wherin Trief Castell standeth: by west whereof lyeth S. Mary Ile, which is ouer against Whitherne, or as we nowe call it Witherne, of which in our Englishe hystories we haue oft mention vnder the name of Candida Casa, whereof the learned are not ignorant.

Trief. S. Mary Ile.

Beyonde these are two other lying togither, as it were in the mouth of the lowest docke, & from thence we passed directly roundo about, the aforesayde nuke, vnto Dumbritton fyrth, where we finde also nine or tenne Ilandes, of diuers quantities, whereof Ailze, or Aliza, is the first, & wherein is great plentye of the Soland foule, Kinuary the second, Bure the third, Marnoch the fourth, Pladua the fift, Lanlach the sixt, Arren or Botha, the seauenth, Sauday the eyght, and Olr the ninth: but of all these, one or two are only accounted famous, that is Arren the greatest of all, wherin standeth a towne of the same name, and Bure the nert, in which Rosa is scituate: the reast are eyther vtterly barren, or not very commodious, except for fowle to such as owe the same. By this time also are we come to the peynt of Cantyre, which is not passing fiftene or sixtene myles, distaunt from the coast of Irelande, so that next vnto these afore remembred (and when we haue fetched in the aforesaid peynt) we come vnto the Hebrides, which are reconned to be three and fourtie, in number, besides the flattes and shallowes as I haue earst affirmed in the beginning of thys chapter.

15. Miles betweene Cantyre & the coast of Desmond.

Of these aforesayd Ilands, I finde dyuers to be 30. myles, some twelue other more or lesse quantity, but Sky Mula Iona, & Ila, are the greatest, as shall appeare hereafter. Certes it is impossible for me, being a meere Englyshman voyde of helpe & of small reading, to discusse the controuersies that are moued among the learned, touching the Meuainæ & the Hebrides, wherefore sith I am not able to deale so deepely with that matter, I will first shewe what Ilandes doe lye vpon the west coastes of Scotlande betweene Cantyre and Andermouth heade, giuing out onelye the names of the least (sith I know nothing els of their commodities and greatnesse) and then proceeding with the reast as they doe lie in order. First of all therefore and ouer against Kiltan, (for I will go by the shore) we haue Karay, then Segay, S. Machare, and hys neighbour, Langa, Summay, Dunqu, Corsey Leawing, Cewil, Pawell, Caerbery, Lismore, & Puke, which lyeth at the very point, of Andermouth, ouer against Mere, fourtene in all. From hence going westwarde, wee come to the Terry and the Coll, and then entring in among the reast, by Carndeburge, Ulwaye, or Dronsay, Colausay, & Iona minor we come at the last to Scarbo, Corebricken, Houell, al which thus mencioned, of the least are counted ỳ greatest, & yet there are sundry other, of whose names I haue no knowledge. In thys tracte also, there are yet three to intreate of, as Ila, Iona & Mula, of which the first is one of the most, that hath not bene least accounted of. It is not much aboue 30 myles in length, & twenty in breadth, & yet it is an exceeding riche plot of grounde very plenteous of corne, but more ful of mettals, which were easie to be obteyned, if either the people were industrious, or the soyle yéeldable of wode to fine and trye out the same.

Ila.

Iona was sometime called Columkill, In fame and estimation, nothing inferiour to any of the other, although in length it exceede little aboue twentie myles, and in breadth, 10. for by reason of a famous Abbie somtime buylded there by Fergus the seconde, it hath bene countenaunced out by the sepulchres of so many kings, as deceased in Scotlãd, after the sayde Fergus, vntil the tyme of Malcoline Cammor, who by buylding another Abbey, at Dunfermeling, gaue occasion to hys successours to be interred there.

Iona.

Mula is a ryght noble Ile, replenished wyth dyuers and sundry townes, and castels, as are also the other two, albeit their names at thys tyme be not at hand & ready. This yet is worthy the noting in this Iland aboue all the rest, that it hath a pleasant spring, arising two myles in distaunce from the shore, wherin are certayne lyttle egges founde, much like vnto indifferent Pearles, both for colour and bygnesse, and thereto full of thicke humour, which egges being carried by violence of ỳ fresh water, vnto the salt, are there within the space of 12. houres conuerted into great shelles, which I take to be the mother pearle except I be deceyued. And thus much briefly of the seauen and twentye greatest Iles, lying within the aforesayde compasse, being driuen of force to omitte the lesser onely, for that I neyther fynd theyr names, among the Scottishe writers, neyther to saye the truth directly vnderstande howe manye be flattes, and howe manye be couered with grasse: To procéede therefore by north of Andermouth we haue Egge, Kon, Cãnay, Flad, Trantnesse, (where is a castell,) Trant, Altauecke, another Flad, Kona, and Scalpa, beside sundrye smaller, whose names I doe not knowe, & all these doe enuyron the greatest of all, called Sky, in which are dyuers townes, as Aye, S. Johns, Dunwegen, and S. Nicholas, beside other, and thereunto sundry lakes, and freshe streames, and those not without great abundaunce of Samon and sundry other fishe, whereby the inhabitaunts of those partes doe reape no small aduauntage. Furthermore & by west of these lye diuers other percels also of this number, of which, if you loke to here an orderly reporte you shall vnderstande that I will beginne at the most southerly of them, and so procéede, with eche one in order, so well as my knowledg doth serue me. First of al therfore, there are foure little Illandes, of which one called Erth, another Scail are ỳ greatest. Next vnto these and directly towarde the north lyeth Bawaye, then S. Peters Ile, in the east side, whereof are three small ones, whose names I haue not yet learned. Next of al is the Eust or Yirtha, which séemeth by certaine riuers, to be deuided into four partes, of which the the first hath a towne called S. Columbanes in ỳ north side thereof, ỳ second another dedicated to S. Mary, & the fourth (for I find nothing of ỳ third) one named after S. Patricke, by west wherof, lyeth yet a lesse, not greatly frequẽted of any. By north of this also are 3. other, of lyke quantity, and then followeth Lewis, scituate in the Deucalidon sea, ouer against the Rosse, and called Thule, by Tacitus, wherein are many lakes, and very prettye Villages, as lake Erwyn, lake Vnsalsago: but of townes, S. Clements, Stoye, Noys, S. Colombane, Radmach &c. About thys are also diuers other Illes, of lesse quãtitye found, as Scalpay, Ilen, Schent, Barray the more, Barraye the lesse, S. Kylder, & other of smaller reputation, whereof the most parte are voyde of culture and inhabitantes, and therefore not worthye to be remembred here. This finallye is left to be sayd of these Illes, that albeit Lewissa, be the greatest of them, and conteyning threescore myles, in length, and thirtie in breadth, yet Yirtha, or Yirth, is the most famous, for the shéepe which are there bredde, and is therefore called Shepy of the wylde Irysshe. Certes, the stature of these shéepe is greater and higher, thẽ of any fallowe deere, their tailes hanging downe to the grounde, and their hornes longer & thicker then those of any Bugle. Vnto thys Iſlande alſo in the Moneth of June, (when the ſeas be moſt calme) there commeth a Prieſt out of Lewiſſa, & miniſtreth the ſacramẽt of Baptiſme to all ſuch childrẽ as haue bẽne borne there, and the Iſlandes about ſith that moneth in the yeare paſſed. This being done, and his appointed number of maſſes ſaide, he receyueth the tythes of all theyr commodities, and then returneth home againe the ſame way he came.

Rona. Rona the laſt of the Hebrides, is diſtant, as I ſaide, about fourtie mile from the Orchades, and one hundreth and thirtye, from the Promontorye of Dunſibe. The coaſt of thys Iſle is dayly replenyſhed with Seales, and Porpaſſe, which are eyther ſo tame, or ſo fierce, that they abaſh not at the ſight of ſuch as looke vpon them, neyther make they any haſte to flye out of theyr preſence. Aboue the Firth alſo is another Iſlande, though not inhabited, wherin is a certeine kind of wilde beaſte, not much different frõ the figure of a ſhéepe, but ſo wilde that it will not eaſilye be tamed. For theyr grynning alſo they are reputed to be a kynde of baſtarde Tyger. As for theyr heaire it is betwæne the woll of a ſhéepe, and heaire of a goate, ſomewhat reſembling eche, ſhacked, and yet abſolutely like vnto neyther of both.

The Shotland Iſles There are alſo other Iſles, an hundreth myles beyond the Orchades, towarde eaſt northeaſt, and ſubiect to ſcotlande, wherin is neyther corne, nor anye vſe of fleſh, although they haue ſtore of ſundrye ſortes of cattell amongſt them. But in ſtead of bread, they drie a kinde of fiſhe, which they beate in morters to powder, and bake it in theyr Ouens, vntill it be hearde and drye. Theyr fewell alſo is of ſuch bones as the fiſhe yéeldeth that is taken on theyr coaſtes, and yet they lyue as themſelues ſuppoſe in much felicitie, thinking it a great péece of theyr happyneſſe to bée ſo farre diſtaunt from the wicked auarice, & cruell dealings of the world. As for theyr ryches and commodities, they al conſiſt in the ſkinnes of beaſtes, as of Oxẽ, Shéepe, Gotes, Martenes, and ſuch like, wherof they make great reconing. Herin alſo they are lyke vnto ỳ Hirthiens, in ỳ at one time of the yeare, there commeth a prieſt vnto them, out of the Orchades (vnto which Juriſdiction they doe belong) who Baptiſeth all ſuch children, as haue bene borne among them, ſith he laſt arriued: and hauing afterward remained there for a few dayes, he taketh his tythes of them (which they prouide & pay with great ſcrupuloſitie in fiſhe, for of other commodities pay they none) and then returneth home againe, not without boaſt of his troubleſome voyage, except he watch his time. In theſe Iſles alſo is great plẽty of fine Amber to be had, which is produced by the working of the ſea, vpon thoſe coaſtes: howbeit, after what name theſe Iſles be called particularly and how many there be of them in all, the Scottes themſelues are eyther ignoraunt, or not ſo diligent, as to make any conſtant mention.

The Orchades, lie partly in the Germaine, and partly in the Calidon ſeas, ouer againſt the poynt of Dunghilby, beyng in number thirtie one of name, & belonging to ỳ crowne of Scotlande, as are the reaſt whereof here tofore I haue made report, ſince we croſſed ouer the mouth of the Solenie ſreame, to come into this countrye. Certes the people of theſe Iſlands are of goodly ſtature, tall, derye complexyon, hearty, luſtie, of long lyfe, great ſtrength, and moſt whyte colour: and yet they féede moſt vpon fiſhe onely, ſith the cold is ſo extréme in thoſe parts, that the ground bringeth forth but ſmal ſtore of Wheate, & in maner very little or no ſewell at al, to warme them in the winter. Otes they haue verye plentifull, but greater ſtore of Barly, wherof they make a nappye kinde of drinke, and ſuch in déede, as will verye readilye cauſe a ſtrãger to forget himſelf. Howbeit this may be vnto vs, a miracle, ỳ although theyr drinke be neuer ſo ſtrong, & they themſelues ſo immeaſurable drinkers (as none are more) yet it ſhal not eaſily be ſeene, that there is any drunckarde among them, either frantike, or madde mã, dolt, or natural fole, méete to were a cockeſcomb. In like ſort they want venemous beaſtes, chiefly ſuch as doe delyte in hotter ſoile. Theyr Ewes alſo are ſo full of increaſe, that ſome doe vſualye bring forth two, three, or foure lambes at once, whereby they account our anelings (which are ſuch as bring forth but one at once) rather to be barren then kept for any gaine. As for wyld and tame fowles, they haue ſuch plentie of them, that the people there account them rather a burthen to theyr ſoyle, then a benefite to their tables. There is alſo a Biſhop of the Orchades, who hath his ſée, in Pomonia the chiefe of al the Iſlands, wherin alſo are two ſtrong caſtelles, and ſuch hath bẽn the ſuperſtition of the people here, that there is almoſt no one of them, that hath not one church at the leaſt dedicated to the mother of Chriſt. Finallye there is little vſe of Phiſicke in theſe quarters, leſſe ſtore of Oles, and leaſt of frogges. As for ỳ horſes that are bred amongſt them, they are commonlye not much greater then Aſſes, and yet to labour and trauaile, a man ſhall finde very fewe elſewhere, able to come nére, much leſſe to matche with them, in

From the Orchades vntill we come southwardes to the Scarre, which lyeth in Buquhamnesse, I finde no mention of any Ile situate vpon that coast, neyther greatly from thence, vntill we come at the forth, that leadeth vp to Sterling, wherein we passe by seuen or eyght such as they be, of which the first called the May, the seconde Baas and Garwy, the third doe seme to be inhabited. From these also holding on our course towarde England, we passe by another ple, wherein Fayr castell standeth, and this so farre as my skill serueth is the last Iland of the Scottish side, in compassing whereof I am not able to discerne, whether their flattes and shallowes, nombers of Ilandes without name, confusion of situation, lacke of true description, or mine owne ignorance hath troubled me most. No maruayle therefore that I haue beene so oft at ground, among them. But most ioyful am I yam come home againe: although not by Thames mouth into my natiue citie (which the taketh his name of Troye) yet into ỹ English dominion where good entertaynement is much more franke and copious, and better harborow, wherein to rest my wery bones, & easily refreshe my wel beaten carkase.

The first Iland therfore, which commeth to our sight, after we passed Farwye, is that which was sometime called Lindefarne, but now Holly Iland, and containeth 8. myles a place much honoured among our Monasticall writers, bycause diuers monkes & Heremites vpō spende their times therein. There was also the Bysshoppes See of Lindefarne, for a long season, which afterwarde was trāslated to Duncline or Durham. Next vnto this is the Ile of Farne, and herein is a place of defence so farre as I remember, & so great store of Egges layed there by diuers kindes of Wildfoule in time of the yere, that a man shall hardly runne for a wager on the plaine ground without the breach of many before his race be finished. About Farne also lie certayne ples greater then Farne it self, but voyde of inhabitaunts & in these also is great store of Puffins, graie as Duckes, and without coloured fethers, sauing that they haue a white ring round about their neckes. There is moreouer another Birde, which the people call saint Cuthbertes foules, a very tame and gentle creature, and easie to be taken. After this we came to the Cocket Iland, so called bycause it lyeth ouer against the fall of cocke water. And here is a vayne of meane seacole, which the people digge out of the shore at the low water. And from thence vntill we came vnto the cost of Norfolke I saw no mo Ilands. Being therefore past S. Edmonds point, we saw a litle Ile ouer against the fall of the water that commeth frō Holkham, and likewyse an other ouer against the Clay, before we came at Maburne hope: the thirde also in Yarmouth ryuer ouer against Bradwell a towne in lew or little England, whereof also I must needes say somewhat, bycause it is in maner an Iland, and as I gesse eyther hath beene or may be one, for the brode place of the Strict lande that leadeth to the same, is little aboue a quarter of a myle, which against the raging waues of the sea, can make but small resistence. Little England or low Englande therefore is about 8. miles in length and fourte in bredth, very well replenished with townes, as Fristan, Burgh castel, Dilton, Flixtō, Lestoft, Guntō, Blundeston, Cozton, Lound, Asheby, Horton, Belton, Bradwel, & Cozleston, and beside this it is very fruitfull and indued with all commodities. Going forwarde from hence, by the Elton nesse (almost an Iland,) I sawe a small percell cut from the maine in Oxforde hauen, ỹ Langerstone in Oxwell mouth, two peces or Islettes at Cattywade Bridge, the calling about vnto ỹ Colne, we beholde Mersey which is a prettie Iland, well furnished with wood. It was sometime a great receptacle for the Danes, when they inuaded Englande, howbeit at this present it hath beside two decayed Blockhouses, two Parish churches of wich one is called East Mersey, the other west Mersey & both vnder the Archdeacon of Colchester as percell of his iurisdictiō. Foulnesse. Foulnesse is an Ile voyde of wood, & yet wel replenished with very good grasse for nette and sheepe, whereof the inhabitaunts haue great plentie: there is also a Parish church, and albeit that it stande somewhat distaunt from the shore, yet at a dead low water a man ryde thereto if he be skilfull of the Cawsie.

In Maldon water are in lyke sorte three Ilands, enuironned with the salt streames, as S. Osithes, Northey and another (after a mershe) that beareth no name so far as I remember. On the right hand also as we went toward the sea againe, we saw Ramsey Ile, or rather a Peninsula or Bylande, and likewyse the Key, in which is a Chappell of S. Peter. And then coasting vpō the mouth of ỹ Bourne, we saw ỹ Wallot Ile & his mates, whereof two lye by East of Wallot, and the forth is Foulnesse, excepte I be deceyued, for here my memorye fayleth me, on the one side and information on the other, I meane cōcerning ỹ placing of foulnesse. name, except you accompt Rochford hundred for one, whereof I haue no mind to entreate, more then of Crowland, Mersland, Ely, and the reast, that are scanned by the Ouze and Auon (two noble riuers hereafter to be described) sith I touch only those that are enuironned with the sea, or saltwater roundē about, as wee maye see in the Canway Iles, which some doe liken to an Ipocrase bag, some to a vice, skrew, or wide sleeue, bycause they are very small at the east end, and large at west. The salte rilles also that crosse the same doe so seperate the one of them frō the other, that they resemble the slope course of the cutting part of a skrew or gimlet, in very perfite maner, if a man doe imagine himselfe to looke downe from the top of the mast vppon them. Betweene these, moreouer and the Leighe towne lyeth another little Ile, whose name is to me vnknowen. Certes I woulde haue gone to landē and viewed these percelles as they lay, but forasmuch as a Perry of winde (scarse cōparable to the makerell gale wherof Iohn Anele, one of the best seamē that england euer bredde, was wont to talke) caught holde of our sayles, and carryed vs forth the right way toward London, I coulde not tary to see what thinges were hereabouts. Thus much therefore of our Ilandes, and so much may well suffice. Canway.

Of the rysing and falles of such ryuers and streames, as descende into the sea without alteration of their names, and first of those that lye betweene the Thames and the Sauerne. Cap. 9.

HAuing as you haue seene attempted to set downe a full discourse of all the Ilandes, that are scituate vppon the coast of Britayne, and finding the successe not correspondent to myne intent, it hath caused mee somewhat to restrayne my purpose in thys description of our riuers. For whereas I entended at the first to haue written at large of the number, scituation, names, quantities, Townes, Villages, Castles, Mountaynes, Freshwaters, Plashes, or Lakes, Saltwaters, and other commodities of the aforesayd Iles, myne expectation of information from all partes of Englande, was so deceyued in the ende, that I was fayne at last, onelye to leane to that which I knewe my selfe eyther by reading or such other helpe as I had already purchased and gotten of the same. And euen so it happeneth also in this my tractatiō of waters, of whose heads, courses, legth, bredth, depth of Chanell (for burden) ebbes, flowinges, and falles, I had thought to haue made a perfect descriptiō. But now for want of instruction, which hath beene largelye promised, and slackly performed, and other sodayne and iniurious denyall of helpe voluntarily offred, wythout occasion gyuen on my part, I must needes content my self with such obseruations as I haue eyther obtayned by myne owne experience, or gathered frō tyme to tyme out of other mens writings: whereby the full discourse of the whole is vtterly cut of, and in stede of the same a mangled rehearsall of the residue, set downe and left in memorie. Wherefore I beseech your Honour to pardon this imperfection and rudenesse of my labour, which notwithstanding is not altogither in vayne, sith my errors may prooue a spurre vnto the better skilled, eyther to correct, or inlarge where occasion serueth, or at the leastwise to take in hande a more absolute peece of worke as better direction shall encorage them thereto. The entraunce and beginning of euery thing is the hardest, and hee that beginneth well hath atchieued halfe hys purpose. The Ise my Lorde is broken, and from henceforth it wil be more easie for such as shall come after to wade through with the reast, sith facile est inuētis addere, and to continue and finishe, is not so great a matter in building, as to attempt and laye the foundation or platforme of any noble peece of workemanshippe, though it be but rudely handled. But to my purpose as I began at ỹ Thames in my description of Ilandes, so will I now do the like with that of riuers: making mine entrie at the sayde ryuer it selfe, which hath his heade or beginning out of the side of an hyll, standing in the playnes of Cotteswolde, about one mile from Tetbury nere vnto the Fosse (an hygh waye so called of olde) where it was sometyme named Isis or the Ouse, although dyuers doe ignorauntlye call it the Thames, euen there, rather of a foolishe custome then of anye skill, bycause they eyther neglect or vtterly are ignoraunt, how it was named at the first. From hence it runneth directly toward the east, where it meeteth with the Tyne or Churne, (a brooke called in latin Corinium) whereof Cyrnecester towne by which it commeth doth take the name. From hence it hasteth to Crekelade (alias Trekanford) Lechlade, Radcotebridge, Newbridge, & Eusham (receiuing by the way an infinit sort of small streames, brookes, beckes, waters, & rundelles) & here on this side of the towne deuiding it selfe into two courses, of which the one goeth straight to Botley, and Hunkley, the other by Godstow, a village not farre of. This latter spreadeth it selfe also for a while Thamesis. Corinium.

into ſundry ſmaller braunches, which runne not farre eare they be reunited, and then beclipping ſundry pleaſaunt meadowes, it paſſeth at length by Dreſord, where it meeteth with the Charwell, and a little from whence the originall braunches doe ioyne againe and go together by Abbandune (or Abington, as we call it,) although no part of it at the firſt came ſo neere the Towne as it doth now, till a braunch thereof was led thyther from the mayne ſtreame, through the induſtrie of the monkes as (beſide the teſtimonie of olde recordes thereof yet extant to be ſeene) by the decay of Dorcheſter it ſelf, ſomtime the rommō thorowfare from Wales, and the Weſt countrey to London, which inſued vpon this fact, is eaſie to bee ſeene. From hence it goeth to Dorcheſter and ſo to Thame, where ioyning with a riuer of the ſame denomination, it loſeth the name of Iſis or Ouſe, (whereof Duſeney at Dreſorde is produced) and frō the ceforth is called Thameſis. From Thame it goeth to Wallingforde and ſo to Reading, which ſome of the number of Bridges there doe call Pontium, albeit that the Engliſhe name doe proceede rather from Rhe, or Ree the Saxon word for a water courſe or riuer, which may be ſeene in Ouerée or Sutherey, for ouer the Rée or South of the Rhe as the ſkilfull can conjecture. But howſoeuer that matter ſtandeth after it hath paſſed by Reading, and there receyued the Kenet, which commeth from the hilles that lye Weſt of Marlebrough, and then the Thetis, commonly called the Tyde that commeth from the Thetisforde: it hyeth to Sudlington, or Maydenheade, and ſo to Wyndleſhore (or Windſore) Eaton & then to Chertſey, where Erkenwalde Biſhoppe of London, ſomtime, buylded a religious Houſe, as I doe reade. From Chertſeye it halleth dyrealye vnto Stanes, and recryuing an other ſtreame by the waye, called the Cole, (whereupon Colbrooke ſtandeth) it goeth by Kingſtone Shene Sion, and Brentforde, where it meeteth the Brane or the Brene, another Brooke diſcending from Edgeworth whoſe name ſignifieth a Frogge, in the Britiſh ſpeache. Vppon thys alſo Sir John Thinne, had ſometyme a ſtately houſe wyth marueylous prouiſion to incloſe and retayne ſuch fiſhe as ſhoulde come about the ſame. From Brentforde it paſſeth by Mortlach, Putney, Fulham, Batterſey, Chelſey, Lambeth, and ſo to London. Finallye going from thence vnto the ſea, it taketh the Lée wyth it by the waye vpon the Coaſt of Eſſex, and the Darnt vpō Kentſide, which riſeth nére to Tanrige, and commeth by Shorehame vnto Dertforde, whereunto the Cray falleth. And laſt of all the mydway a notable ryuer, (in mine opinion) which watereth all the South, and Southweſt part of Kent, and whoſe deſcription is not to be omitted in his place.

Thus we ſée the whole tract and courſe of ỹ Thames by whoſe head and fall, it is euident that the length therof is at the leaſt, one hundreth and eighty miles, if it be meaſured by ỹ iourneyes of the land. And as it is in courſe, the longeſt of the thrée famous riuers of thys Iſle, ſo it is nothing inferiour vnto them, in abundance of all kinde of fiſhe, whereof it is harde to ſay, which of them haue eyther moſt plentie, or greateſt varietie, if the circumſtāces be duely weighed. What ſhould I ſpeake of the fat and ſweete Samons, daply taken in this ſtreame, & that in ſuch plentye, as no ryuer in Europa, is able to excéede it, but what ſtore alſo of Barbelles, Troutes, Cheuins, Pearches, Smelts, Breames, Roches, Daces, Gudgins, Floūders, Shrimps, Eles. &c. are commōly to be had therein, I referre me to them, that knowe the ſame by experience. And albeit it ſéemeth from time to time, to be as it were defrauded in ſundrye wiſe, of theſe hir large commodities, by the inſatiable auarice of ỹ fiſhermen, yet this famous ryuer cōplayneth of no wante, but the more it loſeth at one tyme, the more it yéeldeth at another. Onely in Carpes it ſéemeth to bée ſcant, ſith it is not long ſince that kynde of fiſhe was brought ouer into Englande, and but of late to ſpeake of, into this ſtreame by the violent rage of ſundry Landfloudes, that brake open the heades and dammes of diuers Gentlemens pondes, by which meanes it became partaker alſo of this ſaid commoditie, whereof earſt it had no portion that I coulde euer heare of.

Carpes a fiſhe late brought into England, and later into the Thames.

Furthermore the ſayde riuer floweth and filleth all his channels twyſe in the daye and night, that is in euery 12. houres once, & thys ebbing and flowing, holdeth on for the ſpace of ſeauentye miles, within the mayne lande: the ſtreame or tyde, being alwayes hyghſt at Londō, when the Moone doth exactly touch the northeaſt and ſouth or weſt pointes, of the heauens, of which one is viſible, the other vnder the earth, and not ſubiect to our ſight.

South weſt, and north eaſt Moones, make full ſea at Lōdon: as the full and chaunge doth higheſt tydes, which we commonly call ſpring tides.

These tydes alſo differ in their tymes eche one comming latter then other, by ſo manye mynutes as paſſe ere the reuolucion and naturall courſe of the heauens doe reduce, and bring about the ſayde Planet, vnto thoſe hir former places: whereby the common difference betweene one tyde and another, is founde to conſiſt of twentye foure mynutes, which wāteth but twelue of an whole houre, in

This order of flowing likewise is perpetuall, except rough winds doe happen to checke the streame in his comming, or else some other occasion, put by the ordinary course of the Northen seas, which fyll the sayde ryuer by their naturall returne and flowing. And that both these doe happen oft among, I referre me to such as haue not slodome obserued it. For sometime the huge wind keepeth back a great part of the floude, whereby the tyde is differred (though neuer altogyther put by) and sometyme there happen three or foure tydes in one naturall daye, whereof the vnskilful do descant many things. I would here make mencion of sundry bridges placed ouer this noble streame, of which that of London is most chiefly to be cõmended, for it is manner a continuall Strete, well replenished with large and statelye houses on both sides, & settuate vpon twentie Arches, whereof eche one is made of excellent free squared stone, euery of them being three score fote in height, and full twentie in distaunce one from another.

In lyke maner I coulde intreat of the infinite number of swannes dayly to be seene vpon thys riuer, the two thousand Whirries and small bots, whereby three thousand poore watermen are maintained, through the cariage and recariage, of such persons as passe, or repasse, from tyme to tyme vppon the same: beside those huge tyde botes, tiltbotes & barges, which eyther carry passengers, or bring necessary prouision, from all quarters of Oxfordshyre, Barkeshyre, Buckinghamshyre, Bedfordeshyre, Herforde shyre, Mydellser, Esser, Surry and Kent, vnto the Citie of London. But forsomuch as these thynges are to be repeated againe in the particuler discription of London, annexed to hys Carde. I suesse at this tyme to speake any more of them as also of the ryuer it selfe, wherefore let thys suffyse.

Next vnto the Thames we haue the midway water, which falleth into the mayne sea at Shepey. It ariseth Warde forrest in Sussex, and when it is come so farre as Whethelin towne, it meeteth a little by north thereof, with the Done, which descendeth from waterden forrest, and from whence they go on together, as one by Ashehirst, where hauing receyued also the seconde broke, it hasteth to Pẽsherst, & there carrieth with all the Eden, that commeth from Lingfielde parke. After thys it goeth into the South east parte of Kent, and taketh with it the Frith or Firth, on the north west syde, and an other lyttle streame that commeth from the hylles, betweene Peenebury and Horsemon, on the south est. From thence also & not farre from Palling it receiueth the Theise (a prettye streame that ariseth about Theise Hirst hend afterwarde the Gran or crane, which hauing hys heade not farre from Cranbroke, and meeting with sundry other reuellettes by the way, whereof one braunche of Theise is the last, (for it parteth at the Twist, and includeth a pretty Islande) doth ioyne with the said Medway, a litle aboue Palding, & then with the Lowse. Finally at Maidstone, it meeteth wyth another broke, whose name I knowe not, and then passeth by Allington, Dutton, Newhide, Palling, Cuckestane, Rochester, Chattham, Gillingham, Apchurch, Kingsferry, and falleth into the maine sea, betwene Shepey and the Crane.

Some saye that it is called mydway water because it falleth into the sea mydway, betweene the north foreland and London: yet some not hauing anye such consideration, doe name it, the Medow streame, whereof I thought good also to leaue this short admonition.

After the Midway whose discription I haue partely gathered out of the Leland, and partly out of Maister Lamberts perambulatõ of Kẽt, we haue ỹ Stoure that riseth at Kingeslwode which is fourteene or fifteene myles, frõ Canterbury. This riuer passeth by Ashefords, Wie, Nackington, Canterbury, Fordich, Standich, and Stouremouth, where it receyueth another ryuer, which hath 3. braunches, whereof one called Bredge goeth by Bishops bourne, the other named Wyham, beginneth about Adham, and the thirde (nameless) runeth by Staple to Wingham. Afterwarde our Stoure or Sture parteth it selfe in twaine, and in such wyse that one arme thereof goeth towarde the North, and is called (when it commeth at the sea) the Northmouth of Stoure, the other runneth Southeast warde vp to Ryche borow & so to Sandwiche, from whence it goeth Northeast agayne & falleth into the sea. The issue of this latter tract is called the hauen of Sandwiche and peraduenture the streame that commeth downe thither, after the diuisiõ of the Stoure, may be the same, which Beda calleth Wantsome, but as I cãnot vndo this knot at will, so this is certaine, that the Stoure on the one side, and peraduenture, the Wantsome on the other parteth & cutteth the Tenet from the maine lande of Kent, wherby it is left for an Island and so replenished with townes, as I haue notified before, in ỹ chapter that speaketh of our Islandes.

There are other little Brookes, which fall into the Stoure of which Lelande ſpeaketh, as Fiſhpole becke, that ariſeth in Stonehirſtwood and meeteth with it foure myles from Canterbury: an other begynneth at Chiſelet, & goeth into the Stoure gut, which ſometime incloſed Thanet, as Leylande ſaieth, the thirde iſſueth out of the grounde at Northburne (where Eadbert of Kent ſome time paſt held his pallace &) runneth to Sandwich hauen, as the ſayde Author reporteth, & the fourth called Bridge water that ryſeth by S. Marie Burne church, & meeteth with Canterbury water at Stourmouth: alſo Wyham that ryſeth aboue Wyham, and falleth into Bredge water at Dudmyll, or Wenderton: but ſith they are eyther obſcure or nameleſſe & there to not referuing there names till they come at the ſea, I paſſe them ouer as not to be touched here. From hence vnto Douer I finde no ſtreame by reaſon of the Clyffes, that enuironne the ſayde coaſt: howbeit vpon the South ſide of Douer there is a prettie freſh ryuer, whoſe head ariſeth at Erwell, not paſſing foure myles from the ſea, and of ſome is called Dour, which in the Brittiſhe tongue is a common name for all waters. And therefore alſo it is lykely that the towne and Caſtell of Douer dyd ſometyme take the name. From hence we go towarde the Camber, (omitting paraduenture here and there ſundrye ſmall Creekes, & Beckes, by the way) whereabouts the Rother, a noble ruuer falleth into ỹ ſea. This Rother hath his head in Suſſex not far from Argas hill neere to Waterden forreſt, and from thence directeth his courſe vnto Rotherfield. After this it goeth to Ethlingham or Hitchingham, and ſo forth by Newendon vnto Matthamferry, where it deuided it ſelfe in ſuch wiſe, that one braunche thereof goeth to Appledour (where it meeteth wᵗ the Bily that ryſeth about Billington) the other by Iden, ſo that it includeth a fine percell of grounde called Orney, which in times paſt was reputed as a percell of Suſſex, but now vpon ſome occaſion or other, it is annexed vnto Kent. From hence alſo growing into ſome greatneſſe, it runneth to Rie, where it meeteth finally with the Becke, which commeth from Beckley, ſo that the plot wherein Rye ſtandeth, is in maner a Ilande or Peninſula, as experience doth confirme. Lelande and moſt men are of the opinion that this ryuer ſhoulde be called the Limene, howbeit in our time it is knowen by none other name, then the Rother or Appledour water, whereof let this ſuffice.

Being thus croſſed ouer to the Weſt ſide of Rye hauen, and in viewing the iſſues that fal into the ſame, I meete firſt of all with a water that groweth of two brookes, which come downe by one Chanell into the eaſt ſide of the mouth of the ſayde Port. The firſt therefore that falleth into it, deſcendeth from Beckley or thereabouts, as I take it, the nert runneth along by Peſemarſh, and ſome after ioyning withall, they holde on as one, till they fall into the ſame at the Weſterly ſide of Rye. The third ſtreame commeth from the North, and as it meaneth vp not farre from Punfield, ſo it runneth betweene Deſcamb and Maclington neere vnto Bread, taking another rill with all that ryſeth as I heare not verye farre from Weſtfield. There is likewyſe a fourth that groweth of two heades, betweene Iclingham and Pet, & going by Winchelſey it meeteth withall about Rye hauen, ſo that Winchelſey ſtandeth enuironned on three partes with water, and the ſtreames of theſe two that I haue laſt rehearſed.

The water that falleth into the Ocean, a myle by Southweſt of Haſtinges or thereabouts, is called Æſtus or Aſten, and riſing not farre from Penhirſt, it meeteth with the ſea, as I heare by Eaſt of Hollington. Bulwerhithe is but a creeke as I remember ſerued huhe with no backewater, and ſo I heare of Codding or olde hauen, wherfore I meane not to touche them.

Into Peuenſey hauen diuers waters doe reſort, & of theſe that which entereth into the ſame on the Eaſt ſide ryſeth out from two heades, whereof the moſt eaſterly is called Aſhe, the nert vnto it the Burne, and vniting themſelues not farre from Aſheburne, they continue their courſe vnder the name and title of Aſheburne water as I reade. The ſeconde that commeth thereinto ryſeth alſo of two heades, whereof the one is ſo many miles from Bozeham, the other not farre from the Parke eaſt of Hellingſtowne, and both of the cõcurring Southweſt of Hirſtmowſen, they direct their courſe toward Peuẽſey (beneath which they meete wyth an other ryling at Foyngton) and thence go in one chanell for a myle or more, till they fall togither into the Peuenſey hauen.

that falleth into the ſame on the eaſt ſide, iſſueth out of the grounde about Hertwood, & running from thence by Langhō and Ripe, on the Weſt ſide, it falleth into the aforeſayd ryuer beneath Foſle and Glyme, or three myles lower then Lewys, if the other buttal lyke you not. The next herunto hath his head in Argas hill, the thirde deſcendeth frō Aſhedon forreſt, and ioyning with the laſt mentioned, they croſſe the maine ryuer a little beneath Iſefield. The fourth water commeth from Aſhedon forreſt by Horſted Caines (or Duſeſtate Caines) and falleth into the ſame, lykewyſe Eaſt of Linfield. Certes I am deceyued if this ryuer be not called Iſis, after it is paſt Iſefield. The fift ryſeth about Storuelgate, and meeteth alſo wyth the maine ſtreame aboue Linfield, & theſe are knowen to lye vpon the right hande as we rowed vp the ryuer. On the other ſide are onely two, whereof the firſt hath his originall neere vnto Weneſield, and holding on his courſe towarde the Eaſt, it meeteth with his maiſter betweene Newicke and Iſefield, or Iſfield as ſome reade it. The laſt of all commeth from Plimodune or Plumpton, and hauing met in like ſort with the maine riuer about Barcham, it runneth forth with it, and the reſt in one chanell by Barcham, Hamley, Walling, Lewys, Piddingburne, and ſo forth into the maine ſea.

Sora.

The next ryuer that we came vnto Weſt of Brighthemſton is the Soze, which notwithſtanding I finde to be called Brember water, in the auncient Mappe of Parton Colledge in Oxforde: but in ſuch ſorte (as I take it) as the Rother is called Appledour ſtreame, becauſe of the ſayd towne that ſtandeth therevpon. But to proceede, it is a pleaſaunt water, and thereto if you conſider the ſcituation of his armes, and braunches from the higher grounde, very much reſembling a flower fringed whip. Wherabout the head of this riuer is, or which of theſe braunches may ſafely be called Sora, from the riſing, in good ſoth I can not ſay, for after we had paſſed nyne or tenne myles thereon vp into the lande, ſodainly the croſſe waters ſtopped vs, ſo that we were inforced to turne either eaſt or weſt, for directly forth ryght we had no way to go. The firſt arme on the ryght hand as we went, ryſeth out of a Parke by South of Alborne, and going on for a certayne ſpace toward the Northweſt, it turneth ſouthward betweene Shermonbury and Twinham, and ſome after meeteth with ỳ Bymar, not much South from Shermonbury, whence they run togither almoſt two myles, till they fall into the Soze. That on the Weſtſide deſcendeth from about Billingeſhirſt, & going towarde the eaſt, it croſſeth wᵗ the fourth (which ryſeth a little by Weſt of Thacam) eaſt from Pulborow, and ſo they run as one into the Soze, that after this cōfluence haſteth it ſelf ſouthwarde by Brember, Burleis, the Combes, and ere long into the Ocean.

Bimarus.

The Aron (of which beſide Arundel towne the Caſtell and the valey, wherin it runneth is called Vallis Aruntina, or Arundale in Engliſh) is a goodly water and thereto increaſed with no ſmall number of excellent & pleaſaunt brookes. It ſpringeth vp of two heades, whereof one deſcendeth from the North not farre from Gretham, & going by Lis, meeteth with the nert ſtreame, as I geſſe about Dourſford houſe. The ſecond riſeth by Weſt from the hilles that lye towarde the ryſing of the ſunne from Eaſtmaine and runneth by Peterfield. The thirde commeth from Berpton warde and ioyneth with the ſecond betweene Peterfield and Dourſforde, after which cōfluence they go togither in one chanell ſtill toward the Eaſt, (taking a rill with them that commeth betweene Fernehirſt and S. Lukes Chappell, ſouthweſt of Linchemere & meting with it Eaſt of Loddeſworth as I doe reade, and lykewyſe ſundrye other in one Chanell beneath Sopham) to Waltham, Bury, Houghton, Stoke, Arundell, Toztington forde, Climping (all on the Weſt ſide,) and ſo into the ſea. Hauing thus deſcribed the weſt ſide of Arun, let vs doe the lyke with the other in ſuch ſorte as we beſt may. The firſt riuer that we come vnto therfore on the Eaſt ſide, and alſo the ſeconde riſe at ſundry places in S. Leonards forreſt, and ioyning a lyttle aboue Horſham, they mete with the thirde, which commeth from Iſield Parke, not verye farre from Slinfeld. The fourth hath two heads, whereof one ryſeth in Witley Parke, the other by weſt, neere vnto Heſelmere chappell, and meeting by weſt of Dourſfeld, they vnyte themſelues with the chanell, growing by the confluence that I ſpake of beneath Slinfeld, a little aboue Billingeſhirſt. The laſt water commeth from the hilles aboue Linchemeere, and runneth weſt and South, and paſſing betweene Billingſhirſt and Stopham it commeth vnto the chanell laſt mencioned, & ſo into the Arun, beneath Stopham, without anye farder increaſe, at the leaſt that I doe here of.

Aruntus.

Burne hath his iſſue in a Parke, neere Aldingburne (or rather a litle aboue ỳ ſame toward the North, as I haue ſince beene informed,) and running by the bottomes toward the ſouth, it falleth into the ſea betweene norty Berſlete and Fleſham.

Burnus.

Cryn

Eryn. Eryn riseth of sundry heddes, by east of Erynley and directing his course toward the sunne ryding, it peninsulateth Seleley, and falleth into the Ocean betwéene Seleley towne on the southwest & Pagham at north west.

Delus. Del springeth about Benderton, & thence running betwéene midle Lauaunt and East Lauaunt, it goeth by west of West Hamphnet, by east of Chichester, or West of Rumbalde towne, and afterwarde by Fishburne, where it méeteth with a ril comming North west from Funtingdon (a little beneath the towne) and then running thus in one streame towarde the sea, it méeteth with another rilet comming by North the of Botham and so into Auant gulf by East of Thorney Iland.

Racunus. The Racon riseth by east of Racton or Racodunum and cõming by Chidham, it falleth into the sea, Northest of Thorney afore sayde.

Emill. The Emill commeth first betwéene Racton and Stanked then downe to Emilworth or Emmelworth, and so vnto the Ocean, separating Sussex from Hãpshyre almost from the very head.

Hauing in this maner passed along the coastes of Sussex. The next water that I remẽber, ryseth by east of the forrest of Ellbery, from whence it goeth by Southwike, West Buchant, Farham, and so into the gulfe almost full South.

Badunus. forté. Then come we to Bedenham Créke (so called of a village standing thereby,) the mouth whereof lyeth almost directly agaynst Portchester Castell, which is scituate about 3. miles by water from Portesmouth towne, as Lelande doth report. Then go we within halfe a myle farder to Fozten Créke, which eyther gyueth or taketh name of a village harde by. After this we come to Osterpole Lake, a great Créke, which goeth vp by west into the land, and lyeth not far from a rounde tower of stone, from whence also there goeth a chaine, to another Tower on the east side directly ouer against it, whereby the entraunce of great vessels into that part maye be at pleasure restrayned.

Fozten. Osterpole.

From hence wée goe further to Tichefeld water, that riseth about Ellmaine park, ten or twelue myles by northeast or there about from Tichfeld. From Ellmaine it goeth (parting the forrestes of Walthan, and Castbery by the waye) to Wicham or Wicomb, a prety market towne and large thorowfare, where also the water seperateth it selfe into two armelettes, and goyng vnder two bridges of woode, commeth ere long agayne vnto one Chanell. From hence it goeth thrée or foure myles farder, to a bridge of tymber by Maister Wrythoseleyes house, (leauing Tichfelde towne on the right side) & a little beneath runneth vnder Ware bridg whether the sea floweth as hir natural course inforceth. Finally within a mile of this bridge it goeth into the water of Hampton hauen, whervnto diuers streames resort as you shal heare hereafter.

Tichefield.

After this we come to Hamble hauen, or Hamelrish Hamelrish créke, whose fall is betwéene S. Andrewes castell, and Hoke. It riseth about Shidford in waltham forrest, and when it is past Croke bridge, it méeteth with another brooke, which riseth not farre frõ Bishoppes Waltham, out of sundry springes in the high way, to Winchester, from whence it passeth as I sayde by Bishoppes Waltham, then to Budeley or Botley, and so ioyning with the Hamble, they runne togither by Prowlingsworth, Upton, Bursill, Hamble towne, and so into the sea.

Hamelrish.

Now come we to the haué of south Hampton; which I will briefely describe so neare as I can possibly. The breadth or entry of the mouth herof, as I take it, is by estimatiõ two miles from shore to shore. At the west poynt therof also is a strong castell lately builded which is rightly named Caldshore, but now Calshot, I wote not by what occasion. On ỹ east side therof also, is a place called Hoke (afore mẽtioned) or Hamell hoke, wherin are not aboue thrée or foure fishers houses, not worthy to be remembred. This hauen shooteth vp on the west side by the space of seauen miles, vntill it come to Hamptõ towne, standing on the other side, where it is by estimation a mile from lande to lande. Thence it goeth vp further about thrée myles to Redbridge still ebbing and flowing thither, and one myle farther, so farre as my memorye doeth serue mée. Nowe it resteth that I describe the Alresforde streame, which I will proceede withall in this order following.

South-hampton.

The Alresforde beginneth of diuers faire springs, about a mile or more fro Alresford, or Alforde as it is now called, & some after resorting to one bottome, they become a brode lake, which for the most part is called Alford pond. Afterwarde returning againe to a narrowe chanell, it goeth thorow a stone bridge at the ende of Alforde towne, (leauing the towne it selfe on the left hand) toward Hichingstocke thrée myles of, but ere it commeth there, it receiueth two ryles in one bottome, wherof one commeth frõ the Forrest in maner at hande, and by northwest of olde Alresforde, the other from Browne Candiuer, that goeth by Northenton, Swarewotton, Aberstone.

ſtone.&c. vntill we méete with the ſayd water beneath Alforde towne. Being paſt Hichinſtocke, it commeth by Auington to Eſton village, and to Worthy, where it beginneth to braunch, and rehe arme to part it ſelfe into other, that reſorte to Hyde and the lower ſoples by Eaſt of Wincheſter, there ſeruing ỳ ſtrétes, the cloſe of S. Maries, Molueley, and the new Colledge very plentifully wyth their water. But in this meane while the great ſtreame commeth from Worthy to the caſt bridg, & ſo to S. Elizabeth Colledge, where it doth alſo parte in twayne, enuironing the ſayd houſe in moſt dilectable maner. After this it goeth towarde S. Croſſes, leauing it a quarter of a mile on the right hand: then to Twiſord (a myle lower) where it gathereth agayne into one bottome, and goeth fiue miles farder to Woodmill, taking the Otter brooke withall, on the eaſt ſide, and ſo into the ſalt créeke that leadeth downe to the hauen. Otter.

On the other ſide of Southampton, there reſorteth into this hauen alſo, both the Teſte and the Stockebridge water in one bottome, whereof I finde thys large deſcription inſuing. Stocke.

The very head of the Stocke water, is ſuppoſed to bée ſomewhere about Baſing ſtoke, or Church Hockley, and going from thence betwene Querton & Steuenton, it commeth at laſt by Lauerſtocke and Whitchurch, and ſome after receyuing a brooke, by Northweſt called the Bourne (diſcending from S. Mary Bourne, ſoutheaſt from Horſeburne) it proceédeth by Long paroch and the Wlwode, till it méete with the Cranburne, on the eaſt ſide (a prety riueret ryſing about Michelney, and going by Fullington, Barton, and to Cramburne) thence to Horwell in one bottome, beneth which it méeteth with the Andeuer water, that is increaſed ere it come there by another brooke, whoſe name I doe not knowe. This Andeuer ſtreame, ryſeth in Culhāſhire forreſt, not far by north from Andeuer towne & going to vpper Clatford, ere it touch there it receyueth the Rill of which I ſpake before, which ryſing alſo néere vnto Anpord, goeth to Monketon, to Abbateſham, the Andeuer, and both as I ſaid vnto the Teſt beneth Horwel, whereof I ſpake euen nowe. Theſe ſtreames being thus brought into one botom it rūneth toward the South, vnder ſtockbridge, & ſome after diuiding it ſelfe in twayne, one braunch thereof goeth by Houghton, & a litle beneath méeteth wyth a Ryll, that commeth from by Weſt of S. Annes hyll, and goeth by Eaſt of vpper Wallop, Weſt of nether Wallop, by Buckholt Forreſt, Broughton, and called as Bourne.

I haue béene informed ỳ Gallop, but nowe it is named Wallop. The other arme runneth thorowe the Parke, by North weſt of Kings Somburne, and vniting themſelues agayne, they go forth by Mottelhunt, and thé receyue the Teſt, a prety water ryſing in Clarendun Parke, that goeth by Weſt Deane, and Eaſt Deane, ſo to Mottelhunt, and finally to the aforeſayde water, which from thence forth is called the Teſte, euen vnto the Sea. But to proceéde. After this confluence, it taketh the gate to Kimb bridge, then to Rumſey, Longbridge, and beneath the ſame receiueth a concourſe of two rilles whereof the one commeth from Sherefielde, the other from the newe Forreſt, and ioyning in Madely Park, they beate vppon the Teſte, not very farre from Nurſeling. From thence the Teſt goeth vnder a prety bridge, before it come at Redbridge, from whence it is not long ere it fall into the hauen. Malopius. Teſte.

The next riuer that runneth into this port, ſpringeth in the new Forreſt, and commeth thereinto about Eling, not paſſing one mile, by weſt of the fall of Teſt. From hence caſting about againe into the maine ſea, and leauing Calde ſhore Caſtle on the right hande, wée directed our courſe towarde the Southweſt, vnto Beaulieu hauen whereinto the Miney deſcendeth. Eling.

The Miney ryſeth not farre from Mineyſtéede a Village in the north part of the newe Forreſt, and going by Beaulieu, it falleth into the ſea ſouthweſt, as I take it, of Erbury, a Village ſtanding vpon the ſhore. Miney.

Beyng paſt the Miney, wée croſſed the Limen, whoſe heade is in the very heart of the newe Forreſt, and running South weſt of Lindhyrſt and the Parke, it goeth by Eaſt of Brokenhirſt Weſt of Bulder, and finally into the Sea South and by Eaſt of Lemington. Limen.

The next fall that we paſſed by is nameleſſe, except it be called Bure, & as it deſcendeth from the newe Forreſt, ſo the next vnto it hight Mile, as I haue heard in Engliſhe. Certes the head thereof, is alſo in the ſouthweſt part of the ſaid Forreſt, and the fall not far from Milford bridge, beyonde the which I find a narrow going or Strickland leading from the poynte to Hirſt Caſtle, which ſtandeth into the Sea, as if it hung by a thred frō the mayne of the Iſlande, ready to be waſhed away, by the continuall and dayly beating of the waues. Bure. Miliſ.

The nert riuer that we came vnto of any name is the Auon, which ryſeth by northeaſt, and not far from Wolfe hall, in Wiltſhire. The firſt notable bridge that it rūneth vnto, Auon.

is at Vphauen, thence foure myles farder, it goeth to little Ambreſbury, and there is another bridge, from thence to Woodford village, ſtanding at the right hand bank, and Newtō village on the left. The Biſhops of Sarum had a proper Manour place at Woodforde, which Biſhoppe Sharton pulled downe altogither, becauſe it was ſomewhat in ruine. Thence it goeth to Fiſhertō bridge, to Cranebridge old Saliſbury, new Saliſbury, & finally to Harnham, which is a ſtately bridge of ſtone, of fiue arches at the leaſt. There is at the weſt ende of the ſayde bridge, a little Iſland, that lyeth betwixt this and another bridge, of foure pretty arches, and vnder this latter rūneth a good round ſtreame, which as I take it, is a braēch of Auon, that breaketh out a little aboue, and ſome after it reuniteth it ſelfe agayne: or elſe that Wilton water hath there his entry into the Auon, which I cannot yet determine. Frō Harneham bridge it goeth to Dounton, that is about foure miles, and ſo much in like ſort from thence to Fordingbridge, to Ringwood bridge fiue miles, to Chriſtes church Twinham fiue myles, and ſtrayght into the ſea.

Poole. The nert fall that we come vnto is Poole, from whoſe mouth vpon the ſhore, by South weſt in a bay of three miles of, is a poore fiſher towne, called Sandwiche, where we ſawe a pere and a little freſh brooke. The very vtter part of ſaint Adelmes poynt, is fiue miles from Sandwich. In another bay lyeth weſt Lyllewoth, where as I heare is ſome profitable herborow for ſhips. The towne of Poole is from Wimburne about foure miles, and it ſtandeth almoſt as an Iſle in the hauen. The hauen it ſelfe alſo if a man ſhould meaſure it by the circuite, wanteth little of twenty mile, as I did gueſſe by the view.

Wey. Waiemouth, or as ſome doe call it Wylemouth, is coūted twenty meles from Poole, & ỳ head of this riuer riſeth not full foure miles aboue the hauen, by northweſt at Vplil in the ſide of a great hill. There is a little barre of ſande at the hauen mouth, & a great arme of ỳ ſea runneth vp by the right hand, and ſcant a mile aboue the hauen mouth on the ſhore, is a right goodly and warlike caſtle made, which hath one open barbicane. This arme rūneth vp alſo farder by a myle as in a baye, to a point of land wher a paſſage is into Portlād, by a little courſe of pibble ſande. It goeth vp alſo from the ſayd paſſage vnto Abbatelbiry about ſeuen miles of, where a little freſhe rōdell reſorteth to the ſea. And ſomwhat aboue this, is the head or point of the Cheſill lying northweſt, which ſtretcheth vp from thence about ſeuē miles, as a maine narrow bank, by a right line vnto the ſoutheſt, and there abutteth vpō Portlande ſcant a quarter of a mile aboue ỳ Newcaſtle there. The nature of this banke is ſuch, that ſo oft as the wind bloweth vehemently at ſoutheaſt, ſo often the ſea beateth in and looſing the banke ſoketh thorowe it: ſo that if this winde ſhould blow from that corner anye long tyme togyther, Portlande ſhoulde be left an Iſlande as it hath beene before. But as the ſoutheſt winde doth appaire this banke, ſo a northweſt doth barre it vp againe. It is prety to note of the Townelet of Waimouth which lieth ſtreight againſt Pilton on the other ſide, and of this place where the water of the hauen is but of ſmal bredth, that a rope is cōmonly tied frō one ſide of the ſhore to an other, whereby the ferry men doe guide their botes without any helpe of Ores. But to proceede wyth our purpoſe. Into the mouth of this riuer doe ſhips often come for ſuccour, & being paſt the ſame, we meete with ỳ fal of a water neere to ſ. Catherins chapple as we ſailed by ỳ Shingle, which came down frō Litton by Chilcomb, and thence we went to Bruteport water that ariſeth halfe a mile or more aboue Bemiſter, from whence it goeth to Parnham, Netherbury, Welplaſh, & ſo to Bruteport, & afterwarde into ỳ ſea, taking in ſundry waters wt al by the way, wherof in my nert treatiſe God willing I meane as of diuers other to make a particuler rehearſall. Leuing the Brudeport, we paſſed by Stantō Gabriell, & beholding Charemouth Beacon a far of, we directed our courſe toward ỳ ſame, but ere we came there, we beheld the fall of Chare, which is a prety water. It ryſeth about three miles aboue Charemouth by north in a parke of the kinges called Marlhewood. Chare. Nert vnto this is the Buddle, which cōmeth about three miles by north of Lyme from the hilles, fleeting vpon rocky ſoyle, and ſo falleth into the ſea. Buddle.

Beyond this is the Are whoſe iſſue at thys preſent is harde vnder the rootes of Winter cliffes, and the poyntes thereof beyng almoſt a myle in ſunder, the moſt weſterlye of them called Berewood, lyeth within halfe a mile of Seton, but the other toward the eaſt, is called Whitecliffe, wherof I haue ſpoken already. This riuer riſeth a mile northeſt frō Bemiſter a market Towne, in Dorſet ſhyre, at a place called Are knoll, (longing to Sir Giles Strangwaies) in a moore hanging on the ſide of an hill. And from thence it runneth to the ruines of an old Abbay called Fordes, about foure or fiue miles from thence, (where it ſēmeth to bee a partician betweene Sommerſetſhyre and Deuen) then vnto Are Winſter in Deuonſhyre, and ſo thorowe the Towne it ſelfe, wherein a great ſlaughter was made Are.

But to proceede after our riuer hath passed thorow Areminster towne, it goeth to ỹ brig thereby (where sone after it receiueth the the Artey, sometyme a raging water) and finally to Are mouth Towne, frõ whence after it hath as it were played it selfe, in the pleasant botomes, by the space of a quarter of a myle, it goeth vnder White cliffe and so into the sea, where it is called Arebaye, and thus is that ryuer described. Artey.

As for the hauen which in times past as I haue hearde, hath bene at Sidmouth (so called of Sidde a rylet that runeth therto) and likewyse at Seton. I passe it ouer, sith nowe there is none at al. Yet hath there bene sometyme a notable one, albeit that at this present betwene the two poyntes of the olde hauen, there lyeth a mightie barre of pibble stones, in the verye mouth of it, and the ryuer Are isdryue to the very east point of ỹ haue called White cliffe. Therat also a very little gull goeth into the sea, whether small fisherbotes doe oft resort for succour. The men of Seton begunne of late to stake and make a maine wall within the hauen to haue chaunged the course of the Are, and (almost in the myddle of the old hauen) to haue trenched thorow the Chesil, therby to haue let out the Are, & to haue taken in the maine sea, but I here of none effect that this attempt dyd come vnto. Sidde. Seton.

From Seton westwarde lyeth Colyton, about two myles by west Northwest, where of ryseth the ryuer Coly, which goyng by the aforesaide towne, passeth by Colecomb parke, and afterwarde falleth betwéene Are bryge and Are mouth towne into the Are riuer. Coly.

Leauing the Coly we come sone after to Otterey hauen, whose heade riseth at Otterey fiue myles aboue Mohuns Ottery or Ottery Flemming flat North. From hence it goeth to Upoter, Mohuns Ottery, Hunitõ, Veniton bridge, S. Mary Otterey, Newton bridge Ottermouth and so into the sea. On the west side of this hauen is Budeley almost directly against Otterton. It is eaũe to be seene also, that within lesse then 100. yeares, ships did vse this hauẽ, but now it is barred vp. Some call it Budeley hauen of Budeley towne, other Salterne port, of a little creke comming out of the mayne hauen vnto Salterne village, that hath in time past bẽene a towne of greater estimation. Otterey.

From Otterey mouth we sailed vp to Exmouth so called of the riuer Exe, which moũteth in Exmore, at a place called Execresse thrée myles by Northeast, and from thence goeth by Exford where it is a rill or small water thẽ to Cluerton twelue miles from the head, thence to Therberton Cowley, and next of al to Excester receauing in the meane time the Simõs bath water, which riseth by Northwest of Simons bath bridge (fower myles from Exford:) and is in Sommer time so shalowe that a man maye easily passe ouer it, but in winter it rageth oft, and is very deepe and daungerous. As touching the hauen also I remember well that there lieth vpon the very West point of the same a barren sande and in the West Northwest goeth a little creke a mile or thereabout into the land which some call Kentõ creke. I haue herd that the Burgeses of Excester indeuoured to make the hauen to come vp to Excester it selfe, but whether they brought it to passe or no as yet I doe not know, this is certaine that in times past the shippes came vp no nearer then Apsham, which is a pretty townelet on the shore fower myles vpper into the hauen. Ex. Simmings Bath. Kenton.

Beyonde Excester hauen mouth 4. myles or there about I came to the Teigne mouth which ebbeth and floweth so farre as Newton. The head of this riuer is 20. myles from the sea, and it riseth in Dartmore at a place by northwest called Teigne head. Frõ hence also it goeth to Jagford bridge, Clifford bridge Bridford bridge, Chidley bridge, Teigne bridge, Newton bushelles, beneath which it receaueth Teigne. Leman.

Aller. receaueth the Leman water, and alſo Aller brooke, which riſeth three miles of, as Leland hath ſet down, who writeth moreouer of this hauen in ſort as followeth. The very vtter weſt point of the land, at ỹ mouth of Teigne is called the Neſſe, and is a very high redde cliffe. The eaſt part of the hauen is named the poles, a ſowe ſandie grounde eyther caſt vp by the ſpuing of the ſand out of ỹ Teigne, or elſe throwen vp from the ſhore by the rage of winde and water. This ſande occuppeth now a great quantitie of the ground betwene the hauen where the ſand riſeth, and Teigne mouth towne, which towne ſurnamed Regis, hath in time paſt beene ſore defaced by the Danes, and of late time by the Frenche.

Tor. From Teigne mouth we came to Tor bay, whereof the weſt point is called Byry, and the eaſt Perritory, betwene which is litle aboue foure miles. From Torre bate alſo to Dartmouth is fiue myles where (ſayth Leland) I marked diuers thinges. Firſt of all vpon the eaſt ſide of the hauen a great hilly point, called Downeſend & betwixt Downeſende, and a pointlet named Wherefore, is a litle baye.

Were. Were it ſelfe in like ſorte is not full a myle from Dolwineſend vpwarde into the hauen. Kingeſwere towne ſtandeth out as another pointlet, and betwixt it & Wherefore is the ſecond bay. Somwhat moreouer aboue Kingeſwere towne goeth a litle Creke vp into the land from the maine ſtreame of the hauen

Water hed called water head, & this is a very fitte place for veſſells to be made in. In like ſort half a mile beyond this into ỹ land ward, goeth another longer creke, & aboue that alſo a greater

Neſſe creke. the either of theſe called Gawnſton, whoſe hed

Gaunſton is here not half a mile frō ỹ maine ſea, by the compaſſing thereof as it runneth in Tor bay.

The riuer of Dart, commeth out of Dartmore fiftene miles aboue Totneſſe, in a very Dart or Darmour. large plot, and ſuch another wild moriſh and forreſtye grounde as Exmore is. Of it ſelfe moreouer this water is very ſwift, & thorow occaſion of Tinworkes whereby it paſſeth, it carieth much ſand to Totneſſe bridge, and ſo choketh the depth of the riuer downeward, that the hauen it ſelfe is almoſt ſpoiled by the ſame. The mariners of Dartmouth accompt this to be about a kenning frō Plimmouth.

In the valley alſo betwene Corneworthy & Aſhey rēptō, runneth a brooke called Hum-

Humberton. berton or Herburne. This water commeth out of a Welſpring, & ſo running about two myles, it paſſeth thorow a ſtone bridge called Roſt, two myles from Totneſſe. Frō thence moreouer, after it hath gone other two miles it commeth to Bow bridge, and there falleth into a ſaltwater creke, which gathereth in to the lande out of the hauen of Dartmouth. This creke at the head breaketh for a little way into two armes, whereof the one goeth vp to Bow bridge, and receyueth Humberton water (as I ſaide) ỹ other toward Cornewoythy frō whence vnto Dartmouth, is about foure myles. Finally about halfe a mile aboue Dartmouth towne, there is another Old mil creke. Creke going out of the maine ſtreame called Olde mill creke, ſo farre as I can learne by the rumor of the countrey.

About ſeuen myles by weſt ſouthweſt frō Saltcomb Dartmouth lyeth Saltcomb hauen, ſomewhat barred: & not much aboue the heade of it is Arme hauen, the backewater whereof Arme. commeth vnder Puy & Armington bridges, and ſo vnto the ſea at this place, which is full of flattes and rockes, ſo that no ſhippe commeth thither in any tempeſt, except it be forced thereto, thorowe the vttermoſt extremitie and deſperate hazarde of the fearefull mariners. King Phillip of Caſtile loſt two ſhippes here in the dayes of king Henry the ſeuenth, when he was driuen to lande in the Weſt coūtrey by rage of weather. Vnto Armouth alſo commeth the Awne water, after it hath Awne. paſſed by Eaſt Brenton and Gare bridges, and not farre from the fall of this, lyeth the Pawlme mouth ſo called of a ryuer whych Pawlme. cōmeth thither frō Le bridg to Palme bridg, & falleth into the ſea, about 4. miles by ſouth eaſt, frō the maine ſtreame of Plimmouth.

Being come to the Plimmoth, I finde Plim. that the mouth of the goulfe wherin the ſhips of this towne doe ride, is walled on eche ſide and chained ouer in ỹ time of neceſſitie. On ỹ ſouth ſide of the hauē alſo is a blockhouſe vpō a rocky hill, & vpō the eaſt ſide of this & Thamar hauen, lyeth the Hill baye creke, ỹ ſtone Hilbay creke. creke, Caine Creke, Shillſtō creke (which Stone houſe creke. is two myles of length and whereon ſtandeth Caine creke. a Hill) Budocks creke, and laſt of al, Tamertaue creke, ſo called becauſe of the concourſe of the Taue & Tamar waters there. Shillton. Budocks Tamartaue. Torrey Taue. Torrey brooke falleth lykewyſe into Plym, but whereaboutes as now, I haue forgotten. Finally vpon the weſt ſide of the hauen, is a notable creke alſo entering into the lande a myle or more from the hauen, which being viewed, I went and beheld Thamar hauen on the weſt ſide whereof, I noted theſe crekes.

Firſt of all about two myles aboue Aſhe I ſawe the principall arme of Thamar it ſelfe. Thamar. Certes it riſeth about three myles by Northeaſt from Hartland, & goeth vp into the land about tenne myles from that place: thence it haſteth to Calſtock bridge, whether it almoſt continually ebbeth and floweth, verye great veſſels cōming likewyſe within a mile ther-

of vnto Mozleham, which is not aboue three myles from Tauiſtocke as I reade. Betwixt Thamar ſtreame, and Alhe: I marked farder moze ſayeth Lelande other three crékes alſo deſcending, which brake vp into the lande, whereof the firſt lyeth by Northweſt, the ſeconde weſt northweſt, the thirde plaine weſt, entering into the country aboue half a mile, and ſcarſely a myle lower, I peruſed in like maner the Liuer créke, that goeth vp to S. Germains ward. This créke lyeth 3. myles from the maine ſtreame of Thamar hauen, and riſing in an hill aboue Launſton, it goeth thorow the towne within the walles. In the botome alſo of the Suburbe, is an other named Aterey, which ryſeth aleuen myles of by weſt towarde Bodmin, wherinto runneth a Rill comming thorow a wood before it maketh a confluens with the firſt, in deſcending towarde the hauen. Then breaketh in an other créke called S. Johns, or S. Anthonies Rode, and at the very mouth about S. Nicholas Ile falleth in the laſt, which goeth vp to Milbroke, two myles into the lande from the maine hauen. From hence we ſayled farder towarde the weſt (leauing ſalt Alhe and Seton rillets) and came to the mouth of a riuer called Low, wherein Samons are often founde, & yet is it drie commonly at halfe ebbe. On eche ſyde of the entrye thereof ſtandeth alſo a towne, whereof the one is called eaſt Low the other weſt Low, and this is a prétie market towne. A bridge finally of twelue arches doth leade from the one to the other.

The next fall after we be paſt one little nameleſſe créke, that lyeth by the waye, is Poulpry water, whercinto commeth a little broke. Then méte we with Fawey hauen, whoſe riuer ryſeth at Fawy Moze (about two myles from Camilforde by South, and fiftene miles from Fawy towne) in a very quaue mire on the ſide of an Hill. Frō hence it goeth to Drainesbridge, to Clobhā bridge, Lergen bridge, Newbridge, Reſprin bridge, and Loſſwithiell bridge, where it méeteth with a little broke, and nére thereunto parteth it ſelfe in twaine. Of theſe two armes therefore one goeth to a bridge of ſtone, the other to another of timber, & ſone after ioyning againe, the maine riuer goeth to Saint Gwinnowes, from thence alſo the point of S. Gwinnowes wood, which is about half a mile from thence, except my memorie doe fayle me. Here goeth in a Salt créke halfe a mile on the eaſt ſide of the hauen, and at the heade of it, is a bridge called Lerine bridge. The créke it ſelf in like maner bearing the ſame denomination. From Lerine créke, to S. Caracs pill, or créke, is about halfe a mile and lower on the eaſt ſide of the ſayd hauen it goeth vp alſo not aboue a mile & an half into the lande. From Caracs créke to Poulmorland a myle, and this likewiſe goeth vp ſcant a quarter of a mile into the land, yet at the heade it parteth it ſelfe in twaine. From Poulmoreland to Bodnecke village halfe a mile where the paſſage and repaſſage is commonly to Fawey. From Bodnecke to Pelene point (where a créke goeth vp not fully 1000. paces into the lande) a mile, thence to Poulruan, a quarter of a mile, and at this Poulruan is a tower of force, marching again ẏ tower on Fawey ſide, betwene which, as I doe here, a chaine hath ſome times bene ſtretched, & likely inough for the haué there is hardly two bowlhotte ouer. The very point of lande at the eaſt ſide of the mouth of this Hauen, is called Pontus croſſe, but nowe Panuche croſſe. It ſhal not be amiſſe in this place ſomewhat to intreate of the towne of Fawy, which is called in Cornish Cōwhath and being ſcituate on the Northſide of the hauen, is ſet hanging on a maine rocky hill being in length about one quarter of a mile, except my memory deceiue me.

The renowne of Fawy roſe by ẏ wars vnder King Edward ẏ firſt, Edward the third, & Henry the fifth, partly by feates of armes & partly by plaine pyracy. Finally ẏ townesmē feéling themſelues ſomewhat at eaſe & ſtrong in their purſes, they fell to marchandize, and ſo they proſpered in this their newe deuiſe, that as they trauciled into al places, ſo marchauntes from all countries made reſort to them, whereby within a while they grew to be exceéding riche. The ſhippes of Fawy falling on a time by Rhy and Winchelſey in ẏ time of king Edward the third, refuſed ſtoutly to vale any bonet there, although warning was giuen them ſo to do by the Portgreues or rules of thoſe townes. Herevpon the Rie and Winchelſie men, made out vppon them with cut and long taile: but ſo hardly were they intertained by the Fawy Pyrates (I ſhould ſaie aduenturers) that they were driuen home againe with no ſmall loſſe and hinderaunce. Such fauour found the Fawy men alſo immediately vpon this bickering, that in token of their victory ouer their winching aduerſaries, and riding Ripiers, as they called them in mockery, they altered their armes and compounded for newe, wherein the ſcutchion of Rie and Winchelſey is quartered, with theirs & beſide this ẏ Foiens were called the gallantes of Fawy, whereof they not a litle reioyced, and more peraduenture then for ſome greater boty. And thus much of Fawy

Falwy towne wherin we ſée what great ſucceſſe often commeth of witteleſſe and raſhe aduẽtures. But to returne againe to our purpoſe from whence we haue digreſſed and as hauing ſome deſire to finiſhe vp this our voyage, we wil leaue the Falmouth and go forward on our iourney. Being therefore paſſe this hauen, we come to Pennarth which is 2. myles by weſt therof, and ſcituate on the eaſt ſide of Trewardith Baie, called by Leland Arctoum or Vrctoũ Promontoriũ except his writings do deceiue me. Frõ hence we came to the blacke head, then to Pentozen a myle farder, and here iſſueth out a prety ryuer that commeth by Saint Auſtelles, about two myles and an halfe from thence, which runneth vnder Auſtell bridge & vnder the Weſt ſide of the hill whereon the poore towne of S. Auſtelles ſtãdeth. Thence we ſailed to Chappell land, then to Dudman, to Pennare, and Saint Antonies point, which is three myles from Pennar point, where we make our entrance into the Falamouth hauen, whoſe deſcription I borowe of Leland and worde for worde will here inſert the ſame.

Fala.

The very point (ſaith he) of the hauẽ mouth (being an hill whereon the Kyng hath buylded a caſtell) is called Pendinant. It is about a myle in compaſſe, almoſt enuironned with the ſea, and where the ſea couereth not, the ground is ſo low that it were a ſmall maſtry to make Pendinant an Iland. Furthermore there lieth a cape or foreland within the hauẽ a myle and an halfe, and betwixt this and M. Killigrewes houſe, one great arme of the hauen rũneth vp to Penrine towne, which is 3. miles from the very entry of Falemouth hauen, and two good myles from Penfuſis.

Leume.

Moreouer there is Leuine Priſcio betwixte S. Budocus and Pendinas, which were a good hauen but for the barre of ſande, but to proceãde. The firſt creke or arme that caſteth on the Northweſt ſide of Falemouth hauen goeth vp to Perin, and at thende it breaketh into two armes, whereof the leſſe runneth to Glaſcuith i. viridis ind⁹, ỹ grene neſt, or wagmeer at Penrin: the other to ſaint Glunias the pariſhe Church of Penrine. In like ſorte out of eche ſide of Penrine creke, breaketh an arme or euer it come to Penrine. This I vnderſtande alſo that ſtakes and foundations of ſtone haue bẽne ſet in the creke at Penrine a litle lower then the wharfe where it breaketh into armes: but howſoeuer this ſtandeth betwixte the point of Trefuſis and the point of Reſkronget is Miloz creke, which goeth vp a myle into the land and by the churche is a good rode for ſhippes. The nerte creke beyonde the point of Reſkronget wood is called Reſkronget which goyng two myles vp into the maine breaketh into two armes. In lyke order betwixte Reſkronget and the creke of Trury be two crekes one called S. Feokes, the other Saint Caie, nerte vnto which is Trury creke that goeth vp about two myles creking from the principall ſtreame, & breaketh within half a myle of Trury, caſting in a braunche Weſtward euen harde by Newham wood. This creke of Trury is deuided into two partes before the towne of Trury, and eche of them hauing a broke comming downe and a bridge, the towne of Trury ſtandeth betwixte them both. In like ſorte Kenwen ſtreate is ſeuered frõ the ſaid towne with this arme, and Clements ſtréte by eaſt with the other. Out of the body alſo of Trury creke breaketh another eaſtwarde a myle from Trury, and goeth vp a myle and an halfe to Treſilian bridge of ſtone. At the very entry and mouth of this creke is a rode of ſhippes called Maples rode and here caught not long ſince. 18. ſhippes of Spaniſhe marchauntes with 4. ſhippes of warre of Depe, but the Spaniardes draue the Frenchemen all into this harborowe. A myle and an halfe aboue the mouth of Trury creke, is another named Lhan Mozan of S. Mozans church at hãd. This creke goeth vp a quarter of a mile from the maine ſtreame into the hauen, as the maine ſtreame goeth vp two myles aboue Mozan creke ebbing and flowing: and a quarter of a myle higher is the towne of Tregowy where we found a bridge of ſtone vpon the Fala ryuer. Fala it ſelfe riſeth a myle or more weſt of Roche hyll & goeth by Graund pount where I ſawe a bridge of ſtone.

This Graund pount is four miles frõ Roche hill and two litle myles from Tregowy, betwixt which the Fala taketh his courſe. Frõ Tregowy to paſſe downe by the body of the hauen of Falamouth to the mouth of Lanyhorne pill or creke, on the ſouth ſide of the hauen is a myle, and as I remember it goeth vp halfe a myle from the principall ſtreame of the hauen. From Lanyhorne pill alſo is a place or point of ſande about a myle way of 40. acres or thereabout (as a Peninſula) called Ardeue rauer. As for the water or creke that rũneth into the ſouth ſoutheaſt part, it is but a little thing of halfe a myle vp into the land, and the creke that hemmeth in this Peninſula, of both doth ſéeme to be the greater. From the mouth of the Weſt creke of this Peninſula, to S. Juſtes creke is foure miles or more. In like maner from S. Juſtes pill or creke (for both ſignifie one thing) to Saint Mawes creke is a myle and a halfe, and the point betwẽn them both is called Pendinas,

The

The creke of Saint Mawes goeth vp a two myles by east northeast into the land, and besides that it ebbeth and floweth so far, there is a mylle driuen with a freshe creke that resorteth to the same. Halfe a mile from the head of this downeward to the hauen, is a creke in manner of a pole, whereon is a mill also that grindeth with the tyde. And a myle beneath that on the south side entreth a creke (about halfe a myle into the countrey) which is barred from the maine sea by a small sandye banke, and another myle yet lower, is a another litle creke let: but howe soeuer these crekes doe runne, certaine it is that ỳ bankes of them that belong to Fala are marueilously well wooded, and hitherto Leland, whose wordes I dare not alter for feare of corruption and alteration of his iudgement. Being past Falmouth hauen, therfore (as it were a quarter of a myle beyonde Arwennach Master Killegrewes place which standeth on the brimme or shore within Falmouth) we came to a litle hauen which ranne vp betweene two hilles, but it was barred, wherefore we could not learne whether it were serued with any backe freshe water or not. From hence we went by Polwitherall creke (parted into two armes) then to ỳ Polpenrith wherevnto a reuere t falleth that riseth not farre from thece, and so goeth to the maine streame of ỳ hauen at the last, whether the creke resorteth about three myles and more from the mouth of the hauen, and into which the water that goeth vnder Gare and Mogun bridges, doe fall in one botome as Lelande hath reported. Vnto this hauen also repayreth the Penkestell, the Callous ỳ Chelow, & the Gilling, although this latter lyeth against Saint Mawnens on the hether side hard without the hauen mouth if I haue done aright. For so motheate, mouldye, and rotten are those bookes of Leland which I haue, and beside that, his annotatiõs are such and so confounded as no man can in maner picke out any sence from them by a leafe together, wherfore I thinke that he dispersed & made his notes intricate of set purpose, or else he was loth that any man should easily come by that knowledge by̆ readyng, which he with his great charge and no lesse trauell attained vntõ by experience.

Lopole is two myles in length, and betwixt it and the maine Ocean is but a barre of sand that ones in three or foure yeares, what by weight of the freshe water and working of the Sea breaketh out, at which time it maketh a wonderfull noyse, but sone after the mouth of it is barred vp againe. At all other times the superfluity of the water of Lopole (which is full of Trout and Ele) draineth out thorow the sandy barre into the open Sea: Certes if this barre coulde alwayes be kept open, it would make a goodly hauen, vp vnto Hayleston towne, where coynage of tinne is also vsed, as at Trury and Lostwithiell, for the Quenes aduauntage. From this place I doe not remember that I founde any more falles or hauens, tyll we passed rounde about the cape, and came vnto the Haile, which is a prety riuer, rising from foure principall heds or brookes, wherof one springeth by south another by southwest, the third by southeast, and the fourth by Northeast. Also we saw S. Perins creke, Crantocke and Rialton, of Heyles Leland speaketh somewhat in his collections out of the life of S. Breaca, where he noteth that it is spoyled by sand comming from the Tinne workes. The next great fall of water & greatest of all that is to be founde on the North side of Cornwall, is at Paddestow, whether ỳ Alaune resorteth. Of some it is nowe called Dunmere, but in olde time it hight commonly Alaunus. Into this streame runne diuers other as the Carneley (by east) three myles lower then Wodbridge: ỳ Laine (which riseth two myles aboue S. Esse by northeast, and falleth into Alaune likewise about Wodbridge) the Bodmin water, beside another that commeth from southwest, and goeth in Alane two myles beneath this confluence on the same side aboue Wodbridge: and finallye the last which descendeth out of the hilles from southeast, and ioyneth with the said riuer two myles aboue Padstow, as I doe finde by reading. In one place Leland saith how he cannot well tell whereabout this riuer doth issue out of the grounde, but in another he sayth thus of it. The Alane is euidently seene to passe thorow Wod or Wadbridge at lowe water, and the first bridge of name that it runneth vnder is called Helham, the next, Dunmere bridge, & the third Wadbridge, which is foure myles lower, and the lowest in deede, that is to be founde on this streame. From Padstow also they saile full well vnto Waterford in Ireland. There are likewise two Rockes which lye in the east side of the hauen, secretely hidden at full Sea, as two pads in the straw, whereof I thinke it taketh the name. Leland supposeth this ryuer to be the same Camblan, where Arthur fought his last and fatall conflict: for to this daie men that doe eare the grounde there, doe oft plowe vp bones of a large size, and great store of armour, or els it may be (as I rather coniecture) that the Romanes had some field (or Castra) thereabout, for not long since and in the remembraunce of man, a brasse pot ful of Romane coyne was found there, as I haue often oftẽ herde. Next vnto this is the Dépe hatch & thẽ the Cunilus alias Poꝛtiſſee & Poꝛtguin waters, and vpon the Poꝛthſide of this creke ſtandeth Tintagell oꝛ Dundagtell caſtell, almoſt enuironned in manner of an Iſland. After this and being paſt Tredwy, we come vnto the Taw mouth, whoſe heade riſeth in Exmoꝛe ſoutheaſt from Barſtable, which is a towne fiue myles diſtaunt from the hauens mouth. It receiueth alſo ỳ water of Turrege, which riſeth 3. miles by noꝛtheaſt frõ Yarteland in a moꝛe euen hard by ỳ principall hed of Thamar. This Thurege commeth firſt to Kiſſington bꝛidge, thence to Pulfoꝛd bꝛidge, Madfoꝛde bꝛidge, Dépefoꝛde bꝛidge, the South and weſt bꝛidges of Thoꝛington, to Budfoꝛd bꝛidge, (which hath 24. arches, and an olde chappel builded thereon vnto the virgin Mary, at the farder end) then two miles lower it falleth into the Thaue, and finallye into the Sauerne ſea, by the hauen mouth.

The entrie of the hauen of Thaw is barred wyth ſande and very daungerous, and from the pointe of the hauen mouthe to cutte ouer to Yartey point, is about fiue oꝛ ſeuen miles, a pꝛetie bꝛooke alſo falleth into the ſaid hauen, from the hilles aboue Barſtable, by Eaſt, & going by the Pꝛioꝛy. But to pꝛocéede from hence we goe to the Minheued oꝛ Mine mouth, whoſe backwater entreth into it, after it be come from Minheued and Poꝛtloch.

Then came we to Dour oꝛ Dournſeir fall, whether commeth a rill, next of all to Clyſte Chappell, where the people honoured an Image of our Ladye with much ſuperſtition, thence two myles to Dcharde, to Comb thꝛée myles, and next of all vnto the Iuel, a famous ryuer, which deſcendeth by Bꝛadfielde then by Clyſton (within a quarter of a myle whereof the Shireburn & the Milbꝛooke waters doe méete, of which the firſt ryſeth in Blackmoꝛe, the other thꝛée myle from thence in Milbꝛooke parke) from Clyſton to Euell a pꝛoper market towne in Somerſetſhyꝛe, thꝛe myles oꝛ thereabout from Shireburn: from Euell to Ilcheſter by the bꝛidge thꝛée myles (taking withall the Cokar, that ryſeth weſt of Cokar, and after thꝛée myles gate falleth into the Iuell) frõ Ilcheſter to Michelboꝛowe, leauing Athelney ſomewhat diſtaunt on the left ſide, then to Lamburne, to Bꝛidge noꝛth, Bꝛidge water, and after a time into the Sauerne mouth. Certes it is thought to ryſe in Milbery parke, oꝛ ſomewhere elſe not farre from Shireburne, but the chiefe heade thereof commeth from Coſkomb. When we are paſt this we come vnto the Axe, which runneth by Axe towne, and ſo continueth his courſe bꝛaunching in thende, and leauing a fayꝛe Iſlande as it were in the very fal, partly enuironned wõ the maine ſea, & partly wyth this ryuer. There is moꝛeouer a towne eaſt of this Iſland called in old time Cherin, but now Uphil. Next vnto this is the Stowey mouth ſerued with a backewater, called Stowey, which ryſeth in the hylles not farre of, and after it hath touched at Stow, it falleth into the ſea, which is ſeuẽ miles frõ that place. There are two bꝛookes furthermoꝛe that fal into the ſea, after they haue paſſed betwéene Stow and S. Andꝛewes, & the thirde runneth not farre from Willington, ryſing by South, but ſithence they are onely tryſling rilles and nameleſſe, I thinke it not good to ſtande any longer about them. Thus are we come at laſt vnto the Auon, which not farre from his oꝛiginall, doth enuironne and almoſt make an Iſland of the towne of Malmeſbyꝛy, from thence it goeth vnder Maleſoꝛde and Caſtway bꝛidges, to Choppenham, Bꝛadfoꝛd, Bath, Bꝛiſtow (flowing two miles aboue that citie) and ſone after into the Sauerne, from whence it neuer returneth without mixture of Salt water. In this ſoꝛt haue I finiſhed one part of my Deſcription of the ryuers & ſtreames falling into the ſea, which ſhould haue béene a far moꝛe perfite, and exact péece of woꝛke, if I had béene ſo bꝛyghtlye dealt withall in mine infoꝛmations as I ment to deale pꝛeciſely in ſetting downe the ſame, but ſith the matter is ſo fallen out, that I cannot doe as I woulde herein, I muſt be contented to perfoꝛme what I maye, hoping in time to peruſe and poliſhe it againe that nowe is left rude and without any diligence ſhewed, oꝛ oꝛder vſed at all therein.

Of the Sauerne ſtreame and ſuch falles of ryuers as go into the ſea, betweene it and the Humber. Cap. 10.

Sauerne.

THE Sauerne deuideth Englande oꝛ that part of the Iſland, which ſometime was called Lhoegres from Cambꝛia, ſo called of Camber, the ſecond ſonne of Bꝛute, as our hyſtoꝛies doe repoꝛt. But nowe it height Wales of the Germaine woꝛde Walche, wherby that nation doth vſe to call all ſtrangers without reſpect of countrie. It toke the name of a certaine Lady, called Habren, baſe daughter of Locrinus begotten vpon Eſtrildes daughter to Humber king of Scythia, that ſometime inuaded this Iſlande and was ouerthꝛowne here, in the dayes of this Locrinus as ſhall be ſhewed at hande. Foꝛ after the death of Locrinus, it came to paſſe that Guendolena his wyfe ruled the kingdome in the noneage of hir ſonne, and then getting the the saide Estruldis and Habren hir daughter into hir handes, she drowned the both in this ryuer. And in perpetual remembrance of hir husbandes disloyaltie towardes hir, she caused the streame to be called Habren of the young Ladye, for which the Romaines in processe of tyme for readinesse, & mildenesse of pronounciation wrate Sabrina, and we at this time doe pronounce the Sauerne.

Of the drowning of the sayde Abren also I finde these verses insuing.

In fluuium præcipitatur Abren,
Nomen Abren, fluuio de virgine, nomen eidem
Nomine corrupto deinde Sabrina datur.

But to returne to our Sauerne, it springeth from the high mountaines of south Wales, called in Welche Plim Limmon in latine Plimmonij, in Englishe the Blacke mountaines, & out of the same head with the Wye, where it hath in Latitude as some gesse 52. degrées and 10. minutes, and in longitude 15. and 50. From hence it rometh to Cair Lews (famous in name, but in déede a poore throwfaire from Mahencliffe) then to Landlas; to Newton (or Trenewith) to Arwistle; to Leueden, then within a myle of Mountegomery to the Welche pole, thence wythin half a mile of Pontsbery Colledge to Shrolbury, and so to bridge North, receyuing sundry brookes and waters by the way, of which the Cerlon or Serlo séemeth to be the greatest, and whereby the chanell thereof is not a little increased. From Bridgenorth it encli-neth toward ỹ south vnto Worcester, where-about it receyueth other streames, as the Teme on the West halfe a myle beneath Worcester, not farre from Powike Milles. And another in the East, comming frō Stafforde, and so holding one towarde Glocester, méeteth with the Auon not farre from Theokesbyry, and from whence they come both as one to Glocester, as mine information doth serue me. Here gathering againe somewhat toward the west, it passeth by west of Deane, where it meteth with the Wy, which is none of the least famous of all those that mixe thē-selues wyth Sauerne. Being also greatlye enlarged with the Wylow or Wilinghe (an other great streate streame increased by the Geuenni, and another) it goeth vnto the Holmes, where after it hath mette in the meane season with sundry other brookes, it falleth into the maine sea, betwéene Wales and Cornewall, which is and shalbe called the Sauerne sea, so long as Sauerne ryuer doth hold and kéepe hir name. But as the said streame in length of course bounty of water and depth of chanell commeth farre behinde the Thames, so for other commodities as trade of marchandise, plentie of cariage, and store of all kinde of fish, as Samon, Trouts, Breames, Pikerell, Tenche, Perche, &c. it is nothing at al inferiour or second to the same. Finally there is nothing to be discōmended in this ryuer, but the openesse thereof in manie places to the weather, wherby sundry perils oft ouer take such as fish or saile in small vessels on the same.

The Sauerne being thus described (I hope sufficiently for one that hath so small information & knowledge of the same) it resteth that I go forwarde with the names of those that lye vppon the coast of Southwales, making my entrie at the ferry, ouer betwéene Auft in Glocestershyre, to a village on the farder banke of Sauerne, not farre frō Terendacus Chappell, in the mouth of the riuer Wy, which ferry is about three myles ouer (sayth Leland) or else my memorie doth faile me. Wy mouth

This ryuer Guy or Wy beginneth as I sayde before on the side of the hilles, where the Sauerne doth arise, and passing thorowe Wencelande, doeth fall into the Sauerne beneath Chepsto at the aforesayde place. Guy alias wy.

Leland writing of this ryuer sayeth thus, the Wy goeth thorowe all Herefordshyre by Bradwarden Castell (belonging to Syr Richarde Uehan) & so to Hereforde east, thence eyght myles to Rosse a market towne in Herefordshyre, and in this ryuer be Umbers otherwyse called graylinges. Umber a fishe onely in the wy.

Next vnto this is the Aberwith, or Wyske whereon Caerleon standeth sometime, called Chester. This riuer ryseth in the blacke mountaines, tenne myles aboue Brechnock towarde Cairmardine, and runneth thorowe the great and litle forrest of Brechnoch, then it goeth by Redwin bridge, to Brecknock, Penkithly, Cregheell, Abergeuenni, Uske, Carleon, Newporte, and so vnto the sea, taking withall the Ebowith. This Ebowith is a riuelet ryling flat North, in a mountaine of high Wenllande, and going streight from thence into Diffrin Serowy vale, it falleth into the Uske or Wiske, a myle and a halfe beneath Newporte, from whence likewyse it is vnto the hauen mouth of Wiske about half a mile more. But to procede without Wiske. Certes this riuer is famous and vpon some partes of the lower bankes especially about Carleon is much Romaine Coyne found, of all maner of sortes, as men eare and digge the groimde. Furthermore this streame is one of the greatest in Southwales and huge ships might well come to the towne of Carleon, as they did in the time of the Romaines if Newport bridge were not a let vnto them. wiske. Ebowith.

Neuertheleſſe bigge botes come thereto. It is eyght Welche or twelue Engliſhe myles from Chepſtow or Strigull, and of ſome thought to be in Bace Wenceland, though other be of the contrarie opinion. But howſoeuer the matter ſtandeth, this ryuer is taken to be the bounds of Brechnockſhyre, as Renni is to middle Wenceland and Glamorganſhyre.

Remenei, or Remni.

The nert riuer vnto Uſke or Wiſke is called Remenei or Remni, whoſe heade is three or foure myles aboue Eggluis Tider Uap Hoell (otherwyſe called Fanum Theodori, or the Church of Theodorus) whence come manye ſprings, & taking one botome, the water is called Rapach. It is alſo augmented with the Riſca brooke, comming vnto it out of a Paroche called Eggluis Ilan, and then altogither named Riſca. Thence running thorowe Bedwes Paroche, it is called Remny or Remeny and ſo continueth vntill it come at the Sauerne. The fall therof alſo is not aboue fyre myles from the ryuer Wiſke. Although that for ſhippes it be nothing commodious. It is more ouer a limite betweene the Silures and Glamorganſhyre.

Taffe.

From the mouth of Remni, to the mouth of Taffe are two myles. Thys ryuer is the greateſt in all Glamorganſhyre, and the citie Taffe it ſelfe of good countenaunce, ſith it is endued with the Cathedrall ſea of a Biſhop. The head of this water cōmeth downe from Woody hilles, and often bringeth ſuch logges and bodyes of trees withal frō thence, that they fruſh the bridge in peeces, but for aſmuch as it is made of tymber, it is repayred with leſſe coſt, whereas if it were of harde ſtone all the countrie thereabouts would not be able to amende it. Into this ſtreame alſo falleth Lhay, which deſcendeth (but more eaſterly) from the ſame hilles and it meeteth with all beneath Landaffe, that ſtandeth almoſt euen at the verye confluence, and thus ſayeth Lhoyd, but Lelande noteth it otherwyſe. In like ſorte the Taffe receyueth the Rodney Uaur, and Rodeney Uehan, in one botome, which ſpring in the Lordſhip of Glin Rodeney within two miles togither. Of theſe alſo the Rodeney Uaur ryſeth by Northweſt in a great high rocke, called Dyſſiog. Rodeney Uehan iſſueth a myle aboue caſtell Roſe (by northweſt alſo) but nearer towarde Pyſken Lordſhip, ſo that the Rodney Uaur head and ſtreame lieth more weſt vp into Wales. As for Caſtell Roſe, it is but a highe ſtonye Cragge in the toppe of a hil: but to proceede. Rodeney Uaur runneth vnder a bridge of wood a myle from Penriſe, then to Ponte Remmeis two myles lower, and a little beneath is the confluence. There be alſo two ſmall bridges on Rodeney Uehan of wood, whereof the firſt is againſt Penriſe three quarters of a myle of, the other a little aboue the confluēce right againſt the bridg on Rodney Uaur. There is a bridg of wood alſo vpō the whole ſtreame two myles beneath the ſayde confluence, called Pont Newith, and a quarter of a mile from the place where it goeth into Taffe.

Lhay.

Rodeney vaur, Rodeny vchan.

From Taffe to Lay mouth or Ele ryuer a mile, from Lhay mouth (or rather Penarth, that ſtandeth on the Weſt poynt of it) to the mouth of Thawan ryuer (from whence is a cōmon paſſage ouer vnto Mineheued in Somerſetſhyre of ſeuentene myles) are about ſeuen Welche myles, which are counted after this maner. A myle and a halfe aboue Thawan is Scylley Hauenet, (a prettie ſuccour for ſhippes) whoſe heade is in Wenno paroche two myles & a halfe from the ſhore. From Scilley mouth to Aber Barry a mile, and thither commeth a little ryll of freſh water into Sauerne, whoſe head is ſcant a myle of in playne grounde by Northeaſt, & right againſt the fall of this becke lyeth Barry Iſlande a flight ſhotte from the ſhore at the full ſea. Halfe a myle aboue Aber Barry is the mouth of Come kydy, which ryſeth flat northe frō the place where it goeth into ȳ Sauerne & ſerueth oft for herbor vnto ſea farers. Thēce to the mouth of Thawan are 3. myles, whervnto ſhippes may come at will. Two myles aboue Thawan is Colhow, whether a little rill reſorteth from Lau Iluit, thence to the mouth of Alen foure myles, that is a myle to S. Dynothes Caſtell, and three myles further. The Alen riſeth by northeaſt vp into the lande at a place, called Lhes Bronmith, or Skyrpton, about foure myles aboue the plot where it commeth by it ſelfe into Sauerne. From thence to the mouth of Ogur alias Gur three miles. Then come they in proceſſe of tyme vnto the Kenſike or Colbrooke ryuer which is no great thing, ſith it ryſeth not aboue 3. myles frō the ſhore. From Kenſike to Aber Auon two myles, and herein doe ſhips moleſted with weather oftentimes ſeeke herborow. It commeth of two armes, whereof that which lyeth Northeaſt is called Auon Uaur, the other that lyeth Northweſt Auon Uehā. They meete togither at Lhanuoy Hēgle, about two myles aboue Aber Auon village, which is two myles alſo from the ſea. From hence to the Neth is about two miles and a halfe, thereon come ſhiplettes almoſt to the towne of Neth frō the Sauerne. From the mouth of Neth vnto the mouth of Crimline becke is two miles, and being paſſed

Taury. sed the same we come vnto the Taury, which descendeth from the aforesayd hilles and falleth into the Sea by East of Swansey. Being past this wee come vnto the Lichwr, or Lochar mouth and then gliding by the Wormes head, we passed to the Wandrel mouth, whereof I finde this description following in Lelande. Both Uendraith, Taur & Uêdraith Uchan, ryse in a peece of Carmardinesheyre, called Ilkenen, that is to say, the iswe quarter about Kennen ryuer, and betwixt the heades of these two hilles, is another hill, wherein be stones of a grænish couloure, wherof the inhabitauntes make theyr Lime. The name of the hyll that Uendraith Taur ryseth in, is called Mennith Taur, and therein is a pole as in a moryish ground, names Llintegowen, where ỳ principall spring is, & thys hyll is eight or nyne myles frō Kidwelli. The hyll that Uendraith Uchan springeth out of, is called Mennith Uchan, & thys water commeth by Kydwelly towne. But about thrée or foure myles, care it come thyther, it receyueth a broke, called Tresgyth the course wherof is little aboue a myle from the place where it goeth into Uendraith, and yet it hath foure or fiue fucking milles and thrée Corne milles vppon it. At the heade of this broke is an hole in the hilles side, where men often enter and walke in a large space. And as for the broke it selfe, it is one of the most plentifull and commodious that is to be founde in Wales. All along the sides also of Uendraith Taur, you shall finde great plentye of Seacoles. There is a great hole by heade of Uendraith Uchan, where men vse to enter into vaultes of great compasse, and it is sayde, that they may go one way vnder the grounde to Wormes head, and another waye to Cairkennen castell, which is thrée myles or meze vnto the lande. But how true these things are it is not in me to determine, yet this is certaine, that there is very good Hawking at the Heron in Uendraith Uchā. There are diuers printes of the passage of certaine Wormes also in the Taue, at the head of Uēdraith Uchan, as the inhabitants doe fable, but I neuer heard of any man that saw any Worme there, and yet it is beleeued that many Wormes are there.

Tow, or Towy. Being past this, we came to the Abertowy or mouth of the Towz. This ryuer ryseth in the mountaines of Elinith foure myles by south from Lintiue in a moryish grounde, 24. miles from Carmardyn and in a forrest called Bishops forrest midway betwixt Landwhryeuy & Landanuery castell. For sith this is much better in mine opinion, the the Taw or Taffe, whose head breadeth no fishe, but if any be cast into it, they tarne by their bellies and die out of hande. Into this ryuer also falleth one called Guthrike, not farre frō Landonuery towne, which is two and twentye myle frō the head of Towy. In like sort the Kenen ryuer falleth into the Towy about Landi louaur, which is two miles higher vpō Towy, the Dinefur castel & the whole course of this water is not aboue thrée myles. The Brane (another ryuer also) after it hath run from the head by the space of 12 myles doth come hard by the foote of Landonuery castel, and taking with it the Euery, they fall together into the Towz, a little beneath the Castell. Thys Euery runneth through the middest of Landanuery towne. Beneath Ladanuery in like soze another broke called Marleis, falleth into the Towy, and foure myles beneath the same two other, of which the one is called Nonneis. Foure miles also from Abermarleis or the place where Towy & Marleis doe meete (towarde Carmardine) runneth the ryuer Duleise, which some after falleth also into Towy. Furthermore 2. miles beneath the fall of Duleise, there is another, and thrée or foure myles beyonde this, is the seconde Duleise, & eache of them after other fall into the saide ryuer, but this latter about Dynllan Castell, as Lelande hath described thē. Proceeding yet further still toward Carmardine, our sayde streame goeth by Landistuphan Castell, and also into the sea, about thrée myles beyonde Dynllan Castell. Also he confesseth moreouer, that he sawe the fall of Cothey, a fayre ryuer, into the sayd streame, & this was within foure myles of Carmardine, wherof I spake before. The Cothey riseth thrée myles frō Landanbreui vnder the hulke of Blaine Ieorne, which is a narrowe passage, and therein marueyleus heapes of stones.

The next ryuer we came vnto vpon the coste is called Taue, whose head rinneth also from the blacke mountaines at a place thrée miles from Cardigan called Prestelen, thence it goeth by Saint Clares, and as it hasteth toward the sea, it taketh the ryuer Gowe with it, which riseth at Blaincowen two myles or meze aboue the bridge. Then the Duddery ryuer, and Barthkinni streame, Uenny & Morlais. Next of all come we to Milford hauen, whereunto two ryuers direct their course from the Northeast called Dugledu or the two swordes and betweene them both is a hil which they cal also Cultlell, that is to say the knyfe, wherof riseth a merry tale of a welchman that lying in this place abroade all night in the colde weather, he was demaunded of his hostesse (where he did breake his fast) he nere mornyng) at what Inne he laye in the night preceding, bycause he came so sone to his house ere any of his maydes were vp. Oh good hostesse (quod he) be contented I laye to night in a daungerous estate for I slepte betweene two swordes with a long knif at my hart, meaning in deede that he lay betweene these two ryuers, and his breast towards the South neere to the heade of Cuithell. But to passe ouer these iestes, here Leland speaketh of a ryuer called Gwyly, but where it ryseth or falleth he maketh no certaine report: wherfore it is requisite that I proceede according to my purpose. Beyng therfore paste this hauen and point of Demecia in sayling about the coaste we come to Saint Dennes, or S. Dauys land, which I reade to be seperated from the rest of the countrey much after this maner, although I graunt that there maye be an hare diuers other little créekes, betwixt Newgale and Saint Dauys head, & betwixt S. Dauys and Fyschard, beside those that are here mencioned out of a Register of that house.

As we turne therefore from Milford, S. Dauys land beginneth at Newgall, a créeke serued with a backe fresh water. Howbeit there is a Baye before this créeke betwixt it and Milford. From hence about foure miles is Saluache créeke, otherwise called Sauerach, whether some fresh water reuerteth: y mouth also therof is a good refuge for Balingers as it (I meane the register) sayth. Thence go we to Portclais 3. myles where is a litle portlet, whether the Alen that commeth thorowe Sainte Dyuies close doth runne.

It lyeth a myle southwest frō S. Dewies, Saint Stinans Chappell also is betweene Portclais and Portmaw. The next is Porte Maw, where I founde a great estuary into the lande. The Pendwy hathe a mile from y: Lanuchā. Lanu Tichan is 3. myles frō Pendwy, where is a salt créeke, then to Tredine three myles, where is another créeke to Langunda, foure miles, and another créeke is there in like sort where fysher men catche Herring. Here also the Gwerne ryuer deuideth Penbidiane from Fischerdine Hemmeis land. Frō Langunda to Fischard at the Gwerne mouth 4. myles, & here is a portlet or hauen cast also for shippes. and thus much of Saint Dauys lande. Besides this also I cham in a third booke talketh of Linnes and Poles, but for as much as my purpose is not to speake of Lakes & Linnes, I passe them euer as hasting to the Teify, in latine Tibius, which is the nexte ryuer that serueth for my purpose.

The Teyfy therfore is a right noble ryuer, as any in Wales, fraught with delicate Salmons, and herein onely of all the ryuers in England is the Castor or Bever to be founde. It ariseth foure myles from Strat-flour out of a Pole called Llintiue, lying on the West side of the blacke mountaines (as the Sauerne doth spring out from by east of them) & holding on with the ordinary course, it commeth at laste to Stradflour, where it meeteth with a brooke called the Fleure or Flere. Frō hence it proceedeth on vnto Tregaron, Buyy, Landfur, Glydris, Budhath, Emlin, Kilgatran, & so to Cardigon, which standeth on the farder side as we go towarde the forsaid ryuer from by south. Certes this ryuer which we nowe discribe, goeth in maner plaine West, till we come within syxe myles of Cairmardine, and then returneth toward the North, so going on till it come at Aberstwy, or Aberteify, as it is most cōmonly called. It deuideth Pembroke from Cardigan or Ceretteanshere, as Leland setteth it downe.

Beyng paste the Tewe or Teify we came to Abertayron, so called of the ryuer Ayron which there falleth into the Maine, 3. myles beneath Lanclere. It ryseth also in a mountaine, percel of the blacke hilles, by a chappel called Blaine Penial, belonging to Landwy Brem, but it is in Cardigen shire ouer Tiue and aboute three or foure myles from Tiue banches. Next vnto this as I remember we passed by Aberarth where was a pretye streamelet & some slender harborow. And thē we came to another water which falleth into ȳ sea beneath Rithhide (neither of them being of any great length from their heades) and so vnto Aberystwith which ysſueth in a marshe called Blaine Wythe (so farre as I remember) and runneth about 13. or 14. myles tyll it come at last into the sea. It taketh withal by the waye also first the Meleuen and then the Rhedhol, a ryuer nothing inferiour vnto Ystrith it selfe, with whome it maketh his confluence aboue Badarne, and in a large bottome goeth sone after into the sea.

Hence we went vnto the Wy whose heade commeth from the south part of Snowdony by Nowdheuy Mathan lath, and in this his course moreouer he seemeth to parte Northe Wales and South Wales in sunder. It is called in latine Deuus, in Welshe Dyfy, but how it came to be called Wy in good sothe it is not found. It receyueth also the Alen which cōmeth from the vpper part of Cornicryst-with in Cardigonshyre, out of the blaine, and taketh also with it the Clardwyn, a brooke ysſuing about a myle from Cragnawlin and as it holdeth on the course it receyueth the Clardwy which ſpringeth vp halfe a myle from the Clardue head (another gullet likewiſe falling from ỹ Rocky hilles into Clardwy) and ſo goyng together foure miles farder they fall into the Allen. Finally after all theſe haue as it were played together in one or moe bottomes among the pleaſant Meadowes and lower grounds, by the ſpace of fiue myles, vnder ỹ name of Alen, they beate at the laſt vpon the Wy and accompany him directly vnto the Ocean.

After this we paſſed by Abertho, ſo named of the Riuer Ho, that falleth therein to the ſea and commeth thether from ỹ Alpes or hilles of Snowdony. From hence we ſayled by Abermawr or mouth of Mawr, which commeth in like ſorte from Snowdony, and taketh diuers Ryuers with him whoſe names I doe not know. Then vnto ỹ Artro a broke deſcending from thoſe hilles alſo, and falling into the ſea a myle aboue the Harleche. Next of al we behold the Gleſſe Linne that parteth Caernaruon from Merionneth ſhyre, and ſo came vnto Traith Uchan, betwirte which two, and Traith Mawr rũneth a litle broke thorowe the wharfe of Traith Mawr at the low water as I read. Theſe 2 Traiths are ỹ mouthes of two faire ſtreames, whereof the moſt Southerly is called Mawy, the other Ferles, eche of them I ſaye deriuing his originall water from Snowdony, as diuers other brokes haue done already before them. Of theſe alſo ỹ firſt paſſeth by diuers lakes, although I doe not well knowe the names of anye one of them. From Traithmawr to Chyrchet are three myles, where alſo is a litle rill ſerued with ſundrye waters. Then come we vnto the Erke, a prety broke diſcending frõ Padrỹn hilles. Then calling about toward the ſouth (as the coaſt lyeth) we ſawe the Aberſoch or mouth of the Soch ryuer vppon our right handes, in the mouthe whereof lye two Illandes, of which the more Northerly is called Tudfall and the other Penryn as Leland did obſerue. After this, goyng about by the point we come to Daron Ryuer, whereuppon ſtandeth Aberdaron a quarter of a mile frõ the ſhore betwixt Aberdarõ and Uortigernes dale, where the compaſſe of the ſea gathereth in a heade and entreth at both endes: Thẽ come we to Nenni broke which runneth by Treuenni, and is about 12. myles of from Aberdaron. Then ly. miles of to Egluis Epiſtle, whether commeth a little broke or rill from Gwortheren Rocke, which ſome call Uortigernes Dale. From hence alſo 3. myles further, we come to Lhanhelerion and then foure myles ſo Cluniock, and finally to Cluniock Caur Aruon, where is a little rillet, & a myle or more farder is another that goeth to the mayne ſea. Here in following Lelande as I doe for the moſt part in all this Treatiſe where he kẽpeth any order at all (for his notes, are ſo diſperſed in his Cõmẽtaries ỹ one of them is ſometimes is 6. 8. or 20. leaues from another, and many of them penned after a contrarye ſort) I finde theſe wordes. There is a broke beyonde Aberleuenni goyng by it ſelfe into the ſea: there be alſo two brokes betwẽne Gurnwy or Gwyrfay and Skeuerneck, as Golaid and Semare Pole: Sowther creke alſo is the verye pointe of Abermenley, by which notes as I finde not what he ſaith, ſo the remembraunce of them may helpe better againſt the next publication of this booke: to procẽde therefore in ſuch order as I may.

Golaide. Semere pole. Sother. Menley.

Leuenni is a great broke ryſing 4. mile aboue the place, where it falleth into the ſea, Leuen broke cõmeth into the ſea two miles aboue Skeuernocke: Skeuernocke a little broke fiue myles aboue Aberſaint. Auõ Gurnay commeth thorowe pontnewith bridge, and after into Meney at South Crock, two myles of Cladwant broke, and ryſing three myles from thence it commeth thorow the towne bridge of Carnaruon and goeth by it ſelfe into Meney arme, ſo that Carnaruon ſtandeth betwẽne two riuers. Botes alſo do come to Cadwan. The name of Abermeney is not paſſing a myle aboue Carnaruon, and yet ſome cal it Meney, til you come to Poultell. Then come we to Cair Arfen or Cairnaruon, Gwiniwith mirith (or horſe broke) two myles from Hoylethon, and it ryſeth at a well ſo called full a myle from thence. Hoylethon is a bowe ſhotte from Aberpowle, frõ whence ferry botes go to the Termone or Angleſy. Aberpowle runneth three myles into the lande, and hath his head foure myles beyonde Bangor in Meney ſhore: and here is a litle comming in for botes bending into the Meney. Aber Gegeyne commeth out of a mountaine a myle aboue, and Bangar (thorow which a rillet called Torronnẽ hath his courſe) almoſt a myle aboue it. Aber Dgwine is two miles aboue ỹ. It ryſeth at Tale linne Dgwine pole fiue myles aboue Bangor in the eaſt ſide of Withow. Aber Auon is two myles aboue Aberogwene, and it ryſeth in a Pole called Lin man Auon three myles of. Auon Lan bar Uchan ryſeth in a mountaine thereby, and goeth into the ſea 2. miles aboue Duegeuelth. Auon Duegeuelth is three myles aboue Conwey, which ryſing in the mountaines a myle of, goeth by it ſelfe into Meney ſalt arme. On the ſaide ſhore alſo lyeth Penmaine, and this broke doth runne betwirte Penmaine Maur, and Penmaine Uchan. It ryſeth about 3. myles from Penmaclon hilles which lye aboute 60. myles from Conwey abbaie nowe diſſolued. On the Northe and Weſt of this ryuer ſtandeth the towne of Conwey, which taketh his name therof. This riuer receiueth ỹ Lhigwy a prety ſtreame that commeth from by weſt & ioineth with al a little aboue the Riſt but on the Weſt bancke. The Lighwy alſo taketh another with him that commeth from by ſouth.

Lighwy.

Gele. After this we come to the Gele whereon Abergele ſtandeth, and it runneth thorowe the Cenges: then vnto the Roſe or Ros and next of all to the mouth of a great hauen, wherinto the Clude which cõmeth from the ſouth, and the Elwy that deſcendeth from ỹ Weſt, doe emptie their chanelles, & betwixt which two the pontificall ſea of Bangor is ſituate verye pleaſantly and not farre of from the point. Into Elwy runneth the Alode deſcending from Lhin Alode eyght myles from Denbighe and goyng by Lhan Sannan, it falleth into the Elwy in Lhan Heueth parith which is fiue myles aboue Saint Aſaph. Lelãd calleth it Aleth. Into Clude alſo runneth Clue Doch foure miles lower by water then Ruthine towne: on the Weſt ſide likewyſe the Uſtrate, that commeth within halfe a myle by ſouth of Denbighe and goeth into Clude almoſt againſt Denbighe towne. Frõ hence to my remembraunce, and before we come to Aber Dée or the mouth of the Dée I finde no Riuer of any countenaunce, wherefore I will haſt forth to the deſcription of that ſtreame. It ryſeth of ſundy heades ſouthweſt from Lintegy or Lin Tegnis, in the countie of Penthlin whereunto within a while they reſort and direct their courſes, and there ioyning in one Channell, it commeth almoſt by Bala a poore market towne. Then going ſtil by the ſide of Pale it paſſeth to Berwin, where it mæteth with a rill, afterwardes to Corwen a little by Southweſt whereof, it receiueth the Alwyn a noble ſtreame which commeth from the Northweſt out of a Lyn lying on the other ſyde of ỹ ſame hilles wherin the Alode riſeth, and not onely taketh ſundery ryuerets and rilles withall as it goeth, but alſo runneth with great ſwiftneſſe tyll it be ioyned with the ſame. From Corwen it goeth to Cellon, and a fewe myles beneath Cellon it mæteth with the Byrnog, then the Wyerham rill, and finally the Alyn whoſe crinkeling ſtreames diſcende from a Lin in the Stradlin hilles, and goyng firſt North eaſt vnto Hold or Gwidgrue, thẽ ſouthward vnto Cargurle, and finally againe into the Northeaſt, it ſtayeth not tyll it come at the Dée, where it mæteth about halfe a myle or more frõ the Holit with the aforeſaide riuer. Hauing therfore receiued this water it continueth the courſe vnto Cheſter it ſelfe, and frõ thence into the Iryſh ſea as experience hath cõfirmed. What other ryuers do fal into this ſtreame it ſhal be ſhewed in the ſecond booke. In ỹ meane time hauing a good gale of wind blowing from the South weſt, we came to Lyr pole whether the Wyuer on the ſouthe about Frodſham & the Merſey on the north, doe fall, in thunburdening of their channels. Wiuer water runneth among the Wiches, and Marley departeth Cheſter and Lancaſhyre in ſunder.

From hence alſo we go by Wegam, or Dugeles: and nexte of all vnto the Ribell, which almoſt doth enuyronne Preſton in Anderneſſe. It ryſeth in Rybbes dale about Salley Abbye, and from thence goeth to Salley and a lyttle beneath Salley it receiueth the Calder that cõmeth by Whaley, and then the Doer. After thys, we come to the Wire, which ryſeth eyght or tenne miles from Garſton, out of the Hyles on the ryght hande, and commeth by græne Hawghe a pretye Caſtell, belonging to the Earles of Darby, and more then halfe a myle of to Garſton in Anderneſſe. It ebbeth and floweth alſo, three myles beneath Garſtone, and at the Chappell of Alhallowes (tenne myles frõ Garſton) it goeth into the Sea. After thys we come to Coker that maketh no great courſe ere we come to the Sandes, by Cockerham Uyllage, where they make Salt out of the Sandes, by often wetting, and dreaning the water from thence into a Pyt, they ſeeth it, as at the Wiche. &c. Then to Cowder ryll, & ſo to the Lune or Lume, that giueth name to Lancaſter, where much Romaine money is founde.

Of thys ryuer you ſhall reade more in the ſeconde Booke. Next vnto it alſo is the Kery, halfe a mile beyond Marton, where the rich Kitſon was borne. It ryſeth out of the hylles not farre of, and falleth into the ſalte water at Luneſandes. From thence we come to Bythe water, which ryſeth not farre from Bytham Towne and Parke, in the Hilles whereabout are great numbers of goates. It is a pretye ryuer, and by all lykelyhode reſorteth vnto Ken ſands. Ken ryſeth at Ken more, in a Pole of a myle compaſſe, verye well ſtored with fyſhe, the head whereof (as all the Barromy of Kendal) is in Weſtmerlande. It is alſo eyght myles from Kendall, in the waye to Perith, and the courſe thereof is to Newbridge, Barley, Staueley hamlet, Bowſtone, Burne lyde bridges, to Kendall, Leuen bridge, &c. into the sea, receiuing the Sprent ryuer into it, a myle aboue Fremegate bridge. Next vnto this is ỳ Charte whether a freshe water commeth, as doth another to Conny heade sandes.

Then come wé to Dudden or Dodon hauen, whether a freshe brooke also reserueth, & foure myles from hence was Furnesse Abbay vp into the mountaines. Then sayled we to the Elke, whereunto commeth a brooke from Crosmere, then to the Calder serued also wyth a backe freshe water: then (going about by S. Bées) to the Wy or Ferne, to to Deruent, the Lug or Luy, and finallye to Solney, which parteth England & Scotland.

Hauing thus gone thorowe the ryuers of Englande, nowe it resteth that wé procéede with those which are to bée founde vppon the Scottyshe shore, in such order as we best maye, vntill we haue fetched a compasse about the same, and come vnto Barwicke, whence afterwarde it shall be easye for vs to make repaire vnto the Thames, from which we dio set forwarde in the beginning of oure voiage.

Elke. The fyrste ryuer that I mette wythall on the Scottish coast, is the Elke, after I came passe the Soluey which hath his heade in the Cheuiote Hylles runneth by Birkinton, and falleth into the Sea at Borow on the sands. Thys Elke hauing receiued the Ewys falleth into the Soluey fyrst at Atterith. After thys I passed ouer a lyttle créeke from Rytheil, and so to Anand, whereof the valleye Anandale doth séeme to take ỳ name. There is also the Pyde, wherof commeth Molsdale, the Ken, the Dée, the Craie, and the Bladnecke, and al these besides dyuers other smal rylles of lesse name doe lye vpon the south coast of Galloway. On the north side also we haue the Kuan, the Arde, the Castile Dune, the Burwin, the Cluide, (whereupon sometyme stoode the famous citie of Alclwyde, and whereinto runneth the Carath) the Hamell, the Dourgleslle, and the Lame. From hence in lyke manner, wé came vnto the Leuind mouth, wherunto the Blake on the southwest and the Lomunde lake, with his fleting Iles and fish without finnes, (yet very holesome) doth séeme to make hys issue. Thys lake of Lomund in calme wheather, ryseth sometimes so high and swelleth with such terrible Billowes, that it causeth the best Marriners of Scotlande to abyde the leysure of this water, before they dare aduenture to hoyse vp sayles, on hie. The like is séene in windye weather, but much more perillous: There are certeine Iles also in the same, which moue and remoue, oftentymes by force of the water, but one of them especiallye, which otherwyse is very fruitefull for pasturage of Cattel. Next vnto this is the Leue, the Rage the Longe, the Goyle, & the Heke, which for the exceeding greatnesse of theire, heades are called lakes. Then haue we the Robinsey, the Forlande, the Tarbat, the Lean, and the Abyr, wherevnto the Spansey, the Loyne, the Louth, the Arke, and the Zeke doe fall, there is also the Sell, the Zord the Diwyn, the Newisse, the Dzne, the Lang, the Dzun, the Hew, the Bzun, the Kell, the Dowr, the Faro, ỳ Nesse, the Herre, the Con, ỳ Glasse the Maur, the Ardail, the Fers (that cómeth out of the Caldell) the Fairsake which two latter lye a lyttle by west of the Dchades, and are properly called ryuers, bicause they issue onely from springes, but most of the other lakes, bicause they come from Linnes, & and huge poles, or such lowe bottomes, fedde with springes, as séeme to haue no accesse, but onelye receesse of waters, wherof there be many in Scotlande. But to procéede hauing once past Dungisby heade in Cathnesse, we shall ere long come to ỳ mouth of the Wisse, a prétty streame, comming by south of the Mountaynes called the Maydens pappes. Then to the Bzowze, the Clyn, the Twyn, (whereunto runneth thrée ryuers, the Shyn, the Sillan, & Carew) the Nesse which besides the plenty of Samon founde therein is neuer frozen, nor suffereth yle to remaine there, that is cast into the pole. From thence wé come vnto the Narding, the Fynderne, the Spaie, (which receiueth the Vine,) ỳ Fitch, the Bulithe, the Arrian, the Leuin, and the Boghe, from whence we sayle, vntill wé come about the Buquhan head, and so to the Downe, and Dée: which two streames bring forth the greatest Samons, that are to be had in Scotland, and most plentye of the same. Then to the North Elke where into the Esmond runneth aboue Brechin, the Southe Elke, then the Louen and the Tawe, which is the fynest Ryuer for water that is in all Scotland, and whereunto most Ryuers and lakes doe runne. As Farlake, Pith, Goure, Loiche, Tannach, Lynell, Lopon, Irewer, Erne, and diuers other besides small rylets which I did neuer loke vppon. Then is there the lake Londors vppon whose mouth Saint Androwes doth stande, the Lake Lewin vnto whose streame two other Lakes haue recourse in Fifland, and then the Fyth or Forth, which some doe call the Scottishe sea, and with the Ryuer laste mentioned (I meane that commeth from Londors) includeth all Fife, the saide Forth being full of Dyuers and all kindes of huge fyshe that die to lye in the depe. How many waters runne into the Fyrth, it is not in my power iuſtlye to declare, yet are there both Ryuers, Rilles, and Lakes that fall into the ſame, as Clack, Alon, Dune, Kery, Cambell, Cumer, Tere, Wan, Torkelan, Rotham, Mulhell, Blene, and dyuers other which I call by theſe names, partly after information, and partly of ſuch townes as are nere vnto their heds. Finally when we are paſſe the Hay then are we come vnto the Twede and ſone after into England againe.

The Twede is a noble riuer and the limes or bounde betweene England and Scotland, whereby thoſe two kingdomes are nowe deuided in ſunder. It riſeth about Drimlar in Euſdale (or rather out of a faire Wel as Leland ſaith ſtanding in the moſſe of an hill called Airſane, or Hareſkan in Twede dale 10. miles from Pibble) and ſo comming by Pibble, Lander, Drybiwgh, Ielſe, Warke, Norham and Hagarſtone, it falleth into the ſea beneath Barwyc as I heare: Thus ſaith Leland, but I not contented with this ſo ſhorte a diſcourſe of ſo long a Ryuer and briefe deſcription of ſo faire a ſtreame, wil adde ſomewhat more of the ſame concerning his race on the Engliſhe ſide, and rehearſall of ſuche Ryuers as fall into the ſame. Cõming therfore to Kidam, it receyueth betweene that & Carham a becke which deſcendeth from the hilles that lye by Weſt of Windram. Going alſo from Kydam by Longbridgeham (on the Scottiſhe ſide) and to Carham, it haſteth immediately to Warke caſtell on the Engliſhe, and by Eppiaw on the other ſide, then to Cornewall, Cald ſtreame, and Tillemouth where it receiueth ſundry waters in one botome which is called the Till, & whoſe deſcription inſueth here at hand. Certes there is no head of any Ryuer that is named Till, but the yſſue of the fardeſt water that commeth hereinto, ryſeth not farre from ẏ head of Uſwaie in the Cheuiote hilles, where it is called Bromis. From thence it goeth to Hartſide Ingram Brantõ, Crawley, Hedgeley, Beuely, Belwyc, and Bewyc, beneath which it receiueth one water comming from Rodham by Weſt and ſone after a ſecond deſcending from the Middletons, and ſo they go as one with the Bromiſhe, by Chatton to Fowbrey (where they croſſe the third water falling downe by North from Holwbourne by Heſel bridg) thence to Woller, there alſo taking in a rill that riſeth about Middleton hal, & runneth by Hardley, Whereley, and ẏ reſt afore remembred, whereby the water of Bromis is not a little increaſed, and after this latter confluence beneath Woller, no more called Bromis but the Till, vntill it come at the Twede. The Till paſſing therefore by Wetland and Dedington, meeteth ſone after with a fayre ſtreame comming from by Southweſt, which moſt men call the Bowbent or Bobent. It riſeth on the Weſt ſide of the Cocklaw hill, and from thence halleth to Hattons beneath the which it toyneth from by ſoutheaſt with the Hellerborne, and then goeth to Pudſton, Downeham, Kilham, and a little by North of Newton Kyrke, and betweene it and Weſt Newton, it taketh in another water cõming from the Chen iote hils by Heth pole, and from thenceforth runneth on without any farder increaſe, by Copland Euert and ſo into the Till. The Till for his part in lyke ſorte after this confluence goeth to Broneridge, Fodcaſtell, Eatall caſtell Heaton and North of Tilmouthe into the Twede, or by Weſt of Weſell, excepte my memorie doe faile me. After this alſo our aforeſaid water of Twede deſcendeth to Grotehughe, the Newbiggins, Norham caſtell, Ford, Lungridge, and croſſing the Whitaker on the other ſide from Scotland beneath Cawmill, it runneth to Ordo, to Barwicke and ſo into the Ocean, leauing ſo much Engliſhe ground on the Northweſt ripe as lyeth in manner of a triangle betweene Cawmilles, Barwiſe and Lamneton, which is two myles and an halfe euery waye, or not much more excepte I be deceiued. Beyng paſt this noble ſtreame, we came by a rill that deſcendeth from Bowſden by Barington. Then by the ſecond which ariſeth betweene Middleton and Detcham and runneth by Eſkill and the Roſſe. Next of all to Warnemouth of whoſe backe water I read as foloweth. The Warne or Gwerne ryſeth Southweſt of Crokelaw, and goyng by Warneford, Bradford, Spindleſtone, and Budill, it leaueth Newton on the right hand, and ſo falleth into the Ocean after it hath runne almoſt nine myles from the heade within the lande. From Warnemouth, we ſayled by Bamborow caſtell, and came at laſt to a fall betweene Bedwell and Newton: The firſt water that ſeruеth this iſſue, riſeth aboue Carleton from the foote of an hill which ſeemeth to part the head of this & that of Warne in ſunder. It runneth alſo by Carleton, Tonley, Derford, Brunton and Tuggell, and finally into the ſea as to his courſe appertaineth. From this water we went by Dunſtanburgh vnto the Aile or Alne mouth which is ſerued with a pretty riueret called Alne, the heade whereof riſeth in the hilles weſt of Alnham towne. From thence alſo it runneth by Kyle, Kyle, Eſlington, and Whittingham where it croſſeth a rill comming ming from by south, and beneath the same, the second that descendeth from Circhildon Stone, & likewise the thirde that riseth at Newton and runneth by Edingham castell and Lemmaton, (all on the Southeast side or right hande,) and so passeth on farder till it meete with the fourth comming from aboue Shipley from by North, after which confluence it goeth to Alnewyc and then to Denton, receyuing there a riller from by South and a rill from by North, and there goyng on to Bilton, betweene Alnwith towne and Wood hil, at Newcastle into the Ocean.

Cocket. The Cocket is a goodly ryuer, the head also thereof is in the rotes of Kemblespeth hils, Alwyne. from whence it goeth to Whitesides, & there meeting with the Alwaye (which descendeth from the North,) it goeth a little farder to Kanbridge, & there receyueth the Ridley by south west. It ioyneth also ere long with the Ryelande, which commeth in north, by Bilsdone, and then hyeth to Sharpeton, to Harbotle, where it crosseth the Yardop water, by Yardop. south, then to Woodhouse, to Bickerton, to Wollons, Newton, and running a pace toward Whitton Towre, it taketh a Brooke with all that commeth in northwest of Alneham, nere Elihaw, and goeth by Shamewood, Ouer nether Trewhet, Snitter, and Thorton, and sone after mixteth it self with the Cocket, from whence they go together to Rothbury, or Whitton Towre, to Haly, to Brinkehorne, Welden, Elihaw, Felton, (receiuing thereabout the Farelley brooke, that goeth by wintring by south east, & Sheldike water, that goeth by Hason, to Brainsaughe by north) & from thence to Morricke castell, and so into the Sea.

There is further more a little fall, betweene Hawkeslaw & Dunrich, which ryseth about Stokes wood, goeth by east Cheuington, and Whittington castell, & afterwarde into the Ocean. The Lune is a prety broke ryuing Lune. west of Elsley, frō whence it goeth to Trittington, Agham, Linton, and ere long in the Sea.

Wansbeck. Wansbecke is farre greater then the Lune. It issueth vp west and by north, of west Whelpington, thence it runneth to kyrke Whelpington, Wallington, Middleton, and Angerton. Here it meeteth with a water running frō about Farnelaw, by ỳ grange, and Hartborne on the north, and then goyng from Angerton, it runneth by Mosseden to Whitforth, and there in lyke maner crosseth ỳ Font, alias Pont. Font, which issuing out of the ground about nere Biggin, goeth by Monney kyrke, Witton castell, Stanton, Munriding, Newton, & so into ỳ Wansbecke, which runneth in lyke maner from Witforde to Morpheth castell, (within two myles whereof, it ebbeth & floweth) the newe Chappell, Bottle castel, Shepwashe, and so into the sea, three myles from the next haueh which is called Blithe.

Blithe. Blithe water ryseth about kirke Heaton, and goeth by Belse, Ogle, and receyuing the broket that cōmeth by the Dillingtons and Barwise on the hill, it runneth by Harford, Bedlington, Cowpon, and at Blithes nuke, into the deepe Ocean.

Hartley. Hartley streamelet ryseth in Wetestade parioche, goeth by Halitwell, and at Hartley towne yeldeth to the Sea.

North Tine. The Tine ryseth of two heades, whereof ỳ called north Tine, is the first that followeth to be described. It springeth by aboue Belkirke in the hylles, and thence goeth to Butterhawghe, (where it receiueth the Shele) Shele. thence to Cragcheles, Leapelish, Shilburne, Parro, Smalburne, Elis, Grenested Heslaside, Billingham, and at Reasmouth, taketh in the Reade, and in the meane time sundrye Reade. other rilles, comming from by north & south, whereof I haue no knowledge, neyther anye regarde to write, bycause they are obscure, Shillugton. smal, and without denominations. After this 3. Burnes confluence it passeth to Lechall, to Carehouse (crossing Shillingtō rill by west) another also beneath thys on the same side, made by the confluence of Workes burne, and Pyddle burne, at Roseburne, beside ỳ thyrd aboue, & Symons burne beneath Shepechase, then to S. Dunondes, to Wall, to Ackam, and so into south Tine, beneath Accam, & northwest as I dee wene of Heram.

Tine. S. The South Tine ariseth in the Cheuiote hilles, and eare it hath gone farre from the head it meeteth with Esgyll on the east, Esgyll. another rill on the West, and so going by the houses toward Awsten moze, it ioyneth with Schud from by west, and sone after with the Vent from by East aboue Lowbiere. From Vent Lowbier it goeth to Whitehalton, to kyrke Gilderbecke. Haugh (crossing ỳ gilders Becke) to Thornhope, where it is inlarged wyth a water on eache side, to Williams Stone, and almost Knare. at Knaresdale, taketh in the Knare, and then runneth withall to Fetherstone angle. At Fetherstone angle lykewise it meeteth wyth harley water, by South west, another a lytle beneath from southeast, and thence when it commeth to Bylleker castell, it carryeth another with all from by west, after which confluence it goeth to Harltwesell, Unthanke, Wilmoteswike, receiuing one ryl by ỳ way, and another there from the south, as it doth the thyrd from Brandly hall by north, and the Alon by the south, whereby his greatnesse

is not a little augmented. From Willymotſwyſt, it goeth to Lées, Haddonbridge, Wodhall, Owmers, Wherneby, Coſtely, and ſo by Warden (ſome after receyuing the North Tine) thē to Herham, & Dilſtan, croſſing two waters by the waye, whereof one commeth from by ſouth, another lower then the ſame from Riſing ouer againſt Burell. From Dilſtā it goeth to Eltingham, Pryddo, Willam (and there it méeteth furthermore with a beck that goeth betwéene Benwell and Redhoughe) then to Repon, Blaydon, and next of all with the Derwent, from by ſouth which riſeth alſo about Kneden of two heades, and goyng by Acon Aſperſheles Bernefordſide, Ebcheſter, Blackehall, and Willington, finally falleth into the Tine beneath Redhughe and before it come to Newcaſtell, from whence alſo the Tine goeth by Fellin, Hedburne, Jello, Shcles and ſo into the ſea. Derwent.

The Were riſeth of thrée heades, in Kelloppeſlaw hill, whereof the moſt ſoutherly is called Burdop, the middlemoſt Wallop and the Northerlieſt Kellop, which uniting themſelues about S. Johns Chappell, or a little by Weſt thereof, their confluence runneth thorow Stanhope parke, by eaſt Pare, and ſo to Froſterley. Here it receiueth thrée rilles frō the North in Weredale, whereof one commeth in by Stanhop, another weſt of Wodcroſs Hall, and the third at Froſterley afore mencioned, Howbeit a little beneath theſe, I finde yet a fourth on the ſouthe ſide, which deſcendeth from ſouthweſt by Bolliop, Byſhopſley, Milhouſes, and Landew, as I haue béene informed. Boyng therefore united al tō the Were, this ſtreame goeth on to Walſingham there taking in the Waſcropburne, beſide another at Bradley, the thyrde at Harpley Hall, (and theſe on the Northſide,) and the fourth betwéene Witton and Wittō caſtel called Bedburne cōming by Hamſterley wherby this riuer doth now ware very great. Going therefore frō hence, it haſteth to Byſhops Akelande, Newfield, and Willington. But néere vnto this place alſo and ſomewhat beneath Sunderland, the Were croſſeth one broke from ſoutheaſt by Yet & Cordale, and two other from by northweſt in one botome, whereof the firſt commeth from Aſhe by Langley, ỳ other from Beare parke, and ſo méeting beneath Kelley with the other they fall both as one into the Were betwéene Sunderland, and Burnall. From hence our Ryuer goeth to Holwghwell, Shirkeley, olde Dureſme (and there taking in the Piddingbroke by Northeaſt) it goeth to Dureſme, Finkeley Harbarhouſe, Lumley Caſtell, (where it méeteth with the Pilis, whoſe heds are vnited betwéene Pelton and Whitwell) and from thence to Lampton, the Bedwiks, Afferton, Furd, and ſo into the ſea betwéene Sunderland and Munkermouth. Were. Burdop. Wallop. Kellop. Wallop. Bedburne Piddingbroke. Pilis.

Beyng thus paſſed the Tine, and ere we come at the mouth of the Theſe almoſt by 2. myles, we méete with a prettye fall, which groweth by a Ryuer that is increaſed with two waters, whereof one riſeth by northweſt at Horetōs, and goeth by Stotfeld and Clayton, the other at Dawlton: goyng by Byerton, Dwtham, and Grettam, finally ioyning within two miles of the ſea, they make a prety portlet but I know not of what ſecurity.

The Theſe riſeth in the blacke lowes, a boue two myles flat weſt of the ſoutherlye head of Were called Burdop, and thēce runneth thorow Tildale forreſt: and taking in the Langdon water from northweſt it runneth to Durtpit chappell, to New Biggin, & ſo to Middleton. Here it receyueth by weſt of eche of theſe a Rill comming from by North, (of which the laſt is called Hude) & likewiſe the Lune by ſouthweſt, that riſeth at thrée ſeuerall places, whereof the firſt is in the borders of Weſtmerland and there called Arnegyll becke, the ſecond more ſoutherly, named Lune becke, and the thirde by ſouth, at Bendor Skath hill, and méeting all aboue Arnegill houſe, they runne together in one botome to Lathekyrke bridge, and then into the Theſe. Hauing therefore mette with theſe, it runneth to Pickelton (and there taking in the Kirkwith water) it goeth Rumbald kirke (croſſing there alſo one Rill and the Bander broke) and then goyng to Horſewood hagge, & Horſewood parke, til it come to Bernards caſtle. Here alſo it receyueth a water cōmyng eaſt of Kere croſſe, frō the ſpittle in Stāmore by Crag almoſt ſouthweſt, and being united tō the Theſe, it goth by Stratford, Egleſdon, Rokeſby, Thorpe, Wickliffe, Duington, and betwene Barforth, & Gainforth: meteth with another Rill, that commeth from Langley foreſt, betwene Raby caſtle and Standorpe. But to proceede, the Theſe beyng paſt Ramforth, it runneth betwene Perſore & Cliffe, and in the way to Croftes bridge, taketh in ỳ Skerne a pretye water which riſeth about Trinden, and goeth by Fiſhburne, Bradbury, Preſton and Darlington: and finally méeting with the Cocke becke, it falleth into the Theſe beneath Stapleton, before it come at Croftes bridge. From thence it runneth to Sockburne, nether Dunſley, Middleton row, Newham, Parne (croſſing a broke frō Leuen bridge) to Barwiche Preſton, Thorne Abbais and Archam, which ſtandeth on the South Lune. Arnegill. Skirkewith. Bander. Kere croſſe Skerne.

Southeast side of the riuer betwene the falles of two waters: wherof one descendeth from west Hartburne, the other from Stillington. From Arsham finally it goeth to Beilazis Middleburgh, and so into the sea.

Next of all we come vnto the high Cliffe water, which rising aboue Hutton, goeth by Gisborow, & there receiueth another stream comming from by south east, and then continuyng in his course, it is not long ere it fal into the sea.

Wole. The next is the Scaling water, which descendeth from Scaling towne, from whence we come to the Wolemouth, not farre from whose hed standeth Wolgraue castle: then to Sandford creke, & next of all to Elke mouth, which riseth aboue Danby wood, and so goeth to Castleton, there méeting by the way with another Rill comming from about Westerdale by Danby, and so they goe on together by Armar and Thwatecastle (till they ioyne with another water aboue Glasdale chappel) thence to new Biggin, taking yet another brooke with them, running from Goodlande warde, (and likewise the Ibur) and so goe on without any further increase by Bulworth, ere long into the sea.

Elke.

Ibur.

There is also a creke on eche side of Robin Whods bay, of whose names and courses, I haue no skil sauing that Fillingale the towne doth stand betwene them both.

There is another not farre from Scarborow, on the North side called the Harwood brooke. It runneth thorow Harwode Dale by Cloughton, Bunilton, and sone after méeting with another Rill on the southwest, they runne as one into the Ocean sea.

From Scarborow to Bridlington by Flãborow hed, we met with no more falles. This water therfore that we saw at Bridlington, riseth at Duggleby, from whence it goeth to Kirby, Helperthorpe, Butterwic, Boithorp, Forhole, (where it falleth into the ground & riseth vp againe at Rudston) Thorpe, Cathorpe, Bridlington, and so into the Ocean.

Being come about ỹ Spurne hed, I méete ere long with a riuer that riseth short of Witherley, and goeth by Fodzingham, and Wilsted: from thence, to another that commeth by Rosse, Halcham, Carmingham: then to the third, which riseth aboue Humbleton, and goeth to Elferwise, Heddon, and so into the Humber. The 4. springeth short of Spzotteley, goeth by Wytton, and falleth into the water of Humber at Merflete, as I heare.

Hull. The next of all is the Hull water, which I will describe also here, and then crosse ouer vnto the southerly shore. The furdest head of Hull water riseth at Kilham, from whence it goeth to Lewthorpe creke, and so to Fodzingham, a little beneath which it méeteth with sondry waters, wherof one falleth in on the North east side, comming from about Lillet, the second on the Northwest banke frõ Nafferton: the third from Emmeswell & Kirkeburne, (for it hath two heds, which ioyne beneath little Dzyfeld) and the 4. which falleth into the same: so that these two latter runne vnto ỹ maine riuer both in one chanell, as experience hath confirmed. From hence then our Hull goeth to Katteley to Godalehouse, & thẽ taking in a water from Hozneste Mere, it goeth on thorowe Beuerley medowes, by Warron, Stonecerry, Hull, and finally into the Humber. Of the Rill that falleth into this water from South netherwise by Skyzlow, and the two Rilles that come from Cockingham and Woluerton, I saye no moze, sith it is inough to name them in their ozder.

¶Of such Riuers as fall into the Sea, betweene Humber to the Thames. Cap. xj.

Humber. THere is no ryuer called Humber from the heade, wherfoze that which we now call Humber, hath the same denomination no hygher then the confluence of Trent with the Duze, as beside Leland, sundzy auncyent writers haue noted befoze vs both. Certes it is a noble arme of ỹ sea, & although it be pzoperly to be called Duze, euen to the Nuke beneth Ancolme, yet are we contented to cal it Humber, of Humbrus a King of ỹ Scithiens, who inuaded this Ile in ỹ time of Locrinus, thinking to make himselfe the Monarch of ỹ same. But as God hath frõ time to time singularly pzouyded of the benefite of Bzitaine, so in this buũes it came to passe, that Humber was put to flight, his men slaine, & furthermoze whilest he attempted to saue hymselfe by hasting to hys shippes, such was the pzesse of his nobilitye that followed him into his owne vessell, and the rage of weather, which hastened on his fatall daye, that both he & they were dzowned in that arme: And thys is the onelye cause wherefoze it hath bẽne called Humber, as our wzyters saye, and whereof I finde these verses.

Dum fugit obstat ei flumen, submergitur illic,
Deque suo tribuit nomine nomen aquæ.

Thys ryuer in olde time parted Lhoegres oz England from Albania, which was ỹ pozcion of Albanactus, the yongest son of Bzute. But sithence that time ỹ limits of Lhoegres haue bene so inlarged, first by ỹ pzowesse of ỹ Romains, then by ỹ conquests of English, ỹ at thys pzesent day ỹ Twede on the one side, and the Solne on the other, are taken for the principall bounder, betweene vs and those of Scotiã. In describing therfore of the Humber, I must nede describe the Duze, & in laying for ỹ the course of the Duze, I shal hardly escape the noting of those streames at large, that fall into the same: howbeit sith I haue of purpose appointed a chapter for these and the lyke, the nert booke, I will here onely speake of the Duze, and say thereof as followeth.

and

Vrealias Duze, ex Isis.

The Ure therefore ryseth in the fardest partes of all Richmondeshyre, among the Coterine hilles, in a mosse, towarde the west fourteene myles beyonde Mydleham. Being therefore issued out of the grounde, it goeth to Holbecke, Hardraw, Hawhouse, Butterside, Askebridge (which Leland calleth the Ascaran, and say ỹ therof & the Bainham, that they are but obscure bridges) thẽ to Askarth, thorowe Wanlesse Parke, Wenseley bridge (made two hundred yeares since, by Alwyn, Parson of Winslaw) New parke, Spennithorne, Danby, Cerune Abbay, Clifton and Masham. When it is come to Masham, it receyueth the Burne, by south west (as it dyd the wile, from very deepe scarry rockes, before at Askaran) and dyuers other wild rilles not worthy to be remẽbred. From Masham, it hasteth vnto Tanfelde (taking in by the waye a ryll by Southwest) then to another Tanfelde, to Newton hall, and northbridge at the hither ende of Rippon, and so to Huickes bridge. But ere it come there it meeteth with ỹ Skel, which being incorporate with ỹ same, they run as one to Thorpe, then to Aldborow & sone after receyueth ỹ Swale. Here sayth Leland, I am brought into no little streight, what to coniecture of the meeting of Isis & Ure, for some say ỹ the Isis & the Ure doe meete at Borowbridge, which to me doth seme to be very vnlikely, sith Isurium taketh his denominatiõ of Isis & Vro, for it is often seene that the lesse ryuers doe mingle theyr names with ỹ greater, as in the Thamesis & other is easie to be found. Neyther is there any more mencio of the Ure after his passage vnder Borowbrige, but onelye of Isis & the Duze in these dayes, although in olde tyme it helde vnto Yorke it selfe, which of the Ure is truely called Urewise, (or Yorke shorte) or else my perswasion doth fayle me. I haue red also Ewerwyc and Yorwise. But to proceede, & leaue this superfluous discourse. Frõ Borowbridge, ỹ Duze goeth to Aldbrough (& receiuing ỹ Swale by ỹ way) to Aldworke, taking in Usburne water, frõ the southwest then to Linton vpon Duze, to Newton vpõ Duze, & to Munketun, meeting wỗ the Nydde ere long, and so going withall to the Readhouses, to Popleton, Clifton, Yorke (where it crosseth the Fosse) to Foulefourth, Middlethorp, Acaster, & Acaster, Kelfete, Welehall, Bareleby, Selby, Turmonhall, Skurthall, Hokelathe, Hoke, Sandhall, Redneese, Whitegifte, Ulfet, Blacketoft, Foreflete, Brownflete, & so into Humber. And thus do I describe the Duze. Nowe beyng entred into ỹ Humber streame, toward ỹ sea againe, I will begin with the Ancolme, and so go along vpon the coast of Lincolneshire tyll I come to Bolton in such order as insueth. Fosse.

Ancolme, a goodlye water ryseth East of Mercate Rasing, & frõ thence goeth by middle Rasing. Then receiuing a short ryll from by south, it runneth on vnder two bridges, by the waye, till it come to Wingall, north east, where also it meeteth with another broke, frõ Usselby that commeth thither, by Uresby, and south Kelsey. After this confluence also it goeth by Cadney (taking in the two rylles in one botome, that descende from Howsham, and north Leysey,) and thence to Newsted, Glanford, Wardeley, Thorneham, Appleby, Yorslow, north Ferriby, and so into the sea. Ancolme Beyng past Ancolme, we go about the Nesse and so to the fall of the water, which commeth from Keleby, by Cotham Abbaye, Nersham Abbaie, Thorneton, & leaung Corhyll by west, it falleth into the Ocean. The nert is the fall of another broke comming from Fleting all along by Stallingburne. Thẽ crossed we Grymsby gullet which issuing aboue Ereby cõmeth to Laseby, the two Cotes, and then into the sea. After thys wee passed by a nother Portelet, whose backwater, descendeth from Baleby by Asheby, Briggesley, Wathe, and Towney, and finally to the nert issue, before we came at Saltflete which braunching at the last, leaueth a prety Islande wherein Comsholme Village standeth. This water ryseth short as I here of Tatheuel, frõ whence it goeth to Rathby, Hallington, Ellington, Lowth, Kidirington Auingham, & then braunching aboue North Somerton, one arme meeteth with the sea, by Grauethorp, ỹ other by north of Somercote.

Saltflet water hath but a short course for rising among the Cockeringtons, it cõmeth to the sea, at Saltflete hauen, howbeit the nert vnto it is of a longer race, for it ryseth as I take it in Calwthorpe paroche, and descendeth by Legburne, the Carletons, the west myddle and east Saltfletes, and so into the Oceane. The water that ryseth aboue Ormesby & Dryby, goeth to Tamsby, Swaby Abbaie, Clathorpe, Belew, Tattle, Witherne, Stane, and north east of Thetilthorpe into the maine sea. Saltflete.

Maple-

Maple-thorpe.

Maplethorpe water ryſeth at Thareſthorp and going by Markeley, Folethorpe, & Truthorpe, it is not long ere it mæte w̃ the Germain Ocean, then come we to ẏ iſſue ẏ commeth frō aboue Hotoft, & thence to Mumby chappel, whether ẏ water cõming frō Claxby, Willowby, and Slouthby (and whereinto another ryll falleth) doth runne, as there to doe homage vnto their Lorde, & Souereigne. As for Ingolde mil creke, I paſſe it ouer, and come ſtreight to another water, deſcending from Burge by Skegnes. From hence I go to the iſſue of a faire broke, which as I heare, doth riſe at Tetford, and thence goeth by Somerby, Bagenderby Aſhwardby Sawlthorpe, Partney, Aſheby, ẏ Stepings, Thorpe Croſt, and ſo into the Sea. As for Wainflete water, it commeth from the eaſt ſea, and goeth betwæne S. Maries and Ahallowes by Wainflete town, and treading the pathe of his predeceſſors, empiteth hys chanell to the maintenaunce of the Sea.

Now come I to the courſe of the Wytham, a famous riuer, wherof goeth the bye word, frequented of old, and alſo of Ancolme, which I before deſcribed.

Lindis wytham Rhe.

Ancolme ele, and Wytham pike,
Search all England, and find not the like.

Lelande calleth it Lindis, diuers the Rhe, and I haue read all theſe names my ſelfe, except my memory do faile me. It riſeth amõg the Wickhams, in the edge of Lincolnſhire, and as I take it in Southwickã paroche, frō whence it goeth to Colſterworth, Eaſton, Kirkeſtoke Paunton, and Paunton, Houghton, and at Grantham taketh in a Rill from by ſouthweſt, as I here. From Grantham it runneth to Nan, Thorpe, Bolton, & Barneſton, where croſſing a becke from Northeaſt, it procedeth farther ſouthweſtwarde by Mereſton, toward Faſton, (there alſo taking in a broke that riſeth about Denton, and goeth by Sydbroke,) it hafteth to Dodington, Clapale, Barneby, Beckingham, Stapleford, Baſſingham, Thurlby, and beneth Amburgh, croſſeth a water that commeth from Stogilthorpe by Somerton caſtle. After this confluence alſo, our Wytham goeth ſtil forth on his way, to the Hickhams, Bolthã, Brace-bridge, and Lincolne it ſelfe. But ere it come there, it maketh certain poles (wherof one is called Swan pole) and ſone after deuiding it ſelfe into armes, they runne both thorough the lower part of Lincolne, eche of them hauing a bridge of ſtone ouer it, thereby to paſſe thorough the principall ſtrete: and as the bigger arme is well able to beare their fiſher botes, ſo the leſſer is not without his ſeuerall commodities. At Lincolne alſo this noble riuer meeteth, with the Foſſe dike, whereby in great flondes, veſſelles may come from the Trentes ſide to Lincoln. For betwene Torkſey where it beginneth, & Lincoln citie where it endeth, are not aboue vij. miles, as Lelande hath remembred. Biſhop Atwater began to cleanſe this ditch, thinking to bring great veſſels frō Trent to Lincoln in his time, but ſith he died before it was performed, there hath no man bene ſince ſo well minded as to proſecute his purpoſe. The courſe moreouer of this our ſtreame followyng, from Lincoln to Boſtõ, is 50. miles by water, but if you mind to ferry, you ſhall haue but 24. For there are 4. common places where men are ferried ouer, as Short ferry 5. miles from Lincolne: Taterſall fery, 8. miles frō Short fery: Dogdike fery a mile, Langreth fery, 5. miles, and ſo many finally to Boſton. Foſſe dike.

But to go forward with the courſe of Lindis, when it is paſt Lincolne, it goeth by Shepewalh, Waſſingburg, Fiſkerton, and ſone after taketh in ſondry riuers in one chanell, wherby his greatneſſe is very much increaſed. Frō this confluence it goeth to Bardolfe, and there receiuing a Rill (deſcendyng from betwene Sotby and Randby, and goyng by Harton) it ſlideth forth by Tupham to Taterſall caſtle, taking vp there in like ſort three ſmall Rilles by the way, wherof I haue ſmall notice as yet, and therfore I referre thẽ vnto the next Treatiſe, wherin God willing many things ſhal be more plainly ſet downe, that are here but obſcurely touched, and ſome errors corrected, that for want of informatiõ, in due tyme haue ſpedily paſſed my handes. Finally, being paſt Taterſall, and Dogdike fery, the Wytham goeth toward Boſton, & thence into the ſea. Thus haue I briefly diſpatched this noble riuer, now let vs ſee what we may do with the Wiland, whoſe deſcriptiõ ſhall be ſet downe euen as it was deliuered me, with onely one note added out of Leland, and another had of Chriſtopher Sarton of Wakefield, by whoſe frendly helpe I haue filed many things in this that were erſt but roughly handled, and more then rudely forged.

Being paſſed Boſton Hauen, we come ſtreight waye to the fall of Wyland. Thys ſtreame ryſeth about Sibbertoft, and running betwæne Boſworth and Howthorpe, it goeth to Fæding worth, Merſon, Bubberhã, Truſſell, Herborowe, (receyuing there the Bray, which cõmeth frō Braylbroke caſtle) to Bolton, Weſton, Wiland, Athely, Nedburne, Rokingham, and Calweot, (where a riueret called lyttle Eye mæteth wythall, comming from eaſt Norton by Alerſtone, Wyland. Bray.

Stocke,

Stocke, Falton, and dry ſtocke. From Cawrot it goeth to Gritto, Harringworth, Seton, Glauerley, Duddington, Colly weſton, Eſton, and there ioyneth with the thirde called Warke, not farre from Ketton, which commeth from Lye by Preſton, Wing, Lindon, Luffenham, &c. Thence it goeth on by Tinwell, to Stanforde (croſſing the Bryke water, and Whitenelbecke, both in one bottom) and from Stanforde by Talington, Marley to Mercate Deping, Crowland (where it almoſt meeteth with ỹ Auon) then to Spalding, Waplad, and ſo into the ſea. Leland writing of this Wyland, addeth theſe words which I will not omitte, ſith in mine opinion they are worthy to be noted, for better conſideratiõ to be had in the ſayd water and his courſe. The Wyland ſayth he, goyng by Crowlande, at Newdrene diuideth it ſelfe into two braches, of which one goeth vp to Spalding called Newdrene, and ſo into the ſea at Foſſedike Stowe: the other named ỹ South into Wiſbeche. Thys latter alſo parteth it ſelfe to two myles from Crowlande, and ſendeth a ryll called Wrythlake by Thorney, where it meeteth wyth an arme of the Nene, that cõmeth from Peter borow, and holdeth courſe with ỹ brode ſtreame, till it be come to Murho, fiue myles from Wyſbech, where it falleth into the ſouth. Out of the ſouth in lyke ſort falleth another arme called Shepes eye, and at Hopelode (which is fourteene myles from Linne) did fal into the ſea. But now the courſe of that ſtreame is ceaſed, wherupõ the inhabitants ſuſtaine many grieuous floudes, becauſe the mouth is ſtaunched, by which it had acceſſe before into the ſea: hetherto Leland. Of the courſe of this ryuer alſo from Stanford, I note thys furthermore out of another writing in my time. Beyng paſt Staunton (ſaith he) it goeth by Burghley Uffington, Tallingtõ, Nagey, Deping, caſt Deeping, and comming to Waldram hall, it braunceth into two armes, wherof that which goeth to Singleſole, receyueth the the Nene out of Cambridge ſhyre, and then going by Dowedale, Trekenhole, and wynding at laſt to Wiſbiche, it goeth by Liuerington, S. Maries, and ſo into the ſea. The other arme hasteth to Crowland, Clowthouſe Brethertouſe, Pikale, Cowbecke and Spalding. Here alſo it receiueth ỹ Baſtõ dreane, Longtoft dreane, Deeping dreane, & thence goeth by Wickham into the ſea, taking with all on the right hand ſondry other dreanes, and thus farre he.

Next of all when we are paſt theſe, we come to another fall of water into ỹ Waſh, which deſcendeth directly from Whaplade dreane to Whaplade towne in Hollande: but becauſe it is a water of ſmall importãce, I paſſe from thence, as hasting to the Nene, of both, the more noble riuer. The next therfore to be deſcribed is the Auon, otherwyſe called Nene, which the author deſcribeth after this maner. The Nene beginneth 4. miles aboue Northampton in Nene Mere, where it riſeth out of two heades, which ioyne about Northampton. Of this riuer the city & countrie beareth the name, although we now pronoũce Hãpton for Auondune, which error is cõmitted alſo in ſouth Auondune, as we may eaſily ſee. In another place Lelãd deſcribeth ỹ ſaid riuer after this maner. The Auõ riſeth in Nene niere field, and goyng by Dundale and Peterborow, it deuideth it ſelfe into three armes, wherof one goeth to Horney, another to Wiſbich, the third to Ramſey: and afterward beyng vnited againe, they fall into the ſea not very farre from Linne. Finally, the diſcent of theſe waters, leaue here a great ſort of Ilandes, wherof Ely, Crowland, and Perſland, are the chiefe: hetherto Leland. Howbeit, becauſe neither of theſe deſcriptiõs touch the courſe of this riuer at the full, I wil ſet downe the third, which ſhal ſupply whatſoeuer the other do want. The Auon therefore ariſing in Penemere field, is encreaſed with many rilles before it come at Northampton, and one aboue Kings thorpe, from whẽce it goeth to Dallington, & ſo to Northamptõ, where it receiueth the Wedon, and here I will ſtay, till I haue deſcribed this riuer. The Wedon therfore riſeth at Fauleſſe in maiſter Knightlies poles and in Badby plaſhes alſo, are certaine ſprings that reſort vnto this ſtreame. Fauleſſe poles, are a mile from Chareton, where the head of Chare ryuer is ỹ rũneth to Banbery. There is but an hill called Albery hil betwene ỹ heds of theſe two riuers. From the ſaid hill therefore, the Wedon directeth his courſe to Badby Newenham, Cuerton, Wedon, betwixt which and Flortetowne, it receiueth the Florus (a prety water riſing of foure heds, wherof the one is at Dauentry, another at Watford, the third, at long Buck, the fourth aboue Whilton) and then paſſeth on to Heyford, Kilſingbury, Upton, and ſo to Northampton, where it falleth into the Auon, receiuing finally by the way, the Bugbroke water at Heyford, Pathall water nere Kilſingbery, and finally, Preſton water beneath Upton, which running from Preſtõ by Wotton, meeteth at the laſt with Milton Rill, and ſo fal into Auon. Now to reſume the tractation of our Auon. Frõ Northampton therfore, it runneth by Houghton, great Billing, Whitſtone, Dodington and Willingborow, where we must stay a while, for betwene Willingborow and Highã Ferries, it receiueth a prety water comming frõ about Kilmarshe, which goyng by Ardingworth, Dailborow, Rusheton, Newtõ, Gaddington, Boughton, Warketon, Ketteryng, Berton, and Burton, meeteth there wyth Rothewel water, which runneth west of Kettering to Hilham, the greater Haridon, and then into the Auon. Beyng therfore past Burton, our maine streame goeth to Highã Ferris, Artleborow, Ringsted, Woodford, and (meeting therby with Cranford Rill) to Thrarston, north wherof it ioyneth also with the Deley water, that commeth frõ Sudborowe and Lowicke, to olde Umbles, Warden ho, Pilketon, Toke, (where it taketh in the Lieden Becke) and so to Dundell Cotterstocke, Tansoner, and betwene Tothering and Warmington, receyueth the Corby water, which rising at Corby, goeth by Weldon, Denethap, Bulwich, Bletherwyc, Finesshed, Arethorpe, Newton, Tothering, & so into the Auon. After this, the said Auon goeth to Elton, Pallington, Perwell, Sutton, Castor, Allertõ, and so to Peterborow, where it deuideth it selfe into sondry armes, & those into seuerall braunches amõg the Fennes & medowes, not possible almost to be numbred, before it meete with the sea on the one side of the countrey, & fal into the Duze on the other.

The Duze, which Leland calleth the third Isis, falleth into the sea betwene Meräand and Downeham. The chiefhed of this riuer ariseth nere vnto Staines, from whence it cõmeth to Brackley (sometyme a noble towne in Northampton shire, but now scarcely a good village) and there taking in on the left hande one water comming from the parke betwene Sysam and Astwell (which runneth by Whitfield and Tinwelton) and another on the right frõ Imley, it goeth on by Welkby, Fulwell, Water stretford, Buckinghã and Berton, beneath which towne the Eryn falleth into it, whereof I finde this short discription to be inserted here. The Eryn riseth not farre from Hardwyc in Northamptonshire, from hence it goeth by Heth, Erinford, Godderington, Twyford, Steple cladõ, and ere it come at Padbiry, meeteth with the Garan broke descending from Garanburg, and so they go together by Padbiry till they fall into the Duze, which carieth them after the confluence, to Thorneton bridge (where they crosse another fall of water comming from Whitlewood forest by Luffeld, Lecamsted and Foscot) and so to Beachamptõ, Culuerton, Stony stratford and Wolurtõ. Here the Duze meeteth with a water (called as Leland coniectureth, ỳ Were or Were,) on the left hand as you go downeward that cõmeth betwene Weden and Werenham in Northamptonshire & goeth by Towcester, and Alderton, and not farre from Wolurtõ and Hauersham, into ỳ foresaid Duze, which goeth also frõ hence to Newporte paganell, where in like sort I must stay a while till I haue described another water, named the Cle, by whose issue the sayd streame is not a little increased. This riuer riseth in the bery cõmunes betwene Buckinghã and Bedfordshires, not far from Whippesnade, and goyng on toward the northwest, by Eaton and Layton, it commeth to Linchelade, where it entreth wholy into Buckinghamshire, and so goeth on by Hammond, Brickle, Fenny stratford, Simpson, Walton and Middletõ, beneath which it receiueth the Saw from aboue Halcet, & so goeth on till it meete with ỳ Duze nere vnto Newport, as I haue said. Being united therefore we set forward from the sayde towne, and followe thys noble ryuer, to Lathbirye, Thuringham, Filgrane, Lawndon, Newington, Bradfelde on the one side, and Turuey on the other, till it come at length to Bedforde, after many windlesses, & then meeteth with another streame, which is increased with so manye waters, that I was inforced to staye here also, and viewe theyr seuerall courses, from the highest steple in Bedforde, whence (or peraduenture otherwyse) I noted the same as followeth. Certes on the east side where I beganne thys speculation, I sawe one that came from Potton, and mette withal nere Beclifwade: another that grewe of two waters, whereof one descended frõ Baldocke, the other frõ Hitchin, which ioyned beneath Arlesey, and thence went to Langforde and Edwarth. The third which I beholde had in lyke sort two heades, whereof one is not farre from Wode ende, the other from Wooburne (or Howburne) & ioyning about Flitwise, they go to Flytton, (where they receiue Antill Broke) and so by Chiphil, and Chicksande, they come to Shafforde, from whence taking the aforesayde Langford water with them, they go forth by Beclifwade, Sandy, Blumham, & nere vnto Themilford are united wt the Duze, & now to our purpose againe. After this ỳ Duze, goeth by Berkeforde, to Winteringhã, (meetyng there with the Warelley becke) and so runneth to S. Neotes (or S. Neots) to Paxton, Offordes, Godmanchester, Huntingdon, Milton, S. Ives, Hollywell, and Erith, receyuing in the meane tyme the Stow, nere vnto little Parton, and likewise the Ellen, & the Emmer, in one chanell a litle by west of Huntingdon. Finallye the maine streame spreading abroade into the Fennes, I cannot tell into howe many braunches, neyther how manye Ilsettes, are inforced by the same, but thys is certeine, that after it hath thus delted it selfe with raunging a while about the pleasant bottomes and lower grounds, it meeteth with the Granta, frō whence it goeth with a swift course, vnto Downehā. Betwen it also and the Auō, are large sundry Mores, or plashes by southwest of Peterborow wherof Whittlesey mere, and Ramsey mere, (whereinto the Ruell falleth, that commeth from aboue Broughton, Wyston, and great Riuelley) are sayde to be greatest. Of all the ryuers that ruinne into this streame, that called Granta is the most noble and excellent, which I will describe euen in his place, notwithstanding that I had erst appointed it vnto my seconde booke, but forasmuch as a description of Duze and Granta, were delyuered me togyther, I will for his sake that gaue them me, not seperate the rowe in sunder. The very farthest heade and originall of thys ryuer is in Wenham, a large Parke belonging to the Earle of Sussex, wherin as the Townesmen say, are foure springs that runne foure sundry wayes into the maine Sea. Leland sought not the course of thys water, aboue Newport ponde, & therefore in his Commentaries vpō the song of ỹ Auon, he writeth thereof after this maner insuing. But here before I enter into his discourse, I must giue you warning, how D. Iohn Caius the learned Phisition, and some other are of the opinō, that this ryuer comming from Newport, is properlye to bee called the Rhé, but I may not so easily dissent frō Leland, whose iudgement in my mynde is by a great deale the more likely, harken therefore what he sayth.

Rhé.

The heade of Grantha or Granta, is in ỹ pond at Newport, a towne of the east Saxons, which going in a bottome beside ỹ same, receyueth a prety ryll; which in the mydest thereof doeth driue a mil and descendeth from Wickin Wenhaunt, that standeth not far from thence. Being past Newport, it goeth a long in the lower grounde vntil it come to Bridle Waldē, west of Chipping Waldē, (now Saffron walden) harde by the Lorde Audleis place, where of late the ryght honorable Lorde Phillip Earle of Surrey, with his household dyd soiourne, and sometyme stode an Abbaie, of Benedictine Monkes, before theyr generall suppression. From Audley end it goeth to Littlebirie, the lesse and greater Chesterfordes, Healdune, Hinckstone, Heckton or Sawston, and nere vnto Shalefordе receyueth the Babzen that commeth by Linton, Abbington, Babzenham, and Stapleforde: and so going forwarde it commeth at the last to Trompington, which is a myle from Cambridge. But ere it come altegyther to Trompington, it meeteth with the Barrington water, as Leland calleth it, but other ỹ Rhé, (a cōmon name to all waters in the Saxon speache,) whereof I finde thys description, to be touched by the waye. The Rhé ryseth short of Ashwell, in Hertforde shyre, and passing vnder the bridge betweene Gylden Morden and Downton, and leauing Tadlow on the west side, (as I remēber) it goeth toward Crawdē, Malton, Barrington, Haselingfeld, and so into Granta, taking sundry Rylles with him from south, & southwest, as Wendy water south west of Crawden, Whaddō brooke southwest of Orwel, Wildred becke southwest of Malton, and finally ỹ which goeth by Fulmere & Foxton, & falleth into the same betweene Barringtō, and Harleston, or Harlon as they call it.

Nowe to procede with our Granta, from Trompingtō on the one side, and Grantcester on the other, it hasteth to Cambridge warde, taking the Burne with it by the way, which descendeth from a castell of the same denomination, wherein the Picotes, & Peuerelles sometime did inhabite. Thence it goeth by sundrye Colledges in Cambridge, as the Quenes Colledge, the Kings Colledge, Clare Hall, Trinity Colledge, S. Johns. &c. vnto the high bridge of Cābridge, & betwene the towne and the Castell to Chesterton, and receyuing by & by the Doure, or Sture, (at whose bridge, ỹ most famous Mart in England is yearely holden & kept. Frō Chesterton it goeth to Ditton, Miltō, & ere long meeting with two rylles (from Bottesham and Wilberhā, in one bottome) it runneth to Horningsey and water Beche: and finallye here ioyning with the Bulbecke water, it goeth by Denny, and so forth into the Duze, fiftene myles from Cambridge, as Leland hath set downe. And thus much of the thirde Ilis or Duze, out of the aforesayde Authour, wherevnto I haue not onelye added somewhat of mine owne Experience, but also of other mens notes, whose diligent obseruation of the course of thys ryuer, hath not a little helped mee in the discription of the same. Nowe it resteth that we come nerer vnto the coast of Norfolke, and set forth such waters as we passe by vppon the same, wherin I will deale so precisely as I maye, and so farre will I trauaile therein as I hope shall content euen the curious reader, or if any faulte be made, it shall not be so great, but that after some trauayle in the finding, it shall with case be corrected.

The first ryuer ỳ therfore we come vnto after we be past the confluence of Granta, & the Duze, and within the iurisdiction of Norfolke, is called the Burne. This streame ryseth not very farre from Burne Bradfeld aboue the greater Wheltham, and from thence it goeth to Nawnton, Bury, Farneham Martin, Farneham Alhallowes, Farneham Genouefa, Hengraue, Flemton, Lackeforde, Ielingham, and to Mildenhall, a litle beneath which it meeteth with the Dale water, that springeth not farre from Catilege, and going by Alcheby, Moulton, (a benefice as the report goeth not very well prouided for) to Kenforde, Benet, Bradingham, Frekenham, it falleth at the last not farre from Iselham into the Burne, from whence they go together as one into the Duze. With ỳ Burne also there ioyneth a water comming from about Lydgate, a little beneath Iselham, and not very farre from Mildenhall.

Dunus.

The Dune heade and rysing of Mauenhey are not much in sunder, for as it is supposed they are both not farre distaunt from the bridge betweene Lopham and Ford, wherby ỳ one runneth east & the other west, as I haue beene enformed. The Dune goeth first of all by Feltham, then to Hopton, and to Kinets hall, where it meeteth with a water, coming out of a lake shorte of Banham (going by Quiddenham, Herling, Gasthorpe) and so forth on both in one channell, they runne to Ewston. Here they meete in lyke sort, wyth another descending from two heads, whereof the one is neere vnto Pakenham, the other to Tauestocke, as I here. Certes these heads ioyne aboue Ikeswoth, not farre from Stow Langtoft, from whence they go to Prwoth, Thorp, Berdwel, Hunnington, Fakenham, and so into the Dune at Ewston as I sayde. Frō hence also they hasté vntō Downeham, which of this riuer doth seeme to borowe his name. South reé ryl, I passe ouer as not worthy the description, bicause it is so small.

Next vnto thys ryuer on the south side is the Braden, or Bradunus, which ryseth at Bradenham, and goeth by Necton, north Peckenham, south Peckenham, Birlingham Bedney, Langforde, Igbor, Munforde, north olde, Stockebridge, Ferdham, Helgy, and so into the Duze.

Bradunus forté.

The neerest vnto thys is another which riseth about Lukeham, and from thence commeth to Lexham, Wallingham, Newton, the castel acre, Acres, Nerboe, Pentney, Wrōgey, Rounghton, Westchurch, & so to Linne, as so doth also another by north of this which commeth from the east hylles by Congenham, Grymston, Bawsey, Gaywood, whereof let this suffise, and now giue eare to the reast sith I am past the Duze.

Conginus.

Beyng past the mouth or fall of the Duze, we méete nert of al with the rising chase water which descendeth from two heds, & also ỳ Ingel that commeth from about Snetsham. From hence we go by the point of S. Edmód, and so hold on our course, till we come vnto the Burne, which falleth into the sea by south from Waterden, and goyng betweene the Crakes to Burnham thorp, and Burnham Norton, it striketh at the last into the sea, east of Burnham Norton, a mile at ỳ lest; except my coniecture doe faile me. The Glow or Glowy, riseth not farre from Baconsthorp, in the hundred of Tunsted, and goyng by and by into Holt hūdred, it passeth by Hunworth, Thornage, Glawnsford, Blackney, Clare, and so in the sea receiuing there at hand also a Rill by east, which descendeth from the hils lying betwene Killing town and Wayburne.

The Wantsume riseth in Northfolke at Galesend in Holt hundred, from whence it goeth to Tatersend, Downton, Skelthorpe, Farneham, Penkthorpe, Kieburg, Ellingham, and Billingesford. And here it receyueth two waters in one bottom, of which the first goeth by Stanfeld and Beteley, the other, by Wandling and Gressonhall, and so run on eche his owne way, till they méete at Houndlington, southwest of Billingesforde with the Wantsume. From hence they go altogether to Below, Iyng, Weston, and Norton, but ere it come to Norton, it méeteth with the Powke, which (issuyng about Yerham) goeth by Wattelhall and Barrold. After this the sayd Wantsume goeth on by Ringland, and so to Norwich the pontificall sée of the Bishop, to whom that iurisdictiō appertaineth. Beneath Norwich also it receyueth two waters in one chanell, which I will seuerally describe according to their courses, noting their confluēce to be at Bireley, within two myles of Norwich, except myne annotation deceiue me. The first of these hath two heds, whereof one mounteth vp south west of Whinborow, goeth by Gernelton, & is the very Hiere or Yare that drowneth the name of Wantsume, so sone as he méeteth with al. The other hed riseth at Wode in Mitforde hundred, and (after confluence with the Hiere at Caston) goyng by Brandon, Birton, Berford, Erleham, Cringlefeld (not farre from Bireley as I sayd) doth méete with his companion, which is the second to be described as followeth. It hath two heads also that méete northwest of Therstane, and hereof the one rommeth from Findon hal, by Wremmingha from about Wotton, by Hemnal, Fretton, Stretton, and Talborow, till they ioyne at Therſton, as I gaue notice aforehand. From Therſton therfore they go together in one to Newton, Shotelham, Dunſton, Caſtor, Arminghale, Bixeley, Lakenham and Trowſe, and then fall into the Wantſume beneath Norwich which hereafter is named Yiere. The Yiere Pare or Care therfore proceding in his voiage, as it wer to ſalute his grãdame the Oceane, goeth from thence by Paſwyſe, Surlingham, Clarton and Pardley: and here it mæteth agayne with another Riueret deſcending from about Shotelham, to Thirkane, Shedgraue, Hockingham, and ſo into Care or Pare, wherof Pardley the town receyueth denomination. After this it goeth to Frethorpe, and aboue Burghe caſtle mæteth with the Wauen hey, and ſo into the ſea. Wauen.

Into this riuer alſo falleth the Bure, which riſing at a towne of the ſame name, paſſeth by Milton, Bureſdume, Corpeſley, Parington, Blekeling, Bure, Aleſham, Bramptõ, Burtõ, Horſted, Wrerhã bridge, Horning, Ranewoth (and beneath Baſtelwyc receyueth the Thurine which riſeth aboue Roleſby) then to Oby, Clypſby, (there alſo receiuing another from Filby) Rimham, Caſtor, and by Parmouth into the Ocean. Thurinus. Wauen.

The Wauenhey afore mencioned, riſeth on the South ſide of Brifingham, and is a limite betwene Northfolke and Suffolke, goyng therfore by Dis, Starton, not farre from Dce, it mæteth with the Eie whiche riſeth nere Dekolde, or betweene it and Braiſworthe, and goeth on by Brome, Dce, and ſo into the Wauency.

From thẽce alſo our Wauency, runneth by Sylam, Brodiſh, Nedam, Harleſton, Rednam, Alborow, Flixton, Bungey, Shœpemedow, Barſham, Beckles, Alby, and at Whiteacre as I here it parteth in twaine, or elſe receyuing Wilforde water, which is the moſt likely, it goeth along by Somerley, Horningſheete, S. Olaues, (there receyuing the Friſſan browke, out of low or little Englande) Friſſan and Burge caſtell, where it mæteth wyth the Yiere, and from thence forth accompanieth it as I ſayd vnto the ſea. Fritha.

Willingham water commeth by Henſted Einſted, or Eniſſate, and falleth into the ſea by ſouth of Yelland. Einus.

The Cokell ryſeth ſouth ſouth weſt, of Cokeley Towne, in Blythe hundred, and nere vnto Baſtelworth, it mæteth with the ryll, that commeth from Willet, and ſo going on togither by Wenhaſton, and Blibrowe, it falleth into the ſea at an hauen, betweene Roydon, and Walderſwicke. A little ryll runneth alſo thereinto from Elſon, by Sowolde, and another from Dunwiche, by Walderſwike, and hereby it wanteth lyttle that Elſon Neſſe, is not cut of and made a pzety Iſlande. Cokelus.

The Forde ryſeth at Porford, and going by Forderley, and Theberton, it falleth at laſt into the Myſmere creke. Forda.

Into the Ozeforde hauen, falleth one water comming from Aldborowe warde, by a narrowe paſſage, frõ the north into the ſouth. By weſt whereof (when we are paſt a lyttle Iſle) it receyueth the ſeconde, deſcending frõ betweene Talingſton, and Framingham, in Plomes hundred: which comming at laſt to Marleforde, mæteth wyth a ryll ſouth weſt of Farneham called the Gleme, (that commeth by Rendelſham, the Gleinhams) and ſo paſſing forth, it taketh another wyth all at Snapeſbridge, comming from Carleton, by Sarmundham, Sterneſfielde, and Snape. Then going to Iken (where it mæteth wyth the thirde ryll at the weſt ſide) it fetcheth a compaſſe by Sudburne eaſt of Ozforde, and ſo vnto the hauen. Next vnto thys by weſt of Ozforde, there runneth vp another creke by Butley, whereinto the waters comming frõ Celleſforde, and from the Ike, doe runne both in one botome, and thus much of Ozforde hauen. Ozus. Fromus. Gleme. Iken, or Ike.

The Deue ryſeth in Debenham, in the hundred of Herteſmere, and from thence goeth to Mickeforde, Winſton, Cretingham, Letheringham, Wickham, hither to ſtill creeping towarde the ſouth: but then going in maner full ſouth, it runneth nere vnto Aſhe, Rindleſham, Aſforde, Melton, and Woodbridge, beneth which, it receiueth on the weſt ſide, a water cõming of two heades, whereof one is by north from Dtley, and the other by ſouth from Henly, which ioyning weſt of Hertelſham, go vnto the ſayde towne, and ſo into the Deue, eaſt of Hertelſham, aboue ſayd. From thence the Deue goeth by Waldringfielde and Henley, and mæteing ſone after with Brightwell browke, it falleth into ỹ maine ſea, leauing Badwſey on the eaſt where the fall therof is called Bawdſey hauen. Deua. Clarus fon:

Ure ryſeth not farre from Bacton, in Herteſmere hundred, and thence deſcendeth into Stowe hundred by Cippyng Newton, Dagworth, Stowe, (beneath whiche it mæteth with a water comming from Rattleſden, by one houſe,) and ſo goyng on to Nedeham, (thorowe Boſmere and Claydon hundredes) to Blakenham, Bramforde, Ypſwiche, (receyuing beneath Stoke, which lyeth ouer againſt Ypſwiche, the Chatſham water, Urus.

water, that goeth by Belſted, & ſo into ỹ Ure, at the mouth whereof is a marueilous dẽpe & large pitte, whereof ſome Marryners ſaye that they coulde neuer fynde the bottome, and therefore calling it a Well, and ioyning the name of the ryuer withall, it commeth to paſſe that ỹ hauen there, is called Urewel, for which in theſe daies we doe pronounce it Orwell. Into thys Hauen alſo the Sture or Stoure, hath ready paſſage, which remaineth in thys treatize nert of all to be deſcribed.

Sturus. The Sture or Stoure, parteth Eſſex from Suffolke, as Houeden ſaith, and experience cõfirmeth. It ariſeth in Suffolk, out of a lake nere vnto a towne called Stourmere. For albeit there come two rylles vnto the ſame, whereof the one deſcendeth from Thyrlo, the Wratinges and Ketton, the other from Horſhed parke, by Hauerill &c. Yet in ſomer tyme they are often drye, ſo that they cannot be ſayde to be perpetuall heads, vnto the aforeſayde ryuer. The Stoure therefore ryſeth at Stoure mare, which is a pole containing twentie acres of ground at the leaſt, the one ſide whereof is full of Alders, the other of rẽde, wherein the great ſtore of fiſhe there bredde, is not a little ſuccoured. From thys mere, alſo it goeth to Bathorne bridge, to Stocke clare, Cawndiſh, Pentlo, Milforde, Foxerth, Bureſley, Sudbury, Bures, Borſted, Stoke Nayland, Lanham, Dedham, Strotford, eaſt Barforde, Brampton, and to Catwade bridge, where it falleth into the ſea, receiuyng in the meane time ſundry brookes and rylles not here omytted at all. For on Eſſex ſide, it hath one from Hemſted, which goeth by Bumſted, and Birdbroke: another ryſing ſhorte of Foxerth, that runneth by water Beauchamp, Brundon, and falleth into the ſame at Badlington, weſt of Sudbury: and the thirde that glydeth by Horkeſley, and meeteth withal weſt of Borſted. On the north or vpon Suffolke ſide, it receyueth one deſcending frõ Cattledge, by Bradley, Thurlow, Wratting, Riddington, and at Hauerell falleth into this Sture. The ſeconde deſcendeth from Poſting field, & ioyneth therewith eaſt of Clare. The thyrde aryſeth of two heades, whereof one commeth from Wickham bruke, the other from Chedbar in Riſoy hundred, and ioyning about Stanfield, it goeth by Hawton, Somerton, Borſted, Stanſted, and north of Foxerth, falleth into Stour. The fourth iſſueth from betweene the Wallingfelds, and goeth by Edwardſtone, Borſted, Alington, Polſted, Stoke, and ſo at ſouth Borſted falleth into the ſame. The fift ryſeth North Weſt of Cockefielde, and goeth to Cockefielde, Laneham, Brimſley, Yolding, and receyuing Kettle Baſton water ſouthweſt of Chelſworth (and likewiſe the Breton that commeth from Bretenham, by Hitcheham, & Biſſeton ſtreat on the ſouth eaſt of the ſame towne) it goeth in by Nedging, Aldham, Hadley, Lainham, Shelly, Higham, and ſo into the Sture. The firt is a lyttle ryll deſcending ſouthweſt from Chappell. The ſeuenth ryſeth betweene Chappel, & Bentley, and going betweene Tatingſton, and Whetſtede, Holbrooke, and Sutton, it falleth at length into Stoure, and frõ thence is neuer harde of. Kettle baſton.

As for Oxley Rill, that ryſeth betweene Oxley, and Wilkes Parkes, and goeth vnder Ramſey bridge, and ſo into the Stoure, on Eſſex ſide, weſt of Harwiche, and eaſt of Ree Ile, I paſſe it ouer becauſe it is but a ril and not of any greatneſſe, although I ſeeke to remember manye tymes, euen the very ſmalleſt. Oxley.

Nert vnto this, wee come to another that runneth South of Beamont by Holſe, and falleth into the Sea about the middeſt of the Bay, betwirt Harwich and the Naze. Holſa.

Betwirt the Naze alſo and the mouth of Colne, is another Ryll which riſeth at little Bentley, and thence goeth to Tendring thorpe, thorow Claton parke by great Holland, and eaſt of little Holland, into the dẽpe ſea. Clato.

The Colne hath three heds, whereof one is at Duington that goeth by Tilbery, and eaſt of Peldam, falleth into the cheſe head, which ryſeth about Redgewell in Eſſex, frõ whence it goeth to Peldam Henningham. &c. The third falleth in South of Peldam into Colne, and being once mette all in one chanell: the Colne goeth as I ſayde, to Hedninghã Hawſted, Erles Colne, Makes Colne, Fordon, Bardfold, Colcheſter, and ſo into the ſea at Brickleſey. It ſeemeth here, that when ỹ ſea entreth betweene the points of Bradwell and S. Anthonies, it deuydeth it ſelfe into two armes, whereof one goeth toward Colcheſter the other toward Maldon. Into the Colne or Colunus (whereof Lelande thinketh Colcheſter to take hys name, and not a Colonia Romanorum) doe run many ſalt creekes beneth Fingering ho, whoſe names ſith I doe not knowe, nor whether they be ſerued with any backwaters or not, I gyue ouer to intreat any farther of theyr poſitions. Into that of Malden runneth many faire waters, wherof I will ſay ſo much as I knowe to be true by experience. Colunus.

There is a petty water that beginneth nere vnto Gwinbache or Wimbech church in Eſſex (the very limits of Dunnow Deanery) which runneth directly frō thence vnto Radwinter, (a parcell of your Lordſhips poſſeſſyons in theſe parts) and within three quarters of a mile of the aforeſaid church. By the way alſo it is increaſed with ſundry pretty ſprings wherof Pantwell is the chiefe, and to ſay the truth, hath maiſtre a leaſing fathered on the ſame: there is likewiſe another in a paſture belonging to the graunge, now belonging to Henry Browne Eſquier, ſoiournyng thereupon. The third, commeth out of the yarde of one of your Lordſhips Manour there, called Radwinter hall. The fourth, frō Iohn Cockſwettes houſe, named the Rotherwell, which running vnder Rothers bridge, meeteth with ỹ Owin, on the northweſt ende of Ferraunts meade, ſoutheaſt of Radwinter church, wherof I haue the charge by your honors fauorable prefermét. The nert is named Froſhwel, and of this Spring doth the whole Hundred beare the name, and alſo the Ryuer it ſelfe whereinto it falleth (from by north) ſo far as I remember. Certes, all theſe ſauing ỹ firſt and ſecond, are within your Lordſhips towne aforeſayd. The ſtreame therfore running frō hence (and now called Froſhwell, of Froſhe, which ſignifieth a frog) haſteth immediately vnto olde Sandford, then thorow new Sandforde parke, and afterward with full ſtreame to Shalford, Bocking, Stiſted, Paſwyc, and ſo to blackwater, where the name of Froſhwel ceaſeth, the water being from henceforth as I here, called Blackwater, vntyll it come to Maldon. From Blackwater therefore it goeth to Coraill, Caſterforde, Braſted and Wickham, where it meeteth wyth the Barus, and ſo goyng togyther, deſcende to Heybridge, and finally into the ſaltwater aforeſayde. As for the Barus, it ryſeth in a ſtately parke of Eſſex called Bardfeld, belonging to the crowne, from whence it goeth to olde Saling, Brayncrée (receyuing a ryllet by waye comming from Raine, blacke Notley, white Notley, Falkeburne, Wittham, and falleth into the blackewater beneath Braſted, on the ſouth.

Froſhwell.

Barus.

Beſide thys, the ſayde ryuer receyueth alſo the Chelme or Chelmer, which ryſeth in Wymbeche aforeſayde, where it hath two heads: wherof the one is not farre from Broxtrées (where Thomas Wiſeman Eſquier dwelleth) the other nigh vnto a farme called Highams, and ioyning ere long in one Chanell, they hye them toward Thaxted, meting yt the way alſo with a Ryll commyng from Boyton ende. Beyng paſt Thaxted, it goeth by Tiltey, and ſome after receyueth one Ril which ryſeth on the north ſide of Lindſell, and falleth into ỹ Chelmer by north eaſt at Tiltey aforeſayde, and another comming from ſouthweſt, and ryſing ſoutheaſt from Lindſel at moche Eſſton. From thence then holding on ſtyll wyth the courſe, it goeth to Moche Dunmowe, little Dunmow, Feiſted, Lies, both Waltams, Springfield, & ſo to Chelmereſforde. Here vppon the ſouth ſide I finde the iſſue of a water that riſeth 5. miles or thereaboutes, ſouth and by weſt of the ſayde towne, from whence it goeth to Munaſing Butteſbury (there receiuyng a Rill from by weſt) to Ingat ſtone, Marget Inge, Wilforde bridge Writtle bridge, and ſo to Chelmereſforde, (croſſing alſo ỹ ſecond water that deſcendeth from Roxforde ſouthweſt of Writtle by the way) wherof let this ſuffice. From hence the Chelmer goeth directly towarde Maudon by Badow, Dwting, Wodhamwater, Byly, and ſo to Blackwater northweſt of Maldon, receyuing neuertheleſſe ere it come fullye thither a becke alſo that goeth frō Lée parke, to little Lées, great Lées, Hatfield, Peuerell, Dwting, and ſo into Blackwater (whereof I ſpake before) as Maldon waters, doth a ryll from by ſouth ouer againſt S. Oſithes, and alſo another by Bradwell.

Roxforde.

Lée.

The Burne, ryſeth ſomewhere about Ronwell, and thence goeth to Hull bridge, ſouth Fambridge, Kirkeſhot fery, and ſo to Foulneſſe: & as this is the ſhort courſe of that ryuer, ſo it braunceth, and the ſouth arme therof receiueth a water comming from Haukewell, to great Stanbridge, and beneth Pakeſham, doth méete by South, wyth the ſayde arme, and ſo finiſhe by his courſe, as we doe our voyage alſo about the coaſt of Englande.

Burne.

Thus haue I finiſhed the deſcription of ſuch ryuers and ſtreames as fall into the Ocean according to my purpoſe, although not in ſo preciſe an order and maner of handling, as I might, if information promyſed had bene accordingly performed: howbeit, thys wyll I ſay of that which is already done, that from the hauen of Southampton, by ſouth vnto the Twede, that parteth England and ſcotland, by north (if you go backward contrary to the courſe of my deſcription) you ſhall finde it ſo exacte, as beſide a fewe bye ryuers to be touched hereafter, you ſhall not néede to vſe any further aduiſe for the finding and falles of ỹ aforeſayd ſtreames. For ſuch hath béene my helpe and conference wyth other men about theſe, that I dare pronounce them to be perfite and exact. In the reſt I followed Leland in maner worde for worde, what he hath ſayd therefore of them, that haue I exemplyfied & publiſhed herein. Such was his dealing alſo in hys bookes, that he ſought not to be curious and preciſe in thoſe deſcriptions that hée made, made, but thought it sufficient to say somewhat, and more of thinges then any mā had done before hym. In the next booke therfore, I will in three chapiters run ouer these matters agayne, and as I haue already borowed somewhat of the same, in settyng downe such braunches as fal into the mayne streames at large, so will I there agayne remember such great riuers as I haue here eyther omitted, or not so orderly handled as their dignities do require. In reading therefore of the one, refuse not I beseeche your honor withall, to haue conference with the other, for what this wanteth, that other shall supply, and ỳ which is briefly touched in this, shal there be opened at large, the onely occasion of this deuision growyng vpon hope of instruction to come in tyme, whereof when I had most nede, and the lefe vnder the presse, I was left destitute and without hope of all relefe. It is possible, that some curious head may finde carpyng worke inough in ỳ courses of these streames, but if such a one wyll enterprise the lyke, and try what one man can doe by reading onely, (for I sayled about my country within the compasse of my study) & therunto remember how many wais, through many mens iudgmentes, and what number of occasions may serue here and there, to inforce the writer to mistake his Pamphlets, quarters, townes, entraunces, &c. I doe not doubt but it would trouble his brayn, although now peraduēture in table talke, he can find many things, as he doth that sitteth at home among Ladies and Gentlewomen, and will talke and take order for matters abroad that are to be done in the field, where he neuer shewed his face. Vnto the learned therfore, I yeld correctiō of mine errors onely, and as I confesse that some vnknowne vnto me, may and haue escaped my handes, so by their gentle and brotherly admonition, they shall be the soner amended. Furthermore, this I haue also to remember that in the courses of our streames, I regard not so much to name ỳ very town or church, as the limites of the parochie, and therefore if I say it goeth by such a towne, I thinke my duety discharged, if I hitte vpon any part or parcel of the parochie. This also hath not a litle troubled me, I meane the euill writing of the names of many townes and villages, of which I haue noted some one man in the description of a riuer to write it two or three maner of wayes, whereby I was inforced to chuse one (at aduenture most commonly) that semed the likelyest in my ne opinion & iudgement: but inough of this and these things for this present.

Chap. 12.

THere are, which indeuoring to bring all thyngs to their Saxon Originall, doe affirme that this diuisiō of waies whereof we now intreate, should appertaine to such Princes of that Nation, as reigned here, sith the Romaines gaue vs ouer. But how weake their coniectures are in this behalfe, the antiquity of these stretes it selfe shal easily declare, whereof some percelles after a sorte are also set downe by Antoninus, and those that haue written of the seuerall iourneyes from hence to Rome, although peraduenture not in so directe an order, as they were at the first established. For my parte if it were not that I desire to be short in this behalfe, I could with such notes as I haue already collected for that purpose, make a large confutation of diuers of theyr opinions cōcerning these passages, but sith I haue spent more time in ỳ tractatiō of the riuers, then was allotted vnto me, I will omit at this time to discourse of these things as I would, and say what I may for the better knowledg of their courses, proceēding therein as followeth.

First of all, I finde that Dunwallon King of Britayne, about 483. yeares before ỳ birth of our sauior Jesus Christ, seing the subiectes of his Realme, to be in sundry wyse oppressed by thēues and robbers, as they trauelled to and fro, and being willing (so much as in him laye) to redresse these inconueniences, caused his whole kingdome to be surueyed, and then commaunding foure principall wayes to be made, which should leade such as trauayled into all partes thereof, from sea to sea, he gaue sundry large priuileges vnto the same, whereby they became safe, and verye much frequented. And as he had regarde herein, to the securitie of hys Subiectes, so he made sharp lawes, grounded vpō Iustice, for ỳ suppression of such wicked mēbers as did offer violence to any trauayler, that should be met wyth al or found within the limites of those passages. How by what partes of this Iland these wayes were conueighed at the first, it is not so wholy left in memory, but that some question is moued among the learned, concerning theyr auncient courses, howbeit such is the shadowe remaining hitherto of theyr extensions, that if not at this present perfectly yet hereafter it is not impossible but that they maye be founde out, and left certaine vnto posteritye. It semeth by Galfride, that the ſayd Dunwallon did limite out thoſe wayes by doles and markes, which beyng in thyrt tyme altered by the auarice of ſuch irreligious perſons as dwelt nere and incroched vpon the ſame (a fault yet iuſtly to bée found almoſt in euery place) and queſtiõ moued for their boundes before Bellinus hys ſonne, he to auoyde all further controuerſie that might from thenceforth inſue, cauſed the ſame to be paued with hard ſtone, of 18. foote in breadth, and 10. foote in depth, and in the bottome thereof huge flint ſtones alſo to be pitched, leſt the earth in tyme ſhould ſwalow vp his workmanſhip, & the higher ground ouergrow their riſing creſts. He indued thẽ alſo wt larger priuiledges thẽ before, proteſting that if any man whoſoeuer ſhoulde preſume to infringe his peace, & violate the lawes of hys kingdome in anye maner of wiſe nére vnto or vpon thoſe wayes, he ſhould ſuffer ſuch puniſhmẽt without all hope to eſcape (by frendſhip or mercy (as by ỹ ſtatutes of his realme lately prouided in thoſe caſes, are due vnto ỹ offenders: The names of theſe foure wayes are the Foſſe, the Gwethelin, or Watling, the Ermyng, and the Pehenild.

Foſſe. The Foſſe goeth not directly, but ſlopewiſe ouer the greateſt part of this Iland, begynnyng at Dotneſſe or Totneſſe in Deuõſhire, where Brute ſometymes landed (or as Ranulphus ſayeth) which is more likely at the point of Cornwall though the eldeſt writers do ſéeme to note the contrary. From hence it goeth thorow the middle of Deuonſhire and Somerſetſhire, and commeth to Briſtow, from whence it runneth manifeſtly to Sudbery market, Tetbury, and ſo forth holdeth on as you go almoſt to ỹ midde way betwene Glouceſter and Cirnceſter (where the wood faileth, and the Champeigne country appeareth toward Cotteſwald) ſtreight as a lyne vntill you come to Cirneceſter it ſelf. Some hold opinion that the way which lyeth from Cirneceſter to Bathe, ſhoulde be the very Foſſe, and that betwixt Cirneceſter & Glouceſter, to be another of the 4. wayes made by the Britons: but auncient report grounded vpon great likelyhode, and confirmed alſo by ſome experience, iudgeth that moſt of the wayes croſſed eche other in this part of the realme, and of this mynd is Leland alſo, who learned it of an Abbote of Cirneceſter that ſhewed great likelyhode in ſome recordes therof: but to proceéde. From Cirneceſter, it goeth by Chepingnorton to Couentrey, Leiceſter, Newarke, and ſo to Lincolne ouerthwart the Watling ſtreate, where by generall conſent of all the writers (except Alfrede of Beuerley, who extendeth it vnto Catheneſſe in Scotland) it is ſayde to haue an ende.

Watling ſtréte. The Watling ſtréte beginneth at Douer in Kent, and ſo ſtretcheth thorow the middeſt of Kent vnto London, and ſo forth (peraduenture by the midſt of ỹ city) vnto Verolamium or Verlameceſter, now S. Albons, where in ỹ yeare of grace 1531 the courſe thereof was found by a mã that digged for grauel wherewith to mende the highway. It was in this place 18. foote brode, and about 10. foote déepe, and ſtoned in the botome as afore, and peraduenture alſo on the toppe, but theſe are gone, and the reſt remayneth equall in moſt places with the fields. The yelow grauell alſo that was brought thether in cartes 2000. yeares paſſed, remayned there ſo freſh and ſo ſtrõg, as if it had bene digged out of ỹ natural place where it grew not many yeares before. Frõ hence it goeth hard by Margate, leauyng it on the weſt ſide, and a little by ſouth of this place, where the Priory ſtode, is a long thorow fare vpon the ſayd ſtréte, métely well builded (for low houſing) on both ſides. After this, it not onely becommeth a bound vnto Leiceſterſhire toward Lugby, but alſo paſſeth from Caſtleford to Stamforde, and ſo forth by the weſt of Marton, which is a myle from Torkeſey.

Here by the waye I muſt touche the opinion of a trauayler of my tyme, who noteth the ſayde ſtreate to go another waye, inſomuch that he would haue it to croſſe the third Auon, betwixt Newton and Dowbridge, & ſo go on to Binford bridge, Wibtoft, the highe croſſe, and thence to Atherſton vpon Ancre. Certes it maye be, that the Foſſe had his courſe by the countrye in ſuch ſort as hée deſcribeth, but that ỹ Watling ſtreat ſhould paſſe by Atherſtõ, I can not as yet be perſuaded. Neuertheleſſe his coniecture is not to be miſliked, ſith it is not vnlikelye that thrée ſeuerall wayes myght méete at Alderwaye (a towne vpon Tame, beneath Salters bridge) for I do not doubt that the ſayd towne, dyd take his name of all thrée wayes, as Aldermary churche in London, did of all thrée Maryes vnto whome it hath béene dedicated, but that the Watling ſtreate ſhoulde be one of them, the compaſſe of his paſſage will in no wiſe permit. And thus much haue I thought good to note by the waye, nowe to returne agayne to Leland, and other mens collections. The next tydings that we here of the Watlyng ſtreate is, that it goeth thorowe the Parke at Pomfret, as the common voyce of the country confirmeth: thẽce it paſſeth hardily ouer Caſtelford bridg, to Aberford, (which is fiue myles from thence, & where are moſt manifeſt manifeſt tokens of thys waye and his broad creſt) to Yorke, to Witherby, & then to Borowbrig, where on the left hand therof ſtod certain monumentes, or Pyramides of ſtone, ſometyme placed there by the Romaines. Theſe ſtones (ſayth Leland) ſtande 8 myles weſt from Bowes, & almoſt weſt from Richmonde a little thorowe fare called mayden caſtel ſcituate vpon the ſide of this ſtreat, and here is one of thoſe Pyramides or great rounde heapes, which is three score foote compaſſe in the bottome. There are other alſo of leſſe quantities, and on the very top of eche of them are ſharp ſtones of a yard in length, but the greateſt of all is eighténe foote hyghe at the leaſt, from the grounde to the verye head. He addeth moreouer howe they ſtande on an hyll: in the edge of Stanes more, and are as boundes betwéne Richmonde ſhyre, and Weſtmerland. But to proceed this ſtreat lying a myle from Gilling, and two myles from Richmonde commeth on from Borowbrigge, to Catericke eighténe myles, that is twelue to Leuing, and fiue to Catericke, then eleuen myles to Gretey, or Gritto, fyue myles to Bottles, eight myles to Burghe on Stanes more, foure myles from Appleby & fiue to Browham, where the ſayde ſtreate commeth thorowe Winſoll parke, and ouer the bridge, on Eymouth and Loder, and leauing Perith, a quarter of a myle or more, on the weſt ſide of it, goeth to Carleil ſeuenténe myles from Browham, which hath béene ſome notable thing. Hetherto it appeareth euidently, but going from hence into Scotlande, I heare no more of it, vntill I come to Cathneſſe, which is two hundred and thirtye myles or thereabouts, out of Englande.

Erming ſtréte. The Erning ſtreate, which ſome call the Lelme, ſtretcheth out of the eaſt, as they ſaye into the ſoutheaſt, ý is, from Menevia or S. Dauids in Wales vnto Southãpton, wherby it is ſomewhat lykely in déede that theſe two wayes, I meane the Foſſe, and the Erning, ſhoulde méete about Cirnceſter, as it commeth from Gloceſter, according to the opinion conceyued of them in that countrye. Of thys way I finde no more written, and therefore I can ſaye no more of it, except I ſhoulde indeuour to dryue awaye the tyme, in alleadging what other men ſaye thereof, whoſe mindes doe ſo farre diſagrée one from another, as they doe all from a truth, and therefore I gyue them ouer, as not delighting in ſuch dealing.

Ikenilde. The Ikenild or Rikenild, begã ſomewhere in the ſouth, and ſo held on toward Cirnceſter, then to Worceſter, Wicomb, Brimmicham, Lichfield, Darby, Chelterfield, and croſſing the Watlingſtréte ſome where in Yorkeſhire, ſtretched forth in the ende vnto ý mouth ý of Tine, where it ended at ý maine ſea, as moſt men doe confeſſe. I take it to be called the Ikenild, becauſe it paſſed thorow the kingdome of the Icenes: for albeit that Lelande and other following him doe ſeme to place the Icenes in Norfolke & Suffolke, yet in myne opinion that cannot wel be done, ſith it is manifeſt by Tacitus, that they laye nere vnto the Sylures, and as I geſſe, eyther in Stafford and Worceſter, or in both, except my coniecture do fayl me. The author of the boke entituled Eulogium hiſtoriarum, doth call this ſtréte the Lelme: but as herein he is deceyued, ſo haue I delt withal ſo faythfully as I may among ſuch diuerſitie of opinions, yet not denying but that there is much confuſion in the names and courſes of theſe two latter, the diſcuſſing whereof, I muſt leaue to other men ý be better lerned then I.

Of the ayre and ſoyle of Britaine. Chap. 13.

The ayre for the moſt part thorowout the Iſland is ſuch, as by reaſon in maner of continuall cloudes, is reputed to be groſſe & nothing ſo pleaſant as that is of the mayne. Howbeit as they which affirme theſe things, haue onely reſpect to the impediment or hinderaunce of the ſunne beames, by the interpoſitiõ of the cloudes & oft ingroſſed ayre: ſo experience teacheth vs that it is no leſſe pure, holſome, and commodious, then is that of other countries, and as Cæſar hymſelfe hereto addeth, much more temperate in ſommer, then that of the Galles, from whome he aduentured hither. Neyther is theyr any thing found in the ayre of our Regiõ, that is not vſually ſéene amongſt other nations lying beyond the ſeas. Wherfore, we muſt nedes cõfeſſe, that the ſituation of our Iſland for benefite of the heauens is nothing inferiour to that of any country of the maine, where ſo euer it lie vnder the open firmament.

The ſoyle of Brytaine is ſuch, as by the teſtimonies and reportes, both of the olde & newe writers, and experience alſo of ſuch as nowe inhabite the ſame, is verye fruitefull, but yet more inclined to the féeding & graſing of the cattell, then profitable for tyllage & bearing of corn, by reaſon wherof the country is wonderfully repleniſhed with Neat, & al kind of cattell: and ſuch ſtore is there alſo of the ſame in euery place, that ý fourth part of the land is ſcarcely manured for the prouiſion and maintenãce of graſſe. Certes, this fruitfulnes was not vnknown vnto the Bri-

tions long before Cæsars time, which was the cause wherefore our predecessors liuyng in those dayes in maner neglected Tillage, and lyued by feedyng and grasing onely. The graziers themselues also then dwelled in moueable villages by companies, whose custom was to deuide the ground amongst them, and eche one not to depart from the place where his lot lay, till by eating vp of the country about him, he was inforced to remoue further and seke for better pasture, and this was the brittish custome at the first. It hath bene cõmonly reported that the ground of Wales is neyther so fruitful as that of England, neither the soyle of Scotland so bountifull as that of Wales, which is true if it be taken for the most part: otherwise, there is so good grounde in some partes of Wales, as is in England, albeit ỹ best of Scotland be scarcely comparable to the best of eyther of both. Howbeit as the bounty of the Scottish doth saple in some respect, so doeth it surmount in other, God and nature hauyng not appointed all countries to yelde forth lyke commodities.

Plenty of riuers.

There are also in this Iland great plenty of fresh riuers & streames, as you haue heard already, and these thorowly fraught wyth all kyndes of delicate fish, accustomed to be found in riuers. The whole Ile likewyse, is very full of hilles, of which some, though not very many, are of exceedyng heigth, and diuers extendyng themselues very farre from the beginnyng as we may se by Shooters hill, which rising east of London, & not very far from the Thames runneth along the south side of the Iland westward, but till it come to Cornwall. Lyke vnto these also are the crowdõ hils, which from the peke do run into the borders of Scotlande. What shoulde I speake of the cheuiot hils which runne. miles in length: of the blache mountains in Wales which go from . . to . . miles at the lest in length, of the Graines in Scotlande, and of our Chiltren, which are 18. myles at the lest, from one end of them to the other, of all which some are very well repleni shed with wood, notwithstandyng that the most part yelde a sweete short grasse, profitable for sheep, wherin albeit that they of Scotland doe somewhat come behynde vs, yet their backward defect is inwardly recompensed not onely with plenty of quarries, (and those of sondry kindes of marble hard stone, and fine alabaster) but also rich mynes of mettal, as shalbe shewed hereafter. In this Iland likewyse the windes are commonly more strong and fierce, then in anye other places of the maine, and that is often seene vpon the naked hilles, which are not garded with trees to beare it of. That grieuous inconuenience also inforceth our Nobility, gentry, and comminaltie, to build their houses in the valeis, leauing the high groundes vnto their corne and catteli, least the cold and stormy blastes of winter should breede the greater anoyance, whereas in other Regions eche one desireth to set his house aloft on the hyll, not onely to be seene a farre of, and cast forth their beames of stately & curious workemanship into euery quarter of the country, but also (in whote habitations) for coldenesse sake of the ayre, sith the heate is neuer so behement on the hill top as in the valey, because the reuerberation of the sunne beame, eyther reacheth not so farre as the highest, or else becometh not so strong, when it is reflected to the lower mountayne.

Building.

But to leaue our Buyldinges, vnto the purposed place (which notwithstanding haue verye muche increased, I meane for curiositye and coste, in Englande, Wales, and Scotland, within these fewe yeares) and to returne to the soyle againe. Certainelye it is euen now in these our dayes growne to be wyche more fruitfull, then it hath bene in times past. The cause is for that our countremen are growne to be more paynefull, skilful and carefull thorowe recompence of gayne, then heretofore they haue bene, insomuch that my Synchroni or time folowes, can reap at thys present great commoditye in a lyttle roume, whereas of late yeares, a great compasse hath yelded but small profite, and thys onely thorowe the pole and negligent occupatiõ of such, as manured and had the same in occupying. I myght sette downe examples out of all the partes of thys Iland, that is to say, manye out of Englande, moe out of Scotlande, but most of all out of Wales, in which two last rehearsed, verye little other foode, and lyuelyhode was wont to be looked for beside flesh, more then the soyle of it selfe, and the cow gaue, the people in ỹ meane tyme lyuing idelly, dissolutely & by picking and stealing one frõ another, all which vices are nowe for the most part relinquished, so that eche nation manureth hir owne with triple commoditie, to that it was before tyme.

Husbãdry amended.

The pasture of thys Iland is according to the nature & situation of the soyle, whereby in most places it is plentifull, verye fine hatable, and such as eyther fatteth our cattel with spede, or yeldeth great abundaunce of mylke and creame, whereof the yelowest butter, and finest cheese are made. But where the blewe claye aboundeth (which hardelye drinketh vppe the winters water in long season) there the grasse is speary, rough, and very

bery apte for bushes, by which occasion, it becommeth nothing so profitable to the owner. The best pasture ground of all Englande, is in Wales, and of all the pasture in Wales, that of Cardigan is the chiefe. I speake of that which is to be founde in the mountaines there, where the hundreth part of the grasse growing is not eaten, but suffered to rotte on the grounde, whereby the soyle becommeth matted, and dyuers Bogges and quicke mores made with all in long continuance, because all the cattle in the countrey are not able to eate it downe.

Meddowes

Our meddowes are either bottomes (whereof we haue great store, and those very large because our soyle is hilly) or else lande meades. The first of them, are yearely and often ouerflowen by the ryning of such streames as passe thorowe the same, or violent falles of lande waters, that dyscende from the hylles about them. The other are seldome or neuer ouerflowen, & that is the cause wherefore their grasse is shorter than that of the bottomes, and yet is it farre more fine, wholsome, and batable, sith the haye of our lowe meddowes is not onely full of sandy cinder, which breedeth sundry diseases in our cattell, but also more rowty, foggy, & full of dagges, and therefore not so profitable, for stouer and forrage as ỳ higher meades be. The differēce furthermore in theyr commodities is great, for whereas in our lande meddowes we haue not often aboue one good loade of haye in an acre of ground, in lowe meaddowes, we haue sometimes three, but commonly aboue two, as experience hath oft conferred.

Corne.

The yelde of our corne grounde, is also much after thys rate following, thorowe out the lande (if you please to make an estimate thereof by the acre) in common and indyfferent yeares, wherin eche acre of Whete well tilled and dressed will yeld commonly twentie bushelles, an acre of Barlie 32. bushels, of Otes and such lyke, fiue quarters, which proportion is notwythstanding oft abated, towarde the north, as it is often surmounted in the south. Of mixed corne, as peason, and beanes, sowē togither, Tares & Otes (which they call bulmong,) Rie and Wheate, here is no place to speake, yet theyr yelde is neuertheless much after this proportiō, as I haue often marked.

Cattell.

The cattel which we breede are commonly such as for greatnesse of bone, sweetenesse of flesh, & other benefits to be reaped by ỳ same, giue place vnto none other, as may appeare first by our Oxen, whose largenesse, height, weight, tallow, hides, and hornes are such, as none of any other nation, do cōmonly or may easily excede them. Our sheepe likewise for good taste of flesshe, quantitie of kymmes, fynesse of fleece, & abundance of increase, (for in many places they bring forth two or three at an eaning) giue no place vnto any, more then do our Goates, who in like sort do follow the same order, and our Deare come not behinde. As for our Conies, I haue seene thē so fat in some soiles, especially about Weal & Dissege that the greace of one being weighed, hath peysed very neare fiue or 7. ounces, all which benefites we first referre to the grace & goodnesse of God, and next of all vnto the bountye of our soyle, which he hath so plentifullye indued with so ample & large cōmodities. But as I meane to intreate of these thinges more largly hereafter, so will I touch in this place one benefite which our country wanteth, and that is wyne, the fault whereof is not in our soyle, but the negligence of our country men (especially of the south parts) who doe not inure the same to this commoditie, which by reason of long discontinuance, is nowe become vnapt to beare any Grapes, eyther in the fielde or seuerall vineyardes: Yet of late time some haue assayed to deale for wine, but sithe that lyquor when it commeth to the drynking hath beene founde more harde then that which is brought from beyonde the sea, and the cost of planting and keping thereof so chargeable, that they maye buye it farre better cheape from other Countries: they haue giuen ouer theyr enterpryses, wythout any consideration, that as in all other thinges, so neither the grounde it selfe in the begynning, nor succesfe of their trauaile can answere their expectation at the first, vntyll such time as the soyle be brought as it were into acquaintance with this commoditie, and that prouision maye bee made, for the more easinesse of charge, to be employed vpon the same. If it be true that where wine doth lasse and indure well, there it will growe no worse. I muse not a little wherefore the planting of vines shoulde be neglected in England. That this liquor might haue growne in this Iland heretofore: first the charter that Probus themperour gaue equally to vs, the Galles and Spaniardes is one sufficient testimony. And that it dyd growe here, the olde notes of tythes for wine, that yet remaine in the accomptes of some Persons and Vycars in Kent, besides the recordes of sundrye sutes, commenced in diuers ecclesiasticall courtes, both in Kent and Surrey: also the inclosed parcelles almost in euery Abbaye, yet called the vyneyardes, maye bee a notable proofe. Wherefore our soyle is not to be blamed, as though our nightes were so exceeding short, that the mone which is Lady of moysture, & chefe ryper of this liquor, cannot in any wise shine long ynough vpō the same, a very merry toy, & fable worthy to be suppressed. The time hath bene that Wad and Madder, haue bene (next vnto our Tin & Welles) the chief commodities & Marchaundize of this realm: I finde also that Rape ople hath bene made within this lande, but nowe our soyle will beare neither of these, not for that the ground is not able so to doe, but that we are negligent and careless of our owne profit, as men rather willing to buye the same of others thē take any paine to plant thē here at home. The like I may say of flare, which by lawe ought to be sowen in euery countrey towne in England, more or lesse, but I see no successe of ỳ good & wholsome statute, sith it is rather contemptously reiected then otherwise dutifully kept. Some say that our great numbers of lawes, whereby it is impossible for any man to auoyde theyr transgression, is one great cause of our negligence in this behalfe. Other affirme that the often alteration of our ordinaunces do breed this general cōtempt of al good lwas, which after Aristotle doth seme to carye some reason withall. But very many let not to saye, that facility in dispensatiō with them, and manifest breche of the same in the superiours, are ỳ greatest causes why the infertours regarde no good order, beyng alwayes ready to offende without any such facultie one way, as they are to presume vpon the example of the higher powers another. But as in these thinges I haue no skyl, so some wishe that fewer licences for the priuate commoditie, but of a fewe, were graunted: & this they say, not that they denie ỳ execution of the prerogatiue royall, but woulde wyth all theyr hearts that it might be made a grieuous offence, for any man by feed frendeshyp or otherwise, to procure oughtes of the Prince, (who is not acquainted wyth the botome of the estate of common things) that may be preiudiciall to the weale publike of his country. If it were requisite that I should speake of the sundry kinds of mowlde, as ỳ cledgy or clay, whereof are sundry sorts, red, blew, black & white: also the red or white sandy, the lomye, roselly, grauelly, chalky or blacke: I could say that there are so many diuers vaines in Brytaine, as else where in any quarter of lyke quantitie in ỳ world. Howbeit this I muste nedes cōfesse that the sandy and cledgy doe beare the greatest sway, but ỳ clay most of all, as hath bene, and yet is alwaies seene and felt thorowe plenty & dearth of corne. For if this latter doe yelde hir full increase, then is there generall plenty, wher-as if it faple then haue we scarcity, according to the olde rude verse, set downe of england, but to be vnderstanded of the whole Ilande, as experience doth confirme.

When the sande doth serue the clay,
Then may we sing well away,
But when the clay doth serue the sand
Then is it mery with England.

I might here intreate also of the famous vales in Englande, of which one is called the Vale of white horse, another of Euesham, noted to be twelue or thirtene miles in compasse, the third of Aylesbyry ỳ goeth by Tame the rote of Chilterne hils, & so to Donstable, Newport panell, Stony Stratford, Buckingham, Birstane parke, &c. And likewise of the fourth of Whithart, or Blackemore, in Dorsetshire, and also the Marshwod vale, but forasmuch as I knowe not well their seuerall limites, I giue ouer to go any farder in their description at this time. In like sort it should not be amysse to speake of our fennes & other pleasant bottomes, which are not onely indued with excellent ryuers & great store of fine fodder, for neat and horses in time of ỳ yere, (whereby they are exceding beneficiall vnto their owners) but also of no small compasse & quantity in ground. For some of our Fennes are well knowen to be eyther 10. 12. 16. 20. or 30 miles in length, that of the Gyrwis yet passing al the reast, which is ful 60. as I haue often read. Finally I might discourse in like order of the large commons, laide out heretofore by the Lordes of the soyles for ỳ benefite of such poore, as inhabite within ỳ compasses of their manours, but as the tractatiō of them belongeth rather to the seconde booke, so I meane not at thys present to deale wythall, reseruing the same wholly vnto the due place whileste I go forwarde with the reast.

Of the generall constitution of the bodyes of the Brytaines. Cap. 14.

THose that are bredde in this Ilande are men for the most part of a good complexion, tall of stature, strong in body, white of coulour, and thereto of great boldenesse and courage in ỳ warres. For such hath bene the estimation of englishe souldiers from time to time, since our Ile hath bene knowne vnto the Romaines, that whersoeuer they haue serued in forrein countries, the chiefe bruntes of seruice haue bene reserued for them. Of their conquestes and bloudy battailes wonne in Fraunce, Germany, and Scotlande, our histories are full: and where they haue bene ouercome, the victors themselues confessed their victories to haue ben so dearely bought, that they woulde not gladly couete to ouer-

come often, after such difficult maner. In martiall prowesse, there is little or no difference betwene Englishmen and Scottes, for albeit that the Scottes haue béne often and very grieuously ouercome by the force of our nation, it hath not béene for want of manhood on their partes, but through ỹ mercy of God shewed on vs, and his iustice vpon them, sith they alwaies haue begun the quarels and offred vs méere iniurie with great despite and crueltie. Leland noting somewhat of the cõstitution of our bodies, sayeth these wordes, the Britaines are whyte in couleur, & strong of body, as people inhabiting néere the north, and farre from the Equinoctiall line, where contrariewyse such as dwell towarde the course of the sunne, are lesse of stature, weaker of body, more fearfull by nature, blacker in couleur, and some so blacke in déede as anye Crow or Rauen, thus sayeth he. Howbeit, as these men doe come behinde vs in constitution of bodie, so in Pregnancie of witte, nimblenesse of lymmes, and politike inuentions, they generally exceede vs: notwithstãding that otherwise these giftes of theirs doe often degenerate, into méere subtiltie, inhabilitie, vnfaithfulnesse and crueltie. We therfore dwelling néere the North, are commonly taken by forrein Hystoriographers and others, to be men of great strength and little policie, much courage and small shift: & thus doth Comineus burden vs after a sort in hys history. But thanked be God, that all the wit of his countrymen coulde neuer compasse to doe so much in Britaine, as the strength and courage of our Englishmen, (not without great wisedome, and forecast) haue brought to passe in Fraunce. Certes in accusing our wisedome in this sorte, he doth in mine opinion increase our commendation, for if it be a vertue to deale vprightly with singlenesse of minde: sincerely and plainly, without any suspicious fetches in all our dealinges, then are our countreymen to be accompted vertuous. But if it be a vice to couloure craftinesse, subtile practises, doublenesse and hollow behauiour, with a cloke of politicie, amitie and wisedome, then are Comineus and his companie to be reputed vicious. How these latter pointes take holde in Italy, I meane not to discusse, how they are daily practised in many places of the maine, and be accompted most wyse and pollitike, that can most of all dissemble, here is no place iustly to determine, (neyther woulde I wishe my countrymen to learne any such wisedome) but that a king of Fraunce, coulde say, Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit regnare, their owne hystories are testimonies sufficient. But to proceede with our purpose. With vs some doe liue an hundred yeares, very many vnto fower score: as for three score, it is taken but for our enterance into age, so that in Britain, no man is sayde to wexe old til he draw vnto three score. These two are also noted in vs (as thinges apparteyning to the firme constitutions of our bodies) that there hath not béene séene in any Region so many carcasses of the dead to remaine from time to time without corruption as in Britain: and that after death by slaughter or otherwyse such as remayne vnburied by foure or fiue dayes togither are easie to be knowen and discerned by their friendes and kinred, wheras Tacitus and other complaine of sundry nations, saying, that their bodies are tam fluidæ substantiæ, that within certaine houres the wife shall hardely knowe hir husbande, the mother hir sonne, or one friende another, after their liues be ended. I might here adde somewhat also of the meane stature generally of our women, whose beautie commonly exceedeth the fairest of those of the maine, their comlynes of person and good proportion of limmes, most of theirs ỹ come ouer vnto vs from beyonde the sea. I coulde make report likewyse of the naturall vices & vertues of all those ỹ are borne within thys Iland, but as the tractation thereof craueth a better head then mine to set it forth, so I will giue place to other men, that list to take the same in hand. Thus much therfore of the constitutions of our bodies, and so much may suffice.

How Britayne grew at the first to be deuided into three portions. Chap. I.

After the commyng of Brutus into this Iland (which was as you haue red in the afore sayd treatize, about the yere of ỹ world 2840 or 1127 before ỹ incarnation of Christ) he made a generall survey of the whole Iland from side to side, by such meanes to view and search out not onely the limites and boundes of his dominions, but also what commodities this new atchieued conquest might yeld vnto hys people. Further more, findyng out at the last also a conuenable place wherein to erect a citie, he began there euen ỹ very same, which at this day is called London, namyng it Trenouanton, in remembraunce of olde Troye, from whence hys auncestors proceeded, & for which the Romaines pronounced afterward Trinobantum, although the Welchmen doe call it still Trenewith. This city was builded as some write, much about the tenth yeare of his raigne, so ỹ he lyued not aboue 15. yeares after after he had finished ẏ same. But of ẏ rest of hys other actes attempted and done, before or after the erection of this city, I finde no certayne report, more then that when he had raigned in this Iland after his arriuall by the space of 24. yeares, he finished his dayes at Trenouanton aforesayde, beyng in hys young and flouryshyng age, where at his carcase was honorably interred. As for the maner of hys death, I finde as yet no mention therof among such writers as are extant. I meane whether it grew vnto him by defect of nature, or force of grieuous woundes receyued in hys warres agaynst such as withstood him from tyme to tyme in this Iland, and therefore I can say nothing of that matter. Herein onely all agree, that duryng the tyme of his languishing paynes, he made a disposition of his whole kyngdome, deuiding it into three partes or portions, according to the nũber of his sonnes then liuing, whereof the eldest exceded not 28. yeres of age, as my conceaue giueth me. To the eldest therefore, whose name was Locrine, he gaue the greatest and best Region of all the rest, whiche of hym to this day is called Lhoegres among the Britons, but in our language Englande, of such English Saxons as made conquest of the same. This portiõ also is included on the south with the Brittish sea, on the east with the Germaine Ocean, on the north with the Humber, and on the west with the Irish sea, and the riuers Dée and Sauerne, wherof in the general description of this Iland, I haue spoken more at large. To Camber his secõd sonne, he assigned all that lyeth beyonde the Sauerne and Dée towarde the west, (whiche parcel in these dayes conteineth Southwales and Northwales) with sondry Ilandes adiacent to the same, the whole beyng in maner cut of and seperated from England or Loegria by the said streames, wherby it seemeth almost Pemusula, or a bye land, if you respect the small hilly portion of ground that lyeth indifferently betwene their maine courses or such branches at the least as run and fall into them. The Welchmen or Brytons call it by the auncient name still vnto this day, but we Englishmen terme it Wales, which denomination we haue from the Saxons, who in time past did vse the word Walshe in such sort as we do straunge: for as we cal all those straungers that are not of our nation, so dyd they name them Walshe which were not of their countrey. The third and last part of the Iland he allotted vnto Albanacte hys youngest sonne (for he had but three in all, as I haue sayd before) whose portion seemed for circuite to be more large, then that of Camber, and in maner equall in greatnesse wyth the dominions of Locrinus: But if you haue regard to the seuerall commodities that are to be reaped by eche, you shal find them to be not much discrepaunt or differing one from another: for what so euer the first and second haue in plenty of corne, fine grasse, and large cattell. This latter wanteth not in exceedyng store of fishe, rich mettall, quarries of stone, and aboundaunce of wylde foule: so that in myne opinion, there coulde not be a more equall particion then this made by Brute, and after the aforesayd maner. This later parcel at the first, toke the name of Albanactus, who called it Albania. But now a small portion onely of the Region (beyng vnder the regiment of a Duke) reteyneth the sayd denomination, the rest beyng called Scotlande, of certayne Scottes that came ouer from Ireland to inhabite in those quarters. It is deuided from Loegres also by the Humber, so that Albania as Brute left it, conteyned all the north part of the Iland that is to be fõud beyond the aforesayd streame, vnto the point of Catheneisse. To conclude, Brute hauyng deuided hys kingdome after this maner, and therin contenyng himselfe as it were wyth the general title of the whole, it was not lõg after ere he ended his life, and being solemnly interred at his new city by his three children, they parted eche from other, and toke possession of their prouinces. But Scotland after two yeres fell agayn into the handes of Locrinus as to the chiefe Lord, by the death of his brother Albanact, who was slayne by Humber kyng of the Scithiẽs, and left none issue behynde hym to succede hym in that kyngdome.

Locrine. Loegria. Camber. Cambria. Albanact. Albania. Locrine king also of Scotland.

That notwithstanding the former diuision made by Brute vnto his children, the souereigntie of the whole Iland remained still to the prince of Lhoegres and his posteritie after him. Chap. xvj.

IT is possible that some of the Scottish nation reading the former chapter will take offence with me for meaning ẏ the principalitie of the North partes of this Ile, hath alwayes belonged to the kinges of Lhoegres. For whose more ample satisfaction in this behalfe, I will here set downe therfore a discourse therof at large, written by diuers, and nowe finally brought into one Treatise, sufficient as I thinke to satisfie the reasonable, although not halfe ynough peraduenture to content a wrangling minde, sith there is or at the least wyse hath bene nothing more odious amõg some, then to heare that the king of

The Scottes alwayes desirous to shake of the english subiection, haue often made cruell and odious attemptes so to do, but in vayne, of England hath oughtes to doe in Scotland. How their Hystoriographers haue attempted to shape a couloured excuse to auoyde so manifest a tytle, all men maye se that reade their bookes indifferently, whereunto I doe referre them. For my part there is little or nothing of myne herein, more then onely the collection of a number of fragmentes together, wherein chiefly I haue vsed the helpe of Nicholas Adams, who wrate thereof of set purpose to king Edward the first, as Leland dyd the lyke to king Henry the eyght, Iohn Harding vnto Edwarde the fourth, beside three other, whereof the first dedicated hys Treatise to Henry the fourth, the seconde to Edwarde the thirde, and the third to Edwarde the first, as their writinges yet extant doe abundantly beare witnesse. The tytle also that Leland giueth his booke, which I haue had written with his owne hands, beginneth in this maner. These remembraunces follo" wing are found in Chronicles authorized re" maining in diuers monasteries both in Eng-

" lande and Scotlande, by which it is euident-
" ly knowen & shewed, that the kinges of Eng-

Ebranke the lineall heire from the bodie of this Locrine, that is to say the sonne of Membris, sonne of Madan, sonne of the same Locrine, buylded in Albania the castle of Maydens nowe called Edenbrough: and the Castle of Alcluith or Alclude, now called Dumbriton, as the Scottish Hector Boethius confesseth: whereby it most euidently appeareth that our Ebranke was then thereof seased.

This Ebranke reigned in the saide state ouer the a long time, after whose death Albania as annexed to the empire of the Britaine, descended to the onely king of Britons, vntill the discent to the two sisters sonnes, Mozgan and Conedage, lineall heires from the sayne Ebranke, who brotherly vpō the first example deuided y realme. Mozgā had Lhoegres, and Conedage had Albania: but shortly after Mozgan the elder brother powering in hys hed, the loue to his brother with the loue to a kingdome, excluded nature & gaue place to ambition, and therupō denouncing warre, death miserably ended hys life (as the reward of his vntruth) whereby Conedage obtayned the whole Empire of all Britaine, in which state he remayned during his naturall lyfe.

From him the same lineally descended to the onelye king of Britons, vntill after the reigne of Cozbodian, who had issue two sons, Ferres, and Pozres: This Pozres requyring lyke diuision of the lande, affirming the former partitions to be rather of fauour then fauour, was by the handes of his elder brother, both of his lyfe and hoped kingdome bereued at once: whereupon their vnnaturall mother vsing hir natural malice, for the death of hir one sonne, without regard of the losing of both, miserably slew the other.

Cloten by all writers aswell Scottishe as other, was the next inheritour to the whole Empire, but lacking power (the only meane in those dayes to obtayne right) he was contented to deuide the same among three of his kinsmen, so that Scater had Albania. But after the death this Cloten his sonne Dunuallo Mulmutius made warre vpon these three kinges, and at last ouercame them, and so recouered the whole dominion, in token of which victorie, he caused himselfe to be crowned with a crowne of gold, the very first that was wrone among the kinges of this nation. This Dunuallo erected temples, wherein the people shoulde assemble for prayer, to which temples he gaue benefite of Sanctuarie: he made the lawe for wager of battaile, in cases of murder and felonie, whereby a theefe that lyued and made his art of fighting, shoulde for his purgation fight with the true man, which he had robbed: but he beleeued that the Goddes (for then they supposed many) would by myracle assigne victorie to the innocent partie. The priuileges of which first lawe & benefite of the latter, aswell in Scotlande as in Englande, be enioyed to this day few causes by late positiue lawes among vs receyued, wherein the benefite of wager of battaile is expelled; by which obedience to hys lawes, it doth manifestly appeare, that thys Dunuallo was then seased of Albania nowe called Scotland: This Dunuallo reigned in thys estate ouer them many yeares. Beline & Brenne the sonnes of this Dunuallo, dyd after theyr fathers death, fauourably deuide the land betweene them: so that Beline had Logres, and Brenne had Albania: but for that this Brenne (a subiect) without the consent of his elder brother and Lord, aduentured to marry with the daughter of the king of Denmarke: Beline seased Albania into his owne handes, and thereuppon caused the notable wayes priuileged by Dunuallons Lawes to be newly wrought by mens handes, which for the length was from the farder part of Cornewall, vnto the the sea by North Cathnes in Scotland: & for religion in those daies, he constituted ministers called Archeflamines in their functions most like the authoritie of Bishoppes at this daye, the one of which remained at Ebranac now called Yorke, and whose power extended to ỹ vttermost bondes of Albany, wherby lykewyse appeareth that it was then within his dominion. After his death the whole Ile was enioyed by the onlye kings of Britaine, vntill the tyme of Vigenius and Peryderus (meall heires from the sayde Belyne who fauourably made partition, so that Vigenius had all the land from Humber south, and Peryderus from thence North all Albania. This Vigenius died, and Peryderus survived, and thereby obtayned the whole, from whome the same quietly discended, and was by his posteritie accordingly enioyed, vnto the reigne of king Coell, of that name the first. In hys tyme an obscure nation by most writers supposed Scythians, passed by seas from Irelande, and arrived in that part of Britaine called Albania: against whome this Coell assembled his power, and being entred Albania to expell the, one Fergus in the night disguised, entered the tent of this Coell, and in his bed traiterously slew him. This Fergus was therefore in reward of such vertue made there King, whereupon they sat downe in that part, with their wiues and children, and called it Scotlande, and themselues Scottes: from the beginning of the worlde, foure thousande and fiue hundred and seuentéene yeares, which by iust computation and confession of all their owne writers, is fiue hundred yeares lacking tenne, after that Brutus had reigned ouer ỹ whole Iland, the same land being enioyed by him and his posteritie before their comming, during two and fiftie discentes of the kinges of Britaine. Certes this intrusion into a land so many hundred yeares before inhabited, and by so many discets of kings quietly enioyed, is the best tytle that all their owne writers alledge for them. This Fergus hereupō immediately did deuyde Albania also amōg his Capitaines and their people: whereby it most euidently appeareth that there were no people of that nation inhabiting there before, in proofe wherof, the same partition shall followe.

After the Scottishe accompt.

The landes of Cathnes lying against Orknay, betweene Dummesbey and the Water of Thane, was giuen vnto one Cornath, a capitaine and his people. The landes betweene the Water of Thane and Nes, nowe called Rosse, lying in breath from Cromart to the mouth of the water of Lochte, were giuen to Lutorke, another Capitaine and his people. The landes betweene Spay and Nes, from the Almaine seas to the Ireland Seas, now called Murray land, were giuē to one Marroche and his people. The lande of Thalia now called Boyn Ayrze, Bogewall, Gariot, Formartine, and Bowgahan, were giuen to one Thalis and his people. The landes of Mar Badezenoche, & Lochquhaber, were giuen to Martache and his people. The lands of Lorne and Kintier, with the hilles & mountaynes thereof, lying from Mar to the Irelande seas, were giuen to Capitaine Monaunce and his people. The landes of Athole were giuen to Atholus, another capitaine & his people. The landes of Strabzaun, and Brawdawane lying West from Dunkell, were giuen to Crcones and Epidithes two Capitaynes. The landes of Argile, were giuen to Argathelus a Capitaine. The landes of Linnor & Clidsdale, were allotted to Lolgona a captaine. The landes of Siluria now called Kile, Carrike and Cumyngham, were giuen to Sdurche another Capitaine. The landes of Brigance nowe called Gallowale, were giuen to the compaignie called Brigandes, which as their best menne, were appointed to dwell next the Britons, who afterwarde expulsed the Britons from Annandale in Albany, whereby it is confessed to be before inhabited by Britons. The residue of the lande now called Scotland, that is to say: Meirnis, Angus, Steremōde, Gowry, Strahern, Pirth, Fiffe, Striueling, Callender, Calderwode, Lougthian, Mers, Tenedale, with other the rement Dales, and the Sheriffoome, of Berwicke were then enioyed by a nacion mingled in marriage wyth Britons, and in their obedience whose capitaine called Berynger, buylded the castle & towne of Berwicke vpon Twede, and these people were called Picts, vppon whome by the death of this Coell, these Scottes had oportunitie tunitie to vse warre, wherof they ceased not, vntill such time as it pleased God to appoint an other Coil king of Britõs, agaynst whose name, albeit they hoped for a like victory to ỹ first, yet he preuayled and ceased not his war, vntill these Scottes were vtterly expulsed out of all the bounds of Britayne, in which they neuer dared to reenter, vntill the troublesome raigne of Sicill kyng of Britones, which was the xij. king after this Coil. During all which tyme the countrey was reenhabited by the Britons. But then the Scots turning the ciuill discord of this realme, betweene this Sycill and his brother Blede to their best auauntage, arriued agayne in Albania, & there made one Reuther their king.

Upon this their new arriuall, new warre was made vpon them by this Sicill kyng of Britons, in which warre Reuther their new kyng dyed, and Thereus succeeded agaynst whom the warre of Britones ceased not, vntill he freely submitted himselfe vnto the said Sicill king of Britones at Ebzanke, that is Yorke, where shortly after the tenth yeare of his raigne he dyed. Fynnane brother of Josine succeded by their election to the kingdom of Scottes, who shortly after compelled by the warres of the same Sicill, declared hymselfe subiect, and for the better assuraunce of his fayth and obeisaunce to the kyng of Britons, deliuered his sonne Durstus into the handes of this Sicill: who fantesiyng ỹ child and hopyng by his owne succession to atter their subtiltie (I will not say duplicitie) maried hym in the ende to Agasia hys owne daughter.

This Durstus was their next kyng, but for that he had maried a Britten woman, (thoughe she was a kynges daughter) the scots hated hym for the same cause, for which they ought rather to haue liked hym the better, and therfore not onely traiterously slewe hym: but further to declare the ende of theyr malice, disheryted as much as in them was, the issues of the same Durstus and Agasia. Wherupon new warre sprong betweene them and vs, which ceased not vntill they were contented to receyue Edeir to theyr kyng, the next in bloude then liuyng, discended from Durstus and Agasia, and thereby the bloud of Britons of the parte of the mother was restored to the crowne of Albania; so that nature whose lawe is immutable, caused this band of loue to hold. For shortly after this Edeir attended vpon Cassibelane king of Britons, for the repulse of Iulius Cæsar, as their owne author Boetius confesseth. Who cõmaũded the same as his subiect, but Iulius Cæsar after his third arriual by treason of Androgeus, preuayled against the Britons: and thereupon pursued this Eder into scotland, and as hymselfe sayth in his Commentaries, subdued all the Isle of Britayne: which, thoughe the liuyng Scottes denye it, their dead writers confesse that he came beyond Callender wode, and cast downe Camelon, the principall city of Pichtes, and in token of this victory not farre from Carron, builded a round Temple of stone, which remayned in some perfection vnto the raign of our king Edwarde called the first after the Conquest, by whome it was subuerted, but the monumẽt therof remayneth to thys day.

Marius the son of Arutragus, being king of all Britaine, in his tyme one Rodericke a Scythian, with a great rable of needy souldiours, came to the water of Frithe in Scotland, which is an arme of the sea, deuidyng Pentland from Fiffe, against whome thys Marius assembled a power, by whiche he slew this Rodericke, and discomfited his people in Westmerland: but to those that remained in lyfe, he gaue the countrey of Cathenes in Scotlande, which prouyth it to be within hys owne dominion.

Coill the sonne of this Marius, had issue Lucius, counted the first christiã king of this nacion: he conuerted the thre Archflamines of this land into Bishoprikes, and ordeyned bishops vnto eche of them: the first remained at London, and his power extended from the farthest part of Cornewall, to Humber water, the second remayned at Yorke, and hys power stretched from Humber to ỹ farthest part of all Scotland. The third remayned at Caerleõ vpõ the riuer of Wiske in Glamorgan in Wales, and his power extended frõ Seuerne thorough all Wales. Some write that he made but two, & turned their names to Archbishops, the one to remayne at Canterbury, the other at Yorke: yet they confesse that he of Yorke had iurisdiction through all Scotland, eyther of which is sufficient to proue scotlãd to be then vnder his dominion.

Seuerus by birth a Romaine, but in bloud a Briton, and the lineall heire of the body of Androgius, son of Lud, and Nephwe of Cassibelaine, was shortly after Emperour and king of Britons, in whose tyme the people to whom his auncester Marius gaue the land of Cathenes in Scotland, conspired with the Scottes and receyued them from the Iles into Scotland. But hereupon this Seuerus came into Scotland, and méeting with their fayth and false hartes together, droue them all out of the mayne lande into Iles, the vttermost bondes of all great Britayne. But notwithstanding this glorious victory, the Britons considering their seruitude to the Romaines, imposed by treason of Androgeus, auncestor to this Seuerus began to hate hym, whome yet they had no tyme to loue, & who in their defence and suretie, had slayne of the Scottes and their confederates in one battaile xxx. thousandes: but such was the cõsideration of the common sort in those dayes, whose malice no tyme could diminishe, nor iust desert appease.

Antoninus Bassianus born of a Britõ womã, and Geta borne by a Romayn woman, were the sonnes of this Seuerus, who after the death of their father, by the contrary voyces of their people, contended for the crown. Few Britones helde with Bassianus, fewer Romaynes with Geta: but the greater number with neither of both. In the ende Geta was slayne, and Bassianus remayned Emperor, against whom Carausius rebelled, who gaue vnto the Scottes, Pichtes, and Scithians, the countrey of Cathenes in Scotland, which they after inhabited, wherby appeareth hys seison therof.

Coill discended of the bloude of auncient kinges of this land, was shortly after kyng of the Britons, whose onely daughter & heire called Helene, was maried vnto Constantius a Romaine, who daunted the rebellion of all partes of great Britayne, and after the death of this Coil, was in ỹ right of his wife kyng thereof, and raigned in his state ouer them 13. or 14. yeares.

Constantine the sonne of thys Constance, and Helen, was next King of Britons by the ryght of hys mother, who passing to Rome, to receyue the Empyre thereof, deputed one Octauius king of wales, & Duke of the Gwilses, (which some expounde to be afterwarde called west Saxons) to haue the gouernemẽt of thys dominion. But abusing the kinges innocent goodnesse, thys Octauius defrauded thys trust, and toke vppon himselfe the Crowne, for which traytorye albeit he was once vanquished by Leonine Traheron, vncle to Constantine: yet after the death of thys Traheron, he preuayled agayne and reigned ouer all Britteygne. Constantine beyng nowe Emperour, sent to Maximus his kinseman hether to destroy the same Octauius, whom in singular battail discomfited Octauius, whereupon thys Maximus, aswel by the consent of great Constãtine, as by the election of all the Brytons, for that he was a Bryton in bloude, was made King of Brytteigne. This Maximus made war vpon the Scottes and Scythians wythin al Brytteygne, and ceassed not vntill he had slayne Eugenius theyr King, & expulsed and dryuen them out of the whole bounds of Britteygne. Finally he inhabited al Scotland with Britons, no man, woman nor child of the Scottish natiõ, suffred to remain within it, which as theyr Hector Boecius saith, was for theyr rebellion, & rebelliõ properly could it not be, except they had bene subiectes. He suffered the Pichtes also to remaine his subiects, who made solemne othes to hym after, neuer to erect any peculiar King of theyr owne natiõ, but to remaine vnder the olde Empyre, of the onely kyng of Brytons.

About xlv. yeres after this (beyng long time after the death of this Maximus) wyth the helpe of Gouuan or Gonan and Pelga, the Scottes newly arriued in Albania, and there created one Fergus the second of that name to be their kyng. But because they were before banished the continent land, they crowned him kyng of their auenture in Argile, in the fatall chaire of Marble, the yeare of our Lord, CCCC. xxv. as they write.

Maximian sonne of Leonine Traheron, brother to kyng Coil, and vncle to Helene, was by lineall succession next kyng of Britons: But to appease ỹ malice of Dionothus king of Wales, who also claimed ỹ kingdõ, he maried Othilia eldest daughter of Dionothus, and afterward assembled a great power of Britons, and entered Albania, inuading Galloway, Mers, Annandale, Pentlande, Carrike, Kyll, and Cuningham, and in battaile slew both this Fergus then kyng of Scottes, and Durstus the king of Pichtes, & exiled all their people, out of the continent land: wherupon the few number of Scottes then remaynyng on liue, went to Argila, and made Eugenius their kyng.

When this Maximian had thus obteyned quietnes in Britain, he departed wõ hys cosin Conã Meridocke into Armorica, where they subdued the kyng, and depopulated the countrey, which he gaue to Conan his cosin, to be afterward inhabited by Britons, by the name of Britayne the lesse: and hereof this realme toke name of Britayne the greate, which name by consent of forreine writers, it kepeth vnto this day.

After the death of Maximian, dissention beyng betwene the nobles of great Britayne, the Scottes swarmed together again, and came to the wall of Adrian, where thys realme being deuided in many factions, they ouercame one. And hereupon their Hector Boetius, (as an henne that for laying of one egge, will make a great cakelyng) solemnly triumphing of a conquest before the victory, alleageth that herebye the Britons were made tributaries to the Scottes, and yet he conconfeſſeth that they wonne no more land, by that ſuppoſed conqueſt, but the ſame portion betwene them and Humber, which in the old partitions before, was annexed to Albania. It is hard to be beleued, that ſuch a broken nacion as the Scottes at that tyme were returning from baniſhment within foure yeres before, and ſince in battaile loſing both theyr kinges, and the great number of theyr beſt men, to be thus able to make a conqueſt of great Britayne, & very vnlikely if they had cõquered it, they woulde haue left the whote ſunne of the Eaſt partes, to dwell in the cold ſnow of Scotlãd. Incredible it is, that if they had cõquered it, they would not haue deputed officers in it, as in caſes of conqueſt behoueth. And it is beyonde all beliefe, that great Britayne or any other countrey, ſhoulde be won without the comming of any enimy into it, as they did not, but taried at the ſame wall of Adrian. But what nede I ſpeake of theſe defences, when the ſame Boetius ſcantly truſteth his owne beliefe in this tale. For he ſayeth that Galfride and ſundry other autentike writers, diuerſlye vary frõ this part of his ſtory, wherein his owne thought accuſeth his conſcience of vntruth: Herein alſo, he further forgetting how it behoueth a lyer to be myndefull of his aſſertion in the fourth chapiter next following, wholly bewrayeth hymſelfe, ſaying that the confederate kinges of Scottes and Pictes, vpon ciuill warres betwene the Britons which then was folowyng, hoped ſhortly to enioy all the lande of great Britayne, from beyond Humber vnto the freſh ſea, which hope had bene vayne, and not leſſe then voyde, if it had bene their owne by any conqueſt before.

Conſtantine of little Britayne, deſcended from Conan king thereof, coſine of Vrſules bloud to thys Maximian, & his neareſt heyre was next king of Britayne, he immediately purſued the Scots with warres, & ſhortly in battaile ſlue their kyng Dongard, in the firſt yeare of his raygne, whereby he recouered Scotlande out of their handes, and toke all the holdes thereof into hys owne cuſtody.

Voretiger ſhortly after obteined the crowne of Britayne, againſt whome the Scottes newly rebelled: for ỹ repreſſing wherof (miſtruſting the Britons, to hate hym for ſundry cauſes, as one that to auoyd the ſmoke, doth oft fall into ỹ fire) receyued Hengeſt a Saxõ, and a greate number of his coũtrimen, with whom & a few Britons, he entered Scotland and ouercame them, whereupon they toke the Iſles, which are theyr common refuge. He gaue alſo much of Scotlande, as Galloway, Pentland, Mers and Annandale, with ſundry other landes to thys Hengeſt and his people to inhabite, which they did accordingly. But when thys Hengeſt in proceſſe of tyme, thirſted after the whole Kingdome, he was baniſhed, and yet afterwarde beyng reſtored, he conſpired with the Scottes againſt Aurilambroſe the ſonne of Conſtantine, the iuſt inheritour of this whole dominion. But his vntruth and theirs both were recompenſed togither, for hée was taken priſoner by Eloulph de Samor a noble man of Britayne, and his heade for his traitory, ſtriken of at the cõmandement of Aurilambros. In the fielde the Scottes were vanquiſhed: but Octa the ſonne of Hengeſt was receiued to mercye, to whome and his people this Aurilambroſe gaue the countrye of Galloway in Scotlande, for which they became his Subiectes: And hereby appeareth that Scotland was then againe in his handes.

Some thinke the Seymors to come from this man by lineal diſcẽt.

Uter called alſo Pendragon, brother to Aurilambros was next king of ỹ Britons, agaynſt whome, theſe ſworne Saxons newe forſworne ſubiectes (confederate wyth the Scottes) newely rebelled: but by his power aſſembled againſt thẽ in Galloway in Scotlande, they were diſcomfited, and Albania againe recouered into his handes.

Arthur the ſonne of this Uter begotten before the marriage, but lawfully borne, in matrimony ſucceded next to ỹ crowne of great Britayne, whoſe noble actes, though manye vulgare fables haue rather feigned, then commended: yet al the ſcottiſh writers confeſſe, that he ſubdued great Britayne, & made it tributary to him, & ouercame the Saxons then ſcattered as farre as Cathenes in Scotland: and in all theſe warres againſt them, he had the ſeruice and obeyſance of ſcottes and Pictes. But at the laſt ſettyng their fete in the guilfull paths of their predeceſſours, they rebelled, & beſieged the city of Yorke, Howel king of the leſſe Britayne, coſin to king Arthur, being therin. But he with an hoſte came thither and diſcomfited the Scottes, chaſed them into a marſhe, and beſieged them there ſo lõg, that they were almoſt famiſhed: vntyll the biſhoppes, Abbotes, and men of religion (for as much as they were chriſtened people) beſought hym to take thẽ to his mercy and grace, and to graunt them a portion of the ſame countrey to dwell in vnder euerlaſting ſubiection. Vppon this he toke them to hys grace, homage and fealtie: and when they were ſworne hys ſubiectes and liegemẽ: he ordeyned his kinſmã Anguiſan to be their king & gouernor, Urian king of Iſlãd, & Murefrẽce king of Orkney. He made an Archbiſhoppe of Yorke alſo, whoſe authoritie extended through all Scotland.

Finally, the said kyng Arthur holding his royall feast at Cairleon, had there all ỹ kings that were subiectes vnto hym, among the which, Angusian the sayd king of Scots did his due seruice for the realme of Scotlande, and bare kyng Arthurs swoorde afore hym.

Malgo shortly after succéded in the whole kingdō of great Britaine, who vpon new resistaunce, newly subdued Ireland, Iſlande, the Orchads, Norway & Denmarke, & made Ethelfrede a Saron king of Bernicia, that is, Northumberland, Louthian, and much other land of Scotland, which Ethelfrede by the swoord obteyned at the handes of the wilfull inhabitantes, and continued true subiect to this Malgo.

Cadwan succéded in the kingdom of great Britayne, who in defence of his subiectes the scottes, made warre vppon this Ethelfrede, but at the last they agréed, and Cadwan vpō their rebellion gaue all Scotland vnto this Ethelfrede, which he therupon subdued and enioyed: but afterward in the raigne of Cadwallo that next succéded in great Britaine, he rebelled, whereupon the same Cadwallo came into Scotland, and vpon his treason reseized the country into his owne handes, and hauyng with hym all the Viceroyes of Saxōs which then inhabited here as hys subiectes, in singuler battaile slew the same Ethelfrede.

Oswald was shortly after by Cadwallōs gift made kyng of Bernicia, and he as subiect to Cadwallo, and by his commaundemēt discomfited the Scottes and Pictes, and subdued all Scotland. Oswy the brother of thys Oswald, was by the lyke gift of Cadwallo, made next kyng of Bernicia, and he by lyke commaundement newely subdued the scots and Pictes, and held them in that obeysaunce to this Cadwallo, during xxviij. yeres. Thus Cadwallo reigned in the whole monarchy of great Britayne, hauing all the vij. kynges therof, as well Saxōs as others his subiects: for albeit the number of Sarons from tyme to tyme greatly increased, yet were they alwayes either at the first expelled, or els made tributary to the onely kinges of Britons for the tyme being, as all their owne writers confesse.

Cadwallader was next kyng of the whole great Britayne, he raigned xij. yeres ouer al the kinges thereof, in great peace and tranquillitie: & then vpon the lamentable death of hys subiectes, which dyed of sundry diseases innumerably, he departed into litle Britaine. His sonne and cosin Iuor and Iue, being expulsed out of england also by the Saxones, went into Wales, where among the Britōs they and their posteritie remayned Princes. Vpon this great alteracion, & warres being through the whole dominion betwene Britons and Sarons, the Scottes thought tyme to slip the coller of obedience, and thereupon entred in league with Charles then kyng of Fraunce establishing it, in this wyse.

1. The iniury of Englishmen done to any of these people, shall be perpetually holden common to both.

2. When Frenchmen be inuaded by Englishmen, the Scottes shall send their army in defence of Fraunce, so that they be supported with mony and victuals of Fraunce.

3. When Scottes be inuaded by Englishmen, the Frenchmen shall come vpon their owne expences, to their support.

4. None of these people shall take peace or truce with Englishmen, without the aduise of other. &c.

Many disputable opinions may be had of warre, without the praysing of it, as onely admittible by inforced necessitie, and to bée vsed for peace sake onely, where here ỹ Scots sought warre for the loue of warre only. For their league giueth no benefite to thēselues, either in frée trafique of their owne commodities, or benefite of the French, or other priuiledge to the people of both: what discōmoditie riseth by losing the entercourse and exchāge of our cōmodities (being in necessaries more aboundant then Fraunce,) ỹ scots féele and we perfectly know. What ruine of their townes, destruction of countries, slaughter of both peoples, haue by reason of this bloudy league chaunced, the histories be lamentable to reade, & horrible among christian men to be remembred: but God gaue the increase accordyng to their séede, for as they did here by sowe dissention, so did they shortly after reape a bloudy slaughter. For Alpine their kyng possessing a light mynde that would be lost with a little wynde, hoped by this league shortly to subdue all great Britayne, and to that ende not onely rebelled in his own kingdome, but also vsurped vpon the kingdome of Pictes, wherupon Edwine king of england, made one Brudeus king of Pictes, whom he sent into Scotlād with a great power, where in battail he toke this Alpine king of Scots prisoner, and discomfited his people: and this Alpine beyng their king found subiect and rebell, his hed was strike of at a place in Scotland, which thereof is to this day called Pasalpine, that is to say, the hed of Alpine. And this was the first effecte of their Frenche league.

Nicholas Adams.

Osbright king of england, with Ella hys

subiect,

subiect, and a great number of Britons and Saxons shortly after, for that the Scots had of thẽselues elected a new king, entred Scotland, and ceased not his warre against them, vntil their king and people fled into the Iles, with whom at the last vpon their submission, peace was made in this wyse.

" The water of Frith shalbe March betwene
" Scots and englishmẽ in the east partes, and " shalbe named the scottish sea.
" The water of Clude to Dunbriton, shal be
" March in the west partes betwene the Scots
" and Britones. This castle was before called " Alcluide and now Dunbriton, that is to say,
" the castle of Britons. So the Britons had all the landes frõ Sterlyng to the Ireland seas, and from the water of Frithe and Clude, to Cumber, with all ỹ strengthes and commodities therof, and the englishmen had ỹ lands betwẽne Sterlyng and Northumberlande. Thus was Clude March, betwene scots and Britones on the one side, and the water of Frithe named the Scottish sea, Marche betwene them and englishmẽ on the other side, and Sterlyng common March to thẽ people, Britons, Englishmen, and Scottes, and king Osbright had the Castle of Sterlyng, where first he caused to be coyned Sterlyng mony. The Englishmẽ also builded a bridge of stone, for passage ouer the water of Frith, in the middes wherof they made a crosse, vnder which were written these verses.

I am free March, as passengers may ken,
To Scottes, to Britons, and to Englishmen.

Not many yeres after this, Hinguar & Hubba, two Danes, with a great number of people, arriued in Scotland, and slew Constantine, whom Osbright had before made kyng: whereupon Edulfe or Ethelwulfe then kyng of englãd, assembled his power against Hinguar and Hubba, & in one battaile slue them both, but such of their people as would remayne and become christians, he suffered to tary, the rest he banished or put to death. &c.

To Rome. This Ethelwulf graunted the Peter pẽce, of which albeit Peter and Paule had little nẽede and lesse right: yet the payment therof continued in this realm euer after vntil now of late yeres, but the Scottes euer since vnto this day, haue, and yet do pay it, by reason of that graunt, which proueth them to be then vnder his obeysaunce.

Alurede or Alfrede succeeded in the kyngdome of England, and reigned nobly euer the whole monarchie of great Britayne: he made lawes, that persons excommunicated should be disabled to sue or clayme any properties, which law Gregour whom this Alurede had made king of Scottes obeyed, and the same law as well in Scotland as in England is holden to this day, which also prouideth hym to be high lord of Scotland.

Thys Alurede constreyned Gregour king of Scots also, to breake the league with Fraunce, for generally he concluded wyth hym, and serued hym in all his warres, as well agaynst Danes as others, not reseruing or making any exceptiõ of the former league with Fraunce.

The sayd Alurede, after the death of Gregour, had the lyke seruice and obeysaunce of Donald king of Scottes wyth fiue thousand horsemen, against one Gurmonde a Dane that then infested the realme, and this Donald dyed in this faith and obeisaunce wyth Alurede.

Edward the first of that name called Chifod sonne of this Alurede succeeded next kyng of englãd, against whom Sithryc a Dane & the Scottes conspired: but they were subdued, and Constantine their kyng brought to obeisance. He held the realme of scotland also of kyng Edwarde, and thys doth Marian their owne country man a Scotte confesse: beside Roger Houeden, & Willia of Malmesbury.

In the yere of our Lord 923. the same king Edward was President and gouernor of all the people of England, Cumberland, Scots, Danes and Britones.

King Athelstane in like sort cõquered scotland, and as he lay in his tentes beside Yorke whylest the warres lasted, the king of Scots fayned hymselfe to be a minstrel, and harped before him onely to espy his ordinaunce & his people. But beyng as their writers confesse, corrupted with money, he sold his fayth & false hart together to the Danes, and ayded them against king Athelstane at sondry times. Howbeit he met wãll their vntruthes at Brooningfield in the west countrey, as is mentioned in the 9. chapter of the first booke of thys description, where he discomfited the Danes, and slew Malcolme deputie in that behalfe to the king of Scottes: in which battaile, the Scottes confesse themselues to haue lost more people then were remembred in any age before. Then Athelstane following hys good lucke, went throughout all scotland and wholy subdued it, and being in possession therof, gaue land there lying in Annãdale by his dẽede, the copy wherof doth followe.

I kyng Athelstane, giues vnto Paulan, Oddam and Roddam, als good and als faire, as euer they mine were, and therto witnes Mauld my wyfe.

By which course wordes, not onely appeareth ỹ plaine simplicitie of mens doinges in those dayes: but also a ful proofe that he was then ſeyzed of Scotlande.

At the laſt alſo he receyued homage of Malcolme king of Scottes, but foz that he coulde not be reſtozed to his whole kingdome, he entered into Religion, and there ſhoztely after dyed.

Then Athelſtane foz his better aſſuraunce of that countrey there after, thought it beſt to haue two ſtringes to the bowe of their obedience, and therefore not onelye conſtituted one Malcolme to be their king, but alſo appointed one Indulph, ſonne of Conſtantine the thirde, to be called prince of Scotlande, to whome he gaue much of Scotlande: and foz this, Malcolme dio homage to Athelſtane.

Edmund brother of Athelſtane ſucceded nert king of Englande to whome this Indulph then kyng of Scottes not only dyd homage, but alſo ſerued him wyth ten thouſand Scottes, foz the expulſion of the Danes out of the realme of Englande.

Some referre this to an Edward.

Edzed oz Eldzed, brother to thys Edmund ſucceded nert king of Englande, he not onelye receyued the homage of Iriſe then kyng of Scottes, but alſo the homage of all the Barons of Scotlande.

Edgar the ſonne of Edmund, brother of Athelſtane being nowe of full age, was nert kyng of England: he reigned onely ouer the whole Monarchie of great Brittaine, and receyued homage of Keneth king of Scots foz the kingdome of Scotlande, and made Malcolme prince thereof.

Thys Edgar gaue vnto the ſame Keneth the countrey of Louthian in Scotland, which was befoze ſeized into the hands of Oſbzight king of England foz their rebellion, as is befoze declared. He enioined this Keneth their king alſo once in euery yere at certaine principall feaſtes (whereat the king dyd vſe to weare his crowne) to repaire vnto him into Englande foz the making of lawes, which in thoſe daies was done by ỹ noble mẽ oz peres according to the order of France at this day, To which end he allowed alſo ſundzy lodgings in England, to him & his ſucceſſours, wherat to lye & refreſhe themſelues in their iourneyes, and finally a peece of ground lying beſide the newe palace of Weſtminſter, vppon which this Keneth buylded a houſe, that by him and his poſteritie was enioyed vntill the reigne of King Henry the ſeconde, in whoſe tyme vpon the rebellio of William thẽ king of Scottes, it was reſumed into the king of Englands handes. The houſe is decayed, but the grounde where it ſtode is called Scotlande to this day.

Mozeouer Edgar made this lawe, that no man ſhoulde ſucceede to his patrimonie oz inheritaunce holden by knightes ſeruice, vntill he accompliſhed the age of one and twentie yeares, bycauſe by intendement vnder that age, he ſhoulde not be able in perſon to ſerue hys king and countrey according to the honour of his dede and the condition of his purchaſe. This lawe was receyued by the ſame Keneth in Scotlande, and aſwell there as in Englande is obſerued to this day, which proueth alſo that Scotlande was then vnder hys obeyſaunce.

In the yeare of our Lozde 1974. Kinalde king of Scottes, & Malcolin king of Cumberland, Makon king of Man, and the Iſles, Duuenall king of ſouthwales, Siferth and Howell kings of the reſt of wales, Jacob oz James of Galloway, and Iuhill of weſtmerlande, did homage to king Edgar at Cheſter. And on the mozow going by water to ỹ monaſtery of ſ. Johns to ſeruice and returning home againe, ỹ ſaid Edgar ſitting in a barge & ſteering the ſame vpon the water of Dee, made the ſayd kings to rowe ỹ barge, ſaying that his ſucceſſozs might well be ioyefull to haue the prerogatiue of ſo great honour, and the ſuperiozity of ſo many mighty princes to be ſubiect vnto their monarchie.

Edward the ſonne of this Edgar was nert king of Englande, in whoſe tyme this Keneth kyng of Scots cauſed Malcolme prince of Scotlande to be poyſoned, wherupon king Edwarde made warre againſt him, which ceaſſed not vntill this Keneth ſubmitted himſelfe, and offered to receyue him foz prince of Scotlande whome king Edward woulde appoint: herevpon Edwarde proclaymed one Malcolme to be prince of Scotlande, who immediately came into Englande and there dyd homage vnto the ſame King Edwarde.

Etheldzed brother of thys Edwarde ſucceeded nert ouer Englande, againſt whome Swayn kyng of Denmarke conſpired with this laſt Malcolme then king of Scots: But ſhoztly after this Malcolme ſozowfully ſubmitted himſelf into the defence of Etheldzed, who conſidering how that which coulde not be amended muſt only be repented, benignelye receyued him, by helpe of whoſe ſeruice at laſt Etheldzed recouered hys realme againe out of the handes of Swayn, and reigned ouer the whole Monarchy eyght & thirtie yeares.

Edmund ſurnamed Ironſide ſonne of this Etheldzed was nert king England, in whoſe tyme Canutus a Dane inuaded the realme with much crueltie, but at laſt he marryed wt Emme ſometime wyfe vnto Etheldzed and mother of this Edmund: which Emme as arbitratrix betweene hir naturall loue to the one

ons and matrimoniall duetie to the other, procured suth amitie betweene them in the ende, that Edmond was contented to deuide the realme with Canutus, & keeping to him selfe all England on this side Humber, gaue all the reast beyond Humber with the seignorie of Scotlande to this Canutus: wherupon Malcolme then king of Scottes after a little customable resistence, dyd homage to the same Canutus for kingdome of Scotland, and thus the sayde Canutus helde the same ouer of this Edmond king of Englande by the lyke seruices.

This Canutus in memorie of his victorie and glorie of his seignorie ouer the Scottes, commaunded this Malcolme their king, to buylde a Church in Buchquhan in Scotland (where a fielde betweene him and them was fought) to be dedicate to Olaus patrone of Norway and Denmarke, which Church was by the same Malcolme accordingly performed.

Edwarde called the confessour sonne of Ethelored and brother to Edmond Ironside was afterward king of england. He toke frō Malcolme king of Scottes his lyfe and hys kingdome, and made Malcolme sonne to the king of Cumberlande and Northumberland king of Scottes, who dyd him homage and fealtie.

Thys Edwarde perused the olde lawes of the realme, and somewhat added to some of them, as to the lawe of Edgar for the wardshippe of the landes vntyll the heire shoulde accomplishe the age of one & twentie yeares, he added that the marryage of such heire, shoulde also belong to the Lorde of whom the same lande was holden.

Also that euery woman marrying a frē man, shoulde notwithstanding she had no children by that husbande, enioye the thirde part of his inheritaunce during hir lyfe, with many other lawes which the same Malcolme king of Scottes obeyed. And which alwel by them in Scotlande as by vs in Englande be obserued to this day, and directly proueth the whole to be then vnder his obeysaunce.

By reason of this law Malcolme the sonne of Duncane next inheritour to the crowne of Scotlande being within age, was by the nobles of Scotlande deliuered as warde to the custodie of this king Edwarde, during whose minoritie one Makebeth a Scot traytorously vsurped the crowne of Scotland, against whom this king Edward made warre in which the said Makebeth was ouercome and slayne, wherupon ỳ said Malcolme was crowned king of Scottes at Stone, in the yeare of the reigne of this king Edward.

Thys Malcolme by tenour of the sayde newe lawe of wardship was marryed vnto Margaret the daughter of Edward, sonne of Edmond Ironside and Agatha, by the disposition of the same king Edward, and at his full age dyd homage to this king Edward for the kingdome of Scotland.

Moreouer Edwarde of Englande, hauing no issue of his body, and misliking that Harolde the sonne of Godwyn descended of the daughter of Harolde Harefoote the Dane woulde vsurpe the crowne, if he should leaue it to his cosin Edgar Ealing (being then within age) and partly by the peticion of his subiectes, who before had sworne neuer to receiue any kings other then of the Danish nation, did by his subtiall will in writing as all our clergy writers affirme, deuise the crown of great Britaine vnto William then duke of Normandie and to his heires, constituting him his heire testamentarie. Also there was proximite in blonde betweene thē for Emme daughter of Richarde duke of Normandye was wife vnto Ethelored, on whom he begat Alured and this Edward: and this William was sonne of Robert, sonne of Richarde, brother of the whole blond to the same Emme: whereby appeareth that this William was heire by tytle and not by conquest, albeit that partly to extinguish the misrule of other tytles and partely for the glory of hys victory, he chalenged in the ende, the name of a conquerour, & hath bene so written euer sithens his arriuall.

This king William called the conquerour supposed not his conquest perfite, tyll he had lykewyse subdued ỳ Scots, wherfore to bring the Scottes to full obeysaunce after hys Coronation as heire testamentary to Edward the Confessour, he entred Scotland, where after a litle resistance made by the Scottes, the sayde Malcolme then their king did homage to hym at Abirnethy in Scotlande for the kingdome of Scotlande, as to hys superiour also by meane of conquest.

Willyam surnamed Rufus sonne of thys William called the conquerour, succeded next to the crowne of England, to whom the sayde Malcolme king of Scottes dyd like homage for the kingdome of Scotland. But afterwarde he rebelled and was by this William Rufus slayne in the fielde, where vpon the Scottishmen dyd chose one Donald or Dunwal to be their king. But this Willia Rufus deposed hym and created Dunkane sonne of Malcolme to be their king, who dyd like homage to him: finally this Duncā was slayne by the Scottes & Dunwall restored, who once agayne by this Wylliam Rufus was depoſed, and Edgar ſonne of Malcolme & brother to the laſt Malcolme, was by him made theyr king, who dyd lyke homage for Scotlande to this William Rufus.

Henry called Beauclerke the ſon of William, called the conquerour, after the death of his brother William Rufus, ſucceeded to the crowne of England, to whome the ſame
Edgar kyng of Scottes dyd homage for Scotland. This Henry Beauclerke married Mawde the daughter of Malcolme king of Scottes, and by hir had iſſue Mawde afterwarde empreſſe, Alexandre the ſonne of Mal-colme brother to this Mawde, was next king of Scottes, he dyd lyke homage for the kingdome of Scotlande to this Henry the firſt.

Mawde called the empreſſe daughter and heire to this Henry Beauclerke and Mawde hys wyfe, receiued homage of Dauid brother to hir and to this Alexandre next king of Scottes, before all the temporall men of En-glande for the kyngdome of Scotlande.

Thys Mawde the empreſſe gaue vnto Dauid in the marriage, Mawd the daughter and heire of Voldoſius earle of Huntingdon & Northumberlande. And herein their euaſion appeareth, by which they allege that their kinges homages were made for the earle-dome of Huntingdon: for this Dauid was ỹ firſt that of their kinges was Earle of Huntingdon, which was ſince all the homages of their kinges before recited, and at the time of thys marryage, and long after the ſayde Alexander his brother was king of Scots: doing the homage aforeſayde to Henry Bew-clerke.

In the yeare of our Lorde 1136. and firſte
yeare of the reigne of king Stephen, the ſaid Dauid king of Scottes, being required to doe his homage, refuſed it, for as much as he had done homage to Mawde the empreſſe before tyme, notwithſtanding the ſonne of the ſayde Dauid dyd homage to king Stephane.

Henry called Fitz empreſſe, the ſon of Mawd the empreſſe daughter of Mawde, daughter of Malcolme king of Scottes, was next king of England. He receyued homage for Scotland of Malcolme, ſonne of Henry, ſonne of the ſayd Dauyd their laſt king, which Malcolme after thys homage, attended vpon the ſame kyng Henry in his warres agaynſt Lewys then king of Fraunce: whereby appeareth that their Frenche league was neuer renued after the laſt diuiſiõ of their countrey by Eg-bright king of Englande. But after theſe warres finiſhed with the Frenche king, this Malcolme being againe in Scotland rebelled: whereupon, king Henry immediatelye ſeized Huntingdon, and Northumberland into hys owne handes by confiſcation, & made warres vpon him in Scotland, during which the ſame Malcolme dyed without iſſue of hys bodie.

William brother of thys Malcolme was next kyng of Scottes, he wyth all the nobles of Scotland, (which could not be now for any earledome) did homage to the ſonne of thys king Henry the ſecond, wyth a reſeruation of the duetie to king Henry the ſeconde, hys father: alſo the earledome of Huntingdon was as ye haue heard before thys, forfaited by Malcolme his brother, and neuer after reſtored to the crowne of Scotlande.

Thys William king of Scottes, did afterwarde attend vpon the ſame king Henry the ſeconde in his warres in Normandie againſt
the Frenche kyng, notwithſtanding theyr Frenche league, and then dyd him homage for Scotlande, and thereupon was licenſed to depart home in Scotlande, where immediately he moued cruell warre in Northumberlande againſt the ſame king Henry being yet in Normandy. But God toke the defence of king Henries parte, and deliuered the ſame William kyng of Scottes into the handes of a fewe Engliſhmen, who brought him priſoner to kyng Henry into Normandie, in the tenth yeare of hys reigne. But at the laſt at the ſuite of Dauid his brother, Ri-charde Biſhop of S. Andrewes and other Biſhoppes and Lordes, he was put to this fine for the amendement of his treſpaſſe, to paye tenne thouſande pounde ſterling, and to ſurrender all hys tytle of the earledome of Hun-tingdõ, Cumberland, and Northumberland, into the handes of thys kyng Henry: which he did in all thinges accordingly, ſealing hys charters therof with the great ſeale of Scot-lande and ſignettes of hys nobilitie, wherein it was alſo compriſed that hée and his ſucceſſours, ſhould hold the realme of Scotland of the king of Englande and his ſucceſſours for euer. And herevpon he once again dyd homage to the ſame king Henry, which nowe coulde not be for the earledome of Huntingdon, the ryght wherof was alrealdie by hym surrẽdred. And for the better aſſurãce of this faith alſo, the ſtrengthes of Berwick, Eden-brough, Roxbrough and Striueling were de-liuered into the handes of our king Henry of Englande which their owne writers confeſſe: but Hector Boetius ſaieth that this treſ-paſſe was amended by fine of twentie thouſande poundes ſterling, & that the earledome of Huntingdon, Cumberland, and Northumberlande were deliuered as Morgage into the handes of king Henry vntill other tenne thouſande poundes ſterling ſhoulde be to him

payd,

payd, but though that were true, yet proueth he not the that money was payde, nor the lande otherwise redeemed, nor euer after came to any Scottishe kinges handes. And thus it appeareth that the earledome of Huntingdõ was neuer occasion of the homages of the Scottishe kinges to the kinges of Englande eyther before this tyme or after.

This was done 1175. Moreouer I red this note hereof gathered out of Robertus Montanus that liued in these, and was as I take it cõfessor to king Henry. The king of Scots doth homage to king Henry for ỹ kingdome of Scotlande and is sent home againe, hys Bishops also did promise to doe the lyke, to the Archebishoppe of Yorke, and to acknowledge themselues to be of his prouince & iurisdictiõ. By vertue also of this composition the sayde Robert sayth, that Rex Angliæ dabat honores, Episcopatus, Abbatias & alias dignitates in Scotia, vel saltem eius consilio dabantur, that is, the king of England gaue, honors, Bishoprickes, Abbateships, & other dignities in Scotland, or at the leastwyse they were not giuen without his aduise and counsell.

At this tyme Alexander bishop of Rome (supposed to haue general iurisdiction ecclesiastical thorough Christendome) conferred the whole clergy of Scotland, accordyng to the olde lawes, vnder the iurisdiction of the Archbishop of Yorke.

In the yeare of our Lord 1185. in the month of August at Cairlell. Roulande Talnante lord of Galway, did homage and fealty to the said king Henry with all that held of hym.

In the 22. yeare of the raigne of king Henry the 2. Gilbert sonne of Fergus prince of Galway, did homage and fealtie to the sayd king Henry, and left Dunecan his sonne in hostage for conseruation of peace.

Richard surnamed Cœur de Lyon, sonne of this Henry was next king of england, to whõ the same William king of Scottes dyd homage at Caunterbury for the kyngdome of Scotland.

This king Richard was taken prisoner by the Duke of Ostrich, for whose redemptiõ the whole realme was tared at great summes of money, vnto the which this William king of Scots (as a subiect) was contributory, and payed two M. markes sterlyng.

In the yere of our Lord 1199. John kyng of england, sent to William king of Scottes to come & do his homage, which William came to Lincolne in the moneth of December the same yeare, and did his homage there vpon an hill in the presence of Hubert, Archbishop of Caunterbury, and of all the people there assembled, and there was sworne vpon the crosse of the said Hubert: Also he graunted by his charter confirmed, that he should haue the mariage of Alexander hys sonne, as hys liegeman, alwayes to hold of the king of england: promisyng moreouer that he the sayde king William & his sonne Alexander should kepe and hold faith and allegeance to Henry sonne of the sayd king John, as to their chiefe Lord against all maner of men.

Also where as William king of Scots had put John Bishoppe of S. Andrewe out of his Bishoprycke, Pope Clemente wrote to Henry kyng of englande, that he shoulde moue and induce the same William, and if nede were requyre by hys Royall power compell hym to leaue his rancour agaynst ỹ sayd Bishop and suffer him to haue, and occuppe his sayde Bishoprycke againe.

In the yeare of our Lorde 1216. and fiue and twenty of ỹ reign of king Henry, sonne to king John, the same king Henry and the Quene were at Yorke at ỹ feast of Christmasse for the solemnization of a marryage made in the feast of S. Stephane the Martir the same yeare, betwene Alexander king of Scottes, & Margarete the kings daughter, and there the sayde Alexander dyd homage to Henry king of Englande.

In Buls of diuers Popes were admonitions geuẽ to the kings of Scottes, that they should obserue & truly kepe all such appointments, as had ben made betwene the kings of england and Scotland. And that the kings of Scotland should holde the realme of Scotlande of the kings of englande vpon payne of curse and interditing.

After the deathe of Alexander kyng of Scottes, Alexander his sonne beyng nyne yeres of age, was by the lawes of Edgar, in warde to king Henry the 3. and by the nobles of Scotland brought to Yorke, and there deliuered to him. During whose minoritie king Henry gouerned Scotland, and to subdue a commocion in this realme, vsed the ayde of v. M. Scottishmen, but king Henry dyed during the nonage of this Alexander, whereby he receiued not his homage, which by reason and law was respited vntil his full age of xxj. yeares.

Edward the first after the conquest, sonne of this Henry, was next king of england, immediately after whose coronation, Alexãder king of Scottes, being then of ful age did homage to hym for Scotlande at Westminster, swearyng as all the realt did after this maner.

I. D. N. king of Scottes shalbe true and faithfull vnto you Lorde E. by the grace of God king king of England, the noble and ſuperior lord of the kingdome of Scotland, and vnto you I make my fidelitie for the ſame kingdome, the which I hold and claime to hold of you. And I ſhall beare you my faith and fidelitie of lyfe and limme, and worldly honour againſt all me, faithfully I ſhall knowledge and ſhall doe you ſeruice due vnto you of the kingdom of Scotland aforeſayde, as God me ſo helpe and theſe holy Euangelies.

This Alexander king of Scottes died, leauing one only daughter called Margaret for his heire, who before had maried Hanygo, ſonne to Magnus king of Norway, which daughter alſo ſhortly after died, leauyng one onely daughter her heire, of the age of two yeares, whoſe cuſtody and mariage by the lawes of king Edgar, and Edward the confeſſour, belonged to Edward the firſt: wherupon the nobles of Scotland were commaũded by our king Edward to ſend into Norway, to conuey this yong Quéne into England to him, whom he entended to haue maried to his ſõne Edward: and ſo to haue made a perfite vnion betwéne bothe Realmes. Hereuppon their nobles at that tyme conſidering the ſame tranquillitie, that many of them haue ſithens refuſed, ſtode not vpon ſhiftes and delayes of minoritie nor contẽpt, but moſt gladly conſented, and therupon ſent two noble men of Scotlande into Norway, for hir to be brought to this king Edwarde, but ſhe died before their comming thither, & therefore they required nothing but to enioye the lawful liberties that they had quietly poſſeſſed in the laſt king Alexander his tyme.

After the death of this Margaret, the Scots were deſtitute of any heire to the crown from this Alexander their laſt king, at which time this Edwarde diſcended from the bodye of Mawde daughter of Malcolme ſometyme king of Scottes, beyng then in the greateſt broile of his warres with Fraunce, mynded not to take the poſſeſſion of that kingdome in his own right, but was contented to eſtabliſh Baliell to be king therof, the weake title betweene him, Bruſe, & Haſtings, being by the humble petition of all the realme of Scotland committed to the determination of this king Edward, wherin by autentique writing they confeſſed the ſuperioritie of the realme, to remaine in king Edward, ſealed with the ſeales of fiue. Biſhops fiue. earles, and fiue barons of Scotland, & which ſhortly after was by the whole aſſent of ỹ three eſtates of Scotland, in their ſolemne Parliament confeſſed and enacted accordingly, as moſt euidently doth appeare.

The Baliell in this wiſe made kyng of Scotlãd, did immediately make hys homage and fealty at Newcaſtle vpon ſaint Steuens day (as did likewiſe all the Lordes of Scotland, eche one ſetting his hand to the compoſition in writing) to king Edward of England for the kingdom of Scotland: but ſhortly after defrauding the benigne goodneſſe of this king Edward, he rebelled, and did very much hurt in englande: Hereupon king Edward inuaded Scotland, ſeazed into his hãds the greater part of the countrey, and toke all the ſtrengthes thereof, whereuppon Baliol king of Scottes came vnto king Edwarde at Pauntroſſe in Scotland with a white wãd in his hand, and there reſigned the crowne of Scotland, with all his right, title, and intereſt to the ſame, into the handes of this kyng Edward, and therfore made his Charter in writyng, dated and ſealed the fourth yeare of his raigne. All the nobles and gentlemen of Scotlande alſo repayred to Barwike, and did homage & fealtie to king Edwarde, there beõmyng his ſubiectes. For the better aſſurence of whole othes alſo, king Edward kept all the ſtrengths & holdes of Scotland in his owne handes, and hereupon all their lawes, proceſſe, all iudgement, all giftes of aſſices and others, paſſed vnder the name and autoritie of king Edwarde. Lelande touchyng the ſame rehearſall, writeth thereof in this maner.

In the yere of our lord 1295. the ſame Iohn king of Scottes, contrary to his faith and alleageaunce, rebelled againſt king Edward, and came into england, and burnt and ſlew without all modeſty and mercy. Whereupon king Edwarde with a great hoſte went to Newcaſtle vppon Tine, paſſed the water of Tweede, and beſieged Barwike, and gote it. Alſo he wan the caſtell of Dunbar, & there were ſlaine at this braũt 15700. Scots. Then he proceeded further, and gate the Caſtle of Roheſborow, and the caſtle of Edẽborough, Striuelin and Gedworth, and his people herried all the lande.

In the meane ſeaſon, ỹ ſayd king Iohn of Scots conſidering ỹ he was not of power to reſiſt and ỹ ſaid king Edward ſent his letters and beſought him of treatie and peace, which king Edward benignly graunted, and ſent to him againe that he ſhould come to the towne of Berthin, and bring thither the great lords of Scotland wt̃ him. The king of england ſẽt thither Antony Beke, biſhop of Durhã, with his royall power to conclude the ſaide treatice: and there it was agreed that ỹ ſaid Iohn and all the Scottes ſhould vtterly ſubmitte thẽſelues to the kings will, & to the end ỹ ſaid ſubmiſſiõ ſhould be perfourmed accordingly, ỹ

king of Scottes laid his sonne in hostage and pledge. There also he made his letters sealed with the common seale of Scotland, by the which he knowledging his simplenes & great offence done to his lord king Edward of englande, by his full power & frée will, yelded vp all the lande of Scotland, with all the people & homage of the same. Then ỳ said king Edward went forth to sée the mountaines, and vnderstandyng that all was in quyete and peace, he turned to ỳ Abbey of Stone of Chanons regular, where he toke the stone called the Regall of Scotland, vpō which the kings of Scotland were wont to sitte, at the time of their coronations for a throne, and sent it to the Abbey of Westminster, commaundyng to make a chaire thereof for the prestes that should sing masse at the high altare: which chaire was made, and standeth yet there at this day.

In the yere of our Lord 1296. the king held his Parliament at Barwike: and there he toke homage singularly of all the lordes and nobles of Scotland. And for a perpetuall memory of the same, they made their letters patentes sealed with their seales, & thē the king of england made William Warreine earle of Surrey and Southsare, Lord Warden of Scotland, Hugh of Cressingham treasorer, and William Ormesby iustice of Scotland, and forthwith sent king John to the tower of London, and John Comyn, and the earle Badenauth, the erle of Bohan & other lordes into england to diuers places on this syde of the Trent.

And after that in the yere of our lord, 1297 at the feast of Christmas, the kyng called before him the sayd John king of Scottes, although he had committed hym to warde; and saide that he would burne or destroy their castels, townes & landes, if he were not recompenced for hys costes & damages sustained in the warres, but king John & the other that were in warde, answered that they had nothing, sith their liues, their deathes, and goods were in his handes. The king vpon that answer moued with pity, graunted them theyr lyues, so that they would doe their homage & make their othe solemnly at the high altar (in the church of the Abbey of Westminster) vpon the Eucharist, that they and euery of thē should holde and kepe true fayth, obedience, and allegiaunce to the said king Edward and his heires kinges of englande for euer. And where the said king of Scots saw the kinges banner of england displayed, he and all hys should draw there vnto. And that neyther he nor any of his from thencefoorth should beare armes against the king of england or any of his bloud. Finally, the king rewarding wyth great giftes the sayd king John & his lordes, suffered them to departe. But they went into Scotland alway imagining (notwithstāding this their submissiō) how they might oppresse king Edward and disturbe his realme. The Scottes sent also to the king of Fraunce for succour and helpe, who sent them shippes to Barwike furnished with men of armes, the king of england then beyng in Flaunders.

In the yeare of our lord 1298. the king wēt into Scotland with a great host, and ỳ Scots also assembled in great number, but the king faught with them at Fawkirke on S. Mary Magdalenes daye, where were slayne lr. M. Scots, and William Walleys that was their captayne fled, who beyng taken afterward, was hanged, drawen, and quartered at London.

After this the Scottes rebelled agayne, and all ỳ lordes of Scotland chose Robert Bruis to be king, except only John Cōmyn earle of Carrike, who would not consent thereto because of his othe made to ỳ king of england. Wherefore Robert Bruis * slewe hym at Dumfrise, and the same Robert Bruis was crowned at Schoone Abbay. Hereupon the king of england assembled a great hoste, and rode thorough all Scotland, and discomfited Robert Bruis, and slue viij. M. Scottes, and toke the most part of all the lordes of Scotlande, putting the temporall lordes to death because they were forsworne. This was done, vpon the 29. of Jan. 1306.

Edward borne at Carnaruan sonne of this Edward, was next king of England, who frō the beginning of his reigne enioyed Scotlād peaceably, doing in all thinges as is aboue sayde of king Edwarde his father, vntill toward the latter ende of his reigne, about which time thys Robert Bruse conspired against him & with the helpe of a few forsworn Scottes, forswore himselfe king of Scottes. Hereupon this Edward with Thomas earle of Lancaster and many other Lords made warre vpō him about the feast of Mary magdalene, the sayde Bruse and hys partakers being already accursed by the Pope for breaking the truce that he had established betwixt thē. But being infortunate in his first warres against him, he suffered Edwarde the sonne Baliol to proclaime himself king of Scottes, and neuertheless hælde forth his warres agaynst Bruse, before the ending of which he dyed, as I reade.

Edwarde borne at Windsore sonne of Edward ỳ second was next king of england at ỳ age of fifténe yeares, in whose minoritie the Scots practised with Isabell mother to this Edwarde and wyth Roger Mortymer earle of

of the March to haue their homages releaſed, whoſe good will therin they obtayned, ſo that for the ſame releaſe they ſhoulde pay to thys king Edward thirtie thouſand pounders ſterling in thꝛée yeares next following, that is to ſay, tenne thouſande pounde ſterling yearely. But bicauſe the nobilitie & commons of this realme woulde not by parliament conſent vnto it their king being within age, the ſame releaſe pꝛoceéded not, albeit the Scottes ceaſed not their pꝛactiſes with thys Quéene and Earle. But befoꝛe theſe thꝛée yeres in which their money (if ỹ bargaine had taken place) ſhoulde haue béene payed were exꝑired, our king Edwarde inuaded Scotlande and ceaſed not the warre vntill Dauid the ſonne of Robert le Bruſe then by their election king of ſcotlande abſolutelye ſubmytted hymſelfe vnto hym. But for that the ſayde Dauid Bꝛuſe had befoꝛe by pꝛactiſe of the Quéene and the Earle of Marche, marryed Jane the ſiſter of this king Edward: he mouued by naturall zeale to his ſiſter, was contented to giue the realme of ſcotlande to this Dauid Bꝛuſe, & to the heires that ſhoulde be begotten of the body of the ſayde Jane (ſauing the reuerſion and meane homages to this king Edwarde and to his owne children) wherewith the ſame Dauid Bꝛuſe was right well contented, and therevpon immediately made his homage for ſcotlande vnto him.

Howbeit ſhꝛtly after cauſeleſſe conceyuing cauſe of diſpleaſure, this Dauid pꝛocured to diſolue this ſame eſtate taily, and therevpon not onely rebelled in ſcotlande, but alſo inuaded englande, whyleſt king Edwarde was occuꝑyed about hys warres in France. But this Dauid was not onely expelled englād in thend, but alſo thinking no place a ſufficient defence to his vntrueth, of his owne accoꝛde fled out of ſcotlād: wherby the coũtreis of Annandale, Gallaway, Mars, Teuydale, Twedale, and Ethꝛike were ſeaſed into the king of englandes handes, and new Marches ſet betwéene englande and ſcotland at Cockburnes pathe and Sowtry hedge, which whē this Dauid wēt about to recouer againe, his power was diſcomfited, and himſelf by a few engliſhmen taken and bꝛought into englande where he remayned pꝛiſoner eleuen yeres.

Duryng thys tyme, kyng Edwarde enioyed Scotlande peaceably, and then at the contemplacion and wery ſuite of his ſoꝛowfull ſiſter wyfe of this Dauid, he was contented once againe to reſtoꝛe him to the kingdome of Scotlande, whereupon it was concluded, that for this rebellion Dauid ſhoulde paye to king Edward the ſomme of one hundꝛed thouſande marckes ſterling, and thereto deſtroy all his holdes and foꝛtreſſes ſtanding againſt the engliſh boꝛders, & further aſſure the crowne of ſcotland to the childꝛen of this kyng Edward for lacke of heire of his owne bodye, all which thinges he dyd accoꝛdingly. And for the better aſſurance of his obeiſance alſo, he afterward deliuered into the hāds of king Edward ſundꝛy noble men of ſcotlād in this behalf as his pledges. And this is the effect of the hiſtoꝛy of Dauid, touching his dealings: now let vs ſée what was done by Edwarde Balliol, whereof our Chꝛonicles doe make repoꝛt as followeth.

In ỹ yere of our loꝛd 1326. Edward ỹ third king of england was crowned at Weſtminſter, and in the 5. yere of his reigne Edward Balliol right heire to ỹ kingdome of ſcotlād came in & claymed it as due to him. Sundꝛy loꝛdes and gentlemen alſo, which had title to diuers landes there, either by themſelues, oꝛ by their wiues did ỹ like, wherupō the ſayde Balliol & they went into ſcotland by ſea, and landing at Kinghoꝛne with 3000. Engliſhmen, diſcomfited 10000. Scottes, and ſlewe 1200. and thē went foꝛth to Dunfermeline, where the ſcots aſſembled againſt them with 40000. men, and in the feaſt of S. Laurence, at a place called Gaſtmoꝛe (oꝛ otherwyſe Gladmoꝛe) were ſlaine v. Erles, xiij. Barōs, a hundꝛed and thꝛée ſcoꝛe knightes, two M. men of armes, and many other, in all xl. M. and there were ſlaine on the engliſh part but xiij. perſons only.

In the eight yere of the raign of kyng Edward, he aſſembled a great hoſte and came to Barwike vpon Twéde, & laid ſiege thereto To him alſo came Edward Balliol king of ſcots, wꝫ a great power to ſtrength & aide him againſt the ſcottes who came out of ſcotland in foure battailes well armed and arayed.

Edwarde kyng of england, and Edwarde king of ſcottes, apparelled their people either of them in foure battailes: and vppon Halidon hyll, beſide Barwike, met theſe two hoſtes, and there were diſcomfited of ỹ ſcots, xxv. M. and vij. C. whereof were ſlayne viij. erles, a thouſand and thꝛée hundꝛed knightes and gentlemen. This victoꝛy done, the kyng returned to Barwike, and the towne wyth the caſtell were yelded vp vnto him.

In the eyght yeare of the reigne of king Edward of englande, Edward Baillol kyng of ſcottes came to Newcaſtell vpon tine and dyd homage.

In the yeare of our Loꝛde 1346. Dauid Bꝛuys by exhoꝛtacion of the king of France rebelled, and came into england with a great hoſte vnto Neuilles croſſe: But the Archbiſhoppe of Yoꝛke with diuers tempoꝛall men, fought fought wᵗ him and the ſaid king of ſcots was take, and William earle Douglas & Hoꝛriſe earle of Strathoꝛne were bꝛought to Londō, & many other Loꝛds ſlayne, which wyth Dauid dyd homage to Edward king of england.

And in the thirtie yere of the kings reigne, and the yeare of our Loꝛde 1355. the ſcottes wanne the towne of Barwicke, but not the Caſtell. Hereupon the king came thither wᵗ a great hoſte, and anone the towne was yᵉlden without any reſiſtance.

Edwarde Bailiol, conſidering that God dyd ſo many marueylous & gracious thinges foꝛ kyng Edwarde, at his owne will gaue vp the crowne and the realme of ſcotland to king Edwarde of england at Rokeſboꝛough, by his letters patents.

And anon after the king of england, in pꝛeſence of all his Loꝛdes ſpirituall and temporall, let crowne himſelfe kyng there of the realme of ſcotlande, and oꝛdayned all thinges to hys intent, and ſo came ouer in englande.

Richarde the ſonne of Edward, called the blacke pꝛince, ſonne of this kyng Edward, was next king of Englande, who foꝛ that the ſayde Jane, the wyfe of the ſayde king Dauyd of Scotland was deceaſed without iſſue, and being enfoꝛmed how the Scottes deuiſed to their vttermoſt power to bꝛeake the limitacion of this inheritance touching ỹ crowne of ſcotland, made foꝛthwith war againſt thē, wherin he bꝛent Edēbꝛough, ſpoyled all their countrey, toke all their holdes, and maintained continually warre againſt them vnto his death, which was Anno domi. M.CCC. xcix.

Henry the fourth of that name was next kyng of englande, he continued theſe warres begun againſt them by king Richard, & ceaſſed not vntyll Robert king of ſcots (the third of ỹ name) reſigned hys crowne by appointment of this kyng Henry, and deliuered hys ſonne James bꝛyng then of the age of nyne yeares, into his handes to remayne at his cuſtodie, Wardſhip and diſpoſition, as of his ſupeꝛioꝛ Loꝛd, accoꝛding to the olde lawes of king Edwarde the confeſſour. All this was done Anno dom. M. CCCC.iij. which was within fiue yeares after the death of kyng Richarde: This Henry the fourth reigned in this ſtate ouer them fourteene years.

Henry the fift of that name ſonne to thys king Henry the fourth was next king of england. He made warres againſt ỹ french king, in all which this James then king of ſcottes attended vpon him as vpon his ſupeꝛioꝛ loꝛd, with a conuenient number of ſcots, notwithſtanding their leagꝛe with fraunce. But this Henry reigned but nine yeares, whereby the homage of this James their king (hauing not fully accompliſhed the age of one and twentye yeares) was by reaſon and lawe reſpited. Finallye the ſayd James wyth dyuers other loꝛdes attended vpon the coꝛpes of the ſayde ſalde Henry vnto Weſtminſter, as to his dutie appertayned.

Henry the ſixt, the ſonne of this Henry the fift, was next king of englande to whome the ſeignoꝛie of ſcotlande and cuſtodye of thys James by right lawe and reaſon diſcended, marryed the ſame James king of ſcottes to Jane daughter of John earle of Sommerſet, at S. Mary ouer Iſe in ſouthwarke, and toke foꝛ the value of thys marryage, the ſumme of one hundꝛeth thouſand markes ſterling.

This James king of ſcottes at his full age, did homage to the ſame king Henry the ſixt, foꝛ the kingdome of ſcotland at Wyndſoꝛe, in the moneth of January.

Since which tyme vnto the dayes of king Henry the ſeauenth, graundfather to our ſouereigne loꝛd that now is, albeit this realme hath bēne moleſted with diuerſitie of titles, in which vntꝛeete tyme neither lawe noꝛ reaſon admit pꝛeſcription to the pꝛeiudice of any ryght: yet did king Edwarde the fourth next king of englande by pꝛeparation of warre againſt the ſcottes in the latter ende of hys reigne, ſufficiently by al lawes induce to the continuaunce of his claime to the ſame ſupeꝛioꝛitie ouer them.

After whoſe death, vnto the beginning of the reigne of our ſouereigne loꝛde king Henry the eight, exceeded not the number of xxty yeares, about which tyme the impediment of our clayme of the ſcottes part, chaunced by the nonage of James their laſt king, which ſo continued the ſpace of one & twentie yeres. And like as his minoꝛitie was by all law and reaſon an impediment to himſelf to make homage, ſo was the ſame by like reaſō an impediment to ỹ king of this realme to demaunde any, ſo that the whole time of intermiſſion of our claime in the time of the ſayde king Henry the eyght, is deduced vnto the number of thirteene yeres, & thus much foꝛ this matter.

Of the wall ſometime buylded for a partition betweene Englande and the Pictes. Cap. 17.

HAuing hitherto diſcourſed vpon the title of the kings of england, vnto the ſcottiſh kingdome. I haue nowe thought good to adde hereunto the deſcription of the wall that was in times paſt, a limite vnto both the ſayde regions, & therefoꝛe to be touched in this firſt booke as generallye apperteinent vnto the eſtate ſtate, of the whole Iſlande.

The firſt beginner of the Picts wal

The firſt author and beginner therefore of this wall was Hadriane the emperour, who as Ælius Spartianus ſayth, erected the ſame of foure ſcore miles in length, to deuide the barbarous Britons from the more ciuile ſort, which thē were generally called by the name of Romaines.

The finiſher of the wall.

After hys tyme Seuerus the emperour cōming againe into this Iſle, (where he had ſerued before in repreſſion of the tumultes here begun, after ẏ death of Lucius) amongſt other thinges he finiſhed the wall that Hadriane had begunne and extended it euen vnto the the weſt ſea, that earſt went no farder then foure ſcore myles, from the eaſt part of the Ocean, as I haue noted already. It is worthy ẏ noting how that in thys voyage he loſt 50000. men in the ſcottiſh ſide, by one occaſion and other, which hinderaunce ſo incenſed him, that he determined vtterlye to extinguiſh theyr memory from vnder heauen, and had ſo done in dede, if his life had indured but vntill another yeare. Sextus Aurelius writing of Seuerus, addeth howe that the percell of the wall, which was left by Hadriane, and finiſhed by this prince, conteyned two & thirtye miles, whereby the breedth of this Iſland there, and length of the wall conteyneth onlye 112. miles, as maye be gathered by hys wordes, but chiefly for the length of the wall Spartianus who touchyng by it among other thinges ſaieth of Seuerus as followeth, Brittaniam (quod maximum eius imperij decus eſt) muro per tranſuerſam inſulam ducto, vtrinq; ad finē Oceani muniuit, that is, he fortified Britaine (which is one of the chiefe acts recorded of his time) with a wall made ouerthwart the Iſle, that reached on both ſides euen to the very Ocean.

The wall goeth not ſtreight by a line but in and out in many places.

The ſtuffe of the wal

That this wal of ſtone alſo, the ruines therof which haue miniſtred much matter to ſuch as dwell nere therunto in their buildinges is triall ſufficient. Hereby in lyke ſorte it commeth to paſſe, that where the ſoile about it is leaſt inhabited, there is moſt mention of the ſayde wall, which was wrought of squared ſtone, as vnto this day may euidently be confirmed. Howbeit this Wall was not the onelye partition betwene theſe two kingdomes, ſith Iulius Capitolinus in vita Antonini Pij doth write of another that Lollius Vrbicus did make beyond the ſame, of Turffe, which nertheleſſe was often throwen downe by the ſcottes, and eftſones repayred againe vntill it was geuen ouer and relinquiſhed altogether. The like mudde wal hath bene ſéne alſo within the wall about an arrow ſhot from that of ſtone, but how farre it went, as yet I cannot finde, this onely remayneth certaine, that the wall made by Hadrian and Seuerus was ditched with a notable ditch, and a rampire made theron in ſuch wiſe, that the ſcottiſh aduerſary had much adoe to enter & ſcale the ſame in his aſſaults. Betwixt Thirlewal, and the Northe Tine, are alſo in the waſte groundes, manye parcelles of that walle yet ſtanding, wherof the common people doe babble many thinges.

Two other wals.

A rampire

Beginning therefore with the courſe thereof, from the weſt ſea, I finde that it runneth frō Bowneſſe to Burgh, about foure miles, and likewiſe from thence within halfe a mile of Caerleil, and leſſe on the north ſide, and beneath the confluence of the Peder and the Eden. From hence it goeth to Terreby a village about a myle from Caerleil, then thorow the Barrony of Linſtocke, and Gilleſland, on the north ſide of the riuer Irding or Arding, & a quarter of a mile from the Abbey of Leuercoſt. Then 3. myles aboue Leuercoſt, and aboue the confluence of Arding, and the Pultroſe becke (which deuideth Gilleſland in Cumberlande, from ſouth Tindale in Northūberland) it goeth to Thirlwall caſtle, thē to the Wall towne, next of all ouer the riuer to Swenchelo, Carraw (peraduenture Cairuozen) tower, to Walwyc, and ſo ouer ſouth Tine, to Cockely tower, Portgate, Halton cheles, Winchelſer, Rutchelſer, Heddon, Walhottle, Denton, and to Newcaſtle, where it is thought that S. Nicholas churche ſtandeth on the ſame. Howbeit, Leland ſayth, that it goeth within a myle of Newcaſtle, and thē crooketh vp toward Tinmouth vnto Walleſende, ſo called becauſe the aforeſaid wall did ende at the ſame place. And thus much I read of the Pictiſh wal. As for the Romaine coyne that is often found in the courſe thereof, the curious bricke about the ſame nere vnto Carleil, beſide the excellent Cornellines and other coſtlye ſtones already entailled for Seales oftentymes take vp in thoſe quarters, I paſſe thē ouer as not incidēt to my purpoſe. In like maner I wold gladly alſo haue ſet downe the courſe of Offaes diteh: but foraſmuch as ẏ tractatiō therof is not to be referred to this place, becauſe it is not a thing generall to ẏ whole Iſland, I omitte to ſpeake of that alſo. Yet thus much will I note here by the report of one (who ſaith how he did tread it out) that he followed it from the Dée to Ryznaburgh hill thorow Treuclach forreſt, by eaſt af Crebith, Cauch hil, Mountgonnery caſtle, the new caſtle and Diſcoid, & hauing brought it hitherto, either loſt it, or ſought after it no further, & ſo much of ſuch thinges as concerne the generall eſtate of the whole Iſland.

The courſe of the wal from weſt to eaſt.

Of ryuers and waters that lose their names before they come at the sea. Cap. 1.

I Haue in the former Treatise made report of most of the greatest riuers in Englande, wherewyth our seafaring men are very well acquainted, not only by reason of their notable issues into the Oceã, but also for the oftẽ herborow & passage, which they haue by diuers of them, farre vp into the countrey. Nowe therefore will I procéde, with the descriptiõ of such as are yet in parte vntouched, and whereby the chanels and courses of the first are not a litle increased. In tractation whereof I will not omitte to reiterate the description of those maine riuers, that are not already perfitely set downe, neyther the insertion of such as earst I had no knowledge of. And as I first begannc with the Thames in that booke, so will I nowe make mine entraunce with such riuers as fall into the same, not letting any one escape, wherin a man in the Winter season may wet hys horse fote vp vnto the fotelockes.

Isis. How and where this riuer issueth out of the grounde, I haue before set downe, noting the place to be within a myle of Tetbury, wherof some doe vtterly mislike, bycause that ryll in sommer drowthes is oft so drie, that there is litle or no water at all seene running in the same. For this cause therefore many affirme the very head of Isis to come from the pole aboue Kemble. Other confounde it with the head of the Cyrne or Chyrne, called in latine Corinium that riseth aboue Coberley. For my part I followe Lelande, as he doeth the Monke of Malmesbury, that wrate the hystorie entituled Eulogium historiarum, who searched the same of set purpose, and pronounced wyth Lelande, although that at this present that course be very smal, and choked vp as I doe here with mowldes. Procéding therefore from the hed, it first of all receyueth the Kemble water called the Coue, which ryseth aboue Kemble towne, goeth by Kemble it selfe vnto pole and Somerford, & accompanyeth ỳ Thames, vnto Canes, Alhtõ Canes & Holwõ, vntil they mẽte with the Chirne, the next of all to be described. Coues.

The Chyrne is a faire water, rysing out of the grounde aboue Coberley. From whence it runneth to Cowley, Cowlesburne, Randcome, and so into the Isis on the left side aboue Crekelade. These thrée waters beyng thus vnited & brought into one chanell, within a little space of the head of Isis, it runneth by Crekelade, beneath which towne it receyueth the Rhe, descending from Elcombe, Escot, Redburne, Widhil, and at the fall into Isis, or not farre of ioyneth with another that runneth west of Purton by Bradẽ forrest, &c. Corinium. Rhe.

Next of all our Isis mẽteth with the Amney on the left hande, which comming from aboue Holly rode Amney, runneth by Downe Amney, and finally into the Isis a litle aboue Isey. In lyke sorte I reade of another that mẽteth withall on the right hand aboue Isey also, which so farre as I can call to remembraunce, commeth from about Dryfield and falleth so into our Isis, that they runne as one vntill they come at the Colne, although not so nakedly and without help, but that in this voyage, the maine streame doth crosse one water that descendeth from Swindon, & going also by Stratton toward Sewingham, is it selfe increased with two rilles by the way, whereof one commeth from Liddenton by Wambrey, as I haue bene informed. Amney.

nére to Witchington, and from thence goeth to Shiptons, Compton Abdale, Wittenton, Parnewoorth, Colnedeanes, and Colne Rogers, Winston, Bybery, Colne Alens, Quenington, Fairford, and west of Lachelade into the riuer Isis, which hereabout on the southside also taketh in another, wherof I finde this remembraunce. The Isis being

once paſt Seuingham, croſſeth a brooke from ſoutheaſt that mounteth about Aſhebyry and receyuing a ryll from by weſt, (that commeth from Hinton) beneath Shrineham, it afterward ſo deuideth it ſelfe, that the armes therof include Inglesham, and by reaſon that it falleth into the Iſis at two ſeuerall places, there is a pleaſant Iſlande produced, wherof let thys ſuffiſe.

Leens. Beyng paſt Lechelade a mile, it runneth to S. Johns bridge, & thereabout meeteth wyth ỹ Leche, on the left hande. This brooke wherof Lechlade taketh the name (a towne wherunto one peece of an olde Vniuerſity is aſcribed, which it dyd neuer poſſeſſe, more then Cricklade did the other) ryſeth eaſt of Hapnet, frō whence it goeth to Northleech, Eſſēton, Ankerworth, eaſt Leche, ſouth Thorpe, Farendon and ſo into the Iſis. From hence thys famous water goeth by Kēſcot toward Radcote bridge, (taking in the rill that riſeth in an odde peece of Barkeſhyre, and runneth by Langford) & being paſt ỹ ſaid bridge, (now notable thorowe a conſpiracye, made there ſometimes by ſundrye Barons againſt the eſtate) it is not long ere it croſſe two other waters, both of thē deſcending from another odde parcell of the ſaide countie; whereof I haue this note gyuen me for my further information. There are two falles of water into Iſis, beneath Radcote bridge, whereof the one commeth from Shilton, in Barkeſhire by Areſcote, blacke Burton and Clarrefield. The other alſo riſeth in the ſame piece and runneth by Baiſenorton vnto Bampton, and there receyuyng an armelet from the firſt that breake of at Blackeburton, it is not long ere they fall into Iſis, and leaue a pretye Iland. After theſe confluences, the main courſe of the ſtreame, haſteth by Shifford, to Newbridge, where it ioyneth with the Winruſh. Winruſh.

The Winruſh ryſeth aboue Shyeburne, in Glouceſterſhyre; frō whence it goeth to Winruſh, and comming by Barringtō, Burford, Widbrooke, Swinbeck caſtel, Witney, Duckington, Cockthorpe, Stanlake, it meeteth wyth the Iſis weſt by ſouth of Northmore. From hence it goeth beneath Stantō, Hartingcourt and Enſham; betweene which and Caſſenton, it receyueth as Lelande calleth it the Bzuerne water. Bziwerus

It ryſeth aboue Limington, and going to Norton in the Marſhe, and thorowe a parche of Worceſter ſhire vnto Euenlode, betweene it and the foure ſhyre ſtones, it taketh in a rill called Come, comming by the Long and the little Compton. After this alſo it goeth by Bradwell, Odington, and ſo to Bleddenton, aboue which towne, it taketh in the Rolriche water, that iſſueth at two heades, in ỹ hilles that lie by weſt of little Rolriche, and ioyne aboue Kenkeham, and Church hill. From thēce alſo it goeth vnto Bzuerne, Shiptō vnderwood, Aſcot, Short hamton, Chorlebury, Cornebury parke, Stonfielde, Longcombe, and ſouth eaſt of Woodſtocke parke, taketh in the Enis, that riſeth aboue Emſtone, and goeth to Cyddington, Glymton, Motton (wher it is increaſed wyth a rill (that runneth thether frō Steple Barton, by the Beechin trée) Woodſtocke, Blaydon, ſo that after this confluence, the ſayde Enys runneth to Caſſentō and ſo into the Iſis, which goeth frō hence to Orforde, and there receiueth the Charwell, now preſently to be deſcribed. Rolriche. Enis. Charwell.

The heade of Charwell is in Northampton ſhyre, where it ryſeth out of a little pole, by Charleton village, ſeauen miles aboue Banberye northeaſt, and there it iſſueth ſo faſt at the verye ſurge, that it groweth into a pretye ſtreame, in maner out of hand. Sone after alſo it taketh in taketh in a rillet called ỹ Bure, which falleth into it, about Otmere ſide, but foraſmuch as it ryſeth by Bincester, ỹ whole courſe thereof is aboue foure myles, and therefore cannot be great. A friende of myne proſecuitting the reaſt of this deſcription reporteth thereof as followeth. Bure. Culen.

Before the Charwell commeth into Orforde ſhyre, it receiueth the Culen, which falleth into the ſame, a lyttle aboue Edgecote, & ſo dyſceding toward Wardington, it meeteth with another comming from by northweſt, betweene Wardington & Cropredy. At Banburye alſo it meeteth wyth the Come (which falleth from Fenny Cōton by Farnebore, and afterwards going by Kings Sutton, not farre from Ayne, it receiueth the diſcharge of dyuers ryllettes, in one bottome before it come at Clifton. The ſayde water therefore ingendred of ſo many brookelettes, conſiſteth chiefly of two, whereof the moſt ſoutherly called Oke, commeth from Oke Norton, by Witchington or Wiggington, and the Berſords, and carying a few blind rilles withal, doth meete with the other that falleth from by northweſt into the ſame, within a myle of Charwell. That other as I coniecture, is increaſed of three waters; whereof eache one hath his ſeuerall name, the firſt of them therfore, height Tudo, which comming betweene Epwell and the Lee by Toddington, ioyneth about Broughton with the ſeconde that runneth from Horneto, named Ouus, as I gelle. The laſt falleth into the Tude or Tuvelake, beneath Broughton and for that it riſeth not far from Sotteſwel in Warwikſhyre, ſome are of the opinion, that it is to be called Sotbrooke, Come. Ouus. Tudo. Sotbroke. Souarus.

broke. The nert water that mæteth with our Charwell beneath Clifton commeth from about Croughton, and after this is the Sowar or Swere, that riseth north of Michael Tew, & runneth by nether Wotton. The last of all is the rey alias Bure, whose hed is not farre aboue Burcester, alias Bincester, & Burncester: & frō whence it goeth by Burecester to Merton, Charleton, Fencote, Addington, Noke, Islip, and so into Charwell, that holdeth on hys course after this augmentation of the waters, betwene Wode and Water Eton, to Marston, and the east bridge of Oxford by Magdalene colledge, and so beneath the southbridge into our aforesayd Isis.

Sowar.

Burus.

In describing this ryuer, this one thyng right honourable is come vnto my mynde, touchyng the centre and naueil as it were of England. Certes, there is an hilly platte of ground in Helledon paroche, not farre from Danbery, where a man may stand & behold the heds of three notable ryuers, whose waters, and those of such as fall into them, do aboundantly serue the greatest parte of England, on this side of the Humber: the first of these waters is the Charwel, already described. The second is the Leme that goeth westward into the fourth Auon: and the third is the head of the Nene or fift Auon it selfe, of whose courses there is no Carde but doth make sufficient mention, and therefore your honour may behold in the same how they do coast the country, and also measure by compasses how this plot lyeth in respect of all the rest, contrary to common iudgement, which maketh Northampton to be the midst of our countrey. But to go forward with my description of the Ouze, which beyng past Oxford goeth to Isly, Bennington, Sanforde, Rodleye, Newnham, and so to Abington, without increase, where it receyueth the Oche, otherwyse called the Coche, a little beneth S. Helenes, which runneth thither of two brockets as I take it, whereof one cōmeth from Compton, out of the vale and west of the hill of the White horse, the other from Binges Letcombe and Wantage in Barkshire, and in one chanell entreth into the same, vpō the right side of his course. From Abington likewyse (taking the Arun withall southwest of Sutton courtney) it goeth by Applesord, long Wittenham, Clifton, Wittenham the lesse, and beneth Dorchester, taketh in the Tame water, from whence the Isis loseth the preheminence of the whole denomination of this ryuer, and is contented to imparte the same with the Tame, so that by the coniunction of these two waters, Thamesis is produced, & that name continued euen vnto the sea.

Widdest of England whereabouts.

Ocus.

Arun.

Thame ryuer ryseth in the easterly partes of Chilterne hils, towards Penley parke, at a towne called Tring west of the saide park, which is vij. myles from the stone bridge, that is betwene Querendon and Aylesburye (after the course of the water) as Leland hath set downe. Running therfore by long Merstō and Puttenham, Hucket and Scarton, it receyueth sone after a Ryll that commeth by Querendon from Hardwicke, and ere long an other on the other side that riseth aboue Wyndouer in the Chilterne, and passyng by Halton, Weston, Turrill, Broughton, and Aylesbury, it falleth into the Tame, west of the sayd towne, except my memory doe faile me. From this confluence, then the Tame goeth by Ethorpe, the Winchingtons, Coddington, Cherley, Notley Abbey, and comming almost to Tame, it receyueth one water from southeast aboue the sayd towne, and another also from the same quarter beneath the towne, so that Tame standeth enuironed vpon three sides, with three seuerall waters, as may be easily sene. The first of these commeth from the Chilterne east of Below or Bledlow, from whence it goeth to Hinton Horsenden, Kingsey, Towsey, and so into the Tame. The other descendeth also from the Chilterne, and goyng by Chinner, Crowell, Siddenham, and Tame parke, it falleth in the end into Tame water, and then they procede together as one, by Shabbington, Rycote parke, Dracote, Waterstoke, Milton, Cuddesdon, and Chiselton. Here also it taketh in another water from by east, whose hed commeth from Chilterne hils, not farre from Stocking church, in the way from Oxford to London. From whence it runneth to Weston (and mætyng beneth Curham with Watlington ryll) it goeth on to Chalgraue, Stadham, and so into the Thame. Frō hence our streame of Thame runneth to Newentō, Draton, Dorchester (sometyme a Bysshops see and a noble city) and so into the Thames, which hasteth in lyke sorte to Bensington, Crowmarshe or Wallingford, where it receyueth the Blaue, descendyng from Blauburg, now Blewbery as I learn. Thus haue I brought the Thames vnto Wallingforde, situate in the vale of white horse that rūneth a long therby. Frō hence it goeth by Newenham, Northstoke, Southstoke, Goring, Basildon, Pangburne, where it mæteth with a water that commeth from about Hamstede Norrys, runneth by Frizelham, Bucklebury, Stanford, Bradfeld, Tidmarsh, & Pangburne. After which confluence it goeth on betwene Mapledorham and Purley to Cauersham, and Cauersham manour, and a little beneath receyueth the Kenet that commeth therinto from Readyng.

Cenethus. The Kenet ryseth aboue Ouerton, v. or vj. myles west of Marleborow, or Marlingsborow as some call it, and then goyng by Fyfeld, Clatford, Faulon, and Pzestbure, vnto Marlebury, it holdeth on in lyke order to Ramsbury, and northwest of little Cote, taketh in a water by north descending from ẏ hils aboue Alburne chase, west of Alburne town. Thence it rūneth to little cote, Charnham strete, and beneth Charnham strete, it crosseth the Bedwin, which (taking ẏ Chalkburn rill withal) cōmeth frō great Bedwyne, & at Hūgerford also, two other in one botom somewhat beneth the towne. From hence it goeth to Auington, Kinbury, Hamsted marshall, Enburne, Newbery, and beneath thys towne, taketh in the Lamburne water that cōmeth by Isbiry, Egerton, the Sheffords, Welford, Borford, Donington Castle, and Shaw. From Newbery it goeth to Thatchā, Welhampton, Aldermaston, a little aboue which village, it receyueth the Alburne, an other broke increased wt sundry rilles, & thus goyng on to Padworth, Olton, and Bichael, it commeth at last to Readyng, where as I sayd it ioyneth with the Thames, and so they go forward as one by Sonning to Shiplake, and there on the east side receyue the Loddon that commeth downe thither from the south, as by his course appeareth.

Bedwinus. Chalkeburne. Lamburne Alburnus.

Lodunus. The Loddon ryseth in Hamshire betweene west Shirburne, and Wotton, towarde the southwest, afterwarde directyng his course toward the northwest, thorowe the vine, it passeth at the last by Bramley, and thorow a piece of Wiltshire to Stradfield, Swallowfield, Arberfield, Loddon bridge, leauyng a patch of Wiltshire on the right hande, as I haue bene informed. This Loddon not farre from Turges towne, receyueth two waters in one botome, whereof the westerly called Basingwater, commeth from Basingstoke, and thorow a parke vnto the aforesaid place. The other descendeth of two heds, from Mapledour well, and goeth by Shewes Newenham, Rotherwyke, and ere it come at Hartly, ioyneth with the Basing water, from whence they goe togyther to Turges, where they meete with the Loddon, as I haue sayd alredy. The next streame toward the south is called Ditsford broke. It ryseth not farre from Upton, goeth by Orwell and beneath Wharnborow castle, receyueth the Ikell (cōmyng with a parke of the same denomination) frō whence they go togither by Paddingley vnto Swallowfield, and so into the Loddon. In this voyage also, the Loddon meeteth with the Elwy or Eluey that commeth from Aldershare, not farre by west of Cuerley: and about Eluetham, likewyse with another cōming from Dogmansfield, named ẏ Deuke, and also the third not inferior to the rest, rōnyng from Erm, whose head is in Surrey, and goyng by Ashe, becommeth a limite, first betwene Surrey & Hamshire, then betwene Hamshire and Barkeshire, and passyng by Ashe, Erynley, blackewater, Yerley, & Finchamsted, it ioyneth at last with the Ditsford, before it come at Swalowfield. To conclude therfore with our Loddon, hauyng receiued all these waters, and after the last confluence with thē now beyng come to Loddon bridge, it passeth on by a part of Wiltshire to Twiford, then to Wargraue, and so into the Thames that now is meruelously increased and grown vnto triple greatnesse to that it was at Orford Being therfore past Shiplake and Wargraue, it runneth by Horsependen or Hardyng, then to Henley vpon Thames, where sometyme a great rill boyleth it selfe in the same. Then to Kemēham, Greneland (goyng all this way from Shiplake iust north, and now turnyng eastwards agayne) by Medenham, Hurley, Bysham, Marlow the greater, Marlow the lesse, it meteth with a broke sone after that consisteth of the water of two rilles, whereof the one called the Use, ryseth about west Wickham out of one of the Chiltern hils, and goeth frō thence to east Wickham or high Wickham, a prety market towne. The other named Higden, descendeth also from those mountaynes, but a myle beneath west Wickham, and ioyning both in one at ẏ last in the west ende of east wickham town, they go togyther to Woburn, Hedsor, and so into ẏ Thames. Some call it the Tide and that word do I vse in my former treatise, but to proceede. After this confluence, our Thames goeth on by Cowkham, Topley, Maydenhead (aliās Sudlington) Bray, Dozney, Clure, new Windsore, (takyng in neuertheless, at Eaton by ẏ way, the Burne which riseth out of a Moze, and commeth thither by Burneham) olde Windsor, Wraybozow, and a little by east therof, doth crosse the Cole, whereof I finde this short description ensuyng.

Ducus. Eryn. Use. Higden.

The Cole riseth nere vnto Hamsted, frō whence it goeth to Redburn, S. Bighels, S. Albons, Aldeham, Watford, and so by Moze to Richemansworth, where there is a confluence of three waters, of which this Cole is the first. The second called Gadus, riseth not farre from Asherige, an house or palace belongyng to the prince. From hence it runneth to great Gaddesden, Hemsted, betwene Colus, aliās Mere and Mertume. Gadus.

kinges Langley, and Abbots Langley, then to Hunters, and Cashew bridges, and so to Richmanswoorth, receyuing by the way a rill commyng from Albury by northwest, to Northchurch, Barkehamsted, and beneath Hemstede ioyning with the same. The last commeth in at northwest from aboue Chesham, by Chesham it selfe, then by Chesham Boys, Latimers, Mawdens, Cheynies, Sarret and Richemanswoorthe, and so going on all in one Chanell, vnder the name of Cole, it rūneth to Vrbridge, where it taketh in the Misenden water, from northwest, which rising aboue Misenden the greater, goeth by Misenden the lesse, Hagmondesham (now Hammersh̄) the Hache, Chalfhunt Gyles, Chalfhunt S. Peters, Denham, and then into the Cole aboue Vrbridge as I sayd. Some after this our Cole doth parte it selfe into two braunches, neuer to ioyne agayne before they come at the Thames, for the greater of them goeth thorow the goodly medowes streight to Colbroke, the other vnto two milles, a mile and a halfe east of Colbroke in the way to London, leauyng an Iland or betwene them of no small size and quantitie.

Vindeles. Beyng past the Cole, we come to the fal of the Vindeles, which riseth by northwest nere vnto Bagshot, frō whence it goeth to Windlesham, Chobham, and meetyng with a Bracket commyng westward from Wisley, they run togyther toward Chertesey, where when they haue met with a small rill rising north of Sonning hill in Windlesor great parke, it falleth into the Thames on ẏ north east side of Chertesey. When we were come beyonde this water, it was not long ere we came vnto another on the same side, that fell into the Thames betwene Shepperton on the one side, and Oteland on the other, and is called the Waye.

Veius. The Weie or the Waye rising by west, cōmeth from Oxted, and some after taking the Hedley broke with all (which riseth in Wulmere forrest, and goeth by Hedley & Frensham) hasteth by Bentley, Farnham, Alton, Wayberley, Elsted, and so to Pepper Harrow, where it ioyneth with the Thuresby water, which commeth not farre of from a village of the same denomination. From hence also it goeth to Godalmyng, and then toward Shawford, but ere it come there, it crosseth Crauly becke, which rising somewhere about ẏ edge of Sussex shoot of Ridgewyke, goeth by Hachery parke, Knoll, Crauly, Bramley, Wonarshe, & so into the Waye. From hence then our ryuer goeth to Shawford (and some after meeting with the Abbinger water that commeth by Shere, Albury, and the chappell on the hill) it procedeth to Guldeford, thence to Stoke, Sutton in the parke, Send, Woking, and at Newarke parke side, taketh in a broke that ryseth of two heds, whereof one doth spring betwene two hils north of Pepper harrow, and so runneth thorow Henley parke, the other aboue Purbright, and afterward ioyning in one, they go forth vnto Newarke, and being there vnited, after the confluence it goeth to Purford court, to Byfler, Mayfrede, Oteland, and so into the Thames.

Abbinger. Molis. Frō Oteland the Thames goeth by Walton, Sunbury, Iwell, Moulsey, Hampton, and ere it come at Hampton cowrte on the north side, and east Moulsey on the other, it taketh in the Moule water, which geueth name vnto the two townes that stande on eche side of the place, where it falleth into our streame. It ryseth in Woodforrest, & going by Burstow, it meeteth afterward with another gullet, conteyning a small course from two seuerall heds, whereof one is also in the forrest aforenamed, the other rūneth from Bebush wood, and comming by Ifeld, meeteth with the first aboue Horley, and so run on in one chanell, I say, till they ioyne with the Moule water, whereof I spake before. After this confluence in lyke sorte, it is not long ere the Moule take in another from by North, which commeth from about Betham, on the one side, and another on the other, runnyng by Oxley and Capell, and whereinto also a braunch or rill commeth from a wood on the northwest part. Finally, beyng thus encreased with these many rilles, it goeth by east Bechewoorth, west Bechewoorth, and ouer against the Swalow on the side of Drake hil, takyng in another that commeth thither frō Wotton by Darkyng and Milton, it rūneth to Nickleham, Letherhed, Stoke, Cobham, Athire parke, east Moulsey, and so into the Thames, which after this coniunction goeth on to Kingston, and there also meeteth with another becke, rising at Ewell south of Nonsuch. Certes, this rill goeth from Ewell by ẏ olde parke, then to Maudon, and so to Kingston towne. The Thames in lyke maner beyng past Kingston, goeth by Tuddington, Petersham, Twickenham, Richmond, and Shene, where it receyueth a water on the northwest side, which commyng from about Harrow on the hill, and by west of the same, goeth by Hayes, Harlington, Feltham, and Thistlewoorth into the Thames.

Thuresby. Crawley. Brame. The nert fall of water is at Sion, nere vnto new Brainford, so that it issueth into the Thames betwene them both. This water is called Brane, that is in the Brittish tong (as Leland saith) a frogge. It riseth about Edgeworth, and commeth from thence by Kingesbiry, Twiford, Perriuall, Hanwell, and Auferley. Thence we followed our riuer to old Brētford, Norlach, Cheswyke, Barnelmes, Fulham and Putney, beneth which townes it crossed a becke from Wandlesworth, that ryseth at Woodmans turne, and goyng by Ealthalton, nieteth another comming from Croydon by Bedington, and so goyng on to Mitcham, Marton Abbey & Wandlesworth, it is not long ere it fall into the Thames.

Wandbarn

Next vnto this is the Maryburne rill on the other side, which commeth in by Saynt James, so that by this tyme we haue eyther brought the Thames, or the Thames conueighed vs to London, where we rested for a season to take viewe of the seuerall tydes there, of which eth one differeth frō other, by 24. minuts, that is 48. in an whole day, as I haue noted afore, except the wether alter thē. Beyng past London, and in the way toward the sea: the first water that it meeteth with al, is on Kent side, west of Grenewich, whose hed is in Bromley parish, and goyng from thence to Lewsham, it taketh in a water frō by east, & so directeth hys course forth right vnto the Thames.

Lée.

The next water that it meeteth withall, is on Esser side, almost agaynst Woolwiche, and that is the Lée, whose hed riseth shorte of Kempton in Hertfordshire, 4. myles south east of Luton, and goyng thorowe a peece of Brokehall park (leauing Woodhall park, on the north, and Hatfield on the south, with an other park adioyning) it goeth toward Hartford towne. But ere it come ther, it receiueth a water (peraduenture the Marran) rising at northwest in Brodewater hundred frō aboue Welwin, northeast of Digeswell, & going to Hartingfeld bury, wher the said cōfluence is within one mile of the towne. Beneth Hatfield also it receyueth the Beane (as I gesse) commyng from Borwood by Benington, Alton, Watton, and Staplefford, and a little lower, the third arme of increase from aboue Ware, which descēdeth frō two heds: whereof the greatest commeth from Barkeway in Edwinstre hundred, the other from Sandon in Oddesey hundred, and after they be met beneth little Hormeade, they goe togither by Pulcherchurche, or Puckriche, Stonden, Thundridge, Wadesmill, Benghō and so into the Lée, which from hence runneth on tyll it come at Ware, and so to Amwell, where on the north side it receiueth the water that commeth from little Hadhā, thorow a peece of Singleshall parke, then by great Hadham, and so from Widford to the aforesayde towne. From hence also they go as one to olde Stanstede called le veil, braunchyng in such wyse ere it come there, that it runneth thorow the towne in sundry places. Thence it goeth forth to Abbots Stāsted, beneath which it meeteth wyth the Stoure, west as I remember, of Roydon. This Sture riseth at Wendelbotes, from whence it goeth to Langley, Clauerynge, Berden Manhuden, & Bytcheanger (where it receyueth a rill commyng from Elsinghā & Stanstede Mountfitchet.) Thence it hyeth on to bishoppes Stourford, Sabrichworth, and beneath this town, crosseth with another frō the east side of Elsingham, that goeth to Hatfield Brodock, Shiryng, Harlo, and so into the Stoure, and from whence they goe togither to Elsbye, Parmedon, and next into the Lée. These thinges beyng thus perfourmed, the Lée runneth on beneth Hoddesdon, Broxburne, Wormley, where a water breaketh out by west of the maine streame, a mile lower then Wormely it selfe, but yet within the parosche, and is called Wormeley locke. It runneth also by Cheston Munry, and out of this a little beneath the sayde house, breaketh an arme called the Shirelake; because it deuideth Essex and Hartford shires in sunder, and in the length of one medow called Frithey, this lake rūneth not but at great floudes, and meeteth agayne with a succor of ditchwater, at a place called Hockesdich, half a myle from his first breakyng out, and half myle lower at Parsh point, ioyneth agayne with the streame from whence it came before. Thence commeth the first arme to S. Pauly bridge (the first bridge westward frō that tyme) vppon Waltham causey, and halfe a myle lower then Pauly bridge at the corner of Ramney meade, it meeteth with the kinges streame, and principal course of Lye or Lée, as it is commonly called. The second principall arme breaketh out of the kynges streame at Hallyfielde halfe a myle lower then Cheston Munnery, and so to the fullyng mill and two bridges by west of the kynges streame, whereinto it falleth about a stones cast lower at a place called Walkinshelf, except I was wrong informed. Chesson and Hartfordshire men say, do say that the kings streame at Waltham, doth part Hartfordshire and Esser, but the Esser men by forrest charter do plead their liberties to holde vnto S. Paulies bridge. On the east side also of ỳ kinges streame breaketh out but one principall arme at Hatfield, three quarters of a myle aboue Waltham, and so goeth to the corne mill in Waltham, and then to ỳ kings streame streame agayne, a little beneath the kynges bridge. From hence the Lée runneth on till it come to Stretforde Langthorne, where it braunceth partly of it selfe, and partly by mans industry for mils. Howbeit herein the dealyng of Alfrede sometyme king of England, was not of smallest force, who understandyng the Danes to be gotten vp wyth their ships into the countrey, there to kil and slay, by the conduct of this ryuer: he in the meane tyme before they could returne, dyd so mightely weaken the mayne chanell by drawyng great numbers of trenches from the same, that when they purposed to come back, there was nothyng so much water left as the ships dyd draw, wherfore being set on ground, they were some fired, and the aduersaries ouercome. Finally beyng past Westham, it is not long ere it fal into ỹ Thames. One thyng I read more of this riuer before the conquest, that is, how Edward the first, ꝛ sonne of Alfrede, builded Hartford towne vpon it, in the yeare of grace 912. at which tyme also he had Wittham a town in Esser in hande as hys sister called Aelfiede repayred Oxford and London, and all this 4. yeres before the buildyng of Maldon. But concernyng our ryuer it is noted, that he buylded Hertford or Herudford betwene 3. waters, that is, the Lée, the Benefuth, and Memmaran, but how these waters are distinguished in these dayes, as yet I cannot tell. It is possible, that the Bene may be the same which commeth by Benington, and Benghow, which if it be so, then must the Memmarran be the same that descendeth from Whitwel, for not farre from thence is Brantfield, which might in tyme past right well be called Marranfield, for of lyke inuersion of names I coulde shew many examples.

Beyng past the Lée (whose chanell is begun to bé purged 1576. with further hope to bring the same to the north side of London) we come vnto the Rodon, vpon Esser side in lyke maner, and not very farre (for 4. miles is the most) from the fall of the Lée. This water ryseth at little Canfielde, from whence it goeth to great Canfield, high Roding, Eythorpe Roding, Leden Roding, White Roding, Beauchampe Roding, Fifield, Shelley, high Ongar, and Chepyng Ongar, where the Lauer falleth into it, that ariseth betwixt Matchyng and high Lauer, and takyng another rill withall commyng from aboue Northweld at Cheping Ongar, they ioyne I say with the Rhodō, after which confluēce, Leland coniecureth that ỹ streame is called Iuel: for my part, I wote not what to say of it, but hereof I am sure that ỹ whole course beyng past Ongar, it goeth to Stansted riuers, Theydon mounte, Heybridge, Chigwell, Woodford bridge, Ilford bridge, Barkyng and so into the Thames.

The Darwent meeteth with our sayde Thames vpon Kentes side, two myles and more beneth Erith. It riseth at Tanridge, or thereaboutes, as I haue bene informed by Chrystofer Sartons Card late made of the same, and all the seuerall shyres of England at the infinite charges of sir Thomas Sackforde knight, and maister of the requestes, whose zeale vnto his countrey herein I cannot but remember, and so much the rather, for that he meaneth to imitate Ortelius, and somewhat beside this hath holpen me in the names of the townes, by which these ryuers doe run. Would to God hys plats were once finished. But to proceede. The Darwent I say, rising at Tanridge, goeth on by Titsey toward Brasted, and receiuyng on eche side of that towne (and seuerall bankes) a riuer or rill, it goeth on to Rockhold, Shorehā, Kinsford, Horton, Darnehith, Dartford or Derwentford, and there takyng in the Cray on the left hand that commeth from Orpington by Mary Cray, Powles Cray, North Cray, and Crayforde, it is not long ere it fall into the Thames.

Darwent.

Crayc.

The nert water that falleth into the Thames, is west of the Mauay Iles, a rill of no great fame, neyther long course, for rising about Cozingham, it runneth not many miles east ꝛ by south, ere it fall into ỹ mouth of this riuer, which I doe now describe.

The chiefe hed of this streame, ryseth in Wold forrest, southwest of Eastgrenested, ꝛ goyng by Hartfield and Whetelin, it receiueth a rill from the second hed, that commeth in from south east, and eyther from the north side of Argas hill, or at the left wise out of the south part of Waterdon forrest, as Sarton hath set it downe. After this confluence it is not long ere it take in another by west, from Colwden warde, and the third aboue Penshurst, growing frō two heds, whereof one is in Lingfield parke, the other west of Crawherst: and ioyning aboue Edinbridge, it doth fall into the Midway beneth Hever towne, ꝛ Chiddingstone. From Penhirst our mayne streame hasteth to Ligh, Tunbridge, ꝛ Twidley, and beneth the towne, it crosseth a water from North, whereof one hed is at the Hote, another at Wrotham, the thirde at west Peckham, and likewyse an other from south east, that runneth east of Capell. Nert after this it receiueth the These, whose forked hed is at Tischirst, which descendyng downe toward the north, taketh in not far frō Scotny Medeuius. This riuer is described alredy, but here with more diligence, better helpe, and after their opinion that accompt it not to fall into the sea but into ỹ Thames.

a bꝛoke out of the noꝛthside of Waterdē foꝛeſt, whoſe name I find not except it be the Dour. After this confluence our ryuer goeth to Goldhirſt, and commyng to the Twiſt, it bꝛaunceth in ſuch wyſe that one parte of it runneth into Midwaye, another into the Garan oꝛ rather Cranebꝛoke, if my coniecture be any thyng. The Garan as Leland calleth it, oꝛ the Crane as I do take it, riſeth nere to Cranebꝛoke, and goyng by Sillinghirſt, it receyueth ere long one water that commeth by Fretingdon, and another that runneth from great Charde by Smerdon & Hedcoꝛn, croſſing two rils by the way from by noꝛth, Hedcoꝛne it ſelfe ſtanding betweene thē both. Finally, the Garan oꝛ Crane mꝫtyng with the Midway ſouth of Pallyng, they on ỹ one ſide, and the Theſe on the other, leaue a pꝛety Iſland in the midſt, of foure miles in lēgth and two miles in bꝛedth, wherin is ſome hilly ſoyle, but neyther towne noꝛ village, ſo far as I remember. From Palling foꝛward, the Midway goeth to weſt Farlegh, eaſt Farlegh, and ere it come at Maidſtone, it entertayneth a rill that riſeth ſhoꝛt of Jenham, & goeth by Ledes and Otterinden. Being paſt Maidſtone, the Midway runneth by Allington, Snodland, Hallyng, Cuckſtane, Rocheſter, Chatham, Gillingham, Upchurch, and ſone after bꝛaunching, it embꝛaceth ỹ Grene at hys fall, as his two heds do Aſhdon foꝛeſt, that lyeth betwene them both. I would haue ſpoken of one creke that cōmeth in at Cliffe, and another that runneth downe from Halſto by S. Maries, but ſithe I vnderſtand not with what backewaters they be ſerued, I let them paſſe as not skilfull of their courſes. And thus much of the riuers that fal into the Thames, wherin I haue done what I may, but not what I would foꝛ myne owne ſatiſfaction, till I came from the hed to Lechelade.

Auon.

Being paſſed the Thames and hauing as I thinke ſufficiently in my foꝛmer treatiſe deſcribed all ſuch waters as are to be found betwéene the Stoure in Kent, & Auon in Wiltſhire, it reſteth that I pꝛocéede with this ryuer, and here ſupply many thinges that I befoꝛe omitted, although not by mine owne ouerſight ſo much as by the abuſe of ſuch as ſhoulde haue better pꝛeſerued the pamphlets to be inſerted. Certes this Auon is a godly riuer ryſing as I ſaydc beforе néere vnto Wolfe hall, although he that will ſéke moꝛe ſcrupulouſlye foꝛ the head in déede, muſt looke foꝛ the ſame about the boꝛders of the foꝛeſt of Sauernake (that is Soure oke) which lieth as if it wer embꝛaced betwene ỹ firſt armes therof, as I haue bene enfoꝛmed. Theſe heds alſo do make a confluence by eaſt of Martinſhall hill, and weſt of Wotton. From thēce it goeth to Hilton, Powſey, Manningfield Abbey, Manningfielde croſſe, & beneth Newington taketh in one rill weſt from Rudboꝛow, and another a little lower that riſeth alſo weſt of Alcanninges, and runneth into the ſame by Patney, Merden, Wilſoꝛd, Charleton, and Ruſhal. Beyng therfoꝛe paſt Newington, it goeth to Aphauen (wherof Leland ſpeaketh) to Cheſilbury, Cumpton, Ablington, little Almſbury, Darntfoꝛd, Woodfoꝛd, olde Saliſbury, and ſo to newe Saliſburye, where it receiueth one notable riuer from by noꝛthweſt, and another frō noꝛth eaſt, which two I wyll firſt deſcribe, leauyng the Auon at Saliſbury. The firſt of theſe is called the Wilugh, and riſeth among the Deuerels, and runnyng thence by hill Deuerell, & Deuerell long bꝛidge, it goeth toward byſhops ſtraw, taking in one rill by weſt, and another from Upton by Werminſter at noꝛthweſt. From biſhops ſtraw it goeth to Noꝛtō, Upton, Badhampton, Steplyngfoꝛd, and Stapleſoꝛd, where it mēeteth with the Winterbury water from by noꝛth, deſcending from Maddenton by Winterburne. From Stapleſoꝛd it haſteth to Wiſhfoꝛd, Newtō, Chilhampton, Wilton, and thither cōmeth a water vnto it from ſouthweſt, which ryſeth of two heds aboue Duerdonet. After this it goeth by Woꝛdcaſtle, to Tiſbury, and there receiueth a water on eche ſide, whereof one cōmeth from Funthill, the other from two iſſues (of which one riſeth at Aulſy, the other at Swalodiſe) and ſo keppng on ſtill with his courſe, our Wilugh runneth next nert of all by Sutton. Thence it goeth to Fouant, Boberſtocke, Southburcombe, Wilton, (where it taketh in the Fomington oꝛ Nadder water) Weſtharnam Saliſbury and Eaſtharnam, and this is the race of Wilugh. The other is a naked arme oꝛ ſtreame without any bꝛaunches. It riſeth aboue Collingburne Kingſton in the hils, and thence goeth to Colingburne, the Tidwoꝛthes (wherof ỹ moꝛe ſoutherly is in Wiltſhire) Shipton, Cholterton, Newton, Toney, Idmerſon, Poꝛton, the Winterburnes, Lauerſtock, and ſo into Auō eaſt of Sariſbury. And thus is the confluence made of the afoꝛeſayd waters, with thys our ſecond Auon, whereinto another water falleth (called Becquithes bꝛoke) a nyle beneth Harneham bꝛidge, whoſe head is fiue miles from Sarum, and thꝛée myles aboue Becquithes bꝛidge, as Lelande doth remember, who noteth the Chalkeburne water to haue hys due recourſe alſo, at thys place into the afoꝛeſayde riuer. Certes it is a pꝛetye bꝛoke, and riſeth fiue myles from Shaftelbury, bury, and in the way toward Salisbury in a botom on the right hand, whence it commeth by Knightō and Fennystratford, to Honington, that is about 12. myles from the hed, and about two miles and an halfe from Honington beneth Dostocke, goeth into the Auon, a mile lower then Harnham bridge, except he forget himselfe. This Harneham whereof I now entreate, was sometime a prety village before the creation of new Salisbury, & had a church of S. Martine belongyng vnto it, but now in steade of this church there is onely a barne standyng in a very low meade on the northside of S. Nighels hospitall. The cause of the relinquishyng of it was the moistnesse of the soile, very oft ouerflowen. And whereas the kinges high way lay sometyme thorough Milton, licence was obteyned of the kyng & bishop of Salisbury, to remoue that passage vnto new Salisbury also, & vpō this occasion was the maine bridge made ouer Auon at Harneham. By this exchaunge of the way also olde Salisbury fel into vtter decay, and Milton which was before the hed towne of the shire, and furnished with 12. paroche churches, grew to be but a poore village, and of small reputation. Howbeit, this was not the onelye cause of the ruine of olde Salisbury, sith I read of two other, wherof the first was a salue vnto the latter, as I take it. For where as it was giuen out that the townesmen wanted water in olde Salisbury, it is flat otherwise, sithe that hill is very plentifully serued with springes and wels of very sweete water. The truth of ỳ matter therfore is this. In the tyme of ciuill warres, the souldiors of the castle and Chanons of olde Sarum fell at oddes, in so much that after often brawles, they fell at last to sad blowes. It happened therfore in a Rogation weeke that the clergy goyng in solemne procession, a cōtrouersie fell betwene them about certayne walkes and limites, which the one side claymed and the other denied: Such also was the whote entertainement on eche part, that at the last the Castellanes espying their tyme, gate betweene the clergy and the towne, and so copled them as they returned homeward, ỳ they feared any more to gange about their bounds for ỳ yere. Hereupon the people missing their belly chere (for they were wont to haue bāketting at euery station, a thing practised by the religious in old tyme wherewith to linke in the cōmons vnto them) they conceyued forthwith a deadly hatred against the Castellanes, but not beyng able to cope with them by force of armes, they consulted with their bishop, and he with them so effectually, that it was not long ere they, I meane the Chanons, began a church vpō a pece of their owne ground, pretending to serue God there in better safetie, and with farre more quietnesse then they could do before. The people also seyng the diligence of the chanons, and reputyng their harmes for their owne inconuenience, were as earnest on the other side to be nere vnto these prelates, and therfore euery man brought hys house vnto that place, & thus became old Sarum in few yeres vtterly desolate, and new Salisbury rayled vp in stede therof, to the great decay also of Harnham and Milton, whereof I spake of late. Nowe to returne agayne from whence I thus digressed. Our Auon therefore departyng from Sarisbury, goeth by Burtforde, Longford, and taking in the waters afore mencioned by the way, it goeth by Stanley, Dunketon, Crafforde, Burgate, Fordyng bridge, Kingwood, Auon, Chrystes church, and finally into the sea. But ere it come all there, and a little beneth Chrystes church, it crosseth the Stoure, or Sture, a very faire stream, whose course is such as may not be lefte vntouched. It ryseth of fiue heds, wherof three lie on the north side of the Parke at Sturton within the pale, the other ryse without the parke, and of this riuer the towne and Barony of Sturton doth take his name as I gesse, for except my memory do to much faile me, the lord Sturton giueth the fiue heds of the said water in hys armes, but to procēde. After these braunches are conioyned in one botome, it goeth to long Layme mill, Stiltō, Milton, and beneth Gillingham receyueth a water that descendeth from Pere. Thence ỳ Sture goeth to Bugley, Stoure, Wellcouer bridge, Stourpronell, and ere long taketh in the Cale water, from Pen that commeth downe by Wickhampton, to Mozeland, and so to Stapleford, vij. miles from Wickhampton, passing in the sayd voyage, by Wine Caunton, and the fiue bridges. After this cōfluence, it runneth to Hinton Maries, & some after crosseth the Lidden and deuilish waters all in one chanell, whereof the first ryseth in Blackmore vale, and goeth to bishops Caūdell: the second in the hils south of Pulham, and so runneth to Lidlinch: the third water issueth nere Ibberton, and goyng by Fisehed to Lidlington, and there meetyng wyth the Lidden, they receiue the blackewater aboue Baggeburne, and so go into the Stour. After this the Stoure runneth on to Stouretō minster, Fitleford, Hammond (and some after takyng in one water that commeth frō Hargraue by west Orchard, and a seconde frō Funtmill, it goth on to Thele, Ankeford, Handford, Durwelton, Knightō, Wianston, Cliff. Blandford, Carleton, and croſſing ere long a rill that riſeth about Tarrent, and goeth to Launſton, Munketon, Caunſton, Tarrant, it proceedeth forth by Shepwyc, and by and by receyuing an other brooke on the right hand (that riſeth about Strickeland, and goeth by Quarleſton, Whitchurch, Anderſtō & Winterburne) it haſteth forward to Stourminſter, Berforde lake, Alen bridge, Winburne, aliās Twinburne minſter, whether commeth a water called Alen (from Knoltō, Wilkehāpton, Eſtambridge, Hinton, Barnſley) which hath two heds, wherof one ryſeth short of Woodcotes, and eaſt of Farneham, named Terig, the other at Munketon aboue S. Giles Winburne, and goyng thence to S. Gyles Alheley, it taketh in the Horton beck, as the Horton doth the Cranburne. Finally, meeting with the Terig aboue Knoltō, they run on vnder the name of Alen to the Stour, which goeth to the Canfordes, Preſton, Kingſton, Perley, and Polneſk. But ere it come at Polneſk, it taketh in two brookes in one bottom, wherof one commeth frō Woodland parke by Holt parke and Holt, another from aboue vpper Winburne, by Edmondeſham, Vertwood, and Pannington, & ioyning about S. Leonardes, they go to Hornbridge, and ſo into Stoure. After which confluence, the ſayd Stoure runneth by Iuor bridge, and ſo into Auon, leauyng Chriſtes church aboue the meeting of the ſayde waters, as I haue ſayd before.

Hauyng in this manner paſſed Chriſtes church hed, we come to the fall of the Burn, which is a little brooke runnyng frō Stourefield heath, without braunches, and not touched in my former voiage for want of knowledge, and information therof in tyme.

Burne.

When we had left the Burne behynde vs, we entred Pole hauen, now far better known vnto me then it was at the firſt. Goyng therfore into the ſame, betwene the north and the ſouth pointes, to ſee what waters wer there, we left Brunkeſey Iſland and the caſtle on the left hand within the ſaid pointes, and paſſing about by Pole, and leauing that Creke, becauſe it hath no freſh, we came by Holton and Keſworth, where we beheld two falles, of which one was called the north, the other the ſouth waters. The north ſtreame hight Piddle as I heare. It riſeth about Alton, and goeth from there to Piddle trenche hed Piddle hinton, Walterſtow, and ere it come at Birſtā, receiueth Deuils brooke that cōmeth thither from Bugham, and Melcombe by Deuilish-town. Thence it goeth to Tow piddle, Aſhe piddle, Turners piddle (taking in ere it come there, a water that runneth from Helton by Middleton, Milburne and Biere) then to Hide, and ſo into Pole hauen, and of this water Marianus Scotus ſpeaketh, except I be deceyued. The ſouth water is properly called Frome for Fraine. It riſeth nere vnto Euerſhot, and going down by Fromequitain, Chelmington, and Catſtocke, it receyueth there a rill from beſide Rowſham, and Wizarehall. After this it goeth on to Chilfrome, and thence to Maden Newtō, where it meeteth with the Dwke, that riſeth eyther two miles aboue Yokeparke at Kenforde, or in the great ponde within Yoke parke, and goyng by the Tollardes, falleth into the Frome about Maden Newton, and ſo go as one from there to Fromevauchirch, Crokelwey, Frampton, and Muckilford, and receiueth nere vnto the ſame a rill frō aboue Upſidlyng by S. Nicholas Sidlyng, and Grimſton. From hence it goeth on by Stratton & Bradford Peuerell, and beneath this Bradford, it croſſeth the Silley, aliās Mintern and Cherne brookes both in one chanell: whereof the firſt riſeth in vpper Cherne pariſh, the other at Minterne, and meeting aboue middle Cherne, they go by nether Cherne, Forſton, Godmanſton, and aboue Charneminſter into Frome. In ỹ meane time alſo our Frome braunceth and leaueth an Iſlande aboue Charneminſter, and ioyning agayne nere Dorcheſter, it goeth by Dorcheſter, & Forthington, but ere it come at Beckington, it meeteth with an other Becke that runneth thereinto from Winterburne, Stapleton, Martinſtow, Heringſtow, Caine and Stalford, and from thence goeth without any further increaſe as yet to Beckington, Kinghton, Tinkleton, Horton, Wooll, Bindon, Stoke, and beneath Stoke, receiueth ỹ iſſue of the Luckeforde lake, from whence alſo it paſſeth by Eaſtholme, Warham, and ſo into the Bay. From this fall, we went about the arnie point by Slepe, where we ſaw a little creke, then by Owre, where we beheld an other, and then commyng againe toward the entraunce by S. Helens, and Furley caſtell, we went abroade into the maine, and founde our ſelues at liberty.

Frome. Deuils. Silley. Mintern. Cherne. Luckford.

When we were paſt Pole hauen, we left the handfaſt point, the Peuerell point, S. Adelmes chappell, and came at laſt to Lughort hauen, wherby and alſo the Luckeforde lake, all this portion of ground laſt remembred, is left in maner of a byland or peninſula, and called the Iſle of Burbecke, wherin is good ſtore of alam. In lyke ſort goyng ſtill weſterly, we came to Sutton pointes, where is a creeke. Then vnto Way or Wilemouth, by kinges Welcombe, whereinto when we were entred, we ſaw three falles, whereof the firſt and greateſt commeth from Upwey by Bradwey, and Radypoll, receiuyng afterward the ſecond that ran from eaſt Chekerell, and likewiſe the third that maketh the grounde betwene Weymouth and Smalmouth paſſage almoſt an Iſlande. Goyng by Portland and the point therof, called ỳ Raſe, we ſayled along by the Shingle, till we came by S. Katherines chappel, where we ſaw the fal of a water that came downe from Blackden Beaconward, by Portelham and Abbotesbury. Thence we went to another that fell into the ſea, nere Byxton, and deſcended from Litton by Chilcombe, then vnto the Byde or Byxte porte, a pretty hauen and the ryuer it ſelfe ſerued with ſundry waters. It riſeth as I ſayd before, halfe a myle or more aboue Bemiſter, and ſo goeth from Bemiſter to Netherbury by Parneham, then to Melplaſhe, and to Byxteport, where it taketh in two waters from by eaſt in one chanel, of which one ryſeth eaſt of Pettlecourt, and goeth by Porteſloke, and Milton, the other at Alkerwell, & runneth by Longlether. From hence alſo our Byde goyng toward the ſea, taketh the Simen on the weſt that commeth by Simenſburge into the ſame, the whole ſtreame ſone after fallyng into the ſea, and leauyng a pretty hauenet.

Byde. Nature hath ſet the mouth of this ryuer in maner betwixt two hils, ſo that a little coſt would make a hauen there.

Simen.

The next porte is the Chare, ſerued wyth two rilles in one confluence, beneath Charemouth. The cheefe hed of this riuer is as Leland ſayth in Marſhewode parke, and commeth downe by Whitchurch: the other runneth by weſt of Wotton, and meetyng beneth Charemouth towne, as I ſaid, doth fall into the ſea.

Chare.

Then came we to the Cobbe, and beheld the Lime water, which the townelmen call the Buddle, and is already deſcribed vnder ỳ ſame denomination. Certes, there is no haue here that I could ſee, but a quarter of a mile by weſt ſouthweſt of ỳ towne, is a great and coſtly Jutty in the ſea for ſuccour of ſhippes. The towne is diſtaunt from Colyton, about 5. miles, and here we ended our voyage from the Auon, which conteyneth the whole coſt of Dorcester, or Dorcetſhire, ſo that next we muſt enter into Somerſet Countie, and ſee what waters are there.

Buddle.

The firſt water that we meete with all in Somerſetſhire is ỳ Are, which riſeth as you haue heard, not far from Bemiſter, and to ſay it more preciſely nere vnto Cheddington in Dorſetſhire, from whence it runneth to Moſterne, Febrow, Clayton, Weyforde bridge, Winham fourde, and receiuing one rill from the eaſt by Hawkechurch, and ſone after another comming from northweſt by Churchſtoke, from Wainbroke, it goeth to Areminſter, beneath which it croſſeth the Pare, that commeth from about Buckland, by Whitſtaunton, Parecomb, Long bridge, Stockeland, Kilmington bridge (where it receiueth a broke from by ſouth, that runneth by Dalwood) and ſo into the Are. From hence our Are goth to Drake, Puſbury, Cullyford, but ere it come altogither at Cullifoꝛd, it meteth wt a water ỳ riſeth aboue Cotlei, & goeth frō thēce by Widworthy, Cullitō, & there receiuing a rill alſo procedeth on after ỳ cōfluence aboue Cullifoꝛd bridge into the Are, & frō thence hold on together into ỳ maine ſea.

Are. yare aliâs Irtey.

By weſt of Berewoꝛth point lieth a creke ſerued ſo farre as I remember, with a freſhe water that commeth from the hils ſouth of Southley to Branſcombe.

Sidmouth hauen is the nert, and thither cōmeth a freſhwater by S. Maries from the ſayd hils that goeth from S. Maries afoꝛeſaid, to Sidbury, and betwene Saltcombe & Sidmouth into the maine ſea.

Sid.

By weſt of Auterton point alſo lyeth another hauen, and thither commeth a pretty riueret, whoſe hed is in the Hackpendon hils, and commeth downe firſt by Apauter, then by a parke ſide to mohuns Auter, Punketō, Honnyton, Buckewell, and noꝛth of Autry receiueth a rill called Tale, that riſeth noꝛth weſt of Broadembury in a woode, and from whence it runneth by Pehembury, Uinnitō, and making a confluence with the other, they go as one betwene Cadde and Autry, to Herford, Luton, Collaton, Auterton, Budeley and ſo into the ſea. This riuer is afoꝛe deſcribed vnder the name of Otterey, as Leland left it vnto me: now will I caſt about the Start point that I may come to Exe.

The Exe riſeth in Exemoꝛe in Somerſetſhire (as I ſaid befoꝛe out of Leland) and goeth from thence to Exeford, Winſford, and Exton where it receiueth a water comming from Cutcombe by noꝛth. After this confluence it goeth on toward the ſouth, till it meete with a pretty brook, riſing noꝛtheaſt of Whettel (goyng by Brunton regis) increaſed at the left with three rilles which come all from by noꝛth. Theſe beyng once met, this water rūneth on by weſt of the beacon that beareth ỳ name of Haddon, and ſone after taketh in the Barle that receiueth in like ſoꝛt ỳ Done at Hawkebridge, and from hence goeth by Dauerton, and Combe, and then doth meete with the Exe, almoſt in the very confines betwene Doꝛſet and Somerſet ſhires. Beyng paſt this coniunction our Exe, paſſeth betwene Bruſhford and Purbath, and then to Woodburn. whereof one commeth from Dirforde and Baunton, the other called Woodburne, somewhat by east of Okeforde. From these mætinges it goeth to Caue & thorough ỹ forrest and woodes to Hatherland and Washfields vntill it come to Tiuerton, and here it receiueth the Lomund water, that ryseth aboue Alhebrittle, and commeth downe by Hockworthy vpper Loman, and so to Tiuerton that standeth almost euen in the very cõfluẽce. Some cal this Lomũd the Simming

Lomund or Simming. brooke or Sunninges bathe. After this our Ere, goeth to Bickley, Theuerten (taking in a rill by west) nether Ere, Bramford, beneath which it ioyneth with the Columbe, Columb. that riseth of one heade, northeast of Clary Haydon, and of another south of Shildõ, and mæting beneath Columbe stocke, goeth by Columbe and Bradfeld, and there crossing a rill that commeth by Ashforde, it runneth south to Wode, Noze haies, Columbton, Brandnicke, Beare, Columbe John, Horham, and ioyning as I sayde wyth the Ere at Brafod it passeth vnder but one bridge, ere it mæte wyth another water by west,

Cride. Fozten. growyng of the Fozten and Cryde waters, except it bee so that I doe iudge amisse. The Cride riseth aboue Wollesworthy, and nære vnto Upton, after it is past Dewrish, crossleth a rill from betæwne Puggill and Stockley by Stocke englishe, &c. From hence it goeth to Fulford where it mæteth with the Fozten, whereof one braunche commeth by Caldbrook, the other from S. Mary Tedburne, and ioyning aboue Crediton, the chanell goeth on to the Cride (which ere long also receiueth another from by northe, cõming by Stockley & Combe) then betwene Haine and Newton Sires to Pines and so into the Ere which stayeth not vntill it come to Excester. From Excester it runneth to Were there taking in a rill from by west, and another lower by Eremister, next of all vnto

Cliuus. Toppesham, beneath which towne the Cliue entereth ther into, which rising about Plymtree, goeth by Clift Haydon, Clift Laurence, Brode Clift, Honiton, Southõ, bishops Clift, S. Mary Clyst, Clyst S. George, & then into the Ere, that runneth forward by Notwel Court, Limstõ and Ponderham castle. Here

Ken. as I here, it taketh in the Ken (or Kenton brooke, as Leland calleth it) commyng from Holcombe Parke, by Dunsdike, Shillingford, Kenford, Ken, Kenton, and so into Ere hauen, at whose mouth lye certaine rockes, which they call the chekellones, except I be deceiued.

The next fal, wherof Leland sayth nothing at all, commeth by Alhecombe and Dulish, and hath hys hed in the hils therby.

The Teigne mouth is the next fall that we Teigne. came vnto, and it is a goodly poze. The hed of this water is alredy touched in my first boke to be in Dartmoze among the Cidley hilles. From whence it goeth to Cydley towne, Crokerne Teignton dzue, where it receyueth the Crokerne commyng from by nozth, and likewise another west of Fulford parke. Thẽ it goeth to Duckford, Brideforde, Kirslow, Chidley, Knighton, and beneath the bridge there receyueth the Boup whose course is to nozth Boup. Boup, Lilley, and Bouytracy. Thence it runneth to kinges Teingneton, taking in Eidis a brooke beneath Pzeston that cõmeth Eidis. from Edeford by the way, and whẽ it is past this confluence, at Kings Teigneton, it crosseth the Leman which commeth from Sadleton rocke by Beckington, and Newton Leman. Buchels, and sone after the Aller that riseth Aller. betwene Danbury and Marog well, afterward falling into the sea by bishops Teignton, south of Teignemouth towne.

From hence we goe still southwardes (as we haue done long alredy by southwest) by Wozthstone, and finding thzee oz foure smal crekes betwene Wozthstone rocke and the Bery point, we go furder to Newstone rock, and so into Dartmouth hauen, whereinto sundzy waters haue their direct courses.

The riuer of Darnt commeth out of Darntmoze, xb. myles aboue Totnesse (as I said befoze) from whence it goeth to Bucklande Hole, and sone after taking in the Asheburn Asheburn water on the one side that runneth frõ Sadleton rocke by nozth, and the Buckfastlich Buckfastlich. that commeth from nozth west, it runneth to Staunton, Darington, Hemston, and there also crossing a rill on eche side, passeth fozth to Totnesse, Bowden, and aboue Gabriell Stoke, mæteth with the Harthurne that rũneth vnder Rost bridge, two miles aboue Totnesse, oz as an other sayeth, by Ratter, Harberton, Painesford, and Aspzempton into Darnt, which ere long also commeth to Cozntworthy, Grenewap, Dittham, Darntmouth, betwene the Castels, and so into the sea.

From hence we went by Stokefleming to another water, which commeth from blacke Aton, then to the second that falleth in east of Slapton, and so coasting out of this bay by the Start point, we saile almost directly west, till we come to Saltcombe hauẽ. Certes this poze hath very little fresh water cõmyng vnto it, yet the hed of such as it is, ryseth ſeth nere Buckland, and goeth to Dodbꝛoꝁ, which ſtandeth betwene two creꝛkes. Thẽce it hieth to Charelton, where it taketh in a ril whoſe hed commeth from ſouth and noꝛth of Sherekoꝛd. Finally, it hath another creꝛke that runneth vp by Ilton, and the laſt of all that falleth in noꝛth of Poꝛtlemouth, whoſe hed is ſo nere the bay laſt afoꝛe remembꝛed, that it maketh it a ſoꝛy peninſula, as I haue heard it ſayd.

Awne. Then come we to the Awne, whoſe hed is in the hils farre aboue Bꝛent towne, from whence it goeth to Dirkoꝛd wood, Loddewel, Yache, Aunton, Thoꝛleſton, and ſo into the ſea ouer againſt a rocke called S. Nighels boꝛow.

Arme. Arme riſeth aboue Yarkoꝛd, thence to Stokoꝛd, Iuy bꝛidge, Armington bꝛidge, Flẽte, Dꝛchardton and Dwnewell.

Yalme. Yalme goeth by Coꝛnewood, Slade, Stratley, Yalmeton, Collaton, and Newton ferry.

Plim. Being paſt theſe Poꝛtlets, then next of all we come to Plimmouth hauen, a very buſie pẽce to deſcribe, becauſe of the numbers of waters that reſoꝛt vnto it, & ſmall helpe that I haue foꝛ the knowledge of their courſes, yet will I doe what I may in this, as in the reſt, and ſo much I hope by Gods grace to perfoꝛme, as ſhall ſuffice my purpoſe in this behalfe.

Plim. The Plimne oꝛ Plym, is the very ſame water that gyueth name vnto Plimpton towne. It ryſeth in the hilles weſt of Coꝛnewood, and commeth downe a ſhoꝛt courſe of thꝛée miles to Newenham after it bée iſſued out of the ground. From Newenham alſo it rũneth to Plimpton, and ſone after into the Stoure, which Stour aryſeth noꝛthweſt of Shepiſtour, and goeth from thence to Nemchurch, Hele, Shane Bickley, & ſo to Eſoꝛde where taking in the Plym, it runneth downe as one vnder the name of Plymme, vntill it go paſt Plymmouth and fall into the hauen South eſt of Plymmouth afoꝛeſayde. Plymmouth it ſelf ſtandeth betwẽne two creꝛkes, not ſerued wyth anye backewater, therefoꝛe paſſing ouer theſe two, wée enter into the Thamar that diſchargeth it ſelfe into the afoꝛeſaid hauẽ, going therfoꝛe vp that ſtreame which foꝛ the moſt part parteth Deuonſhire from Coꝛnewall, the firſt riueret that I met withall on the eſt ſide is called Taup, the hed wherof is amõg the mountaines foure miles aboue Pẽters Taup, beneath which it mẽteth with another water from by weſt, ſo that theſe two waters include Harpe Taupe, betwẽne them though nothing nẽre the conduence. From hence the Taue oꝛ Taup runneth to Tauiſtocke, aboue which it taketh in a rill from by weſt, and another aboue noꝛth Bucklande whoſe head is in Dartmoꝛe, and commeth thereunto by Sandfoꝛde and Harrow bꝛidge. From hence it goeth into Thamer, by noꝛth Buckland, Monks Buckland, Beare, and Tamerton Folly. Hauing thus diſpatched the Taup. The next that falleth in on the eſt ſide vpwardes is the Lidde, which ryſing in the hilles aboue Lidfoꝛde, runneth downe by Currypton and Hiddenham, and ſo to Lidſtone, aboue which it recepueth the Truſhell bꝛoke, which riſing noꝛth eaſt of Bꝛedikton, goeth by Truſholton to Ibaine, where it recepueth a rill that commeth by Bꝛadwood from Germanſwye, and after the confluence runneth to Liſton, and frõ thence into the Thamar. The next aboue this is the Coꝛewater, this riſeth ſomewhere about Elwell oꝛ Yelwell, and goyng by Virginſton, runneth on by S. Giles without any increaſe vntill it come to Thamar. Next of all it taketh in two bꝛokes not much diſtant in ſunder, wherof the one commeth in by Glauntõ, the other from Holſwoꝛthy, and both eaſt of Tamerton, which ſtandeth on the farther banke, and other ſide of the Thamar, & weſt noꝛthweſt of Tedcote, except the quarter deceiue me.

Lidde. Truſhell. Coze.

Thamar. Certes, the Thamar it ſelfe riſeth in Somerſetſhire, about thꝛée miles noꝛtheaſt of Hartlande, and in maner ſo croſſeth ouer the whole weſt country betwene ſea and ſea, that it leaueth Coꝛnewall, a bylande oꝛ peninſula. Being therfoꝛe deſcended from the hed, by a tract of vj. myles, it commeth to Denboꝛow, Pancraſe well, Bꝛidge Reuel, Tamerton, Tetcote, Luffencote, Boyton, & Wirrington, where it mẽteth wyth a water on the weſt ſide called Artey, that riſeth ſhoꝛt of Jacobſtow. Two miles in like ſoꝛt from this confluence, we met with the Kenſey, whoſe hed is ſhoꝛt of Marpeſton, by ſouth eaſt, frõ whence it goeth by Treneglos, Tremone, Treſmure, Trewen, Launſton, and ſo into the Thamar that runneth frõ hence by Lowhitton vnto Bꝛadſton, and goyng on toward Dunterton, taketh in a rill from ſouth Pitherwye, and by Leſant. Beneath Dunterton alſo it croſſeth the Enian. This ryuer riſeth at Dauidſton, and directeth his race by S. Clethir, Lancaſt, and Trelaſk firſt, and then vnder ſundꝛy bꝛidges, vntill it mẽte wt the Thamar. From hence alſo the Thamar goeth by Siddenham to Calſtocke bꝛidge, Calſtocke towne, Clifton, Targreue (there aboutes taking in a creꝛke aboue Landilip) and running on from thence, hafteth toward Saltaſhe, where it receiueth the Liuer water. The head of Liuer is about Bꝛownwelly hill, hill, from whence it goeth on to Nozth hill, Lekenhozne, South hill, and taking in a rill by east (from aboue Kellington) it runneth on to Newton, Pillaton, Wottō, Blosselemmyng, S. Erne, and beneth this village crosseth a rillet that runneth thither from Bicton by Dunthocke, S. Germaines and Sheuiocke. But to pzocéede after the confluence, it goeth betwéene Erly & Fro Martine castle, and sone after taking in a ril from by nozth, that passeth west of S. Steuens, it is not long ere it fall into the Thamar, which after this (receiuyng the Milbzoke créke) goeth on by Edgecomb, and betwene S. Mighels Ile and Rioden pointe into the maine sea. And thus haue I finished the deseriptiō of Plimmouth water, and all such falles as are betwéene Newton rocke on the east side, & the Kāme hed on the other.

Sutton. After this we pzocéeded on with our iourney toward the west, and passing by Longstone, we came sone after to Sothan baie, where we crossed the Seton water, whose hed is about Lifeard, and his course by Pynheniet, Thakrench, Tregowike, Sutton, and so into the sea.

Low. Then came we to Lowe, and goyng in betwéene it and Mount Ile, we finde that it had a bzaunched course, and thereto the confluence aboue Lowe. The chiefe heade ryseth in ẏ hils, as it were two miles aboue Gaine, and goyng by that towne, it ceaseth not to continue his course, east of Duloe, til it come a little aboue Low, where it crosseth and ioyneth with the Bzodoke water that runneth frō Bzodokes by Trewargo, & so into ẏ sea. Perte vnto these are two other rils before we come at Faw, or Fawy, whereof in my former treatise, I made some small intreaty.

Fawy. Foy or Fawy riuer riseth in Fawy moze, on side of an hill, from whence it runneth by certayne bzidges, till it méete with the Glin water

Glyn. west of Glyn towne, which rising aboue Temple, and meting with a rill that cōmeth in from S. Neotes, doth fall into Fawy a mile and meze aboue Respzin from by east. After this confluēce then, it goeth to Respzin bzidge, Lesserme castle, Lostwithiel bzidge, Pill, S. Kingtons, S. Winnow, and Golant, and here also receiueth the Lerine water out Lerinus. of a parke, that taketh his way into the main streame by Byconke, Tethe, and the fining house. Beyng thus vnited, it pzocéedeth vnto Fawy towne, taking in a rill or créke from aboue it on the one side, and another beneath it south of Halling on the other, of which two this latter is the longest of course, sith it runneth thzée good myles before it come at the Foy, and thus much had I to adde vnto the description of the sayd Fawy conteined in my former treatise. I might haue touched the créke that lyeth betwéene Knaueland & blackbottle pointes ere I came at Foye or Fawy, but sith it is serued only with the salt, I make small account to speake of it. But to pzocéede, entering finally into the bale commonly called Trewardith bale, which lyeth into the land betwene the Canualle and the blacke head pointe, we sawe the fall of two small bzokes, not one very far distant from another. The first of them entring west of Trewardith, the other east of S. Blayes and both directly agaynst Curwarder rocke, except I mistake my compasse. Neyther of thē are of any great course, and the longest not full thzée miles and an halfe, wherefoze sith they are neither bzaunched noz of any great quantity, what should I make long haruest of a little cozne, and spende moze tyme then may well be spared about them.

Lustell. When we wer past the blackhed, we came to Lustell bzoke, which is increased with a water that commeth from aboue Mewan, & within a myle after the confluence they fall into the sea at Pentozen, from whence we went by the black rocke, and about the Dudman pointe, till we came to Chare hales, Chare. where falleth in a pzety water, whose hed is two miles aboue S. Tues. Thēce we went by here & there a méere salt créke, til we passed ẏ gray rocke, in Gwindzaith baie, & S. Anthonies point, where Leland maketh his accópt to enter into Falamouth hauē, to the fozmer deseription wherof, I wil adde another here, wherby the first shal be moze plain and easie.

Fala. The Fala riseth a little by nozth of Penuenton towne, and goyng westwarde til it come downwardes toward S. Dionise, it goeth frō thence to Melader, S. Steuens Grampont, Goldon, Crede, Cozuely, Tregue, Moran, Tregūnan, it falleth into the hauen with a good indifferent fozce, and this is the course of Fala. But lest I should seme to omit those créekes that are betwene this and S. Antonies point, I will go a little backe again, and fetch in so many of them as come now to my remēbzaunce. Entring therefoze into ẏ pozt, we haue a créke that runneth vp by S. Antonies toward S. Gerens, then another that goeth into the lande by east of S. Maries castle, with a fozked hed passing in the meane time, by a great rocke, that lieth in the very midst of the hauen, in maner of the thirde poynte of a Triangle, betwéene S. Maryes castle and pendinant. Thence we cast about by the sayde castle, and came by another créke, that falleth in by east, then the second aboue S. Iustus, the third at Arocnoza, the fourth at Kilan, and hauing as it wer visited all these in order, we come backe againe about by Tregonnian, and then going vpward betweene it and Talueene, til we come to Fentangolan, we founde the confluence of two great crekes beneath S. Clementes, whereof one hath a fresh water comming down by S. Perther, the other another frō Truro, increased wt sundry braūches, though not one of the of any greatnesse, and therfore vnworthy to be handled. Polewhole standeth vpon the hed almost of the most easterly of them. S. Kenwen and Truro stand aboue the confluence of other two. The fourth falleth in by west, frō certaine hils: as for the firſt and first, as they be little crekes and no fresh, so haue I lesse language and talke to spend about them. Of S. Cate, and S. Feokes crekes, I spake inough before, the towne of S. Feoke standyng betwen the both. That also called after ye saint, rising aboue Peranarworthill, and comming thence by Kyrkio, falleth into Falamouth, northeast of Miloz, which standeth vpon the point betweene it & Miloz creke. Miloz creek (for Lelād did kepe no order in their description) is next Restronguet. Some cal it Miloz pole, from whence we went by Trefusis point, and there found an other great fall frō Perin, which beyng braunched in the toppe hath Perin towne almost in the very confluence. Thus leauyng Fala hauen, as more troublesome for me to describe, then profitable for seafaring men without good aduise to enter into, we left the rocke on our left hand, and came streight southwest to Helforde haueir, whose water commeth downe from Mreke (where is a confluence of two small rilles whereof that ryll confluseth) by Mawgan and Trelawarren, and then it receyueth a rill on the north ripe from Constantine, after whose confluence, it goeth a maine vntill it come to the Ocean. Beneath thys also is another rill commyng from S. Partirs, by whose course, and another ouer against it on the west side that falleth into ye sea by Winniton, all Penage is left almost in maner of an Iland. From hence we go south to ye Manacle point, then southwest to Lysard, and so north and by west to Predannocke pointes, beyonde which we mete with the fall of the said water, that riseth in the edge of Penage and goeth into ye sea by Melian on the north, and Winniton on the south. By north also of Winniton, is the Cury water that ryseth short of Magan, and toucheth with the Ocean south of Pengwenian point.

Low.

From hence we sayled to the Lowmouth which some call Lopole, because it is narower at the fall into the sea, then it is betweene the sea and Hailston. It riseth aboue S. Stephans, and comming downe by Wendron, it hasteth to Hailston or Helston, from whence onely it is called Low, but betweene Helston & the hed, men call it commonly Cohor. Here Leland omitting a great number of waters betweene this and the landes end, and so forth about the point vnto the Haile, as you may see in my former treatise, I thinke it good so far as to me is possible, to supply his want in this place, although I confesse that I cannot do it so exactly as I would. Beyng therefore passed the Low, I came to another water that descendeth without any increase from Crowan by Symney, whose whole course is not aboue 3. myles in all. Then goyng by the Cudan point, we entred the mountes Bay, and goyng streight north (leauing saint Nighels mount a little vpon the left hand) we came to the Lyd, which rising short of Tewidnacke, descendeth by Lidgeuan, and so into the sea. Certes the course of these waters can not be long, sith in this very place, the breadth of lād is not aboue foure miles, and not more then fiue at the very landes ende. There is also a rill east of Bozugy, and Gulual, and another west of the same hard at hand, and likewise the third east of Pensantz: and not a ful quarter of a myle from the second, southwest of Pensantz, also lieth the fourth that cōmeth from Sancrete warde by Newlyn, from whence goyng southwest out of the Baye by Moulhole Ile, that lyeth south of Moulhole towne, we come to a water that entreth into the Ocean betwixt Remels and Lamorley point. Truly the one hed therof commeth frō by west of Sancrete, the other by from west of an hill that standeth betwene them both, and ioyning aboue Remels, it is not long ere they salute their grandame. After this and before we come at Roscastle, there are two other crekes, wherof one is called Boskenny that riseth south of S. Buriens, and an other somewhat longer then the firſt that issueth by west of the aforesayd towne, wherein is to be noted, that our cardes made heretofore doe appoint S. Buriens to be at the very landes ende of Cornewall, but experience now teacheth vs that it commeth not nere the lands end by three miles. This latter rill also is the last that I do read of on the south side, and likewyse on the west, and north tyll we haue sayled to S. Jes baye, which is full x. myles from the landes ende, or Bzesan Ile eastward, and rather more if you reckon to the fall of the Haile, which lieth in the very midst and highest part of the bay of the same. The soile also is very hilly here, as for S. Jes towne, it is almost (as I sayd) a byland, and yet is it well watred with sundry rilles that come from those hils vnto the same.

Haile. The Haile riseth in such maner, and from so many heds, as I haue before described out of Leland. Howbeit, I will adde somewhat more vnto it for the benefite of my readers. Certes, the chiefe hed of Haile riseth by west of Godalfin hils, and goyng downe toward S. Erthes, it receyueth the second and best of the other three rilles from Godalfin towne; Finally, commyng to S. Erthes, and so vnto Clowart. the mame bay, it taketh in the Clowart water from Cuymer, south of Phelacke which hath two heds, the sayd village standyng directly betwixt them both.

Caine. The Caine ryseth southeast of Caineburn towne, a myle and more, from whence it goeth without encrease by west of Gwethian, and so into the sea west of Para Darway.

Luggam. From hence we coasted about the point, and left the bay till we came to a water that ryseth of two heds from those hils that lye by south of the same: one of them also runneth by S. Uni, another by Redruth, and metyng within a myle they fall into the Ocrane, beneath Luggam or Tuggan. A myle and a halfe from this fall we come vnto an other small rill, and likewyse two other creekes betwixt which the towne of S. Agnes stãdeth, and likewyse the fourth halfe a mile beyond the most easterly of these, whose head is almost three myles within the land, in a town called S. Alyn. Thence going by the Panrock, and west of S. Piran in the Sande, we finde a S. Pirās creke. course of three myles and more from the hed, and hauyng a forcked braunch, the partes do mete at west aboue S. Kybbard, and so go into the sea. I take this to be S. Pirans creke, Crantock. for the next is Carantocke pill or creke, whose hed is at Gulwarth, from whence it goeth to Trerise, and some after takyng in a rill, from by west it runneth into the sea east of S. Carantakes. Beyende this is an other creke that ryseth aboue little S. Colan, and goeth by lesse S. Columb, and east & by north hereof, commeth down one more, whose hed is almost south of the nine stones, and goyng from thence to great S. Columbes, it passeth by Lanherne, and so into the sea. S. Merous creke is but a little one, rysing west of Pad- Padstowe. stow, and fallyng in almost ouer against the Gull rocke. Then turning betwene the point and the blacke rock, we entred into Padstow hauen, whose waters remayne next of all to be described.

Alen. The Alane ryseth flat east from the hauen mouth of Padstow, well nere eight or nyne myles, about Dauidston, nere vnto which Enyam. the Enyam also ariueth, that runneth into the Thamar. Goyng therfore from hence, it passeth to Camelford, S. Aduen, S. Bernarde, (both Cornish saintes) and some after receyueth a rill at north east descending frō Rowters hil. Thence it goeth to Blisland, Helham, the first bridge of name that standeth vpon Alyn. Ere long also it taketh in one ryll by south from Bodman, another from S. Laurence, the third by west of this, and the fourth that commeth by Wethiell, no one of them exceedyng the course of three miles, and all by south. From hence it goeth towarde Iglesale warde, and there receyueth a water on the east side, which cōmeth about two miles from aboue S. Teath, by Michelston, S. Tuchoe, S. Maben (mo Cornish patrones) and finally south of Iglesall, meeteth with the Alen that goeth from thence by S. Breaca to Woodbridge. Here about I finde that into our Aleyn or Alen, there should fall two riuerets, wherof the one is called Carnesey, the Carnese other Layne, and commyng in the end to the Layne. full notice of the matter, I see them to issue on seuerall sides beneth Woodbridge almost directly the one against ỹ other. That which descendeth from northwest, and riseth about S. Kew, is named Carnesey as I heare, the other that commeth in on the southwest banke right Laine, and noted by Leland to rise two miles aboue S. Esse, but how so euer this matter standeth, there are two other crekes on eche side also beneth these as Pethzike creke, Pethzik and Pinner creke, so called of two Cornish Pinner saintes (for that syple bird many, wherwith I finish the description of Alen, or as some call it Dunmere, and other Padstow water. Dunmere Beyng past Padstow hauen, and after we had gone three myles, we came to Portgwin a poore fisher towne, where I finde a broke and a pere. Then I came to Portisset two myles further, and founde there a broke a pere, and some succour for fisher botes. Nert of all vnto a broke that ran from south east, directly north into the Sauern sea, and within halfe a myle of the same lay a great black rocke lyke an Iland. From this water to Treuenni is about a myle, where the paroch church is dedicated to S. Symphorian, and in which paroch also Tintagel castle standeth, which is a thyng inexpugnable for the situation, and would be made with little reparations one of the strongest thinges in England. For it standeth on a great high terrible crag enuironned with the sea. There is a chappell yet standyng in the dungeon thereof, dedicated to S. Wlet. Tintagell towne and Treuenni are not a myle in sunder. The nert creke is called Bosynni, which is a myle frō Tintagell, and to the same Tredwy water reso- Tredwy. teth, teth, and so they goe to the sea betwixt two hils, wherof that on the one side lyeth out like an arme or cape, and maketh the fashion of an hauenet or pære, whether shiplets sometyme doe resort for succour. A Frier of late dayes toke vpō him to make an hauen at this place, but in vayne. There lie also two black rocks as Ilets, at the west northwest point, or side of this creke, the one (sauyng that a little gut doth part them) ioyning with the other, and in these by all likelyhode is great store of gulles. I can not tell whether this be the water that runneth by Boscastle or not, but if it be not, then haue I this description of the latter.

Boscastle. Boscastle creke that lyeth east of Tintagiel, is but a small thyng running at the most not aboue two myles into the land, yet it passeth by foure townes, wherof the first is called Lesneth, the seconde S. Juliet, the third, Minster, and the fourth Boscastle or Buckcastle as some men doe pronounce it.

Bede. In Bede bay, I find the Bedewater, whose chiefe hed is not farre from Morton. Thence runnyng to Stratton, it receiueth the Launcels. Launcels rill before it come at Norham. And here also it crosseth another whose hed is east off. Mary wike, from whence it runneth by Wollton and Whalesborow, and thence into the sea betwene Efford and Plough hyll. And thus much of ỹ waters that lie betwene the poynt of Cornwall, and the Hartland hed vpon the northside of Cornwall. Nowlet vs do the lyke with those that remayne of Deuonshire, wherof the said Hartland is the very first point in this our poeticall voiage. Hauing therfore brought Hartland point on our backs, we come next of all to Barstable bar, and so into the Hauen, wherinto two principall streames do perpetually vnburden their chanels.

Ocus. The first and more westerly of these is called Ocus, whose hed is not farre west of the hed of Darnt, both in Darntmore. Rising therefore in the aforesayd place, it runneth northwest to Snorton, and so to Okehampton, beneath which towne it meeteth with an other water comming from southeast, and riseth not much west from the hed of Tawe. From hence it goeth to Stowe Erborne, Mulke Okington, and Iddesley, where it taketh in the Tanrige a very pretty streamelet, whose issue is not full a mile by east from the hed of Thamar. Comming therfore by west and east Putforde, Bulworthy, Bockington, Newton, and Shebbor, it receiueth a forked rill that runneth from eche side of Bradworthy by Sutcombe, Treborow, Milton, and so to Thornebiry, where meeting with another forked water (wherof one head commyng from Dunland, ioyneth with the other north of Cockebiry) it goeth with speede into the Tanrige water. After this confluence it runneth on to Shepewash (by west wherof falleth in the Buckland water frō by north) thence to high Hainton, and so Haytherlay, north wherof it taketh in a rill frō by south, and endeth his race at Iddesley, by ioynyng with the Oke. Hence then the Ocus hasteth to Dowland, and betwene it and Doulton, receiueth one rill from by east, as it doth an other betwene Doulton and Harton frō by west, and so proceeding on with his course, it commeth east of Torrington the lesse, and taking in a water at east, that runneth from three heds (by Wolly parke) betwene which Combe and Roughborow are situate, it descendeth to Torrington the more, and meting with the Langtree water on the one side, and the Ware brooke on the other, it proceedeth to Bedisford, crossing a rill by the way that commeth vnto it betwene Annary and Litham. From Bedisford bridge it goeth without any increase to Weekley, Norham, Appledour, and so into the hauen.

Buckland. Langtree. Were or Ware.

Tawe. The Taw of both is the more noble water, and hath most rils descending into hys chanell. Howbeit by these two is all the hart of Deuonshire well watered on the northside of ỹ Mores. The Tawy riseth directly at south, west of Throwley, and north of the head of Darnt. From thence also it runneth to Sele, South Taueton, Cockatre, Bathe, Northtaueton, Atheridge, Colridge, and some after receiueth the Bowmill creke, whereof one hed riseth at Bow, the other at Mill, and meting beneth bishops Norchard, they fall into the Taue north of Nimeth Rowland, as I haue bene informed. From hence then it runneth by Edgeforth, to Chimligh, by south wherof, it meeteth with a ril comming down of two heds from about Kaienford, by Wetheridge and Thawley. Thence it goeth to Burrington, and Chiltenholtwood, and there taketh in the Moulebray water consisting of two in one chanell, wherof the Mol doth ryse aboue north Moulton, and cōming to Moulton, receiueth another rill running frō Molland, and some after the second that growing by two brookes ỹ hed of one heyng at Knawston, and of the other west of Crokeham, and both vniting themselues beneath Marlston, doth fal into the same ere long also, and so go togyther till it crosse the Bray, which (beyng the second of the two that maketh the Moulebray) riseth at Bray, commeth by Buckland and south of Holtwood doth make his confluence with Taw. Beyng past the woode, it goeth eth on to Brightley hall, Taucton, Tauestocke, and Berstable, sometyme a prety walled towne with foure gates, but nowe a little thyng and such indede, as that the suburbes thereof, are greater then it selfe. I suppose that the name of this towne in the Brittish speache, was Abertaw, because it stode toward the mouth of Taw, and Bernelle pronounced short as I gesse, for Abernelle. As for Staple it is an addition for a market, and therfore hath nothyng to doe in the proper name of the towne. King Athelstane is taken here for the chiefe priuileger of the towne, this is also worthy to be noted hereof, that the houses there are of stone, as most are in all the good townes thereabout.

But to procede with our purpose. Beneath this Towne there falleth in a water that hath one head nere about Challacombe, and another at east Downe, whereof this descendyng by Stoke ryuer, and the other by Sherwell, they vnite themselues within three myles of Berstaple. Some after also it taketh in another that descendeth from Bitenden by Alfeford, and the last of all east of S. Anthonies Chappell, named the Donehame, because one hed is at west Done, and the other at Yam, both of them metyng west of Alfe. And thus is Taue described, which is no great water nor quick streame, as may appeare in Low water mark at Berstable, & yet is it a prety riuerét. This also is worthy to be noted therof, that it receiueth no brooke from by west, whereof I would somewhat meruaile, if Taurige were not at hand.

Donehame.

Beyng past the Taue, Cride bay and Bugpoint aliás Bagpoint, we go by Poze baye, Pozestone, aliás Pozstone, and then toward the northeast, till we come by a créekelet to Ilfare combe, & so to Combe marton, where at (I meane eche of them) are sundry créekes of saltwater, but not serued with any fresh, that I as yet do heare of. Parry there is betweene Martinbowe and Trenslowe, a créeke that hath a backewater, which descendeth frō Parracombe (so farre as I call to mynd named Parradine beck) but the greteste of all is betwene Linton and Connisbery called Oze, which riseth in Somersetshire in Exmoze, (east of Poze oke, moze then a myle) and goyng by Owze, falleth into the sea betwéene Linton & Connisbery, so that the whole race therof, amounteth in & out to an 8. miles as I haue heard reported. Thus haue I finished ỳ discourse of the waters of Deuōshire, whose breadth in this place from hence ouerthwart to the checkestones in the mouth of Ere, on the south side of the Ile, is 38. miles or vnder 40. and so much likewyse is it frō Plimmouth to Hartlād point, but the brodest part there commeth to 36. miles, where as the broadest part of Cornewall doth want two myles of 40.

Beyng past the aforesayde limites of the counties we came to Portloch bay, whether commeth a water named Loche that descendeth from Stokepero, Lucham and Portloch without increase. Thence to Dunsteir brook, which runneth from about Wotton, and Courtney by Tunbercombe and Dunsteir, then to another that commeth west of Olde Cliffe, leauyng a parke on the west side, next of all to Watchet water, whereof one hed cōmeth from the Quantock hils south of Bickualer by Westquantocke head, and almost at Donisford, receyueth the Williton becke, thē to east Quantocke brooke (omitting a créket) & next of all to Doddingtō water, ỳ goeth by Holsford, Alforton, & afterward into the sea.

From hence we go by Bottesall pointe, to Stert pointe, where two noble riuers doe make their confluence, which I will seuerally describe, as to my purpose appertayneth.

The first of these is called the Iuell. It ryseth aboue Oburne, and at Shirburne receyueth a water wherof Lelād saith thus. There are seuen springes in an hill called the seuen sisters, northest frō Shireburn, which gather into one botom, & come into ỳ Mere. Another brooke likewise cōmeth by Heydō frō Pulcādell, three myles from thence by flat east, betwixt the parke and the Mere full so great as the streame of the Mere, and ioyning at the lower mill of Shireburne, with the Merewater, it is not long ere it fall into the Euill. Thence our Euill goeth on toward Glasen Bradford, and ere it come there, taketh in a forked rill from by south, descending from about west Chelbury and Chetnall in Dorset shire, beneth which towne ỳ other hed falleth into the same, so that they run forth by Bearhaggard & Thornford (til they méet with the Iuel) & so to Clifton, Euil, Trent, Mutforde, Alhinton, and east of Limminton it méeteth with the Cade that runneth from Parlington, by north Cadbiry, and some after crossing a rill also from by east, that cōmeth frō Blackeford by Compton, it hasteth to south Cadbiry, Sparkford, Quénes Camel, west Camel, & so into Iuell, which runneth on to Kimmington, Ilchester, Ilbridge, long Sutton, and ere it come at Langport, taketh in two famous waters in one chanell, next of all to be remembred before I go any further. The first of all these riseth southeast betwene the Parets (where it is called Parret water), and goeth to Crokehorne, and at Meriot taketh in a brooke from the east, which cōsisteth of

of two courses vnited at Bowbridge, wherof the one descendeth from Perr by Hasilbury, the other from aboue the three Chenocks, as I doe vnderstand. From hence also they goe as one with the Parret water, toward south Pederton (taking in at east a becke cõming from Hamden hil) thence to Pedcrton, Lambroke, Thorney bridge, & Huchelney where it meeteth with the seconde called Il or Ilus, whose hed is aboue Chellington, & comming down frõ thẽce by Cadworth, before it come at Dunniet, it taketh in a ril that runneth by Chafcomb and Knoll. Thence leauing Ilmister on the east side, it meeteth with another from by East, descending from aboute Whitlakington. Then it goeth to Pokington (where it crosseth ỹ Ilton water by west) next to Ilbruers, and there it ioyneth with a rillet that riseth by west at Staple, and runneth by Bicknell and Abbots Ily, and after this confluence goeth on toward Langport. And here after some mens opinion, the Iuell loseth hys name, and is called Parret, but this coniecture cannot holde, sithe in the olde writers it is called Iuell, till it fall into the sea. Neuertheleſſe, how so euer this matter standeth, beyng past Langport, it goeth by Alwber toward S. Antonies, where it meeteth with the Tone next of all to be described. The Tone issueth at Clatworthy, and goeth by west of Wiuelscombe, to Stawley, Ritford, Runton, Wellington and Bradford, beneath which it taketh in a faire water commyng from Sanford Combe, Elworthy, Brunte Rafe, Wiluerton, Oke and Hilfarens. After this confluence also it runneth to Helebridge and there below meteth with one water that runneth by Hawse, Hethforde and Norton, then another frõ Crokeham by bishops Sledlard, and the third and fourth at Tawnton, that descendeth from Kingston by north, and another by south that ryseth about Pidmister, and thus is the Tone increased, which goeth from Taunton to Riston, Creche, Northcurry, Ling, and so by Anthony into ỹ Iuell, that after this confluence meeteth ere long with the Chare, a prety riuer that commeth by east from Northborow, by Carletõ, Badcare, Litecare, Somerton, Higham Audry more, Audry, and Michelsborow. From whence goyng on betwene Quenes more and North more, it receyueth one broke called Peder from by southwest, that runneth thorough Pederton parke and Northmore, and likewyse another that passeth by Durley, ere it doe come at Bridgewater. From Bridgewater it goeth by Chilton directly northwest, and then turnyng flat west, it goeth northwardes towards the sea, takyng in two waters by the way, wherof one runneth by Coripole and Cannington, and beareth ỹ name of Camington, the other by Siddington and Comage, and then receyuyng the Brier before it come at Start point, they fal as one into the Ocean, wherof let this suffice for the description of the Iuel, whose streame doth water al the west part of Somersethire and leaue it very fruitfull. Cãmingtõ Brier.

The Brier, Bruer, or Brẽr, ryseth of two waters, wherof one is in Selwood forest, and commeth downe by Brunecombe, Bruham, and Bruton. The other which Lelãd nameth Mellos, is northeast of Stafford towne, & goyng by the same, it runneth by Redlinche, to Wike where it meteth with the other hed, and thence go on as one to Awnsford, Alford (where it taketh in a water called Dulis frõ by north that ryseth nere Dolting, and commeth by Euerchurch parke) then to the Lidfordes, Basborow wod, the Tor hil, Pont perilous brig (wherinto they fable that Arthur beyng wounded to death did throw Calybur hys sword) by Glastenbury and so into the Mere. Beside this riuer there are two other also that fall into the said Mere, wherof the one called Soway commeth from Crechurch parke, & Pulton by Hartlack bridge, the other named Cos or the Coscombe water, from aboue Shepton, Mallet (which east of Wyke taketh in a water commyng from Welles) by Wyke, Gedney, and so into the Mere. Finally, returning all into one chanell it runneth to Burtlehouse, and sone after deuiding it selfe, one arme goeth by Bastian alias Brent bridge, to High bridge, leauyng Huntespill a market towne by South west, the other by Marke to Rokes bridge, Hebbes passage, and so into the sea, leauing a faire Iland wherin beside Brentmarsh are 7. or 8. townes, wherof Uphill is none, which is contrary to my former assertion, and here in therfore not onely the same, but also an other errour in the name of this riuer is worthy to be redressed, beside a third touching the course of the said Are, which braunceth not so low, but rather runneth into the braunche of Brier that lyeth most easterly, as experience by the eie of him that of set purpose hath of late ridden to view it, doth manifestly confirme. Now as touching the water that commeth from Wels, which falleth as I said into ỹ Coscomb water on the right hand of the Cawsey. You shall vnderstand that as many springs are in Wels, so the chiefe of them is named Andres well, which ryseth in a medow plat not farre from the east ende of the cathedrall church, and afterward goeth into the Coscomb, in such place as I haue noted. Brier. Lelãd wryteth ỹ first Brieuelus & the seconde Mellodun" or ỹ Milton water. Dulis. Soway. Cos.

Milton. Golafer. Leland speaketh of the Milton and Golafer waters, which should fall likewyse into the Wzier, but whether those be they wherof the one ryseth aboue Stalkozdell, and in the discent runneth by Shipton, Pitcomb, and so to Awnskozd on the one side, as the other doth rise betwene Batcomb and Upton noble on the other halfe: oz vnto whether of them eyther of these names are severally to be attributed, as yet I do not read.

Axe. 2. The Cheder bzooke, dzaweth. 12. miles within a quarter of a myle of his heade. The second Axe issueth out of Dwky hole, from whence it goeth by Dwky towne, afterward meeting with the Cheder bzook that commeth from the Cheder rocks, it runneth by Were, Ratcliffe, and after a little compasse into the nozthest wzaunch of the afozesayde riuer last described, betwene Kokes bzidge and Hebbes passage, as I haue bene informed.

Bane. From the fall of Axe we come to an other called Bane, nozthest of Woodspzing, whose hed is about Banwel parke, oz els in Smaldon wood. Then to another, and to the third, Artro. called Artro, which riseth about Litton, and goyng by the Artroes, Abbey, Perrybzidge (receiuyng a rill ere it come together from by south) beneth Cungesbiry, oz as I learne betwene Kingston and Laurens Wike it meeteth with the sea.

Sottelspill. Sottelspill water ryseth betwene Cheueley and Nailesey, howbeit it hath no encrease before it come into the sea at Sottelspill, moze then the next vnto it, which is named Cleueden water, of a certaine towne neere to the fall therof. It ryseth southeast of Cleueden Barrow, goeth by Burton Naileley, and so vnto Cleuedon.

Auon. 3. The Auon commonly called the third Auon is a goodly water, and growen to be very famous by sondzy occasions, to be particularly touched in our descriptiõ of Bzistowe. It ryseth in the very edge of Tetbury, and goeth by long Newtõ to Bzokenton, Whitchurch, and Malmsbury, where it receiueth two waters, that is to say, one from by west cõming by Foxeley, and Bzomleham, which rũneth so neere to the Auon in the west suburbe of Malmesbury, that the towne thereby is almost made an Iland. Another from Okesey parke by Yankerton, Charleton, and Garesden. After this confluence it halseth to Cole parke, then goeth it toward the southeast, till it meete with a water comming from south west (betwene Hullauington and Bzadfield) by Alton: and sone after with another at the nozthside from Bynall by Wotton Basset (thozow the parke to Gretenham, and vnder bzidges) and after ỹ confluẽce to Dauntsey, Segar, Sutton, Chzistmalsozd, Auon, Calwales house, & then to west Tetherton. Beneth this towne also it taketh in a water increased by two bzokes, wherof one cõming from Cleue by Hilmarton, Whitley house and Bzamble, (and there receiuyng another that commeth by Calne) passeth on by Stanley into the Auon, which from thẽcesozth goeth to Chippenham, Kowdon, Lekham, and then receiuing Cosham water, goeth to Lacocke, Melsham, and ere it come at Whaddon, crosseth two other in one chanell, wherof one riseth about Bzumham house, and goeth to Sene, the other about the Diuizes, and frõ thence runneth to Potterne wood, Crekewood, Wozton, Mallon, Bucklington, and ioyning with the other aboue Litleton, they run by Semmington, and nozth of Whaddon afozesayd into the maine streame, wherof I now intreat. From hence our Auon runneth to Stauerton, and south west of that towne meeteth with the Were that cõmeth from Upton by Dilton, Bzoke parke (there crossing a rill from Westbiry vnder ỹ plane) then to nozth Bzadley, Trubzidge, and so into Auon that goeth from thence to Bzadfozd, and within a myle oz there about, before it come at Freshfozd, it meteth with ỹ Frome, whose description doth insue.

Cosh Were. Westby vnder ỹ plane ner Wil out a ỹ oz twai

Frome The Frome ryseth in the east part of Shẽdip hils, and from thence rũneth by Astwijc, ỹ Cole pits, Lye vnder Wendippe, Whateley, Elmesbzidge, and sone after taketh in the Nonney water, comming from Nonney castle, thẽce to Walles & Dzcharley bzidge, where it receiueth a pzety bzoke descending from Frome Selwode west of Bzackley, increased with sundzy rils, wherof two come out of Selwood fozrest (and one of them from the Fratry) another out of Long lead parke, from Hozningham, and the fourth from Colley. Hence our Frome goeth to Lullington, Beckington, Farley castle, Bozde and Fresh fozd, and taking in the Silling bzoke falleth into the Auon beneath Bzadfozd, and east of Freshfozd. From thence goyng beneath Stoke, it receyueth on the left hande a water commyng from southwest, increased by sundzy bzokes, whereof one commeth frõ Camelet by Litleton, and Dankerton, the other from Stone Elton, Midsommer Nozton, by Welston, Rodstocke, Wzigleton, Foscot, and Wellow (and there takyng in a rill from Phillips Nozton, it goeth) by Clauerton to Hampton, & there it meeteth wyth another water commyng from Barthfozde, whose hed is at Littleton, from whence it rũneth by west Kinton to Castle comb (where it ioyneth with a rill rising by nozth from Litleton dzue) and thence commeth south to Nonney Silling.

Slaugh-

Slaughtenford, Haselbury, Bor, Baithford, and so into the Auon, which turnyng playne west hasteth to Baithwyc, and (meeting wt another in his passage from Coldaston) to Bathe the Tiuertons and Cosson. Here also it taketh in a rill by the way from Markesbiry by Wilmerton and Newton, and then goyng on to Salwford, it meeteth with one rill sone after west of Northstocke, called Swinford, and another by Bittō, from Durhain by Wike, and so procedeth stil holding on his way to Cainsham, where it crosseth the Chute, which issueth at Winford, and goeth by bishops Chue to Penford, and there receiueth the Clue commyng from Cluton, and from thence to Chute, and so into Auon. The Auon likewyse after all these confluences goeth to Bristelton, and so to Bristow, beneath which it receyueth a rill on eche side; (whereof one commeth from aboute Stoke lodge in Gloucester shire, beyng a faire water and running by Acton, Frampt̄, Hambroch, Stapleton, and thorow Bristow, the other by south from Dundzey hill & towne, by Bispzt and Bedminster) and so discending yet lower, goeth to Rawnehain passage & Clyston, then by S. Vincentes rocke and Laie, next of all to Crocampill, and finally into the sea, whether all waters by nature do resort.

Beside this water, Leland maketh mention of Alderley brok, which in some auncient recordes is also called Auon, and runneth by Barkeley. In like maner he talketh of Douresley becke, whose principal hed is in Douresley towne, howbeit he saith no thing of it more, then that it serueth sundry tucking lucking milles, & goeth by Tortworth or foure miles further, before it come at the Sauern. Finally, making mention of an excellent quarrey of hard stone about Douresley, he telleth of the Tortworth becke that runneth within a sight shot of Barkeley towne, and falleth on the left hande into Sauerne marches, taking with all the Alderley or Auon, except I mistake his meanyng, which may sone be done among his confused notes.

Of the Sauerne, and such riuers as fall into the same, as also of other, whereby the rest afore mencioned, are increased before we come to the Humber.

Chap. 2.

The Sauerne springeth from the byghe mountaines of southwales, as I haue before remembred, and runnyng frō thence, the first water that it receiueth of any name, is called Dulas, which commeth therinto on the south side, & south west of Lan Idlos. It riseth as it should seeme of diuers heds in the edge of Radnorshire, and taking in sundry small rils, it meeteth at the last with ẏ Brueham brooke, and so they go togither till they fal into the Sauerne. Beneth lan Idlos likewise it taketh in the Clewdogh from north west, produced by the influence of foure prety brokes, whereof one is called Bacho, another Dunguin (commyng out of lin Glaslin) the third Lhoid rising in lin Beglin, & the most southerly Bigga. After which confluēce our Sauerne procedeth on by Berhlaid toward Landyman, taking in by the way on the east side the Couine, thence to Cairfuse castle; where it meeteth with the Carnon and the Taran both in one chanell, and going not far from the aforesaid fortresse. After this it crosseth the Hawes, on the north halfe beneth Aberhawes, next of all the Dulesse, that riseth in the edge of Radnorshire, and meteth with it before it come at Newton, otherwise called Trenewith, as I finde in Brittishe language. Being past Newton, it runneth forth by Landilouarne, and so forth on till it come to the fall of the Wule, whose hed is in ẏ edge of Radnor also, and therto his passage by Kery and Lanmerepwyg. After this also it procedeth further till it meete with the Kenlet or the Camalet (which taketh in also ẏ Tate or Tadbrokewater, rysing out of the hilles a myle from Bishops towne) the whole course therof beyng about seuen miles from the hed as I haue often heard. Of this also I find two descriptions, wherof one I borrow out of Leland, who saith that it is a prety broke runnyng in the dale by Mountgomery, and commyng within halfe a myle of the place where Chirbiry prory stood, it falleth into ẏ sauern, about a mile from thence. Of the rils saith he that run from the hils thorow Mountgomery, which are a myle from the Sauern shore, & likewise of the Lan Idlos broke that meeteth with all within foure miles of the hed, I speake not but thinke it sufficient to touche those of some estimation, onely leaning ẏ rest to such as may hereafter deale with thinges more particularly, as time and trauaile may reueale the truth vnto them, and hitherto Lelande whose wordes I dare not alter. But another noteth this Camalet or Kenlet to run by Moze, Liddiom, Sned, Churchstocke, Chirbury, Walcote and Winsbiry, and so into the Sauerne. From hence then, and after this confluence it goeth on by Fordon, Leighton and Landbreup toward Belueuerley, & there it meeteth with sundry waters in one chanell, wherof the one called the Tanet, is a very prety water (wherinto the Pe-

The hed of the Mozdant ryseth out of Lanuerdan hils, where diuers say that the paroche church of Croste Oswald or Oswester sometimes stod: Certes Oswester is 13. miles northwest frō Shrewsbury, and conteyneth ample within the walles. It hath in like sort foure suburbs or great stretes, of whiche one is called Stratlan, another Mullyn, the third Beterich (wherin are 140. barnes standyng on a row belonging to the cittizens or burgesses) and the fourth named the black gate strete, in whith are 30. barnes maintayned for corn and hay. There is also a brooke running thorough the towne by the crosse, comming frō Simons well, a bowe shot without the wall, and goyng vnder ỳ same betwene Thorowgate and Newgate, it runneth also vnder the blacke gates. There is an other in lyke sorte ouer whose course the Baderikes or Beterich gate standeth, and therfore called Bederichs brooke. The third passeth by the Willigate or Newgate, and these fall altogether with the crosse brooke a myle lower by south into the Mozdant that runneth (as I sayd) by Oswester. From hence also it goeth to Mozdant towne, and betwéene Lanobzeuy & Melverley doth fall into the Sauerne. After this our principall streame goeth to Sheauerton castle, Mountford, and Victon chappell, and here it receyueth a water on the left hande, that riseth of two heds, whereof one is aboue Merton, the other at Ellismere, and ioynyng betwéene Walcheuses and Bagley, the confluence runneth on by Radnall, Halto, Tedesmer, Roiton, Baschurch, Walford, Grafton, Pitton, and so into the Sauerne. From hence it runneth to Fitz, Eton, or Leyton, Barwise, Upper Rollall, Shelton, and so to Shrewsbury, where it crosseth the Mele water, whose head as I heare, is sayd to bée in Melton.

Mele.

The Mele therfore rising at Melton, goeth by Broctō, Worthen, Alton Pigot, Wellley, Atterley, and at Lea it méeteth with the Haberley water, that cōmeth down by Pontesford and Aunston. After this confluence also it runneth to Newenham, and Crokemele (there taking in a ril on ỳ other side that descendeth by Wellbury & Stretton) & thence goyng on to Hanwood, Nobald, Pulley, Bracemele and Shrewsbury, it falleth as I sayd, into the open Sauerne. From hence our Sauerne hasteth to Vffington, Preston, and betwéene Chilton and Brampton taketh in the Terne, a faire stream and worthy to be well handled if it lay in me to performe it. This riuer riseth in a Mere beside Welbridge park, nére vnto Tern Mere village in Staffordshire. Frō whence it runneth by the parkes side to Knighton, Norton, Betton, and at Draiton Hales crosseth with a water commyng from aboute Adbaston, (where M. Brodocke dwelleth) and runneth by Chippenham and Amming: so that the Terne on the one side, and this brooke on the other, do inclose a great part of Bloze heth, where a noble battaile was sōetime purposed betwéene king Henry the 3. and ỳ Duke of Norke, but it wanted execution. But to procéede after this confluence, it runneth to Draiton Hales, Ternehill bridge, & ere long taking in a ril from Sandford by Blechley, it goeth to Stoke Allerton, Peplaw, and Eaton, where it crosseth with a brooke that ryseth about Brinton, and goyng by Higham, Norton, the great Mere, Forton, Pilson, Pickstocke, Leinton, Tibberton and Bolas, it ioyneth with the said Terne not far from Water Upton. Thence passing to Crogenton, it meteth with another brooke, that commeth from Chaltwen Alton, by Newporte, Longford, Aldney, and so thorow the Wilde moze to Kinesley and Slépe, and finally into the Terne, which hasteth from thence to Eston bridge, and nere vnto Walcote taketh in the Roden. This water riseth at Halton in Cumber mére lake, and commyng to Duckley, crosseth a rill from Cowlemere by Lenyall. Thence it goeth to Norton, and (ioyning with another rill beneth Nonnelay that commeth from Hidle) runneth on to Wen, Alton (there crossing a rill beneth Lacon hall from Prées ward) and so to Lée, Bessorde, Stanton, Norton, Shabzé, Paynton, Rodé, Rodington, and then into Terne that runneth from thence by Charlton, Upton, Norton, Barwise, Accham, & so into ỳ Sauerne two miles beneath Shrewsbery as I wéene. Thus haue I described the Terne in suche wyse as my simple skill is able to performe.

Now it resteth that I procéede on as I may, with the Sauerne streame with which after this former confluence it goth vnto Rorater, Brampton, Eaton vpon Sauerne, Draiton (where it ioyneth with the Euerne that runeth from Frodesleyward, by Withiall & Pitchford) Crelledge, Garneston, Leighton, and betwéene the two Bildasses crosseth the Rhe or Wenlocke water, and so goeth on to Brolley and Hord parke, where it vniteth it it selfe with another brooke to be described in this place whilest the Sauerne rest, and recreate it selfe here among the pleasaunt bottomes.

This water ryseth aboue Tongcastle, and ere it haue run any great distaunce from the hed, it méeteth with a rill commyng by Shirisse Hales, and Staunton. Thence it goeth on to Hatton, Royton, & there crossing another from Woodhouses, cómyng by Haughton and Euelin, it procéedeth to Beckebiry and Higford, and not omitting here to crosse ỳ Worse that runneth vnto it out of Snowdon pole, it passeth forth to Badger, Acleton, Ringlesord, and so into Sauerne, somewhat aboue Bridgenorth except myne information deceiue me. From Bridgenorth our Sauerne descendeth to Woodbury, Quatford, and there taking in the Marbrooke beneath Eaton (that riseth aboue Collaton, and goeth by Morul and Underto) it runneth by Didmanston, Hempton, Aueley, and beneath in the way to Bargate, crosseth with a brooke commyng from Upton parke by Chetton, Billingsley, and Highley, which beyng admitted, it holdeth on to Areley, Eyarnewood parke, Hawbache, and Dowlesse. Here also it méeteth with the Dowlesse water, a pretye brooke issuyng out of Cle hils in Shropshire, which are 3. myles from Ludlow, and running thorow Clebiry park in Wire forrest, and takyng with all the Lempe, doth fall into the Sauerne not very far from Bewdley. But to procéede. From Bewdley our Sauerne hasteth directly to Ribford, Areley and Redston, and here it méeteth with a water called Stoure, descending from Eley, or out of the pondes of Hales owen in Worcester shire, where it receyueth one rill from ỳ left hand, and an other from the right, and then goeth on to Sturbridge (taking in there the third water ere long running from Sturton castle) then to Kniuer Whittenton, Ducrley and Rydormisser, aboue which it crosseth one brookelet that commeth thyther by churche hill, and another beneath it that runneth by Belborow, betwirt which two waters lyeth an odde peece of Staffordshire included, and also the Cle hill. From hence the aforesayde Sauerne hasteth by Redston to Shrawley, and aboue this towne receiueth the Astley water, as beneath the same it doth an other. From Witley thẽ it goeth on to Holt castle, and so to Grimley, taking in therabout with the Dour, and Sulway waters, whereof this riseth at Chadswyc, and runneth by Stoke priory, & Dreitwiche, the other aboue Chadesley, and commeth by Dourdale. After this it goeth forth vnto Worcester, in olde tyme called Cair Brangon, by Cair Frangon, where it méeteth with the Tiber, or Tiberto water on the right hand aboue that city, and beneath it nére vnto Powyc with ỳ Temde, whose description shall be set downe before I procéede or goe any further wyth the Sauerne. Tiber.

The Temde or as some name it ỳ Tame, riseth vp in Radnorshire out of the Pelénith hils, and sone after hys issue, méeting with a water from Withal, it runneth to Begeldy, Lanuerwaterden, and so to Knighton, which is v. or vj. miles as I heare from hys originall. From Knighton it goeth ouer the ditch of Offa vnto Standish, and crossyng a rill that commeth from betwene the parkes, named Clude (and is a bound of Radnorshire) it goeth to Buckton, Walford, and Lanuardé, where it méeteth with the Bardwell or Berfield, and the Clun both in one chanell, of which I find these descriptions here followyng worde for worde in Lelande. The Bardwell or Barfield riseth aboue new chappel, in the honour of Clun, hard by the ditche of Offa, and goeth by Bucknell. The Clun issueth out of the ground betwéne Lhan Uehan and Paiston, and going on by Bucton, Clun castle, Clundon, Purslaw, and Clunbiry, it crosseth with a brooke that runneth along by Kempton and Brampton. Thence goyng forth by Clunbury, Brome, Abcot and Parlow, it méeteth with the Bardwell, and so into the Temde, not very farre from Temderton. I suppose that Lelãd calleth the Bardewell by the name of Dwke, but I will not abide by it because I am not sure of it. After these confluences therfore our Temde, goeth by Trippleton, Deunton, Burrington, and Bromefield, where it méeteth with the Duey, which is an indifferent streame, and increased with sundry waters, wherof I say as followeth. The first of all is called the Bow. It riseth as I learne in the hilles betwéne Hillington and Shelue, and from thence cõmeth down by Lindley and Hardwyc, where it crosseth the Warren that issueth out of the ground about Rotly chappell, and runneth by Adston and Mentnor. After the confluence also goyng on by Choulton and Cheynles, it taketh in the Quency and Strabroke both in one chanell, wherof the first riseth at Lebotwood, and commeth downe by the Strettons till it passe by Feilanton. The seconde mounteth about Longuill, & goeth by Rushebury, Newhall, Harton, and Alcaster, from whence it is not long ere it fal into the Quény, and so by Stratford into the Duey, which hath borne that name sithens the confluence of the Bow and Warré at Hardwyc, wher-of I spake before. Finally, the Dney which Somergil. some call the Somergill beyng thus increased, it runneth on to Hawford chappel, Newtō, Dneybury, Bromefield, & so into Temde, and next of all to Ludlow. The Temde beyng thus brought to Ludlow, meeteth with ỹ Cozne. Cozne which commeth thorowe Cozuedale frō aboue Broctor by Horehouses, Shipton, Hungerford, and a little beneath takyng in a ril that commeth by Tugford, and Brancott castle, goeth on to Corsham castle, and there crossing another from S. Margarets Clee, it hyeth to Stanton Lacy, and so likewyse to Ludlow. From Ludlow in lyke sort it goeth to Ludford, the Alhefordes, little Hereford, Burrington and at Burford buiteth it selfe Ladwiche. with the Ladwich that commeth beneth Hilburne stoke, from betweene Browne, Cleehill, and Stittertons hill, to Middelton, Henley, Ladwich, Conam, and so into Temde, which beneth Temdbury receyueth another ril on the other side, and the second on ỹ left

Rhe. hand called Rhe, that commeth from aboue
Ricton, Staterton, Hounde, Mene, Clebiry, Knighton, and then into the Temde. From hence the Temd goeth by Alkā, Lingridge, Shelley Welch, Clifton, Whitburne (and crossing a water that commeth from ỹ Sa-pies) to Knightwyc and Bradwaies. Here about againe it intertaineth a rill that descendeth from aboute Kidbury on the right hand, and goeth by Collomathern, Credeley, Austrike, and so into Temd, and then procedyng forwarde the said streame, renneth to Braunforde, & ere long (taking in the Lang-herne that ryseth about Hartley, and passeth Lang- herne. by Kengelwyc) it goeth to Powyc, and so into the Sauerne before it come at Wickece-ster. Thus haue I brought all such streames before me that fall into the Sauerne, from the hed, vntill I come to Powyc, wherof as you may easily perceiue the Temde, is the most excellent. Now it resteth that I proced with the rest of the discourse intended concernyng this our riuer. Certes, frō Powyc mils which are about halfe a myle beneath Worcester, ỹ Sauerne runneth on to Kempsey and Cleueld, whence after it hath crossed a broke commyng from Cowley, & it hasteth first to Stoke, and so to Upton, but ere it come there, it drouneth another fall descen-dyng from Maluerne hilles by Blackemore parke, and sone after the third growyng by two braunches, whereof one commeth also from Maluerne hils by little Maluerne and Welland, the other from Elderford by Pen-dock and Longdon. After these confluences in lyke sort, it runneth to Bushelley, & Tewkesbiry, where it receiueth the Auon, that fo-loweth next of all in order to be described, before I proced any further in my discourse of Sauerne.

The Auon riseth at Pauesby in the bor- Auo ders of Northhampton shire, a little fro hād of Gillesborow, and fote of the hils whereon Pauebey standeth, and eue out of the church yard of the sayde village. From hence it goeth to Welford, Stamford, Lilburne, Clifton, and Rugby, by north wherof it crooketh a water called Swift, which commeth from Swiu aboue Rymcote, to Lutterworth, Browne ouer and Collford. From thence also it goeth to Newbold, Wolston, Rugington, & betwene the Stonlies taketh in the Sow. This Sowe Souu is a prety water cōming from aboue Calendon to Whitley, & sone after meeting with a riueret from Couentry, which some doe call Shirburne water, it goeth thence to Bag-ginton where it taketh in a rill called Rynel, as I haue red from Kenelworth, frō whence Ryn
it runneth to Stonley, and so into the Auon.
After this confluence the Auon procedeth on to Stonley Abbey, Alchehow, Milverton, Edmonds cote, and a pace to Warwic. But ere it come there, it meeteth from south east with two waters in one chanell, wherof the least commeth to Parton from bishops Itching-ton, by Herburbiry and Thorpe, where it crosseth a rill from Southam. The other is called Leame, or Lime that descendeth from Lem about Helladen, or neere vnto Catesby in Northampton shire, and going by Duecote, Braunston, Lemington and Merton, it ioy-neth with the other, and then go from thence together vnder the name of Leame, to Yun-nington, Cobbington, and so into the Auon as I gaue notice before. At Warwycke also the Auon taketh in a water runnyng northwest from Grone parke. Thence it goeth on to Berford, and there crossing another from Shirburne, it passeth forth to bishops Pam-ton, meting finally with the third, frō Rine-ton that runneth by Walton and Charlcote.
After this last rehersed confluence, it hasteth to Stretford vpon Auon, and thē to Ludding-ton ward, where it taketh in the Stoure that Stou riseth aboue Cherington, and whose course from thence is such, as that beyng once past the head, it goeth by Weston, and ere long crossing a water from Campden, hangyng Alton, and Todnam, it runneth to Barche-ston, Aldermalton, Clifford, and so into the Auon. From hence then the sayd Auon goeth to Luddington, Burton, Bitford, and Cleue, and beyng parted from the said towne, ere it come at Sawford, it receiueth the Arrow or Aur, which rising in the blacke hils in Wor- Arro cester shire, commeth by Alcherche, Beley
parke,

parke, Pyſley, Studley, & thē taking in another rill called Alne, out of Feckham foreſt, & going by Colwghtō park, it haſteth to Alceſter, Arrow, Ragley, Wheteley, Bouington, Stādford, & ſo into Auō, which after this cōiunctiō goeth to Alſentō, & thē to Couelholm: But ere it come there it receyueth two waters in one Chanell, whereof the firſt ryſeth about Willerſey, ỹ other nere to Buckland, and ioyning beneath Badſey, they fall into Auon, vnder the name of Pludor breke before it come to Couelholme. Beyng paſt Couelholme it croſſeth ỹ Vincell, which ryſing out of the hilles ſomewhere about Sudley, runneth two myles farther to Winchelcome, and Gretton, and taking in a ryll by the waye from Hayles, proceedeth on (going within one quarter of a myle of Hayles Abbaie) to Tuddington, or Doddington, beneath which when it hath croſſed another rill that commeth from Stanwaie, it goeth to Warmington, Sedgebarow, and receyuing there the laſt on the ryght hande alſo (as all aboue rehearſed) it falleth into the Auon, whē it is come by Hinton, vnto a towne called Hamptō, or as ſome do write it Ampton. After this confluence the Auon goeth to Charlton, to Crapthorne (and there taking in a rill on the left hand) to Fladbyry wike, & almoſt at Perſore bridge, meeteth with a braunched water that commeth by Pidle, whereof one heade is at Alberton, an other at Pidle. Frō Perſore it goeth to Birlingham, and ſone after carrying a breke withall diſcending from Fakenham, by Bradley, Himbleton, Huddenton, Crowley, Churchehill, Pibletō, Beſſefore and Deſſefore, it fleeteth to Eckington, Bredon, Twining, Witton, & Tewkeſbiry, where it ioyneth with the Sauerne.

Now to reſume the courſe of the Sauerne, you ſhall vnderſtande that from Tewkeſbiry it goeth to Derehirſt, thē how paſſage, and ſone after receyuing the Chiltenham water that commeth thither by Bodenton, Sawton, & Norō, it runneth to Alhelworth, Sainthirſt, & here it parteth it ſelf till it come to Gloceſter, where it vniteth it ſelf againe. But in the meane time ỹ eaſterly braūch receyueth a forked chanell, wherof one heade is not farre from Leke hāpton, the other about Witcōb, frō whēce it goeth to Brockworth. The other braunche or arme, taketh in the Leaden that cōmeth down by Preſtō, Dimmock, Pantley vper Leadon, Leadon court and there taking in one rill that commeth from Linton by Arekenoll, and another beneath it frō Tainton by Rudforde, it falleth into the ſayde braunche on the right ſide, before it come at Gloceſter. The Sauerne therefore being paſt Gloceſter, it meeteth wyth a little ryll on the ryght hande, and thence holdyng on his courſe by Elmore, Minſterworth Longney to Framilode, it receyueth ere it come at this latter the Strowd broke, which riſing not farre from Syde, goeth by Mallade, Edgeworth Frampton Strowde, and receyuing there a water that commeth from Pannelwiſe Lodge, by Pitteſcombe on the one ſide, and another from Radbridge on the other, it proſequeth hys voyage to Stone houſe, Eſtington, whyte Mylen, and ſo toward Framilode where the ſayde Strowde doth fall into the Sauerne. Strowd.

After the fall of Strowde, the Sauerne goeth from thence to Newenham, and Arlingham, and ſone after receyuing a water on eche ſide, whereof one commeth from Uley by Cham and Chambridge, the other by Blackney and Catcombe, it goeth forth tyll it meete with another water, on eche ſyde, whereof that on thenglyſhe halfe is forked, ſo that one heade thereof is to be founde about Borwell, the other at Horton, and meeting aboue Tortworthy, they runne by Stone and Barkeley Caſtell, and ſo into the Sauerne. That on ỹ welch halfe is named Newarne, which commeth from the forreſt of Deane, and ſo into the Sauerne. Newarne.

The nert ryuer that falleth into the ſayde ſtreame is the Wie, or Guy, whoſe deſcription I haue not ſo exactly as I would wiſh, & therfore I muſt be contented to ſet it down as I may, the like alſo muſt I doe vō the reſt of thoſe of wales, becauſe mine information failleth me, without all hope of redreſſe. Wye or Guy.

The Guy therefore ryſeth out of ỹ blacke mountaines of wales, in Radnor ſhire & cōming by Lhāgerik, & Riadargoy it receiueth one ryll from northeaſt by S. Harmon, & another from the weſt called Darnoll. Thence it goeth to Lhanuthel, and in the way betwirte Riadar and Lanuthell, it ioyneth wyth the Elland (whoſe heade is nere to Comerykwith) & taketh likewiſe into him the Clardwen that deuideth for a ſeaſon Radnor ſhire from Brecknoch. From Lhanuthel it goeth weſt of Diſſart, where it receyueth ỹ Ithan, a riuer riſing aboue Lhanibiſter, and from whence it runneth to Landwy, and Lanbaderne vaur. Beneath this alſo it croſſeth a water on eche ſide, wherof that on the ryght hand conſiſteth of the Duleſſe, and the Clucdoch, after their confluence, other the hight Lomaron whoſe heade is aboue Lanihangle. After theſe confluences, it runneth on crinkeling in ſtraunge maner, till it come to Diſſart, (taking in the Hawy on the left ſide ere it come there) and then into ỹ Wy, which Darnol. Elland. directeth his course to Bealt, alias Lhanuear where it receyueth the Prwon, a notable streame, and inlarged by sondry faire waters, as the Weuerey, the Dulas, and the Comarch on the one side, and likewise an other Dulesse, beside sondry small rils on the other. After this our Irwon goeth to Lhanuareth where it crosseth the Dehon on the one side, then to Aberedwy, and there receyueth the Edwy on the other, and after that the Machawey that runneth by Castle pain, and so going on méeteth in processe of tyme with the Leuẽni, wherof Leland in his commentaryes, doth write as here insueth.

Leuenni,

The Leuenni, otherwise called the Euer or Euery, is a faire streame rising in Welche Talgarth hard by Blain Leuenni, among the Atterill hilles, from whence it goeth to Brecknock Mere, which is two miles long, and a myle brode, and where mẽ fish in Vniligneis or botes of one péece, as they doe in Lhin Seuathan, which is foure myles from Brechnoch. Finally bringing great store of Red sande withall, and there with the Brennich water (that hath his originall issue at Pennith gader, and is encreased with the Trufrin) it falleth into ẏ Wie abone Glesebyry three miles from Hale, at a place that of the onelye fall of this brooke is named Aberleuenni. Being come to Hale (a pretye towne where much Romaine coine is found, which the people call Jewes money) it méeteth with the Dulesse that cõmeth also from the Atterell by Kersop, and from thence goeth to Clifford castel, the Whitneles, Winferton, Letton, Bradwarden, Brobery, Monington, Byforde, Bridgesalers, Eaton, Brynton and Herefordе, where it méeteth with a water ryling shorte of Wormesley, and goeth by Maunsell, Lacy, Brinsop, Credell, Stretton and Huntington, and sone after into the Wye, beside a little ryll that runneth betwene them both euen into Herefordе towne. From hence in lyke sorte the Wye hasteth to Rotheras church, Hamptõ, and Mordeford, where it taketh in sundrye waters in one chanell, of which the Lug or Luy is the principall, and next of all to be described before I go any furder with ẏ course of the Wye, whereinto it dischargeth the chanell. It ryseth as I reade, harde by Melenith neare to a chappell of our Ladye of Pylale, from whence it goeth to Rineton, Titley, Stanbach, Staunton, Pembridge, Arellande, Storbach, Euington, Brparley, beneath which it crosseth the Wadele, comming from new Radnor, Harton, olde Radnor, Nash, and hereabout méeting with an other running by Weston hall, to Monacht, Fulbrooke, Preston (a market towne) and so to Byton, where ioyning with ẏ Wadel, they run on as one to ouer Lée, Kilminster, Kingeslande, Elton, and Leon Minster (or Lemister) taking in the Dney by the waye, before we come at the towne. At Lemister it selfe in like sort three waters doe méete, and almost enuironne the towne, that is to say, the Lug, the Pinfulley or Pinsell (a ryuret rysing at Kingeslande two myles from Lemister) and the Kenbrooke, which commeth out of the blacke mountaines. From Lemister the Lug or Luy goeth on to Eton, and there taketh in a rill beneath Hampton, whereof one heade is betwéene Hatfield and Buckleton, an other neare vnto Marston, & méeting both at Humber. From Hampton it goeth to Wellington, Morton, Sutton, Shelwyke, Lugwardine, & Longward, where it crosseth the Fromey or frome a prette water, and worthy to be remembred. It ryseth aboue Wolferelaw, from whence it commeth downe to Bromeyarde, Auenbary, Frome cassell, Stretton vpon Frome, and there taking in a water (called Acton, or Loden as I take it) comming from aboue Byschoppes Grendon, by Pencomb, Colwarne, Stoke Lacy, Colwarne, and Engleton, it (I meane Frome) goeth on to Yarkeley, Dorington, and Longwarde, and so into the Lug, which runneth furthwith to Mordford or Worthford, & so into the Wye, vnto whose description I nowe returne agayne. Being come therefore vnto Mordforde, it goeth to Hamlacy, Ballinghã, Capull regis (where it receyueth a water called Treske, from Berche by Treske) Fawley, Brokanton, Howe capull, Inkeston, Foy, Brampton, Bridstowe, Wilton Castell, the Rosse (and there a rill from Bishoppes Opton by Budhall,) Wereferde, Yam, Glewston, Godderiche, (here in lyke sort méeting with another that commeth from Ecleswall, by Peniard Castell and Coughton) to Welche Bicknor, Englishe Bicknor, Huntesham & Whitchurch, where it taketh in Gaynar water that cõmeth from Birche, by Lanwarne, Michaell church, and at Langarran crossing the Garran brooke, that ryseth in Gregwood fiue myles from Monemouth by Norwest, these two doe runne as one, to Marston, Whitchurch and so into the Wye, which goeth from thence to Dirton and Monemouth, where I will stay a whyle till I haue described the Mone, next of all to be remembred here.

wall, after it hath runne a good distaunce frō the head, it receyueth the Elkon on the one side, and the Elkill or Yesgill on the other: but first of all this last remembred that commeth thither by Lanthengle, Elkill and the olde Court. As for the other it commeth frō aboue Knedoch by Landuehans churche, and this is all that I can say of these two. After these confluences therfore, the Mona goeth to Cluedoch, & taking in the Hodny that rūneth by fine Capell, Lantony abbay, Stāton, Michaell churche, it hasteth on to Walderston, Landsillo, and then toyneth wyth the Dour, that ryseth a little aboue Dourston, which is fyue miles aboue Dour abbay, so that it runneth thorow the Gilden dale, by Peterchurch, Folwchurche, Morhampton, Newcourt, Dour, and beneath Dour taketh in the Dulesse, from Lanuethengle, by Harlestwas cassell on the one side, and eare long the Wormesbecke from aboue Keuernal by Didley, Deueror, Worthebridge and Kenderchurch on the other, and so running all in one chanell vnto Mona, that riuer goeth on to Kinech churche, Grismonde, Cardway, Skenfrith, Warnethall, Perthire and so to Monemouth, where it meeteth wyth the Wye.

The Guy or Wye therfore being increased with thus many brookes and waters, passeth on from hence, and going toward Landogo, it meeteth with ẏ Trolly becke, whose head is aboue Lannam ferry and goeth from thence by Lhantellio, Lanthangell, Gracedieu, Diggestow, Wonastow, Troy and so into Wye, that runneth also by Wilts wood chase, taking in there the Elwy that cōmeth from aboue Landelwy by Langowen, Lanissen, Penclase, Trilegh, and Langogo, where meeting with the afore sayde streame, the Wye directeth his course from thence by Tinterne abbay, Chepstow and so into the sea, leauing the Treacle (a Chappell standing on a rocke) on the left hande betweene it and Sauerne, ouer against the point that lyeth south of Wetteley. Nert vnto the Wye, I finde a rill of no great course, comming downe from Mounton chappell, by a place of the bishops of Landaffe. Thence passing by Charlton rocke, and the point whereon Trinitie chappell standeth, I come vnto the fall of Trogy, which ryseth short of Trogy cassell, & runneth towarde the sea, by Landuair, Dewlton, Calycot and so into the Ocean.

The next fall is of a water that commeth from about Penho by Saint Bides, north and by west of Denny Island, which lieth midway betweene that Fall & Horshot point, and before I touche at Goldcleffe point, I crosse another fall of a freshe brooke, whose heade is aboue Landuciго, and course by Lhanbed, Langston, Lhanwarne, & thorowe the more to Wilston.

The Vske or Wiske, in latin Osca riseth in such sort as I haue already described, & running in processe of tyme, by Trecastell, it taketh in the Craie brooke, on the right hande before it come to Kidburne chappell. Going also frō thence toward Deuinock, it crosseth the Senney on the same side, (which riseth aboue capel Senney) next of all the Camblas, and at Abbraine the Brane, or the Bremich whose head is three miles from Brecknock, and running by Lanthengle, it meeteth I say with the Vske, about Mayster Awbries Maner. Beneath Aber Ysker, it receyueth the Ysker, which riseth aboue Martir Kinoch and commeth by Battell chappell, and goyng fromthence by Lanspythed, and Newton, it runneth in the ende to Brecknocke, where it taketh in the Hodney on the one side, whose head is in Blaine Hodney, and commyng downe from thence by Defrune chappell, Lanthāgle, & Landiuilog it meeteth with the Vske at Brecknocke townes ende, which of the fall of this water, was sometime called Aberhodni, as I haue bene informed: on the other halfe likewise it receyueth ẏ Tertarith that ryseth among the Bane hylles, fyue myles from Brecknoch and commeth likewise into the very subburbes of ẏ towne beneath Trenewith, or newe Troy wherby it taketh the course.

After these confluēces, the Vske procēdeth on towarde Aberkinurike, or the fall of a water whose heade is in the rootes of Menuchdenny hil, and passage by Cantreffe. Thence it goeth by Lanhamlaghe, Penkethley castell, Lanlanfreid Landetty, Langonider, & sone after receyuing the Kiangall (which riseth about the hill whereon Dynas Cassell standeth, and runneth by Lanyhangle and Tretoure) it passeth betweene Laugattocke and Cerighhowell, to Langroyny, and there crosseth the Groyny brooke, that discendeth from Monegather Arthur hill, by Peter Church, as I finde. When the Vske is past this brooke, it taketh in three other short rils, from by south with in a little distance, whereof the first hight Cledoch Maur, the seconde Fydan, & the thirde Cledochvehan. Of these also the last falleth in nere to Lanwenarth. From hence the Vske runneth to Abergeuenni towne, where it meeteth with the Geuenni water from by north (that riseth short of Bettus Chappell) & so goeth on to Hardwise, beneath which it crosseth three nameles

Gruenni. rilles on the right hande before it come at Lanhangle vpon Vske, of whose courses I know not any more then that they are not of any length nor the chanel of sufficient greatnes seuerally to entreate of. Betweene Kemeneys and Trostrey it meeteth with such an other rill that commeth downe by Bettus Newith. Thence it goeth to Cair Vske or Bzenbigei, but eare it come there, it receyueth the Birthin on the right hande, which is a prettie water descending from two heades, wherof the first is north west of Manyhylot, as the other is of Lanyhangle & Pentmorell. Next vnto this it ioyneth with the Elwy aboue Lanbadocke, whose heade is East of Penclase, and running westwardes by Penclase, Lanmillen, Langolwen (and beneath Landewy taking in a broket from Ragland castell, that commeth downe thither by Raglande parke) it bendeth southwest vntill it come at the Vske, which crinckling toward the South meeteth with three rilles before it come to Narthey chappell, wherof the first lyeth on the right hande, and the other on the left. Frō Narthelly it hasteth to Kemmeys, and eare it come at Carleon, taketh in two waters on the ryght hande, of which the first commeth downe betweene Landgwy & Landgweth, & by Lhan Henoch, without any farder increase: but the other is a more beautifull streame, called Auon, and thus described as I finde it among my pamphlettes.

Birthin. Cair vske standeth on one side of Vske, and Carlō on the other, but Cair vske by diuers miles farder into the land.

Auon. The Auon ryseth in the hilles that seeme to part Monemouth and Brecknock shires in sunder, and running downe from thence by Capell Newith and Triuethin, it receyueth a water from by south almost of equall course, & from that quarter of the countrie and in processe of time, another little one frō the same side, eare it come to Lanyhangle, from whence it goeth to Gwennocke & Penrose, and so in Vske before it go by Carleon. Being past Carlion it runneth to Crymdy, where M. Harbert dwelleth, and there carying another broke withall, that descendeth by Henlis and Bettus chappell, it runneth furth to Newport (in Welch castel Newith) and from thence into the sea taking the Ebowith water withall, whose race I described in my first booke, but hauing nowe more intelligence of his course, I will ones againe deale with it in this manner as I reade it.

Ebowith. The Ebowith riseth in ẏ very edge of Monemouth shyre, aboue Blaineg went, and coming downe by Lanbeleth and Tumberlow hyll (crossing a ryll from North east by the way) it taketh in therabout ẏ Serowy, that runneth by Trestrent, and is of lesse race hitherto, then the Ebowith, and frō that same quarter. After this confluence it goeth to Riskey, Rochestron castell, next of all thorowe a parke, and so to Grenefeld castell, and is not long ere it fall into the sea, being the last issue that I doe finde in the county, which beareth the name of Monemouth, & was in olde time a part of the region of the Silures.

Serowy.

The Kemeney or as some corruptly call it the Ponney is a goodly water, and from the head a march betweene Monemouth & Glamorgan shires. It receyueth no water on the east side, but on the west diuers smal beckes, whereof three are betweene the rising & Bathetere chappell, the fourth commeth in by Capel Gledis, the fift from betweene the Faldray and Lanbadoc, the sixt and seuenth before it come to Bedwas, and the eyght ouer against Bedwas it selfe, from chappell Martin: after which confluences it runneth on by Maghan, Keuen, Mabley and Romeney, and ere long crossing a becke at North east, that commeth by Lanyssen, and Rathe it falleth sone after into the Sauerne, Sea, but see more of this in my former Treatize.

Kemeney.

The Taffe riseth among the woody hilles, that lye west, and by north of Mynchdeny hill, and going downe to Capell Nanty, it taketh in a rillet from by west, & afterward another from by east, comming by Morlais castell, called Taffe behan (as the former is named Taffe vaur) so that Menuch hill doth lye betweene these two heades, and therto is an hill of no smal height and greatnesse. Being ioyned they go on to Marty Tidull as one, & so procede til they mete with Cunnō, (or rather Kenon, tenne myles from Clauth constable, a faire Broke running to Aberdare, and after that with the Rodney, before described) where into the Cledugh falleth, a myle from Ketgowghe & an halfe, on ẏ west side, after which confluence it hasteth to the sea without any farder increase, by Castell Coythe, Whitchurche, Landaffe, and Cardiffe, as I gesse.

The Lay ryseth in the hylles aboue Lantrissent (for all the region is very hilly.) From whence comming by Lantrissent, it runneth by Coit Marchan parke, Lambeder S. Brides, Lhannihangel, Leckwith, Ladowgh, Cogampyll, and so into the sea, without anye manner increase by anye rylles at all saving the Dunelais, which ryseth foure myles from his fall, east northeast, & meeteth withall a little more then a quarter of a myle from Pont Melin Vaur, and likewise by west, the Methcoide that commeth from Glinne Rodeney, and wherein to the Pedware discharged that small water gathered in his chanell.

Leauing

Leauing the Laie which some call Claye, and passing the Pennarth baie, that lyeth betweene the Pennarth and the Lauerocke pointes, we left Scilley Islet (which lyeth in the mouth of Scilley hauen before described) and came vnto the Barry whose heade is aboue Wrinkton castell, and from whence hée runneth by Deinspewis, Cadorton, Barry and so into the sea.

Barry.

Thawan is the next streame (sauing Come Bidy touched afore) nowe to be described. It ryseth of two headlettes aboue Lanlannan, and thence goeth to Cowbridge, Lanblethian, Landoghe, Beanpere, Flymston, Gylston, and betweene the east and the west Aberthawan into the Sauerne Sea. But ere it come all there it receyueth a broke called Kenlan, or Karnlan, or Kenser, on the Eastside, whose heade is east of Bolston, and commyng by Charnelhoyde, Lhancaruan, and Lhancadle, it falleth into the former aboue eyther of the Thawans, Lelande sayth, that Kenlan hath two heades whereof the more Northerly called Brane, lieth in Lucnlithan, & runneth seauen myles before it méete wyth the other. Leauyng this water we sayled on, casting about the nashe point, omytting two or three waters whereof I haue made mencion in my former treatise by the way, because I haue nothing more to adde vnto their descriptions, except it be that the Colhow taketh in a rill frō Lan Iltruit, of whose course (to saye the truth) I haue no manner knowledge.

The Ogur or Gur, which some falsely call Ogmur, is a welfaire streame, (as we were wont to saye in our olde englishe) whose head is in the same hilles, where the Rodeneis are to be founde, but much more westerlye, and running a long course ere it come to any village, it goeth at the length beneth Languineuere, to S. Brides vpon Ogur, then to newe castell, and Narthermaure, beneath which it méeteth the Wenny, halfe a mile from Ogor castell on the east banke. It ryseth fiue or sixe miles from this place, among the hilles, and comming downe at last by Lanharne, it crosseth a ryll ere long from northeast, and the confluence passeth forth by Coitchurch, Ogor castell, and so into the Ogor. Lelande wryting of the waters that fall into thys Ogor sayth thus. Into the Ogur also resorteth the Garrow two myles aboue Lansanfride bridge, descending from Blaingarow. It taketh furthermore sayeth hée another called Leuenny rysing in the Paroch of Glin Corug, at Northwest, and then running two myles lower, vniteth it selfe with the Corug broke, a little short thing & worthie no longer speach. From this confluence the Leuenni goeth seuen myles farder eare it méete with the Ogor on the west side, at Lansanfride, two myles aboue Penbowt, and so farre Lelande. Next vnto the Ogur is the Kenlig water, that commeth downe by the Pyle and Kenlige castell, and being past the same we crosse the Margan rill, where Sir Edwarde Nanrell dwelt, and so vnto Auon, which hauing two heades as is said, the more easterly of them commeth downe by Hauedaport chappell, the other by Glin Corug, Michaell church, Aber Auon, and so into the sea. From hence we went along by the Cole pittes to the mouth of the Neth.

The Neth is a faire water, rysing of fiue heades, whereof the more easterlye named Nethvchā. Nethvehan riseth not farre from the head of the Kennon, and comming downe to Aberpirgwin, it receiueth Nethvaur, a litle aboue the towne, which rising not farre southeast of the head of Taup, receiueth ỳ Traugarth, the Weltay and the Hepsay (all which are accompted, as members of his heade) in one chanell about a myle or more before it ioyne with Nethvehan. After these confluences, the maine streame runneth in and out by sundry myles till it mette with the Dulesse, whose head is aboue Chappel Brenaunt. Thence it goeth to Cador towne, or betweene it and Lamiltyde, then to Nethtowne, and beneath the same receiuing the Cledoch, that runeth by Kelebebilch, and also Neth abbay where Y. The Taup (for I passe ouer the Crimline becke, bicause I want his description) riseth in the thickest of the blacke mountaines, and comming downe west of Callwen chappell, it receyueth on the east banke a ryll, named Coiell, that runneth thither by Coielburne chappell, and beyng thus vnited the chanell passeth forth by Istraguules, and then méeting with the Turche, or Torche water that commeth from the foote of the blacke mountaine, it runneth to Langoge, Lansamled, S. Johns, Swansey, and so into the Baie. Being past this we come by another litle fal, whose water runneth three or foure myles, ere it come into Swansey Baie, but without name. Thence going about by Dyscermout castell & Bumbles point, we go forth toward the southwest, by Pennarth point, till wée come to Ilston water, whose head is not far within the lande, and yet a rill or two doth fall into the same. It ryseth aboue Gwenwy chappell, from whence it goeth to Landbea, and aboue Bettus receiueth a rill named Amone that entereth thereinto frō nozthcast. Being past Bettus it passeth by Laneddy, Arthelas bzidge, and ouer against Landilo Talabout, it crosseth from by west the Combwily and afterwarde the Mozlais aboue Langnarche on the same side. Then comming to Leghoz castell, it taketh in on the east side, the Lhu whose course is not aboue fiue myles, and thence losing the name of Lochar, it is called Burray as I gesse vntill it come to the sea. From this water we passed by Bachannis Isle, to the Aberlheddy water, whose heade being aboue Penacrois, it passeth by Lhanelthey & thence into the sea. Then went we to the Duleste, thence by the Pembzay and Caricoit pointes, till we came about to the Wandzes oz Vendzaith mouth, whose description is sufficiently set downe in the fozmer Treatize, and therfoze but in vaine to be repeated here, except I might adde somewhat thereunto therby to make it moze perfite.

Duleste.
Wandzes.

The Towy ryseth in such sozte and place as I haue sayde, parteth Bzecknocke from Cardigon shyze, foz a certaine season, till it come by the water of Traulnant (that falleth thereinto from by east,) vnto Pylin Capell, and so to Istrodesine where it meeteth with the Tothe that commeth thether from Lhiuerwin where it ryseth and so thozowe Rescoth fozrest, till it vnite it selfe with the Pescotter, which mouting out of the ground in theoge of Cardigan shyze, runneth along as a limite and marche vnto the same, till it ioyne with the Tothe, & both come togither beneath Istrodesine into Towy. After this confluence it cōmeth to Lhanuair Awbzey, Lonyhowell and Landonuery, and here it receyueth two waters in one chanell, whereof the first is called Bzane, the other Gutherije (which lyeth moze southerly of the two) & fall as I sayd into Towy beneath Landonverey, which rūneth on till it meete with the first Duleste that goeth by Lanurdy, then with the Marlais, & these on the Nozthwest. But a litle lower it taketh in many waters in one chanell beneath Langadocke, called Modewy from by east, whereof I haue thys aduertisement. The Modewy oz as some pzonounce it Motheuy, ryseth of two heades, which ioyning aboue Lanyhangle, ỹ streame runneth on till it mette with the Cledoch on the left hande, pzoceding also farder toward Langadocke, it receiueth not far from thence the Sawthey whose two heades descende frō the blacke mountaines oz east edge of Carmardineshyze, as mine infozmation leadeth me. After this confluence the seconde Duleste doth meete with the Towy (whose head is in the hilles aboue Talthogay abbay) then comming downe by Landilonaur, Dinefar castell, and Golden groue, it receyueth the thirde Duleste, from by nozth that commeth in by Dzillan castell and after that the Cothey, whose race is somewhat long and therfoze his description not vtterly to be passed ouer. Not farre from the head (whose place is alreadie set downe) and somewhat beneath Lanapinsent chappell, it taketh in the Turchebecke, that runneth thither from Lanacroyes. Thence it goeth to Lansawell, Abergozlech, Bzeghuangothy, Lannigod and so into Towy, which halking fozwarde by chappell Dewy, receyueth the Rauelthy, from by nozth, then the Gwily frō nozthwest, whose head is aboue Lany Pinsent, & race by Canwell, Eluert, Comewply, and Perling hill, as I haue often heard. After this confluence with the Gwply, the Towy goeth to Caermardine, then to Lanygang, then to Lanke-phan, s. Ilmacles and so into the sea.

Next vnto the Towy is the Taue, whose head is in the blacke mountaines as is afozesayde, at the rootes of Wrenni vaur hill in Pembzokeshyze, from whence it runneth by Lanunrieach, Langludien, Lanualteg, and taking in the Duddery from southwest, out of the same countie by Lanbedernelfray, it goeth to Eglesware chappell, beneath which it crosseth the Marlais by Nozth that runneth by Lanbedy & Whitlande. Thence mēting with one rill (called Uenni as I take it) that commeth thozow Cardith fozrest on the one side, & the Cayze on the other that runneth into it west of Landowzor, it halketh to S. Clares where it taketh in the Barthkynny, oz Barthkinni, as Leland calleth it, & the Gow both in one chanell, of which the first ryseth aboue Capell Bettus, from whence it runneth by Talacouthe, Killant and Langynnyn, the other issueth out of the grounde aboue Trologh Bettus, by Mydzun, & ioyning with the fozmer a little aboue S. Clares they runne into the Taue, and from thence to Lanyhangle, and betwéene it and Abercowen, admitteth finally the Gowē streame, which comming likewyse from the blacke mountaines goeth by Ebbernant, and so into the Taue, who directeth his course, by Lacharne castell and then into the sea.

boue Crugwair, and going into the sea, at Argwaire. Then passed we by another comming out of Rath forrest called Coit Rathe, the water it selfe rising short of Templeton. Thence leauing the Monkeston rocke, we came to Tenby or Dynbechy Pisewd, and passing into the Port betweene the castell and S. Catherines rocke, we founde it serued with two little backewaters, of so smal countenaunce, that they are not worthye of any farder talke to be spent in their descriptions. After this we passed betweene Londy and an other Islet or rock lying by northwest of the same, to Ludsop point, and so to Abertrewēt where I founde a silly freshe watr, that ryseth a myle or thereabout within the lande. Frō thence we went southwards by Bzede hauen, til we came to S. Gowans point. Thē gathering west & by North before we came at Shepe Illande, we founde another freshe water, that riseth short of Kyriog Maharen, and running south of Uggarston, Windmil hill, or betweene it and Castell Norton and Gupton, it holdeth on flat west all the way, till it come at the Oceane. The Shepe Ile not afore described is but a little plot, lying at the very point of the Bay before we came at ỳ Blockhouse, which standeth north of the same at the very entrie into Milforde hauen vpon the east side. By north of Shepe Ile & betweene it and the Stacke rocke (which lyeth in the very middest of the hauen) at another point is Rat Ile, yet smaller then the former. Being therfore passed these, we cast about towarde the northwest, by the Poptōs and Pennar, till wee came to the Pennar mouth, out of which the Salt water issueth that in maner enuironneth Pembroke. Frō this (omitting sundry salt crékes on both sides of the hauen) we came to the fall of two waters in one chanel aboue whose cōfluence, Williamston parke standeth, & whereof one (a mére salt course,) incloseth three partes of Carew castell. The other rysing neare to Coit Rath forrest is a freshe, and going by Gefraiston, Creswel and Lawrenny, it leaueth the Spareh on the south side, and goeth into the hauen after confluence with the former.

Nowe come I to the two swordes, afore mencioned whose courses I finde described in this order, The Clothy ryseth at the foote of Wzenny baur hill and comming downe to Monachlodge, Langelman, Lannakeuen, and Egremond, it receyueth a ryll from by northwest before it come at Lanhaddon castell. Care long also it taketh in another on the east side from Narbarth castell, by Robeston, then going by Cunaston, Slebach, Picton castell, at Rise castell poynt west of Coit Kenles (as I haue béene informed) it méeteth with the other sworde, named Dugledy wher of I reade as followeth. The hed of the Dugledy, is somewhere at northwest, betwéene S. Laurences and S. Dugwels, from whence it rūneth to Trauegarne, Redbarton, and taking in a rill by the waye from Camrose at the west, it goeth to Hauerford west, and there vniteth it selfe with a water, which peraduenture, is the same that Lelād called Guyly. Certes it riseth about Waltō, and comming by S. Leonardes chappel and Pendergest, it falleth, I say into the Dugledy, ouer against the towne of Hauerforde, or Herforde west, but in Welch Hulforde as Lhoid doth set it downe. Beneath Herforde it taketh in another water from southwest, whose head is short of S. Margarettes chappell, and enteraunce betwéene Harraldston, and Herforde, which Harraldstone, receyueth the name of Harralde the successour of Edwarde the confessour as some call him, who was a grieuous mall vnto the Bzitons that remayned in the time of the sayde Edwarde as I haue noted alreadie. The Cultlell cōmeth into the Dugledy beneath Bolston, with a streight course from by North, of three or foure myles, after whose vnition with the aforesayde water, they runne on as one till they mette with the Clothy falling out by the waye sundzy salt crékes as the maine chanell doth from thencefozth vntill it passe the Sandy hauē, the Dale rode (whither a silly fresh rill commeth of small value) and be come about agayne into the large Oceane. Hauing thus shewed the courses of those few fresh waters that come to Milford hauen, we cast about by the blockehouse and S. Annes chappell to Gateholme Ile, that lyeth betwéene S. Annes and the Willocke point, directlye ouer against Stockeholme Illand that is scituate farder of into the sea, towarde the southwest, and is full halfe so great as the Scalmey ỳ I before described. Betwéene the Willocke point also and the Scalmey, directly west, is the midlande Ile, full so great as the Gateholme.

The Gresholme lyeth directlye west of Scalmey, from whence if you sayle thyther on the south side, you must needes past by the newstone rocke: if on the north of Scalmey, you must leaue the Yarlande stone on your lefthand. Whervnto if you note well the scituation of these Illands already named, and conferre them with the Ramsey and S. Dauids land, you shall finde them to produce as it were two daungerous pointes, includyng the Bzid baie, wherein (notwithstanding the great-

Thus hauing doubled the Willocke point, we entred yet into the Baie, to ſée what Iſles were there againſt the nerte publication of thys booke, if it maye pleaſe God to graunt mée lyfe to ſée it printed once againe, eyther by it ſelfe or otherwiſe.

S. Brides Iſlande.

Firſt of all therefore I ſawe S. Brides Iſlande, a very little patche of grounde, nére the lande, before I came at Galtrop rode. From thence we went aboute by the little hauen, Doluach Hauen, Caruay Hauen, Shirelace rocke, Carnbuddy, and Carnay Bayes, Portclais, and ſo into the ſounde betweene Ramſey and the point. In thys ſound lykewiſe is a litle Iſle, almoſt annexed to the maine, but in the middeſt thereof is a rocke called the horſe (a myle and more by north of Kibby rocke, that lyeth ſouth eaſt of Ramſey) and more infortunate then tenne of Setanes coltes, but thanked be God I neuer came on his back. Thence paſſing by S. Stephens baie, and Whiteſande baie, we ſaluted the Biſhop and his Clarkes, as they went in Procеſſion on oure left ſyde (beyng lothe to take any ſalted holy water at their hands) and came at laſt to the point called S. Dauids head. From whence we coaſted along toward the ſoutheaſt, till wée came ouer againſt S. Catherins, where goyng northwardes by the broade hauen, and the Stromables heade, we ſayled thence northeaſt, and by north, to Langlas head, then flat ſouth by the Cow and calfe (two cruell rockes) which we left on the left hande, and ſo coſted euer to Abergwin or Fiſcarde, where we founde a freſhe water named Gwin, or Gwerne, whoſe courſe is in manner directly out of the eaſt into the Weſt, vntill it come within a myle of the aforeſayde Towne. It ryſeth flat north of the percely hill, from whence it goeth by Pont vain, Lauerellidoch, Lanchar, Landilouair, and ſo to Abergwine, or Abergwerne, for I doe read both. Frō Abergwin, we caſt about by Dynas heade, till we come to the fall of Neuerne, where Newport ſtandeth. The head of thys ryuer is aboue Capell Nantgwyn, from whence it runneth by Whitchurch, but ere it come at Kylgwin, it taketh in a little water that ryſeth short of Wreny vaur, & thence go forth as one vntill they come to Newport. Cardigan hauen is the next fall that I dyd ſtumble on, wherein lyeth a little Iſlande ouer againſt the north point. Hereinto alſo commeth the Teify, whereof I haue ſpoken ſomewhat in my former treatiſe, but ſith it ſufficeth not for the for the full knowledge of the courſe of thys ſtreame, I wyll ſupply the want euen here in ſuch order as inſueth.

Teify or Tiue.

The Teify or Tiue ryſeth in Lintiue as is aforeſayde, and after it hath runne from thence a little ſpace, it receyueth a broke frō ſoutheaſt that commeth out of Lin Legnant and then after the confluence runneth on to Stradfleur Abbaie, beneath which it méeteth with the Pyrieke water (that ryſeth aboue Stradmyrich) and ſone after with the Landurch, (both from the northweſt) and finally the Bromis aboue Tregaron, that commeth in by the eaſt as Leland hath ſet down. Nére to Landiwbrcuy alſo it croſſeth the Brennige by eaſt, & then goeth to Landuair, Cledoghe, Kellan, & ſone after taking in the Matherne from by Eaſt that parteth Cardigan partely from Carmardine ſhire, and likewiſe ẏ Dulas aboue Lanbedder, (which ryſeth aboue Langybby, and goeth thence to Bettus) on the northweſt, it goeth next of all to Lanbedder towne, then to Lanybair, beneath which it croſſeth the Grauelth, thence to Pēcarocke, Lanibether, Lanlloyny, Lanyhangle, and Landiſſel, and there it vniteth it ſelfe with the Clethor, which cōmeth down thither by Lantiſiliued chappell, Lanfraine, and finaly Landiſſell from by north as I doe here. After this confluence it procédeth on to Landuay, Alloyne, Bangor, Langeler, Landeureog and Newcaſtell, ere long taking in the Kery from by north, whoſe heade is not farre from that of Clethor, and whoſe courſe is ſomewhat inlarged by ſuch rilles as diſcend into the ſame. For weſt of Capel Kenō, two becks in one chanell doe fall into it, although they be nameleſſe, and but of a lyttle length. Beneth Tredwair, alſo croſſeth another from by weſt, that runneth along by Bettus, Euan, and finally méeting wyth the Teify, they runne as one by Kennarth (ſtill parting Cardigon ſhire, from Carmardin, as it hath done ſith it met wyth ẏ Matherne) and ſo forth on till they ioyne with the Cheach which ryſing aboue Chapple Euan, doth part Carmardine and Brecknocke ſhire in ſunder, till it come vnto the Teify. Frō this confluence, and being ſtill a Limite vnto Cardigon ſhire, it goeth by Marierdiue, and ſo to Cardigan, taking in one rill from by north and two on the ſouthweſt ſide, but afterwarde none at all, before it come to the ſea.

the Bidder broke, which comming from Dehewide, doth fall into the same, betweene Lanychayzin, and Henbenney.

The Arth is no great thing, neyther of any any long course, yet it ryseth three or foure myles or more within the lande slopewise, & comming by Lambadern, & Treueglois, it falleth into the sea, northeast of Aberarth. The Ris or rather the Werey, ryseth of two heades, aboue whose cõfluence standeth a town, named Lanyhangle, Redrod, & from whence it goeth by Lanygruthen to Laristed, and so into the Ocean.

The Ystwith ryseth in the blacke mounteynes, aboue Comerkwith from whence it runneth certeine myles, vntill it come vnto Pspitty, Istwith, Lanauon, Lanyler, Lan Nachairne, and so into the sea taking withal the Ridall or Redhell not far from the shore, whereof I haue this discription. The Ridall ryseth in the toppe of Plimlymmon hyll out of a lake named Lin Ridal, from whence going towarde Spitty Kinwen, it crosseth one water on the north, and another beneath it on the southeast, and so goth on by Lanbeder vaur, till it come to Aberistwith, the Istwith and so into the Ocean.

The Salique broke descendeth in like sorte from the blackmounteines, and going Ummaboue, toward Gogarth, or Gogyrthar, it receyueth the Mallalique, and from thence goeth into the sea.

The Lery ryseth toward the lower ground of the blacke hylles, and going by Lanthangle castell Gwalter, it runneth from thence northeast into the Ocean. Thus haue I brought me selfe out of Cardigon shire, vnto the Wy, that seemeth for a certeine space to be marche betweene the same and Merionneth, & here wt also I ende with the description of southwales, and likewise of all that region remayning, whereof I haue no farder knowledge, more then is alreadye set downe in my first booke, sith those y promised helpe herein haue vtterlye deceyued me. Yet thus much will I note of such waters as fall into the sayde riuer on the south side, that aboue Mathanlaith it crosseth the Dowlasse Du and Dowlasse Kuen both in a chanell, whose heades lye by west of y Kuoluadan hill. Beneath the sayde towne likewise I fynde the Leuennaunt, which hauing two heades, the more southerly of them is Limes betweene Radnor shire & Põemoth. After these it crosseth the Eynon, the Kinuer, and the Cledour, and thus farre for wales I saie againe, sith for the rest I yelde vnto a non plus, vntill I come to y Dee, of whose course I haue some informatiõ, (after it hath receyued y Byrrog & the Morlais, both in one bottome,) on the south side of Chirke castell, but not from the very head for want of information. Hauing therfore, mette with the aforesayde water, the De proceedeth to Belfocke, Orton Hadocke, Orton bridge and Bangor, where the slaughter of monkes was made, or not far of from thence, and of which Monasterie I find this note insuing. Their abbaye of Bangor stoode sometime in Englishe Maylor, by hyther and south of the riuer Dee. It is nowe ploughed ground where that house stoode, by the space of a Welch myle (which reacheth vnto a myle and an halfe Englishe) and to thys daye the tillers of the soyle there, doe plowe vp bones as they saye of those monks that were slaine in the quarell of Augustine, and wythin the memorie of man, some of them were taken vp in their rotten weedes, which were much lyke vnto those of our late monkes, as Lelãd doth set it down, yet Erasmus is of the opinion, that the apparel of the Benedictine monkes, was such as most men did were at their first institutiõ. But to proceede, thys Abbaye stoode in a fayre valley, and in those tymes the ryuer ranne harde by it. The compasse thereof lykewise, was as y circuite of a walled Towne, and to this daye two of the the gates may easily be discerned, of which the one is named Port Hogan lying by north, the other Port Clais, situate vpõ the south. But y Dee hauing now changed his chanell, runneth thorow y very middest of the house betwixt these two gates, the one of them being at the lest a full halfe myle frõ the other. As for the squared stone that is founde hereabout, and the Romaine coine, there is no such necessity, of the rehearsell thereof, but that I maye passe it euer without any farther mencion.

The Dee therefore beyng past Bangor, goeth to Worthenbury, and there receyueth sundry waters into one chanell, whereof the chiefe ryseth nere to Blackmere (a maner pertayning to the Earle of Shrewesbury) from whence it goeth to Whitechurch, Dusacre hall, and sone after taketh in a ryll that discendeth from Coilley, after which cõfluence, it runneth on by nether Durtwiche, to Olde castell, Tallarne, and ere long crosseth two other waters in one channell also, whereof one runneth by Penly chapell, another from Hawmere, and ioyning at Emberhall, they go from thence to Worthenbury, and so into the Dee, which by and by vniteth it selfe with another at Shockebridge that commeth in from Ridding. Thence it runneth betweene Holt castell, and Farne, and ere it come to Alford two waters comming which receyueth in like sort the Alen mencio-ned euen now wherof I gaue some notice in the former Treatize, and I haue found more sithens that time in Leland which I will not here omitte, to set downe worde for worde as I reade it in his Commentaries. One of the greatest riuers, saith he, that falleth into this streame, (meaning Dée) is named Alen. It ryseth in a pole called Lin Alen, and goeth from thence by Lanteglan, Lan Armon, Lanueris, Holesdale, and at Hispalin rūneth into the grounde for a certaine space, about a quarter of a mile in length, and there after it is ryssen againe with a great vehemencie, becommeth a marche betwéne Holesdale

(a Lordship full of very fine riuerets, called in Welche Stradalyn) and Flint, for a fiue miles grounde. From thence going thorow Horedale, Bromefielde aliâs Haylor & Cam-

into the Dée, which hath the best Trowtes

streame, and such a one in déede as brédeth the same Trowt, for which the Dée is com-which being almost so great as the Alen, cō-which ryseth within lesse then a quarter of a myle of Chester, & falleth into Dée at Flock-ers broke, without the north gate, wherein is a Docke called Port pole for great ships to ride at a spring tyde. Hitherto Leland, whose sayings herein shal not perish, because they may be profitably vsed in the next publication of this booke, yf it euer happen to be liked and come thereto.

Being past the Dée we come next of all vn- Wiuer.
to the Wiuer, then the which I reade of no riuer in England that fetcheth more or halfe so many windlesses and crincklinges, before it come at the sea. It ryseth in Buckle hilles, which lye betwene Ridley & Buckle towns, and sone after making a lake of a myle and more in length called Ridley pole, it rūneth by Ridley to Chalmōdly. Thence it goeth to Wrenbury where it taketh in a water out of a more that commeth from Harbury: and Combr.
beneath Sanford bridge the Combrus from Combermer or Comber lake: and finallye the thirde that commeth from about Moneton, and runneth by Langerslaw, then be-twéene Shenton and Atherly parkes, and so into the Wiuer, which watereth all the west part of England, and is no lesse notable then the fift Auon or thirde Duze, whereof I haue spoken already. After these confluences it hasteth also to Audlem, Hawklow, and at Bar-

From thence the Wiuer rūneth on to Win-that falleth into it is the Ashe, (which passeth Ashe.

it commeth finally to Northwiche where it receyueth the Dane, to be described as fol- Dane.

ter the cõfluence goeth to Swetham, the Heremitage, Cotton and Croxton, there taking in two great waters whereof the one is called Whelocke, which comming frõ the edge of the countie by Hoxton to Sandbach crosseth another that descendeth from Churche Cawlton, and after the confluence goeth to Warmingham (ioyning also beneath Middlewich with the Croco or Croxtõ, the second great water, whose head commeth out of a lake aboue Byuerton as I heare) and thence both the Whelocke and the Croco go as one to the Dane, at Croxton, as the Dane doth from thence to Bostocke, Dauenham, Shebyuch, Shurlach and at Northwiche into the aforesayd Wyuer. After this confluence the Wyuer runneth on to Barneton, and there in like sort receiueth two brookes in one chanell, whereof one commeth from aboue Allostocke, by Holme and Lastocke, the other from beyonde Birtles mill, by Chelforde (where it taketh in a rill, called Piuerey) thence to ouer Peuer, Holforde & there crossing the Waterlesse brooke (growing of two beckes and ioyning at nether Tabley) it goeth forth to Winchambridge, and then meeting with the other, after this confluẽce they procéede till they come almost at Barneton, where the saide chanell ioyneth with a pretie water running thorow two Lakes, whereof the greatest lyeth betweene Comberbach, Rudworth, & Marbury. But to go forwarde with the course of the maine riuer. After these cõfluences our Wiuer goeth to Warham, Actonbridge, and Dutton, ouer against which towne, on ỳ other side it meeteth with a rill, comming from Cuddington, also the second going by Norley, and Critton, finally the thirde some after from Kinsley, and then procéedeth on in his passage, by Alheton chappell, Frodesham, Rockesauage, and so into the sea: and this is all that I doe finde of the Wyuer, whose influences might haue béene more largely set downe, yf mine instructions had béene more amplye deliuered, yet this I hope maye suffice for his description, and knowledge of his course.

The Mersey riseth among the Peke hils, and from thence going downe to the Woodhouse, and taking sundrie rilles withal by the waye, it becommeth the confines betweene Chester and Darbyshyres. Going also toward Goitehal, it meeteth with a faire brooke increased by sundrye waters, called Goyte, whereof I finde this short and briefe description. The Goyte riseth not far frõ the Shire meere hill (wherein the Doue and the Dane haue their original) that parteth Darbyshire and Cheshyres in sunder, and thence commeth downe to Goyte howses, Duertõ, Tarhall, Shawcrosse, and at Weybridge taketh in the Frith, and beneath Berohall the Set that riseth aboue Thersethall and rũneth by Duersette. After this confluence also the Mersey goeth to Goyte hall, and at Stockford towne meeteth with the Tame, which deuideth Chestershire and Lancastershyres in sunder, and whose heade is in the very edge of Yorkeshyre, from whence it goeth Southwarde to Sadleworth Firth, then to Mukelhirst, Staly hal, Ashdon Underline, Dunkefield, Denton, Reddish, and so at Stockeford or Stopford into the Mersey streame, which passeth forth in like sort to Doddesbyry, receyuing a brooke by the waye that commeth from Lime parke, by Burnhall parke and Chedley. From Doddesbury it procéedeth to Northen, Ashton, Aiston, Flixton, where it receiueth the Irwell a notable water, and therefore his description is not to be omitted before I doe go forward any farder with the Mersey. It riseth aboue Bacop, and goeth thence to Rosendale, and in the waye to Aytenfielde it taketh in a water from Haselden. After this confluence it goeth to Newhall, Brandlesham, Bury, and aboue Ratcliffe ioyneth with ỳ Racbe water, a faire streame and to be described when I haue finished the Irwell, as also the nert vnto it beneath Ratcliffe, because I wouldo not haue so manye endes at once in hande wherewith to trouble my readers.

Beyng therfore past these two, our Irwel goeth on to Clifton, Hollonde, Edgecroft, Strang wayes, and to Manchester, where it vniteth it selfe with the Yrke, that runneth thereinto by Royton Midleton, Heaton hill, and Blackeley. Beneath Manchester also it meeteth with the Medlocke that cõmeth thyther frõ the north east side of Oldham, & betweene Clayton and Garret Halles, and so betweene two parkes, falling into it about Holme. Thence our Irwel going forward to Woodsall, Whicleswise, Eccles, Barton, & Deuelhom, it falleth neere vnto Flixton, into the water of Mersey, where I will staye a while withall, till I haue brought the other vnto some passe, of which I spake before.

Lelande speaketh of the Cozue water aboute Manchester, but I knowe nothing of his course.

The Racbe consisteth of sundrye waters, whereof eche one in a maner hath a proper name, but the greatest of all is Racbe it self, which ryseth among the blacke stony hilles, from whence it goeth to Littleborough, and beyng past Clegge, receyueth the Beyle, that commeth thither by Wylcrnaw chappell. After thys confluence also, it meeteth with a rill neere vnto Rachedale, and some after with the Spzotton water, and then the Sudley. Sudley broke, whereby his chanell is not a litle increased, which goeth from thence to Crisehirst and so into the Irwell, before it come at Ratcliffe.

Bradsha. The second streame is called Bradsha. It ryseth of two heades, aboue Turetō church, whence it runneth to Bradsha, and ere long Walmesley. taking in the Walmesley becke, they go in one chanell till they come beneath Bolton in the Moze. From hence (receyuing a water that commeth from the rootes of Rauenpike, hill by the way) it goeth by Deane and Bolton in the moze, and so into Bradsha water, which taketh his way to Leuermoze, Farnworth, Leuerlesse, and finally into the Irwell which I before described, and whereof I finde these two verses to be added at the last.

Trke, Irwell, Medlocke, and Tame,
When they meete with the Mersey, do lose their name.

Nowe therefore to resume our Mersey you shall vnderstande that after his confluence with the Irwel, he runneth to Partington, and not farre from thence interteineth ẏ Gles. Gles, or Glesbroke water, increased wyth sundrye armes whereof one commeth from Lodward, an other from aboue Houghton, the thyrde from Hulton Parcke, and the fourth from Shakerley: and beyng all vnited nere vnto Leighe, the confluence goeth Bollein broke. to Holcroft, and aboue Holling greene into ẏ swift Mersey. After this increase the saide streame in lyke sort runneth to Rigston, & there admytteth the Bollein broke water into his societie, which rising nere ẏ Chamber in Warwell Forest goeth to Ridge, Sutton, Warfield, Bollington, Prestbyry, and Newton, where it taketh in a water cōming frō about Pot Chappell, which runneth frō thence by Adlington, Wodfode, Wymsley Ryngey, and Ashley, there receyuing the Birkin. Byrkin broke that commeth from betwene Allerton and Marchall, by Walberly, and War. sone after the Warus or War, that cōmeth thereunto from War towne, by Rawstorne, and after these confluences goeth on to Downham, and ouer against Kirton beneth Crosforde bridge into the Mersey water, which proceeding on, admitteth not another that meeteth with all nere Lym before it go to Thelwall. Thence also it goeth by Bruche and so to Warrington, a little beneath crossing a broke that commeth from Par by Browsey, Bradley and Saukey on the one side, and another on the other that commeth thither from Gropenhall, and with these it rūneth on to nether Walton, Acon grange, and so to Penkith, where it interteineth the Bolde, and sone after the Grandiche water on the otherside, that passeth by Preston, and Daresbyry. Finallye our Mersey goyng by Poulton, it falleth into Liuerpole Hauen, when it is past Runcorne. And thus much of the Mersey, comparable to the Wyuer, and of no lesse fame then most ryuers of thys Iland. Bolde Sunsd

Beyng past these two we come nert of all to the Tarbecke water that falleth into the sea at Harbecke, without finding any mo tyll we be past all Wyrall, out of Liuerpole hauen, and from the blacke rockes, that lye vpon the north point of the aforesayd Iland. Then come we to the Altmouth, whose fresh Alt. tyding not farre into the lande, commeth to Fesson, and sone after receiuing another on the ryght hand, that passeth into it by Aughton, it is increased no more before it come at the sea. Neyther finde I anyother falles till I mēte with the mouth of the Parrow and Dugleſſe, which haue their recourse to the sea in one Chaneil as I take it. Tarbe

The Dugleſſe commeth from by west of Dugl Rauenspike hill, and ere long runneth by Andertonford to Worthington, & so (takyng in two or three rylles by the waye) to Wigē, where it receyueth two waters in on chanel, of which one commeth in south from Byrn Parke, the other from northeast. Being past thys it receyueth one on the north side from Standishe, and another by south from Holland, & then goeth on towarde Rufford chappell taking the Taude with all, that discendeth from aboue Shelmerscale towne, and Taud Skech goeth thorow Lathan Parke, belonging as I here vnto the Earle of Darby. It meeteth also on the same side, with Merton mere Mert water, in which mere is an Iland called Netholme, and when it is past the hanging bridge, it is not long ere it fall into the Parrowe.

The Parowe ryseth of two heades, whereof Farro the second is called Bagen broke, & making Bage a confluence beneath Yelby wode, it goeth on to Burghe, Eglesson, Crosson, and then toyneth nert of all with the Dugglesse, after which confluence, the maine streame goeth forth to Bankehall, Charleton, Yow, Yesket, and so into the sea. Lelande writyng of ẏ Parow, saith thus of the same, so farre as I now remember. Into the Dugleſſe also runneth the Parrow, which commeth within a myle or thereabout, of Chorlton towne, that parteth Leland shire, frō Darby shire, vnder the foote of Chorle also I finde a ryll, named Croyle, and about a myle and an half frō thence a notable quarrey of stones wherof the inhatants doe make a great boll and pyre, and hetherto Leland.

The Rybell as concerning his heade is sufficiētly touched already in my first booke. Beyng therefore come to Gisborne, it goeth to Sawley or Salley, Chatburne, Clitherow castell, & beneath Mitton, meeteth with the Odder, which ryseth not farre from the crosse of grete, and going thence to Shilburne, Newton, Radholme parke, & Stony hirst, it falleth ere long into the Ribble water. From hence the Ribble hath not gone farre, but it meeteth with the Calder. Thys broke ryseth aboue Holme church, goeth by Towley and Burneley, (where it receiueth a trifeling rill) thence to Higham, and ere long crossing one water that commeth from Wicoler, by Colne, and another by and by named Pidle broke that runneth by Newe church, in the Piddle: it meeteth with ỹ Calder, which passeth forth to Paniam, & thence (receyuing a becke on the other side) it runneth on to Altham, and so to Martholme, where the Henburne broke, doth ioyne with all, that goeth by Akingtō chappell, Church, Dunkinhalghe, Rishton, and so into ỹ Chalder as I haue sayde before. The Chalder therefore being thus inlarged, runneth forth to Reade (where M. Nowell dwelleth) to Whalley, and sone after into Ribell, that goeth from this confluence to Salisbury hal, Ribchester, Osbaston, Sambury, Keuerden, Law, Ribles bridge, and then taketh in the Darwent, before it goeth by Pontwarth into the sea.

The Darwent deuideth Lelande shire from Anderneſſe, and it ryseth by east aboue Darwent chappel, and sone after vniting it selfe with the Blackeburne, & Rodleſworth water, it goeth thorowe Howghton Parke, by Howghton towne, to Walton hall, and so into the Ribell. As for the Sannocke broke, it ryseth somewhat aboue Longridge chappell, goeth to Broughton towne, Cotham, Lee hall, and so into Ribell: and here is all that I haue to say of this ryuer.

The Wire ryseth eight or ten miles from Garstan, out of an hill in Wiresdale, from whence it runneth by Shiresheb chappell, & then going by Wadland, Garstan, & Byrkelande hall, it first receyueth the seconde Calder, that commeth down by Edmersey chappell, then another chanel increased with sundrie waters, which I will here describe before I procede with the Wire. I suppose that the first water is called Plympton broke. It riseth south of Golner, and cōmeth by Cawforde hall, and eare long receyuing the Barton becke, it procedeth forward till it ioyneth with the Broke rill, that cōmeth by Claughton hall where M. Broke hales doth lie, and so thorow Hersco forrest. After this confluēce the Plime or Plimton water meeteth with the Calder, and then with the Wire which passeth forth to Wighel church, and the Raw cliffes, and aboue Thorneton crosseth the Skipton, that goeth by Potton, then into the Wire rode, and finally into the sea, according to his nature. Skipton.

Beyng past the fall of the Wire, wee coasted vppe by the salt cotes to Coker mouth, whose shortnesse of course deserueth no discriptiō. The next is Cowdar, which cōming out of Wire dale (as I take it) is not increased with any other waters, more then Coker, and therefore I wyll rydde my handes thereof so much the sooner. But beyng past these two, I came to a notable ryuer called the Lune, whose course doth reast to be described as followeth, & whereof I haue two descriptions, the first being set down by Leland as M. More, of Catherine hall in Cambridge, deliuered it vnto him: the next I exhabite as it was giuen vnto me, by one that hath taken paynes as he sayth to searche out and view the same, but very lately to speake of. The Lune saith M. More riseth at Crossehoe, in Dent dale, in the edge of Richmonde shire out of three heades. North also from Dentdale, is Garsdale, and thereby runneth a water, which afterward commeth to Sebbar dale, where likewise is a broke meeting with Garsdale water, so that a little lower they go as one into Dentdale becke, which is the ryuer that afterwarde is called Lune, or Lane, as I haue verye often noted it. Beside these waters also before mencioned, it receyueth at the foote of Sebbar dale, a great broke which cōmeth out of ỹ Worth, betweene Westmerlande and Richmonde shires, which taking with him the aforesaide chanelles, doth runne seauen myles ere it come to Dentdale foote. From hence it entereth into Lansdale, corruptlye so called peraduenture for Lunesdale, and runneth therin eyght or nyne myles southwarde, and in this dale is Kyrby. Hetherto M. More (as Leland hath exemplified that percell of his letters) but mine other note wryteth hereof in thys maner. Burbecke water ryseth at Muskall heade, by west, and going by Muskall foote to Skaleg, it admitteth the Breder that descendeth thither from Breder dale. From hence our Burbecke goeth to Breder dale foote, and so to Tybary, where it meeteth with foure rylles in one bottome, of which one commeth from beside Orton, another from betweene Raisebecke and Sunbiggin: the thirde and fourth from eche side of Lang- Cokar. Cowdar. Lune. Burbecke Breder.

dale, and after the generall confluēce made, goeth towarde Roundlwathe aboue which it Barrow. vniteth it selfe with the Barow. Thence it runneth to Howgill, Delaker, Firrebanke, and Killingtō, beneth which it mæteth with a water comming from the Pozull hilles, Dent. and afterwarde crossing the Dent brooke (that runneth thither from Dent towne) beneath Sebboz, they continue their course as one into the Burbecke, from whence it is called Lune. From hence it goeth to Burbozne chappell, where it taketh in an other rill comming from by east, then to Kyrby Lansdale, and aboue Whittenton, crosseth a brooke comming from the Countie stone, by Burros, and sone after beneath Tunstal Gretey. the Gretey, which descēding from about Ingelbozow hill passeth by Twyselton, Ingleton, Thozneton, Burton, Wyatton & neare Thurlande castell toucheth finally with the Lune, which braunceth and sone after vniteth it selfe againe. After this also it goeth on Wenny. towarde New parke, & receyueth the Wen-Hinburne. ny, and the Hinburne both in one chanell, of which this riseth nozth of the crosse of Grete, and going by Benthams and Robertes hill, Rheburne aboue Wray taketh in the Rheburne that riseth nozth of Wulfcragge. After thys confluence also aboue New parke, it maketh his gate by Aughton, Laughton, Skirton, Lancaster, Erclike, Alwclike, Sodday, Ozton, and so into the sea. Thus haue you both the descriptions of Lune, make your conference oz election at your pleasure foz I am swozne to neyther of them both.

Docker. The next fall is called Docker, and peraduenture the same that Lelande doth call the Kery. Kery, it ryseth nozth of Docker towne, and going by Barwyc hall, it is not increased befoze it come at the sea.

Being past this we finde a fozked arme of the sea called Kenlandes: into the first of which diuers waters doe runne in one chanell, as it were from foure principal heades, one of them comming from Grarrig hall, another from by west of Whinfielde, & ioyning with ỹ first on the east side of Skelmere
Spzota. parke. The third called Spzot oz Spzota ryseth at Sloddale, and commeth downe by west of Skelmer parke, so that these two brookes haue the afozesayde parke betweene them, and fall into the fourth east of Barneside, not very farre in sunder. The fourth oz
Ken. last called Ken, cōmeth frō Kentmeres side, and going to Stauelop it taketh in a rill frō Chappleton Inges. Then leauing Colnehed parke by east, it passeth by Barneside, to Kendall, Yelston, Sigarthe, Siggeswyc, Leuenbzidge, Pilnethozpe, and so into the sea.

Certes this Ken is a prettie deepe riuer, & yet not safely to be aduentured vpō with Botes and Balingers by reason of rolling stones, and other huge substaunces that oft annoy & trouble the middest of the chanell there. The other peece of ỹ fozked arme, is called Win- Winst star, ỹ head wherof is aboue Winstar chappell, and going downe almost by Carpmaunsell, and Netherlake, it is not long eare it fall into the sea.

The Winander water ryseth about Dum- Winan balrase stenes, from whence it goeth to Langridge, where it maketh a mere: thē to Ambleside, and taking in eare it come there, two rilles on the left hande, and one on the right that commeth by Clapergate, it maketh as I take it the greatest mere, oz freshe water in Englande, foz as I reade it is well neare ten myles in length. Therinto also doe three oz foure waters come, whereby the quantity thereof is not a little increased: finally comming to one smal chanell aboue Newbzidge, it is not long eare it fall into the sea.

On the west side of the point also commeth Spar another thozow Furnesse felles, and frō the hilles by nozth thereof, which eare long making another Lake not farre from Hollinhow, and going by Bzidge ende, in a narrow chanell, passeth fozth by Cowlton & Sparke bzidge, and so into the sea. There is in like Fosse fozte a water called the Fosse, that ryseth neare vnto Arneside, and Tillerthwates, & goeth fozth by Grisdale, Saterthwate, Rustande, Powbzidge, Bowth, & so falleth with the Winander water into the maine sea.

Leau Hauing passed the Leuen oz Conysandes oz Winander fall (foz all is one) I come to the Lew which riseth at Lewike chappell, & falleth into the sea beside Plumpton. The Raw Rawther descending out of lowe Furnesse hath two heades, whereof one commeth frō Pennyton, the other by Ulmerstone abbay, and ioyning both in one chanell, they hasten into the sea whither all waters direct theyr voyage. Then come we to another rill southwest of Aldingham, descending by Glaiston castell, and likewyse the fourth that ryseth neare Lyndell, and running by Dawltō castell and Furnesse abbay, not farre from the Barrow heade, it falleth into the sea ouer against Wauey and Wauey chappell, except myne aduertisementes misleade me.

Dod The Dodon cōmeth frō the Shire stone hill bottome, & going by Blackhil, Southwake S. Johns, Ulkay parke, and Bzoughton, it falleth into the saltwater, betweene Kyrby and Wallum castell, and thus are we now come vnto the Rauenglasse point.

Comming to Rauenglasse, I finde harde

by the towne a water comming from two heades, and both of them in Lakes or Poles, wherof one iſſueth out of Denock mere, & is called Denock water, the other named Eſke from Eſke pole, which runneth by Eſkedale, Dalegarth, and ſone after meeting with the Denocke, betweene Mawburthwate, & Raneglaſſe falleth into the ſea. On the other ſide of Rauenglaſſe alſo cõmeth the Pite broke, from Pyterdale as I reade.

Then finde we another which commeth from the hylles, and at the fyrſt is forked, but ſone after making a Lake, they gather againe into a ſmaller chanell: finally meeting with the Brenge, they fall into the ſea at Carleton ſoutheaſt, as I weene of Drig.

The Cander or as Lelande nameth it the Calder, commeth out of Copeland Forreſt, by Cander, Sellefielde and ſo into the ſea. Then come we to Euer water deſcending out of a pole aboue Coſwaldhow, and thence going by Euerdale, it croſſeth a water from Arladon, and afterward proceedeth to Egremond, S. Johns, and taking in another ryll from Hyde, it is not long ere it meeteth with the ſea. The next fall is at Mozeſby, wherof I haue no ſkill. Frõ thence therefore we caſt about by ſ. Bees to Derwentſet haue, whoſe water is truely written Dargwent, or Derwent. It riſeth in the hilles about Borrodale, from whence it goeth to the Graunge, thence into a Lake, in which are certaine Iſlandes, and ſo to Keſwiſe where it falleth into the Burſemere, or the Burthmere pole. In like ſort the Burthmere water, riſing among the hils goeth to Tegburtheſworth, Forneſide, S. Johns and Thrlcote: and there meeting with a water from Griſdale, by Waketh-wate, called Griſe, it runneth to Burneſſe, Keſwiſck and there receiueth the Darwent. From Keſwiſe in like ſorte it goeth to Thorneſwate (& there making a plaſh) to Armanſwate, Iſel, Huthwate and Cokermouth, & here it receyueth the Cokar, which riſing among the hilles, commeth by Lowſewater, Brakenthwate, Lorton and ſo to Cokarmouth towne, frõ whence it hafteth to Bridgeham, and receiuing a rill called the Wire on the ſouth ſide that rũneth by Dein, it leaueth Sainburne and Wirketon behinde it, & entreth in the ſea. Leland ſayth that the Wire is a creeke, where ſhippes lie oft at rode, and that Wirketon or Wirkington towne doth take hys name thereof. But to proceede, the Elme riſeth in the mines aboue Amautree, and from Amautre goeth to Pereſby Harby, Brow, and there taking in a rill on the left hande comming by Torpenny it goeth to Hatton caſtell, Alwarby, Brythy, Dereham & ſo into the ſea. Thence we go about by the chappell at the point, and come to a baie ſerued with two freſh waters, whereof one riſing weſtward goeth by Warton, Raby, Cotes, & ſo into the maine, taking in a rill withall from by ſouth, called Croco that cõmeth from Crockdale, by Bromefield. The ſecond is named Wampole broke, and this riſeth of two heades, whereof one is about Cardew, thence in lyke ſorte, it goeth to Thureſby, Croſton, Dwton, Gamleſby, Wampall, the Larth, and betweene Whiteridge and Kyrby into the ſaltwater. From hence we double the Bowlneſſe, and come to an Eſtuary, whether three notable ryuers doe reſorte, (and this is named the Soluey mouth) but of all, the firſt exceedeth which is called Eden, and whoſe deſcription doth followe here at hande.

The Eden deſcendeth as I heare from the hilles in Athelſtane moore at the foote of Hulſtat Mozuell hill where Swale alſo riſeth and ſoutheaſt of Pallerſtang forreſt. Frõ thence in like maner it goeth to Pallerſtãg towne, Pendragon caſtell, Wharton hall, Nethy, Hartley caſtell, Kyrkeby Stephen, and eare it come at great Mulgraue it receiueth three waters, whereof one is called Helbecke, becauſe it commeth from the derne and elinge mountaines by a towne of the ſame denomination, the other is named Bellow and deſcendeth frõ the eaſt mountaines by Sowarſby, and theſe two on the northeaſt: the thirde falleth from Rauenſtandale, by Newbyggin, Smardale, Soulby, Blaterne and ſo into Eden, that goeth from thence by Warcop and taking in the Dzne about Burelles on the one ſide, and the Mozeton becke on the other, it haſteth to Appleby, thence to Cowlby where it croſſeth the Dzebecke, thence to Bolton, and Kyrby, and there meeting with the Trowt becke and beneath the ſame with the Liuenet, (whereinto falleth an other water frõ Thurenly meeting wyth all beneath Clebzon) it runneth finally into Eden. After the confluences alſo the Eden paſſeth to Temple, and ſone after meeting with the Milburne and Blincozne waters, in one chanell, it runneth to Winderwarth and Horneby where we will ſtaie till I haue deſcribed ỹ water that meeteth withall neere the aforeſayde place, called the Vlſe.

This water commeth out of a Lake, which is fedde with fyre rilles wherof one is called the Darke, and neare the fall therof into the plaſh is a towne of the ſame name: the ſeconde hight Hartſop, & runneth frõ Hartſhop hall by Depedale: the thirde is Paterdale rill: the fourth Glent Roden, the fift

Glenkgwin. Glenkwent, but the firth runneth into the sayde lake, south of Dowthwate. Afterward when this lake cõmeth toward Pole towne, it runneth into a small chanell, and going by Barton, Dalamaine, it taketh in a rill by the waye from Daker castell. Thence it goeth to Stockebridge, Ponewoth, and sone after meeteth wyth a prety broke, called Loder, Loder. comming from Thornethwate by Bauton, and here a ril, then by Yelton, and there another, thence to Askham, Clifton, and so ioining with the other called Vlse, they go to Brougham castel, Pine churches, Horneby, and so into Eden, taking in a ryll as it goeth that commeth downe from Pencath. Beyng past Hornby our Eden runneth to Langunby and sone after receiuing a ryll that commeth from two heades, and ioyning beneath Wingfel, it hasteth to Lasenby, then to kirke Oswalde, (on eche side whereof commeth in a ril from by east) thence to Monney, & there a ryl, Anstable, Cotehyll, Corby castel. Wetherall, Newby, where I wyll staye till I haue described the Irding, and such waters as fall into the same before I go to Carleill.

Irding. The Irding ryseth in a Moze in the bozders of Tindale, nere vnto hozse hed Crag, Terne. where it is called Terne becke vntil it come to Spyerag hill, that deuideth northumberland and Gillesland in sunder, from whence it is named Irding. Beyng therefore come to Duerhal, it receiueth the Pultrose becke, Pultrose. by east, and thence goeth on to Duerdenton, Netherdenton, Leuercock, and Castelsteade, where it taketh in the Cambocke, that runCambocke neth by Kyrke Cambocke, Askerton castel, Walton, and so into Irding, which goeth from thence to Irdington, Newby, and so into Eden. But a litle before it come there, it crosseth with the Gilly that commeth by Gilly. Tankin, and sone after falleth into it. After these confluences, our Eden goeth to Linstocke castell, (and here it entertyneth a broke, comming from Cote hill warde by Aglionby) thẽ vnto Carleill, which is almost enuironed wyth foure waters. For beside ẏ Eden it receyueth the Peder, which Leland Pedar alias, Logus. calleth Logus from south east. This Peder ryseth in the hiles southwest of Penruddock, from whence it goeth to Penruddocke, then to Grastocke castell, Cateley and Kendersidehall, and then taking in a water from Unthanke, it goeth to Cathwade, Pettrell way, Newbiggin, Carleton, & so into Eden, northeast of Caerleill. But on the north side Bruferth. the Bruferth broke doth swiftely make hys entraunce running by Leuerdale, Scalby castell, and Housedon as I am informed. The thirde is named Candan, (if not Deua after Leland) which ryling about the Skidlow hilles, runneth to Hosedale, Calobecke Warnell, Saberham, Rose Castell, Dawston, Brounston, Yarrington. and west of Cairleill falleth into Eden, which goyng from thence by Grimsdale, Kyrke Andros, Beaumout, falleth into the sea beneath the Rowcliffe castell. And thus much of the Eden, which Lelande neuertheless describeth, after another sort, whose wordes I will not let to set downe here in this place, as I finde them in his commentaries.

The Eden after it hath runne a prety space from his head, meeteth in time with the Vlse Vlse after Leland. water, which is a great broke in Westmerlande, and ryling aboue Maredale, a myle west of Loder, it commeth by the late dissolued house of Shappe Pryory, three myles frõ Loder. Shappe, and by Brampton village into Loder or Lodon. Certes thys streame within halfe a myle of the head, becommeth a great lake for two myles course, and afterwarde waxing narrow againe, it runneth forth in a meane and indifferent botome. The sayde Eden in lyke sort receyueth the Aymote about three myles beneath Brougham castell and into the same Aymote, falleth the Dacor becke (already touched) which riseth by north west in Waterdale hilles, foure myles aboue Dacor castell, and then goyng thorowe Da- Dacor. cor Parke, it runneth by east a good myle lower into Eymote, a lyttle beneath Delamaine, which standeth on the left side of Dacor. In one of his bookes also he sayeth, how Carleill standeth betwéene two streames, that is to saye the Deua, which cõmeth thether from by southwest, and also the Logus Deua. that discendeth frõ the south east. He addeth moreouer howe the Deua, in times past was named Vala or Bala, and that of the names Vala. of these two, Lugibalia for Caerleill hath béene derived. &c. And thus much out of Lelande, but where it had the cause of this hys coniecture as yet I haue not reade. Of thys am I certeine that I vse the names of most ryuers here and elsewhere described, accordingly as they are called in my time, although I omitte not to speake here and there of such as are more auncient, where iust occasion mouueth me to remember them, for ẏ better vnderstãding of our histories, as they doe come to hande.

The white & black Leuen, ioyning therefore aboue Bucknesse, the confluence goeth to Bracken hill, Kirkleuenton, & at Tomunt Tomunt. water water méeteth with the Eske. In lyke sorte the Byrsop ioyning with the Lydde out of Scotland at Byrsop foote, running by Stangerdike side, Harlow, Hath water, & taking in the Eske aboue the Mote, it loseth the former name, and is called Eske, vntill it come to the sea.

Hauing in this maner finished the description of the courses of most of the ryuers lying vpon the west coast of our country: now it resteth that wée cut ouer vnto the west side of the same, and as it were call backe vnto mynde, the most notable of such as wée erst omitted, vntill we come at the Humber, and from thence vnto the Thames.

First of all therfore as touching ỳ Twede, this I haue to note, that the olde and auncient name of the Till that falleth into ỳ same is not Bromis, from the heade as some doe nowe call it, (and I following their assertions haue set downe) but rather Brennicke, & beside that Lelande is of the same opinion. I finde howe the kingdome of Brenicia, toke denomination of thys water, and that only therof it was called Brenicia, or Brennich, and vpon none other occasion.

In my tractatiõ also of ỳ Tine, I reserued the courses of one or two waters vnto this booke of purpose, but sithens the impressiõ of the same, I haue found the names & courses of sundrye other, which I will also deliuer in this place, after I haue touched the Alen or Alon, and one or two more which I appointed hether, because that at the first I vnderstoode but little of them.

The Alen or Alon, hath two heades whereof one is called east Alen, ỳ other west Alen. The first of them riseth south east of Sibton Sheles, and going by Simdorp, it taketh in a rill withall from by east: After which confluence it runneth to Newshele, Allington, Caddon, Olde towne, and in hys waye to Stauertpele, méeteth with the west Alen. The West Alen ryseth in the hilles aboue Wheteley shæles, from whence it goeth to Spartwell, Hawcopele, Dwston, & taking in a rill thereaboutes, it procéedeth on to Permandby, and crossing there another ril in lyke maner from by West, it goeth to Whitefielde, and ioyning some after with ỳ east Alen, they run as one to Stauert pole, Plankforde, and so into the Tine.

Into the north Tine likewise falleth the Ridde, at Riddesmouth. It riseth within three myles of the Scottishe marshe, as Lelande saith & commeth thorowe Riddesdale whereunto it giueth the name. Another writeth howe it ryseth in the rootes of the Carter, & Redsquire hylles, and ere it hath gone farre from the heade, it taketh in the Spelhop frõ the north and the Chellop on the south, beside sundrye other wyld rylles nameless and obscure, and therfore not worthy to be remembred here. After it hath passed Otterburne, it goeth to the medow Holwgh, Woodburne, Risingham, Leame, and so into the Tine, a little lower, then Belindgeham, which standeth somewhat alofe from north Tine, and is as I take it ten myles at the least aboue the towne of Herham. Beneath ỳ confluence in like sort of both the Tines, standeth Corbridge, a towne sometime inhabited by the Romaines, and about twelue myles from Newcastell, and hereby doth the Corue run, that méeteth ere long with the Tine. Not far of also is a place called Colchester, wherby Lelande gesseth that the name of ỳ brooke should rather be Cole then Corue, and in my iudgement his coniecture is very lykely, for in the lyfe of S. Oswyn (otherwise a feeble authoritie) the worde Colbridge is alwayes vsed for Corbridg, wherof I thought good to leaue this short aduertisement, and hetherto of part of my former reseruatiõs. Now it resteth that I touch ỳ names of a few riuers & beckes togither as Lelande hath left them, whose order and courses may peraduenture hereafter be better knowne then they are to me at this present, for lacke of sound instruction. The Deuilles booke, he supposeth to be called Dill, of a town not far of that is commonly called Dilstan, wherby ỳ Tine doth runne. As the Darwent also doth fall into ỳ Tine, beneth Blaidon, so doe sundry brookes into the Darwent in two chanels, as Blackburne, which goeth into Horslop burne, as Horslop doth into Darwent, on the east side, and on the other banke the Hawkesburne, that rũneth into Rouelop, as Rouelop doth finally into Darwent, which is sayde to ryse of two heades, whereof one is nére Knedon, the other at Kidlamhope, and after the confluence, going to Hunterworth, Blaunchelande, Acton, Aspersheles, Blackehedley, Pansheales, Newlande, Darwent cote (by by north east whereof commeth in a ryll on the other side) Spen, Gibside, Hollinside, Swalwel, and so into the Tine. In like sorte Lelande speaketh of a water called Hedley, that should fall into the Tine, whose heade is at Skilorawe, from whence it runneth to Uptthelde, Lamsley, Rauensworth towne, Rauensworth castell, Redhughe, and so into Tine, Southwest of Newcastel, but he omitteth wickham broke (he sayth) because it ryseth short of the towne, and is but a little rill. Finally ỳ Themis doth fal into Tine a mile or therabout aboue Getishead, & not very far beneth beneth Rauenſworth caſtell, riſing ten miles by ſouth into the land, as Lelande hath likewiſe ſet downe.

Were. Ptolomy wryting of the Were, calleth it Uedra, a ryuer well knowne vnto Beda the famous Prieſt, who was brought vp in a monaſtery ẏ ſtood vpon his bankes. It receiueth ſaith Lelande the Derneſſe, whereinto Derneſſe. Bzome. the Bzome alſo doth emptie his chanell, that ryſeth aboue Repare parke, as I haue bene informed. In lyke ſorte I fynde howe it admitteth lykewyſe the Coue, that commeth Coue. from Lancheſter, which is fyre myles higher then Cheſter in the Streate, and then goeth to Cheſter it ſelfe, whereabout it meeteth Hedley. Gaundleſſe. with the Hedley. Finally the Gawndeleſſe, that ryſeth fyre myles by weſt Akelande caſtell, and running by the ſouth ſide thereof paſſeth by weſt Akeland S. Helenes Akelande, S. Andrewes Akeland, Biſhops Akeland and eare long into the Were, and thus much of waters omitted in ẏ Tine & Were.

Theſe. Lelande writing of the Theſe, repeateth the names of ſundry riuerets, whereof in the former Treatize I haue made no mencion at all, notwithſtanding ẏ ſome of their courſes may perhaps be touched in the ſame, as Thureſgil the Thuriſgill whoſe heade is not farre frō the Spittle that I do reade of in Stanmore. Gretty. The Gretley commeth by Warningham & Yortham and falleth into the Theſe aboue Dare. Croftes bzidge. The Dare or Dere runneth by Darlington, & likewiſe into the Theſe aboue the aforeſayd bzidge. As for the Wiſke Wiſke. it commeth thereinto from by ſouth vnder Wiſke bzidge, Danby, Northalberton, and eare long alſo into a greater ſtreame, which going a little lower vnder an other bzidge doth runne by one chanell into the aforeſayd ryuer before it come at the Theſe. And theſe are the bzokes that I haue obſerued ſith the impreſſion of my firſt booke in Leland, thoſe that followe I referred hither of purpoſe.

Thorpe. alias Leuend. The Thorpe, riſeth of ſundry heads, whereof one is abone Pinching Thorpe, from whence it goeth to Nonnethorpe, and ſo to Stokeſley. The ſeconde hath two bzaunches, and ſo placed that Kildale ſtandeth betwene them both: finally meeting beneath Eaſby they go by Eaton and likewiſe vnto Stokeſley. The laſt hath alſo two bzaunches, whereof one commeth from Ingleſby, and meeteth with the ſeconde beneath Bzoughton, & going from thence to Stokeſley they mete with the Thorpe aboue the towne, as the other fal into it ſomewhat beneath the ſame. From hence it goeth to Ridley and there taketh in another rill comming from Potto, thence to Crawthorne. Crawthorne bzoke, Leuanton, Pilto, Hilton, Ingleſby & ſo into the Theſe, betwene Yarne and Barwiſe, whereof I made mencion before although I neither named it, nor ſhewed ẏ deſcriptiō. Some cal it not Thorpe but the Leuend bzoke, or Leuen water, and thus much of ſome of the waters eyther omitted or not fullye touched in the former Treatize.

Of ſuch ſtreames as fall into the maine riuers betweene Humber and the Thames. Cap. 3.

Duze. THe courſe of the Duze is alreadie ſet forth in the firſt booke of this deſcription & ſo exactely as I hope that I ſhall not nede to adde any more thereunto at this time. Wherefore I will deale onely with ſuch as fall into the ſame, ymagining a voyage frō the Rauenſpurne, vntill I come nere to the heade of Theſe, and ſo ſouthwardes about againe by the bottome of the hilly ſoyle vntill I get to Burſton, Sheffelde, Scroby, and the very ſouth point of Humber mouth, wherby I ſhall croſſe them all that are to be found in this walke, and leaue I doubt not ſome eſpeciall notice of their ſeuerall heads & courſes.

Hull or Hulne. The courſe of the Hul is already deſcribed, yet here I will not let to inſert Lelandes deſcription of the ſame, and that more for thoſe odde notes which he hath ſet down in the proceſſe of his matter, then that I thincke his dealing herein to be more exacte then myne, if ſo much may be ſayde without all cauſe of offence. The Hulne (ſaieth he) riſeth of three ſeuerall heads, whereof the greateſt is not farre from Dryfielde, nowe a ſmall village fyrtene myles frō Hull. Certes it hath bene a goodly towne, and therein was the pallace of Egbright king of the Northumbers, and place of Sepulture of a noble Saxon king, whoſe name I now remember not although his Tōbe remaine for ought that I do know to the contrarie, with an inſcription vpon the ſame written in Latine letters. Neare vnto this towne alſo is the Daneſielde, wherein great numbers of Danes were ſlaine, and buried in thoſe hils, which yet remaine there to be ſene ouer their bones and carkaſſes. The ſecond head ſaith he is at Elkburne, and the third at Emmeſwell, and meeting altogither not farre from Dryfielde, the water there beginneth to be called Hulne, as I haue ſayde alreadie. From hence alſo it goeth thorowe Beuerley medowes, and comming at the laſt not farre from an arme led from the Hulne by mans hande (and able to beare great veſſels) almoſt to Beuerley towne, & Cotting meeting thereabout alſo with the Cottinghā ham. becke becke comming frō Weſtwood by the way, it hacketh to Kingſton vpon Hulne, and ſo into the Humber without any maner impechement.

The Fowlney riſeth about Godmanham, from whence it goeth by Wighton, Hareſwell, Seton, Williams bꝛidge, and ſone after ſpꝛeading it ſelfe, one arme called Skelflete, goeth by Cane Cawſey to Bꝛowneflete and ſo into the Ouze. The other paſſeth by Sandholme, Gilbertes dike, Scalby chappell, Blacketoft and ſo into the afoꝛeſayde Ouze, leauing a very pꝛetie Iſlande, which is a parcel as I here of Walding fen moꝛe, though otherwyſe obſcure to vs that dwell here in the ſouth.

The Darwent ryſeth in the hilles that lye weſt of Robin Whodes baie, oꝛ two myles aboue Ayton bꝛidge, weſt of Scarboꝛow as Lelande ſayth: and eare it hath runne farre from the head, it receyueth two rilles in one bottome from by weſt, which ioyne withall about Langdale ende. Thence they go togyther to Bꝛorey and at Hackneſſe take in an other water comming from about Silſey. Afterwarde it commeth to Ayton, then to Haybꝛidge, and there croſſeth the Kenfoꝛde that deſcendeth from Rōbertelton. After this alſo it goeth on to Potterſbꝛumton where it taketh in one rill, as it doth another beneath running from Shirburne, and the thirde yet lower, on the fader bancke, that deſcendeth from Bꝛumpton. From theſe confluences, it runneth to Fowlbꝛidge, Arbꝛidge, Peldingham bꝛidge, and ſo to Cotehouſe, receyuing by the way many waters. Lelande reconing vp the names of the ſeuerall bꝛookes, numbꝛeth them confuſedly after his accuſtomed oꝛder. The Darwent ſaith he receyueth diuers ſtreames as the Shyꝛihutton. The ſeconde is the Crambecke, deſcending from Hunderſkell caſtell, (ſo called tanquā à centum fontibus, oꝛ multitude of Spꝛinges that ryſe about the ſame) and goeth to Rie, which comming out of the Blacke moꝛes, paſſeth by Riuers abbay, taking in the Ricoll on the left hande, then the Seuen, the Coſſey and Pickering bꝛooke. The Seuen alſo ſayeth he riſeth in the ſide of Blackmoꝛe, and thence goeth by Sinnington foure myles frō Pickering, and about a myle aboue a certayne bꝛidge ouer Rie goeth into ẏ Streame. The Coſſey in like ſoꝛte ſpꝛingeth in ẏ very edge of Pickering towne, at a place called Keld head, and goeth into the Rie two myles beneath Pickering, about Kyꝛby minſter. Finally Pickering water ariſeth in Blackemoꝛe, and halfe a myle beneath Pickering falleth into Coſſey, meting by the way with the Pocklington becke, and an other ſmall rill oꝛ two of whoſe names I haue no knowledge. Hitherto Lelande, but in mine opinīō it had bēne far better to haue deſcribed them thus. Of thoſe waters that fal into the Darwent beneath Cotehouſe, the firſt commeth from Swenton, the ſeconde from Ebberſtō, the thirde from Dlerſton, the fourth from Thoꝛnetō, and Pickering, and the fift on the other ſide that commeth thither from Wintringham, foꝛ ſo ſhoulde he haue dealt in better oꝛder, & rid his hands of them with moꝛe expeditiō, referring the reaſt alſo vnto their pꝛoper places. But to pꝛocēde after myne owne maner. Being paſt Cotehouſe, & eare the Darwent come at Wickham, it croſſeth the Rie, which riſeth of two heades, and ioyning weſt of Loꝛton they run thoꝛow Glanſby parke. Finally receyuing the Coſſey it mēeteth at the laſt with an other ſtreame increaſed by the falles of fiue waters & moꝛe, eare it come into ẏ Darwent. The moſt caſterly of theſe is called Seuen, & ryſeth as is afoꝛeſayde in Blackemoꝛe, from whence it goeth by Sinnington, Myrton, Noꝛmanby, Newſounde, How & ſo into the Rie. The ſeconde named Dou hath his oꝛiginal likewiſe in Blackemoꝛe, and deſcēding by Raſmoꝛe, Keldon and Edſton, (where it receyueth the Hodge becke, that commeth by Berneſdale, Kirkedale, and Welburne) it goeth to Sawlton, and there taketh in firſt the Ricoll, that goeth by Careton, & whereof Kidall as ſome think (but falſly) doth ſeme to take the name. Then Feſſe, which ryſeth aboue Biliſdale chappell, & mēeteth with the Rie at the Shaking bꝛidge, from whence they go togyther vnder the Rie bꝛidge, to Kiuis abbaye, and thence (after it hath croſſed a becke from the weſt) thoꝛowe a parke of the Earle of Rutlandes to Newton, Muniton, and ſo to Sawton, oꝛ Sawlton, as I doe finde it wꝛitten: Here alſo it taketh in the Holbecke bꝛooke, that commeth thither from by weſt by Gyling caſtell, and Stangraue, from whence it goeth on to Bꝛaby, next into the Seuen, then into the Rie, and ſo into the Darwent, which from thēce doth run to Wickhā. Being paſt Wickhā, it meteth with a water that cōmeth thereinto from Grynſton to Setterington at ſoutheaſt, and thence it goeth on to Malton & Malton, Sutton, Wellam, Furby, & Kirkham, receyuing by ẏ way one rill on the one ſide and another on the other, whereof this commeth from Burdfall, that other frō Coniſthoꝛpe. From Kyꝛkeham it goeth to Crāburne and Dwlham bꝛidge, (croſſing by the way an other bꝛooke comming from S. Edwardes goꝛe, by Faſton) then to Aldby, Buttercram, tercram (alias Butterham) brdg, Stamford brdg, Kerby brdg, Sutton, Cllerton, Aughton, Bubwith, Wrcfill, Babthorpe & so into ỹ Duze, wherwith I finishe the description of the Derwent, saving that I haue to let you vnderstand how Leland heard that an arme ran sometime from the hed of Darwent also to Scarborow till such time as two hils betwixt which it ran, did shalder & so choke vp his course.

Fosse. The Fosse (a slow stream yet able to beare a good bessell) ryseth in Nemore Calaterio, or among the woody hilles now called Galters forrest, and in his descent frō the higher ground, he leaueth Crake castel, on his west side: thence he goeth by Marton abbay, Marton, Stillington, Farlington, Towthorpe, Erswijc, Huntingdon, and at Yorke into the Duze.

Kile. The Kile ryseth flat north at Newborow, from whence it goeth by Thorneton on the hyll, Ruskell parke, Awne, Collerton, and so into the Duze about Newton vpon Duze.

Swale. The Swale is a ryght noble ryuer. It riseth in the hilles aboue Kyrkedale, and from this towne it goeth to Kelde chappell, Carret house, Crackepot, Whiteside, and nere vnto Palen, taketh in the Barney water, which commeth from the north east. Thence it goeth by Harcaside to Reth (where it meeteth with the Arcley) and so to Flemington, Grinton, Marrike (taking in the Holgate that commeth from by south: & in the way to Thorpe, the Mariske becke, or peraduēture Applegarth water, as Leland calleth it, that discendeth from the north) then to Thorpe, Applegarth, Richmonde, Ealby and Brunton. Here by North it entertayneth two or thre waters in one chanell, called Rauenswathe water, whereof the two fardest doe ioyne not far from the Dawltons, & so go by Rauenswath, Hartforth, Gilling, & at Skeby meete wyth the thirde, comming from Richmonde Beaconwarde. By west also of Brunton, the Swale meeteth with the Rhe, runnyng from Resdale, and beyng past Brunton, it goeth to Catertje bridge beneath Brunton, then to Ellerton, Kyrkeby, Langton parua, Thirtoft, Anderby Steple, and before it come vnto Gatenby, it meeteth wō ỹ Bedall broke, alias Leminges becke, that cōmeth west of Kellirby, by Cūstable, Burton, Langthorpe, Bedall, and Leming chappell. From Gattenby lykewise it goeth by Nawby, and at Brakenbyry, receiueth the Wiske, which is a great water, rysing betweene two parkes aboue Swanby in one place, and southeast of Mountgrace Abbaie in another, and after the confluence which is about Sidlebridge, goeth on betweene the Rughtons to Appleton, the Smetons, Byrby, Huttō Conyers, Danby, Wijc, Pasford, Warlaby, and taking in there a ryll from Brunton, by Aluerton, it proceedeth to Otteringtō, Newley, Byrby Wiske, Newton, and Blackenbury, there meeting as I sayde with the Swale, that runneth from thence by Skipton bridge, Catton, Topcliffe, and Kanyton, and aboue Eldmyre, meeteth with sundrye other rylles in one botome, whereof the northwesterley is called Cawdebec: the south Easterly Kebecke, which ioyne east of Thornton mire, and so go to Thorneton in the Kreate, Kilwington, Thruske, Solwerby, Crakwyc, and sone after crossing another growing of the myrture of the Willow, and likewyse of the Cuckwolde beckes, which ioyne aboue Bridforth, and running on till it come almost at Dalton, it maketh confluence with the Swale, and go thence as one by Thornton bridge, Witton vpon Swale, and so into the Duze.

Cawde Kebecke.

Cuncke Woldes becke.

Skell. The Skell ryseth out of the west two myles from Fountaines Abbay, and commeth as Lelande sayth with a fayre course by the one side of Rippon, as the Uze doth on the other. And on the bankes hereof stode the famous Abbaie called Fountaines, so much renoumed for the lusty monkes that dwelled in the same. It receiueth also the Lauer water, (which ryseth thre myles from Byrby, and meeteth withall nere vnto Rippon) and finally falleth into the Uze, a quarter of a mile beneath Rippon Towne, and almost midde waye betweene the North and Huicke bridges.

Lauer.

Nidde. The Nidde ryseth among those hilles that lye by west northwest of Gnaresborowe, fyue myles aboue Pakeley bridge, & going in short processe of time by West houses, Lodg houses, Woodhall, Newehouses, Nidlesmore, Kaunsgill, Cowthouse, Gowthwall, Bureley, Brymham, Hampeswale, & sone after meeting with the Killingale becke, it goeth after the confluence, by Bylton parke, Gnaresbridge, Washforde, Cathall, Willesthorp, Munketon, or Nonnocke, and so into the Duze, foure tēne miles beneath Gnaresborow, beyng increased by the waye wyth very fewe or no waters of any countenance. Lelande hauing said thus much of ỹ Nidde, addeth herevnto the names of two other waters, that is to say, the Couer & the Burne, which doe fal likewise into the Uze or Duze, but as he sayth little of the same, so among all my Pampheletes, I can gather no more of them, then that the first ryseth fyre myles aboue Couerham by west, and falleth into ỹ Uze, Couer.

Burne

Uze, a little beneath Middleham bridge, which is two myles beneath the towne of Couerham. As for the Burne, it ryseth at Moze hylles, and falleth into the sayde ryuer a lyttle beneth Nasham bridge, and so much of these two.

The Wharfe or Swerfe, ryseth aboue Ughtershaw, from whence it runneth to Beggermons, Kasemill, Hubberham, Wackden, Starbotton, Kettlewell, Cunnistō in Kettlewell, and here it meeteth with a rill comming from Haltongill chappel, by Arnecliffe, & ioyning withal nozth east of Kilnesey crag, it passeth ouer by the lower grounds to Gyzsington, and receyuing a ryll there also from Tressilde parke, it prozcedeth on to Bzunsall bzydge. Furthermoze at Appletrewyc, it meeteth wyth a ryll from by nozth, & thence goeth to Barden Towze, Bolton, Beth and Pilley hall, where it crosseth a rill comming frō by west. Thence to Addinghā, taking in there also a another from by west, and so to Ikeley, and receyuing ere long a nother by nozth from Denton hall, it hasteth to Weston Uauasour, Oteley, and Letheley where it taketh in the Padside, & the Washburne, both in one streame from Lyndley ward, and thence to Calley chappell, & there it crosseth one from by nozth, & another ere long from by south, and so to Pardwode castell, Kereby, Wodhall, Collingham, Linton, Wetherby, Thozpatche, Newton, Tadcaster, and when it hath receyued the Cocke becke from southwest, that goth by Barwy, Aberfozth, Leadhall, and Grymston, it runneth to Erton, Bzzby Wharf, Askel, Kither Nunapleton, and so into the Duze, beneath Calwod, a castell belonging to the Arche bishop of Pozke, where he vseth oft to lye when he refresheth himselfe, with chaunge of ayze & shift of habitation, foz the auoiding of such infection as maye otherwise engender by his long abode in one place, foz want of due purgation, and aiering of his house.

The Air ryseth out of a Lake, South of Darnbzoke, wherin as I here is none other fish but red Trowt, & Perche. Leland saith it riseth neere vnto Oztō in Craven, wherfoze the oddes is but litle. It goeth therfoze from thence to Mawlam, Hamlithe, Kyzby Moldale, Calton hall, Areton, and so fozth tyll it come almost to Gargraue, there crossing the Otterburne water on the west, & the Winterburne on the nozth, which at Flasby, receiueth a ryll from Yelton as I here. Being past Gargraue, our Air goeth on to Eshton, Elswode, and so fozth on, first receyuig a bzoke from southwest, (wherof one bzaunch commeth by Marton, the other by Thoznet, which meete about Bzoughton) then another from nozthest, that runneth by Skipton castell. After this confluence it hasteth to Newe biggin, Bzadley, and Kildwyc, by south east whereof, it meeteth with one water from Mawlis, and Glusburne oz Glukelburne, called Glyke, another lykewyse a lytle beneath from Seton, beside two rylles from by nozth, after which confluence it runneth by Reddlesdē, & ouer against this towne the Lacocke and the Wozth doe meete withall in one chanell, as the Mozeton water doth on the nozth, although it be somewhat lower. Thence it goeth to Kisheozth hall, & so to Bungley, where it taketh a ryll from Denholme parke to Shipeley, & there crossing another from Thoznton, Leuenthozpe, and Bzadley, it goeth to Caluerley, to Chistall, and so to Leedes, where one water runneth thereinto, by nozth from Wettlewode, and two other from by south in one chanell, whereof the first hath two armes, of which the one commeth from Pudsey chappell, the other from Adwalton, their confluence being made aboue Farnesley hall. The other lykewise hath two heades, whereof one is aboue Mozley, the other cōmeth from Domingley, and meeting with the first not far south west of Leedes, they fall both into the Aire, and so runne with the same to Swillington, & there taking in ẏ Rodwel becke south of the bzidg, it prozcedeth to Ollerton, Castelkozde, Bzotherton and Ferribzidge there receiuing the Went, a becke from Pontifract which ryseth of diuers heads, wherof one is among ẏ cole pits. Thece to Beall, Berkin, Kellingtō, middle Hodlesey, Teplehirst, Gowdall, Snathe, Rawcliffe, Newlande, Army, and so into the Duze wyth an indifferent course. Of all the ryuers in the Nozth, Lelande (in so many of hys bookes as I haue seene) sayth least of this. Mine annotations also are very slender in the particular waters whereby it is increased: wherfoze I was compelled of necessity to conclude euen thus with the description of the same, & had so left it in deede if I had not receyued one other note moze to adde vnto it (euen when the leafe was at the prelle) which saith as followeth in maner wozde foz wozde.

There is a noble water that falleth into Aire, whose heade as I take it is about Stāfozde. From whence it goeth to Crestō chapell, to Kingfield, and there about receyuing one ryll neere Elfrabzight bzidge, and also the Hebden by nozthwest, it goeth to Bzearley hall, and so taking in the thirde by nozth it prozcedeth on eastwarde by Mozley bzidge chappell, (and there a ryll from southwest) and so to Coppeley hall. Beneath this place I finde also that it receyueth one ryll from Hallyfaxe, which ryseth of two heades, & two other from southwest, of which one commeth by Barestande, and Stanelande in one chanell, as I reade, so that after this confluence the aforesayd water goeth on toward Cowforde bridge, and as it taketh in two rilles aboue the same on the North side, so beneath that bridge, there falleth into it a prety arme increased by sundry waters comming from by south, as from Warcheden chappell, from Holmeswrth chappell, and Kyrke Heton, eche one growyng of sundrie heades, wherof I would say more, if I had more intelligēce of their seuerall gates and passages. But to procēde from Cowford bridge it runneth to Wunfeld, & receiuing ere long one ryll from Leuersage hall, and another from Burshall by Dewesburye, it goeth on North east of Thornehul, south of Horbyry thornes, & therabout crossyng one ryll from by south from Woller by newe Milner Damme, and sone after another from northwest, called Chald, rysing in the Peke hilles, whereon Wakefielde standeth, and likewise the thirde from south east, and Waterton hall, it goeth by Warmesfield, Newelande, Altoftes, and fynally into the Aire, west of Castelwrth, as I learne. What ỳ name of this ryuer should be as yet I here not, and therefore no merueile that I doe not set it downe, yet is it possible such as dwell thereabout are not ignoraunt thereof, but what is that to me, if I be not partaker of their knowledge. It shal suffise therefore thus farre to haue shewed the course thereof, and as for the name I passe it ouer vntill another time.

Trent. The Trent is one of the most excellent ryuers in the lande, and increased wyth so many waters, as for that onely cause it may bee compared either with the Ouze or Sauerne, I meane the seconde Ouze, whose course I haue lately described. It ryseth of two heads which ioyne beneath Norton in the more, & from thence goeth to Hiltō Abbay, Bucknel church, and aboue Stoke, receyueth in the foule bryke water, which commeth thyther from Tunstall, by Shelton, and finally making a confluence they go to Wanlete, where they mēete wyth another on the same side, that discendeth frō Newcastell vnder Line, which Lelande taketh to bee the very Trent it selfe, saying, that it ryseth in the hylles aboue Newcastell, as maye be seene by hys commentaryes. But to procede. At Trentham or not farre from thence, it crosseth a riueret from northeast, whose name I know not, & thence goyng to Stone Aston, Stoke Burston, the Sandons and Weston, a little aboue Shubburne and Yawod, it receyueth the Sowe, a great chanell increased wyth sundry waters, which I will here describe, leauyng the Trent at Shubburne, tyll I come backe agayne. The Sowe discendeth from the hylles, aboue Whytemore chapell, and goeth by Charleton, and Stawne, and beneath Shalforde ioyneth wyth another by northeast that commeth from Byshoppes Offeley, Eglechal, Chelby, Rauntō. After thys confluence also, it runneth by Bridgeforde, Tillington, and Staffforde, beneath which Towne, it crosseth the Penke becke, that ryseth aboue Nigleton, & Berewod, and aboue Penke bridge, vniteth it self with another comming frō Knightley ward, by Gnaschall church, Eaton, and so goyng forth as one, it is not long ere they fall into Sow, after they haue passed Drayton, Dunstan, Acton, and Banswiche, where losing their names, they with the Sow & the Sow with them, doe ioyne wyth the Trent, at Shubburne, vpon the southerly bank. From Shubburne ỳ Trent goeth on, to lytle Yarwode, (mēeting by the way one ryll at Dudley bridge, and another south of Riddesley) thence by Hawkshery, Wauesfane, Ridware and so towarde Yorhall, where I must staye a whyle to consider of other waters, wherewith I mete in this voiage. Of these therfore the lesser commeth in by south frō Farwall, the other from by west, a fayre streame, and increased with two brookes, whereof the first ryseth in Nedelwode forrest, northeast of Haggarsley parke, wherinto falleth another west of Hamsted Ridware, called Blythe, which ryseth among the hylles in Whateley more, aboue Weston Cony and thence goyng to the same Towne, it commeth to Careswel Drycote, alias Drycote, Painsley, Gratwitch, Grymley, Aldmaston, Hamsted Ridware, and finally into the Trent, directly west of Yorhall, which runneth also from thence, and leauing Kinges Bromley, in a parke (as I take it) on the left hand, and the Blacke water comming from Southton, and Lichefielde on the ryght, goeth streight waye to Catton, where it mēeteth wyth the Tame, whose course I describe as followeth. It riseth in Staffordshyre (as I remēber) not farre from Pettishall, & goeth forth by Hamsted, towarde Pyrihall and Brimichams Aston, taking in by the way a rill on eache side, whereof the first groweth through a confluence of two waters, the one of them comming from Tyrton, the other from Aldbury, and so rūning as one by Wedbury till they fall into the same. The latter commeth from Wolfhall and ioyneth with it on the left hande. After this and when it is paſt the aforeſayd places, it croſſeth in like ſort a rill frō Smethikewarde: thence it goeth to Parneton hall, beneath which it mēeteth with the Rhe, and thence thorow the parke, at Parke hal by Watercote croſſing finally the Cole, whoſe heade is in the forreſt by Kingeſnortō wood, and hath this courſe, whereof I nowe giue notice. It riſeth as I ſayde in the forreſt by Kingeſnorton wood, & going by Parcley and Kingeſhirſt, it mēeteth betwēne that & the parke, with a water running betwēne Yelmedon and Sheldon. Thence it paſſeth on to Coleſhull, by eaſt whereof it ioyneth with a brooke, mounting ſouthweſt of Solyhull called Blithe, which going by Yenwood and Barſton, croſſeth on eche ſide of temple Balſhall a rill, whereof one cōmeth thorow the Quēnes parke or chaſe that lyeth by Weſt of Kenelworth, and the other by Kenelworth caſtell it ſelfe, from about Haſely parke. After which confluences it procēdeth in like maner to Hampton in Arden, & the Packingtons and ſo to Coleſhull, where it mēeteth with the Cole, that going a little farder vniteth it ſelf with the Burne, on the one ſide, (whereinto runneth a water comming frō Anſley on the eaſt) & ſone after on ỹ other doth fal into ỹ Tame. That which ſome call the Rhē, Leland nameth the Brimichā water, whoſe head as I heare is aboue Norfield, ſo that his courſe ſhoulde be by Kingeſnortō, Bremicham, Budſton hall, till it fall beneath Parneton into the Tame it ſelf, that runneth after theſe confluences on by Lē, Kingeſbyry parke, & going by eaſt, of Drayton Baſſet Parke to Falkeley Bridge, it mēeteth with another water, called Burne alſo comming from Hammerwich churche, by Cheſterforde, Shenton, Thickebrowne, and the north ſide of Drayton, Baſſet parke, whereof I ſpake before. From hence our Thame runneth on to Tamworth, there taking in the Ancre by eaſt, whoſe deſcription I had in this maner deliuered vnto me. It riſeth aboue Burton, from whence it goeth by Ponneaton, Witherley and Atherſtone. Ere long alſo it taketh in a water frō northeaſt, which commeth by Hugleſcote, Shapton, Cunſtō, Twicroſſe (vniting it ſelf with a water from Boſworth) Ratcliffe and ſo into Ancre: which after this confluence paſſeth by Whittendō, Crindō, Polleſworth Armington, Tamworth and ſo into Tame, that haſteth to Hopwath, Cōberford hall, Telford, & ſone after croſſing a rill that ryſeth ſhorte of Swinfelde hall, and commeth by Feſkyrke, it runneth not farre from Crorhall, and ſo to Catton, there about receyuing his laſt increaſe not worthie to be omitted. This brooke is named Meſe, & it riſeth in the great parke that lyeth betwēne Worthington, & Smethike, from whence alſo it goeth by Aſheby de la ſouche Packington, Melham & Stretton, & therabout croſſing a ril about Pethersale Graunge, from Duerſale by eaſt, it procēdeth by Chilcote, Clifton, Croral, into the Thame and both out of hand into the maine riuer a mile aboue Reptō. Leland writing of this riuer as I earſt noted ſaith therof in this wiſe. Into the Thame alſo runneth the Bremicham brooke, which ryſeth foure or fiue myles about Bremicham in the Blacke hils in Worceſterſhyre, and goeth into the aforeſayde water a myle aboue Crudworth bridge. Certes ſayth he this Bremicham is a towne maintayned chiefly by ſmithes, as Paylers, Cutlers, Edgetole forgers, Lorimers or Bitmakers, which haue their yron out of Staffordſhire, and Warwiſe shyres, and coles alſo out of the firſt countie, & hitherto Leland. Nowe to reſume the Trent, which being growen to ſome greatneſſe, goeth on to Walton, Drakelow, and there croſſing a water that commeth by Newbold hall, it rūneth to Stapenell, Minſhull, Wightmere, and Newtō, Souche, where it receyueth two chanels within a ſhort ſpace, to be deſcribed a part. The firſt of theſe is called the Dow or Doue. It ryſeth about the three ſhyres mēere, & is as it were Limes betwēne Staffordſhyre and Darbyſhyres vntill it come at the Trent. Deſcending therfore from the head, it goeth by Erles Both, Pilbury Graung, Hartington, Wolſcot, Eaton, Hunſington Graunge, and aboue Thorpe receyueth the Manifolde water, ſo called bycauſe of ỹ ſundrie crinckling rils that it receyueth & turnagaines that it ſelfe ſheweth before it come at the Dow. Riſing therefore not farre from Are edge croſſe, (in the bottome thereby) it runneth from thence to Longmore, Shene, Warſlow Chappell, and Welton. Beneath Welton alſo it taketh in the Hanſby water, that commeth out of Blackenmore hilles to Waterſall, where it falleth into the ground, and afterwarde mounting againe is receyued into the Manifold north of Thorowley as I heare, which goeth from thence to Ilam & aboue Thorpe doth caſt it ſelfe into Dowe. Hauing therefore mette togither after this maner, the Dow procēdeth on to Mapleton, beneath which it croſſeth one water deſcending from Bradlingtō by Fenny Bentley, and another ſomewhat lower that commeth from Hockton hall by Hegnaſton and Aſheburne, and then going to Patterſielde, Churne. mæteth with the Churne, euen here to be described before I go any farder. It riseth a good waie aboue Delacrasse abbay, and comming thither by Hellelby wood, it taketh in Dunsmere the Dunsmære betweene Harracrasse, and Leike. Thence it goeth to the Walgraunge, Yendor. and a little beneath receyueth ỹ Yendor, that commeth frō aboue Harton, thence to Chedleton, & hauing crossed the Alchenhirst brooke

Aula Canuti. aboue Cnutes hall, it runneth by Pylston, Alchenhirst Frogball, Below hill, Alton castell, Pyrkwood & at Rowcester falleth into the Dow, which care long also receyueth a rill from Crowsden, and then going to Eton mæteth Teine. first with the Teine that commeth thither from each side of Chedley by Teinetwone, Bramhirst and Stranehill. Secondly with Attoyeter or Uncester. the Uncester or Attoyeter water, and then going on to Perchington, Sidbery, Cawltō, it crosseth a brooke from Sidnister colledge, by Saperton. From this confluence in lyke sorte it passeth forth, to Tilbery castel, Parston and at Edgerton, mæteth with the water that commeth from Yelderley by Longforde (whereinto runneth another that commeth from Hollington) and so to Hilton. These waters being thus ioyned and many endes brought into one, the Dow it selfe falleth eare long, lykewyse into the Trent, aboue Newton Souche: so that the maine riuer being thus inlarged, goeth onwardes with his course, and betweene Willington and Reptō mæteth with two waters on sundry sides, whereof that which falleth in by Willington ryseth nere Dawbery Lyes, & runneth by Trussely and Ache: the other that entreth aboue Repton descendeth from Hartesburne, so that the Trent being past these hasteth to Twiforde, Ingleby, Staunton, Wesson, Newton, and Alton, eare long also Darwent. mæting with the Darwent, next of all to be dispatched. The Darwent riseth plaine west nere vnto the edge of Darbyshyre, aboue Blackewell a market towne, and from the heade runneth to the new chappell within a few miles after it be risen. Frō hence moreouer it goeth by Yowden house, Darwent chappel, Yorkeshyre bridge, and at Witham
Neue. bridge doth crosse the Neue or Nonius that commeth from Newstole hill, by Netherburgh, Hope, (crossing there one rill frō Castelton, another from Bradwell, & the thirde at Hathersage, from stony ridge hill) and so goeth on to Padley, Stockehall, receyuing a rill by the way from by west, to Stony Middleton, and Ballow, and hauing here taken Burbroke in the Burbroke on the one side, and another from Halsop on the other, it goeth to Chatworth and to Rowsley, where it is increased with the Wye comming from by west, & also a rill on the east, a little higher, but I will describe the Wye before I go any farder.

The Wye ryseth aboue Burston well, and Wye.
there is increased with the Hawkeshow, and Hawe

der distaunt from the edge of Darbyshyre, then that of Wye, and races somewhat longer, though neither of them be worthie to be accompted long. For the Wyle, hauing two heads, the one of them is not farre aboue the place where Wilebecke abbaye stode, the other is farder of by west, about Wilebecke towne, and finally ioyning in one they runne to Cuckney village, where receiuing a beck that commeth downe from by west, it holdeth on two miles farder, there taking in the seconde rill, and so resort to Rukforde, or the Rukfo, other harde by Paunsfield, of which two also this latter ryseth west about foure miles, and runneth forth to Clipston (three myles lower) and so likewise to Rukforde, whereof I will speake hereafter. In the meane tyme to returne againe to the Wye. From Burston well, it runneth to Staddon, Cowdale, Cowlow, New medow, Milhouses, Bankewell, and Haddon hall, beneath which it receyueth the Lath kell, that runneth by Ouer- Lath haddon, and the Bradforde both in one bot- Bradf tome after they be ioyned in one, at Alport, & this is the first great water that our Derwent doth mete withall. Being therfore past the Rowsleies, the sayde Derwent goeth to Stancliffe, Darley in the peke, Wensley, Smitterton hall, and at Matlocke taketh in a rill by northest, as it doth another at Crūforde that goeth by Botes hall. From Matlocke, it procedeth to Watston, or Watsond, Well bridge, Alderwash and ioyneth with an other streame called Amber com- Amber ming in from by North by Amber bridge, whose description shall insue, in this wise as I finde it. The heade of Amber is aboue Edlesson hal, or as Leland saith east of Chesterfielde, and comming from thence by Middleton, to Ogston hall, it taketh with al another brooke, descending from Hardwyke woode, by Alton and Stretton. Thence it goeth to Higham, Brackenfelde, and aboue Dale bridge, meeteth with a brooke running from Hucknallwarde to Shirelande parke side (there crossing the Yorcton Becke) & so to Alfer- Yorcto ton, except I name it wrong. From Dale bridge it goeth by Wingfelde, to Yedge, Fritchlin, and so into Darwent, taking the water water withall that discendeth from Swanswyc by Pentridge, as Leland doth remēber. From this confluence likewise it runneth to Belper, where it mēteth with a ryll comming from Horley parke: thence to Makeney, and at Duffelde, receyueth the Eglesburne, which ryseth about Wirkesworth or Dereworth but in ỳ same parish out of a rock & commeth in by Turnedyche. From Duffeld, it passeth to Bradsall, Darley Abbaie, and at Darby Towne, taketh in a ryll comming from Wirkasson, by Weston vnderwoode, Kidleston, and Merton.

If a man shoulde saye that Darwent ryuer giueth name to Darby towne, he should not well knowe howe euerye one woulde take it, and thereby he might happen to offende some. In the meane tyme I beleeue it, let other iudge as pleaseth them, sithe my coniecture can preiudice none: to proceede therfore. From Darby it runneth on by Alwaston, Ambaston, the Wettes, and so into Trent, which goeth from hence to Sawley, & northy of Thrumpton taketh in the Soare, a fayre streame and not worthy to be ouerpassed.

It ryseth in Leicester shyre aboue Wigton & thence goeth to Sharnesord, Sapcote, and beneath Staunton, taketh in a ryll that commeth by Dounton and Broughton Astley. Thence to Marlebrowe and before it come to Elton crosseth another on the same side (discending by Burton, Glen, Winstowe, Kilby and Blabye) then to Leircester towne, Belgraue, Burstall, Wanlippe, & ere it come at Cullington or Colston, crosseth the Eye, which riseth aboue Bramston, goeth by Knawstow, Somerby, Pickewell, Whitesonden, & beneath (a little) receyueth a ryll on the ryght hande from Coldnorton. Thence to Staplesorde, and sone after crossing a broke from aboue Sproxton, Colon, Garthrope and Sarby, it runneth to Wiuerby, Brentingby, and ere it come at Milton, mēteth with two other smal rils, from the right hand whereof one commeth from about Caldwell by Thorpe Arnolde, & Waltham in the woulde, the other from Skalesorde warde, & from Melton goeth by Sisonby, there mēting with another from northeast ouragainst Kirby Bellars, after which tyme ỳ name of Eye is changed into Wark, or Arke, and so continueth vntill it come at the Soare. From hence also it goeth to Asserby, Radgale, Haby, Trussington, Ratcliffe, and sone after crosseth sundry waters not very farre in sunder, whereof one commeth from Queston, by Twisorde, Ashby and Gadesby, another from Loseby, by Baggraue, and Crawston, and ioining with ỳ first at Quennyhow, it is not long ere they fall into the Warke. The seconde runneth from Engarsby, by Barkeley, and Sison. But the thirde and greatest of the three, is a chanell increased with three waters, whereof one commeth from Norton, by Burton, Kylby, Foston and Blaby, the other from Dounton, by Broughton, and Astley, and mēting with the thirde from Sapcoth, and stony Staunton, they run togyther by Narborow, and sone after ioyning aboue Elstō, wyth the first of the three, they go as one by Elston to Leircester, Belgraue, Wanlippe, and aboue Cullington, doe fall into ỳ Wark and sone after into the Soure. The Soure, in lyke sorte goyng from thence to mounte Sorrel, & taking in another broke southwest from Leircester forrest, by Glenfield, Anstey, Thurcaston and Rodeley, ioyneth wyth the Soure, which goeth from thence to mount Sorrell, and Quarendon (where it taketh in a water comming from Charnewode forrest, and goeth by Bradegate and Swythlande) and then proceedeth to Cotes, Loughborow and Stanforde, there also taking in one ryll out of Notingham shyre, by north east, and sone after another from southwest, comming from Braceden to Shepeshened, Garrington and Dighely graung, and likewise the thirde, from Worthington, by Disworth, long Whitton, & Wathorne. Fynally after these confluences, it hasteth to Sutton, Kingston, and Ratclife, and so into the Trent.

These thinges being thus brought togither, and we nowe resuming the discourse of the same riuer. It doth after his mēting wyth the Soure, proceede withal to Barton, where it taketh in the Erwash, which ryseth about Erwashe. Ryrby, and thence goeth to Selston, Wanlesby, Codnor castell, Eastwode, and crossyng a water from Beual, runneth to Soshal Trowel (& there taking in another rill comming from Henor, by Shyppeley) it proceedeth on to Staplesorde, long Eaton, and so into the Trent. This beyng done it goeth to Clifton, and ere it come at Wilsorde, it mēteth with a broke that passeth from Staunton, by Bōny and Rodington, and thence to Notinghā, where it crosseth the Line, which ryseth aboue Newsted, and passyng by Papplewyke, Hucknall, Bassorde, Radsorde and Linton, nerte of all to Thorpe and Farmdon, where it braunceth and maketh an Iland, and into the smaller of them goeth a broke frō Beuer castell, which rising betweene east Well & Eaton in Leircester is called the Dene, & Dene. from thence runneth by Bramston to Knipton, ton, & beneth Knipton méeteth with a brooke that commeth by west of Croxston, & thence holdeth on wt his course, betweene Willesthorp & Beuer castel aforsaid, & so to Bottelworth, Pormantō, Killington, Shilton there receyuing the Snite frō by south (whose head is nere Clauiton, and course from thence by Hickling, Langer, Whalton, Dxton, and Flareborow) and ere long another comming from Bingham, and Sibthorpe. Thence our Trent runneth to Coram, Hawton, Newarke castel, and so to Winthorpe, where the braunches are reunited, and thence go on by Holme, to Cromwell (and some after taking in a brooke comming frō Bilthorpe, by Kersal, Cawnton, Norwel & Willowby) to Carlton, and to Sutton, there making a litle Ile, then to Grinton, where it toucheth a streame one eche side, whereof one commeth from Norehouse by Weston, and Grethorp, another from Langthorpe, by Collingham, and Bolthorpe. From hence lykewyse it passeth to Clifton, Newtō, Kettlethorpe, Torkesey, Knath, Gamlborow, Waltrith, Stockwith, and leauing Axholme on the left hande, it taketh with all Hogdike water, out of the Ile, and so goeth forth to Wildsworth, Eastferrye, Fraisworth, Burringham Gummels, Hixburghe, Burton, Walcote, & at Ankerbury into the Humber, receiuing the Downe with by the way, which for his nobleneste is not to be ouerpassed.

Snite.

The Done therfore riseth in Yorkeshire among the Pekehils, & hauing receiued a water cōming by Ingbirchworth goth to Pennicstō, which is foure myles frō the hed, then by Orspring, to Thurgoland, and some after (ioining by the way with the Bishop water, that runneth by Bishop chappell, & Hondesheise) it méeteth with another comming frō Bowlerstō chapell. Then goeth it by Waddesley wood to Waddesley bridge, and at Alwerton receiueth the Bradfelde water. Then passeth it to Crokes, and so to Sheffelde castell, (by east whereof it receyueth a brooke from by south that commeth thorowe Sheffeldpark.) Thence it procéedeth to Westford bridg, Brikle bridg & southwest of Tinsley receyueth the Cowley streame, that runneth by Ecclesfeld. Next of al it goeth to Rotherhā where it méeteth with ỹ Rother a goodly water, whose head is in Darbyshyre, about Palley, from whence it goeth vnder the name of Doley, till it come at Rotheram, by north Winsfelde churche, Wingerworth, & Foxelande hall twelue myles from Rotheram, to Chesterforde, where it méeteth with the Iber, and Brampton water that commeth by Holme hall, both in one chanel. Thence it runneth to Toptom castell, & ere long crossing one water comming from Dronefelde by Whittington on the one side, and the seconde from aboue Brimington on the other, it goeth thorowe Staley parke, and ere long méeteth with the Crawley becke, wherof I finde this note. The Crawley ryseth not far from Hardwise, and going by Stanesby and Woodhouse, it receiueth aboue Netherhorpe, one water on the one side comming from the olde parke, and another from Barlebrowe hill on the other, that runneth not far from Woodthorpe. After this confluence likewyse they run as one into the Rother, which hasteth from thence to Eckington (there crossing a ryll that runneth by Bryley hill) and so to Kilmarshe, in the confines of Darby shire, where it taketh in the Gunno from by east, thence to Boughton, vniting it selfe thereabout wyth another by west from Gledles, called Yelebrooke, which deuydeth Yorke shyre from Darby shyre, and so runneth to Treton, Whiston, there taking in a ryll frō Aston and so to Rotheram, where it méeteth wyth the Donne, & from whence our Done hasteth to Aldwarke, Swaiton, Yerburge, there takyng in the Darne, which I wyll next describe, and kaye with the Done, vntil I haue finished the same. It ryseth at Combworth and so commeth about by Bretton hall, to Darton warde, where it crosseth a water that runneth from Gunthwake Hall, by Cawthorne vnited of two heades. From hence it goeth to Burton graunge, then to Dzar, where it toucheth wyth a water from southwest & then goeth to Derfielde & Goldthorpe, but ere it come to Sprotborowe, it vniteth it selfe with a faire ryuer, increased by dyuers waters, before it come at ỹ Done, & whereinto it falleth as I here northeast of Yerburghe. After this confluence lykewyse the Done goeth by Sprotborowe, to Warneswoth, Doncaster, Wheatley (there méeting wyth the Hampall créeke on the northeast side, which ryseth east of Ryby) thence to Sandal, Ryske Sandall, Branwith ferry Stanford, Fishelake, and so to Thuorne, or Thurne, where it crosseth the Idle (whose description followeth) & finally into Trent, & so into the Humber. But before I deale with the description of the Idle, I will adde somewhat of the Rume which is a fayre water: for although the description thereof be not so exactly deliuered me as I looked for, yet such as it is I wyll set downe, conferring it wyth Lelandes booke and helping their defecte so much as to mé is possible. It ryseth by south of Maunsfielde, fyue myles from Rumsorde abbaye, & when the streame commeth nere the abbay, it caſteth it ſelfe abroade and maketh a fayre lake. After this it commeth againe into a narrowe chanell, and ſo goeth on to Rumford village, carying the Budbye tō, and the Gerberton waters wyth all. From thence & with a meetely long courſe, it goeth to Bawtry or Vautrye, a market towne in Nottingham ſhyre, fiue myles from Doncaſter, and ſo into the Trent. Beneth Rumford alſo commeth in the Gyrt, which goeth vnto Southwel myles, & ſo into the Trent. Nowe as concerning our Idle. The Idle ryſeth at Sutton in Aſhfelde, & from whence it runneth to Paunſfelde, Clypſton and Allerton, where it taketh in a water that riſeth in the forreſt, one myle north of Bledworth, and runneth on by Rughforde abbaye, tyll it come at Allerton. The forreſters call thys Pan becke, whereof Lelande alſo ſpeaketh, who deſcribeth it in thismaner. Pan broke ryſeth ſome where about Linthirſt woode, from whence it goeth to Bilſthorpe, and ſo to Allerton. But to procéede the Idle hauing taken in the Panbecke, it runneth to Bothomſall, by Boughton, and Perlethorpe g but ere it come there, it meeteth the Meding Mayden, or Midding broke, which ryſing about Teuerſall, goeth to Pleaſley, Pettleworth, Salwcan, Warſop, Budley, Thureſby, Bothomſall & ſo into the Idle. After thys it procéedeth to Houghton, weſt Drayton, but ere it touche at Graunſton or Gaunſton, it taketh in the Wily, which commeth from Clowne, to Creſwell, Holbecke, Woodhouſe Milebecke, Normanton, Elley, Graunſtō, and ſo into the Idle. Beyng thus increaſed the Idle runneth on to Idleton, Dodſal, Retforde, Bollam, Tilney, Patterſey abbaye, & ſo to Bawtry, where it meeteth another frō the ſhire Okes, that ryſeth aboue Geytford, paſſeth on to Workſop (or Radfurth) Oſberton, Bilby, and Blythe, there vniting it ſelf wyth thrée ryllés in one botome, wherof one commeth from Waldingwel to Careleton, and ſo thorowe a parke to Blithe towne, another from by weſt Furbecke thrée myles and ſo to Blithe, but the third out of ỹ white water néer to Blithe, and there being vnited they paſſe on to Scroby, and ſo into the Idle. From hence it runneth on to Miſſen, to Sadlers bridge, & nert of all to Santoft, where it meeteth with the Sandbecke, which ryſing not farre from Sandbecke towne, paſſeth by Tickhill, Roſſington bridge, Brampton, Kilholme, Lindholme, & one myle ſouth of Santoft into the Idle water, which runneth from thence to Thorne, where it meeteth with the Done, & ſo with it to Crowley. Finally enuironning the Ile of Archolme, it goeth to Garthorpe, Focorby, and ſo into the Trent, Leland wryting of the Wily, Wile or Gwily, as ſome wryte it, ſaith thus thereof. The Wile hath two heades, whereof one is not far aboue the place where Wilbecke abbaie ſtode, the other ryſeth farder of by weſt aboue Welbecke, or Wilebecke Towne: finally ioyning in one, they runne to Cuckeney village, where crolling a becke that commeth in frō by weſt, it holdeth on two myles farder, there taking in the ſeconde ryll, and ſo reſort to Ruſforde. To thys ryuer likewiſe ſaith he do two other waters repaire, wherof ỹ one goeth hard by Paunſfeld (riſing foure myles from thence by weſt) & then commeth thrée myles lower vnto Ruſford, the other ſo far as I remember goeth quite thorowe the towne. Hauing thus finiſhed ỹ courſe of the Trent, & ſuch notable waters as diſcharge themſelues into the ſame. I find none of any coūtenance omitted before I come to Lindis or Witham, where I haue to make ſupplie of foure or fiue as followeth, albeit that their courſes be not of any quantitie in compariſon of thoſe, whereof I ſpake in the Trent.

Into Witham therefore from by north and Witham.
ſeuen myles beneath Lincolne, there falleth a faire water, the heade whereof is at Yake- Yake.
thorne, from whence it goeth by Hanworth, Snarford, Reſby, Stainton, and at Bullington meeteth with a water on each ſide, whereof one commeth from Yaytō and Turrington, the other from Sudbroke, and likewyſe beneath Byrlinges with the third comming from Barkeworth by Stanſted, and ioining all in one ſome after, it is not long ere it fall into the chanell of Witham, and ſo are neuer more hearde of. There is alſo a broke by ſouthweſt, that commeth from Ryrby to Cateley, Billingams, and the ferry. At Ta- Bane.
terſall it meeteth with the Bane, which ryſeth aboue Burghe, and nére vnto Ludford goeth downe to Dunnington, Stanygod, Hemmingſby, Bamburghe, Fillington, Horne caſtell (where it croſſeth a rill from Belchewoth) Thorneton, Parton, Halton, Ryrkeby, Comſby, Taterſall and ſo to Dogdike ferry. Aboue Boſton, likewiſe it taketh in a water comming from Luſeby by Bolingbroke, Stickeford, Stickney, Sibbeſey and Hildrike. And to Boſton towne it ſelfe doe finally come ſundry brookes in one chanell, called Hammond becke, which riſing at Doneſby runneth on to Wrightbold where it caſteth one arme into Holly well water. Thence it haſteth towarde Donnington, re- Bolingceyuing foure brookes by the waye, whereof brorow.
the firſt commeth from Wilthorp, the ſeconde Sem-from Fokingham, called Bollingbrowe or ryngham.

Sempringham water, the thirde frō Bridge ende, the fourth from Sempringham, and afterwardes the maine streame is founde to runne by Lyrton holme, and so into the Witham. Into the Wylande likewyse falleth the Hallywell, which ryseth of a spring that runneth towarde the east from Halywell to Oneby, Esonden, Gretforde, and so to Catbridge, where it receyueth another rysing at Witham and West of Wanthorpe, and the seconde comming from Laund, and so runne from thence togither to Willesthorp & Catbridge, and then into the Hallywell, which after these confluences, goeth to Tetforde, & Castcole, where it meeteth with a Drayne, comming from Bourne, and so thorowe the Fennes to Pinchebeck, Surflete, and Fosdike, where it meeteth with the Welland, in ỹ mouth of the washe as I haue bene aduertised. And thus much of the smaller brookes, wherby the greater are augmented, ouer all the realme of Englande. Certes I would if it had bene possible, haue dealt more orderly in their descriptions, but sith many occasiōs hindered my purpose, that which I haue done I hope shall suffice for this time, sith here after I may happen to take farder trauaile herein, & bring the whole discourse to some more perfite order, as better instruction and good acceptation of that which is done alreadie shall encourage me thereto.

Of the deuision of Englande as it is now generally named into Shyres Cap. 4.

Trinobantes. Ordolukes. Tegenes. Silures. Brigantes. Cankes. Canges.

IN reading of auncient writters as Cæsar Tacitus and others, we finde mention of sundrie regions to haue bene sometyme in this Iland, as of the Trinobantes, Ordolukes, Tegenes, Silures, Icenes, Brigantes, Cāges, and Kentishmen and such like, but sith the seuerall places where most of them laye, are not perfitelye knowne vnto the learned of these dayes, I doe not meane to pronounce my iudgement also vpō such doubtfull cases, least that in so doing I shoulde but increase conjectures, and leading peraduenture the reader frō the more probable, intangle him in the ende with such as are of lesse value & nothing so lykely to be true, as those which other men haue set downe before me. It shall suffice therfore to begin with such a ground, as from whence some better certaintie of thinges may be deriued, and that is with the estate of our Iland in the time of Alfrede, who first deuided England into shyres, whiche before his tyme, and sithence the cōming of the Saxons, was limited out by familes and hydelandes, as Wales hath also bene by hundreds of townes, which then were called Cantredes, as olde recorde doth witnesse. Into how many shyres the sayde Alfrede did first make this partition of the Iland, it is not yet founde out, howbeit if my conjecture be any thing at all, I suppose that he left not vnder eyght and thirtie, sith we finde by no good author that aboue fifteene haue bene added by any of his successours, sith the time of his decease. This prince therefore hauing made the generall partition of his kingdome into shyres, or shares, he deuided againe the same into lathes, as lathes into hundreds, & hundredes into tithinges, or denaries, as diuers haue written, and M. Lambert following their authorities, hath also giuen out, saying almost after this manner in his description of Kent. The Danes (saith he) both before, and in the time of king Alfrede, had flocked by the sea coastes of this Iland in great numbers, sometimes wasting and spoiling with sworde and fire, whersoeuer they might arriue, & sometime taking great bootes with thē to their ships, without doing any farder hurt, or domage to the countrey. Thys inconuenience continuing for manye yeares togither, caused our husbandmen to abandon their tillage, and gaue occasion and hardnesse to euill disposed persons, to fall to the lyke pillage, as practising to followe the Danes in these theyr theftes and robberies. And the better to cloake their mischiefe with all, they feigned thēselues to be Danish Pyrates, and woulde sometime come alande in one port, and sometime in an other, driuing daply great spoyles as the Danes had done vnto their ships before them. The good king Alfrede therfore (who had marueylously trauayled in repulsing the barbarous Danes) espying this out rage, & thinking it no lesse the part of a politicke prince to rote out the noysome subiect, then to holde out the forren aduersarie: by the aduice of his nobilitie, and therample of Moses (who followed the counsell of Jethro his father in law to the like effect) deuided the whole realme into certaine partes or sectiōs, which (of the Saxon worde, Schyran, signifying to cut) he termed shires or as we yet speake, shares, or portions, and appointed ouer euery such one shire an Erle or Alderman or both, to whome he committed the gouernement of the same. These shyres also he brake into lesser partes, wherof some were called lathes, of the worde Gelathian, which is to assemble togither, other hundredes for that they coined iurisdiction ouer an hundred pledges, & other tithinges, bycause there were in eache of them to the number of tenne persons, whereof euery one frō time to time was suretie for others good abearing. He prouided also that euery man shoulde procure himselfe to be receyued into some tithing, to the ende, that if any were founde of so small and base a credite that no man woulde become pledge or suretie for him, he shoulde forthwith be committed to prison, lest otherwise he might happen to do more harme abroade. Hitherto M. Lambert, by whose wordes we may gather very much of the state of this Iſlande in the time of Alfride, whose institution continued after a sort vntill the comming of the Normans, who chaunged the gouernement of the realme in such wise (by bringing in of new officers and offices, after the maner of their countries) that very little of the olde regiment remayned more then the bares names of some officers (except peraduenture in Kent) so that in these dayes it is hard to set downe any great certainty of things as they stode in Alfrids time, more then is remembred, & touched at this present. Some as it were roming or rouing at ỹ name Lath, affirme that they were certen circuites in euery coũty or shyre, cõtayning an appoynted number of townes, whose inhabitauntes alwayes assembled to know and vnderstande of matters touching their portions, in to some one appoynted place or other within their limites, especially whylest the causes were such as required not the ayde or assistaunce of the whole countye. Of these Lathes also (as they saye) some shyres had more some lesse, as they were of greatnesse. And M. Lãbert seemeth to be of the opinion that the lets of our tyme (wherein these pledges be yet called Franci plegij of the worde Frée burghe) doe yelde some shadow of that politike institutiõ of Alfrede: but sith my skill is so small in these cases that I dare not iudge any thing at all as of myne owne knowledge, I will not sette downe any thing more then I read, and reading no more of lathes, my next talke shal be of hundredes. The hundredе, and the wapentake is all one, and by this diuision not a name appertynent to a sette number of townes (for then all hundredе shoulde be of equall quantitie) but a limited iurisdiction, within the compasse whereof were an hundred persons called pledges, or ten denaries, or tithings of men, of which eache one was bounde for other good abering, and laudable behauiour in the cõmon welth of the realme. The chiefe man lykewyse of euerie Denarie or Tithing was in those dayes called a tithing man in latine Decurio, but now in most places a borsholder as in Kent, where euery tithing is more ouer named a Burrow, although that in the West countrie he be still called a Tithing man, and his circuit a Tithing as haue heard at large. I reade further more and it is partly afore noted, that the sayde Alfride caused eache man of frée condicion (for the better maintenaunce of his peace) to be ascribed into some hundred by placing himselfe in one Denarie or other, where he might alwaies haue such as should sweare or saye vppon their certen knowledge for his honest behauiour and ciuile conuersation if it should happen at any time, that his credite should come in question. In like sort, I gather out of Leland and other, that if any smal matter did fall out worthie to be discussed, the Tithing man or borsholder (now officers, at the cõmandement of ỹ Constable) should decide the same in their Letes, whereas the greatest causes were referred to the Hundredes, the greater to the Lathes, and the greatest of all to the shire daies, where the Earles or Aldermen dyd set themselues, and make finall endes of the same, according vnto Iustice. For this purpose likewise in euery Hundred were 12. men chosen of good age and wisdome, and those sworne to gyue their sentences without respect of person, and in this maner, as they gather were thinges handeled in those daies. In my tyme there are found to be in Englande 40. shyres, and likewise 13. in Wales, and these latter erected of late yeres, by King Henry ỹ eyght, who made the Bryton or Welchmẽ, equall in all respectes vnto the Englishe, and brought to passe, that both nations should indifferently be gouerned by one law, which in times past were ordred by diuers, & those far discrepant, & disagreyng one with an other, as by the seuerall view of ỹ same, is yet easy to be deserned. The names of the shyres in England are these wherof the first 10. lie betweene the Brittish sea and the Thames.

Which being added to those of Englãd yeld 53. shires or coũties, so ỳ vnder the Quænes Maiesty are so many Counties, whereby it is easily discerned, that hir power farre excedeth that of Offa, who of olde time was highelye honoured for that he had so much of Brytaine vnder hys subiection as afterwarde contened 39. shyres, when the diuision was made, wherof I spake before. Odde parcelles of shyres.

Thys is moreouer to be noted in our deuision of shyres, that they bee not alwayes counted or laid togither in one percel, wherof I haue great marueyle. But sith the occasion hath growen as I take it either by Priuyledge or some lyke occasion, it is better beyefelye to set downe howe some of these partes lye then to spende the tyme in seeking a iust cause of thys their odde diuision. First therfore I note that in the part of Buckingham shyre betweene Amondesham, and Beconsfelde, there is a peece of Hartfordshyre to be founde, enuironed rounde about with the countye of Buckingham, and yet thys patche is not aboue three myles in length & two in breadth at the berye most. In Barkeshyre also betweene Ruscombe and Okingham is a peece of Wilshyre, one myle in breadth and foure myles in length, whereof one side lyeth on the Loden riuer. In the borders of Northamton shyre directlye ouer against Luffelde a towne in Buckinghamshyre, I fynde a percell of Oxfordshyre not passing two miles in compasse.

With Oxford shyre diuers doe participate in so much that a peece of Glocester shyre, lyeth halfe in Warwicke shyre and halfe in Oxfordshyre, not very farre from Horneton. Such another patche is there, of Glocester shyre not farre from long Compton, but lying in Oxfordshyre county: and also a peece of Worcester shire, directly betweene it and Glocester shyre: Glocester hath ỳ third peece vpon the North side of the Winrushe neere Falbrocke, as Barkeshyre hath one percell also vpon the selfe side of the same water, in the verye edge of Glocestershyre: Lykewyse an other in Oxfordshyre, not verye farre from Burford: and the thirde ouer against Lache lade, which is parted from the mayne countye of Barkeshyre by a lyttle strake of Oxfordshyre. Who woulde thinke that two Fragmentes of Wilshyre were to be seene in Barkeshyre vpon the Loden, and the ryuer that falleth into it: whereof and the lyke sith there are verye manye, I thinke good to gyue thys briefe admonition. For although I haue not presentlye gone thorowe wyth them al, yet these maye suffice to giue notice of thys thinge, whereof moste readers as I perswade my selfe are ignorant. But to proceede with our purpose, ouer eache of these shyres in time of necessity is a seuerall Lieutenant chosen vnder the Prince, who beyng a noble man of calling, hath almost regall authoritie ouer the same for the tyme beyng in many cases which doth cõcerne his office: otherwyse it is gouerned by a Shirife, who is resident & dwelling somewhere within the same coũty, whom they call a Vicount, in respect of ỳ Erle (or as they called him in time past the Alderman) that beareth his name of the Countye, although it be seldome seene in Englande, that the Earle hath any great store of possessions, or oughtes to doe in the County whereof he taketh hys name, more then is allowed to him, thorowe his personall residens, if he happen to dwell and bee resident in the same. In the election also of these Magistrates, diuers able Persons aswell for wealth as wisedome, are named by the commons, at a tyme and place appointed for theyr choyse, whose names beyng deliuered to the Prince, he forthwyth pricketh some suche one of them, as he pleaseth to assigne vnto that office, to whome he cõmitteth the charge of the county, and who hereupon is Shirife of that shyre, for one whole yeare, or vntill another be chosen. The Shirife also hath his vnder Shirife that ruleth & hol- Lieutenaunt Shir holdeth the shyre courtes, & law daies vnder hym, vpon sufficient caution, vnto the high Shirife for hys true execution of Iustice, and pœlding of accoumpt, when he shall be therevnto called. There are likewyse vnder him certayne Bayliffes, whose office is to serue & returne such writtes & processes as are directed vnto thē frō the high Shirife, to make seazure of the goodes and cattelles, and arrest the bodyes of such as doe offende, presenting eyther their persons vnto him, or at the leastwyse taking sufficient bonde, or other assuraunce of them for theyr due appearance at an appointed tyme, when ỳ Shirife by order of law ought to present them to the Iudges according to his charge. In euerye hundred also are one or moe high constables according to the quātity of the same, who receyuing writtes and iniunctions from the high Shirife vnder his seale, doe forthwith charge the pety constables of euery towne, with in their limites, with the execution of ỳ same.

In eche countye likewise, are sundrye law dayes holden at their appointed seasons, of which some retaine the olde Saxon name, and are called Motelaghe. They haue also an other called the Shirifes turne, which they holde twyse in their times, in euery hundred, and in these two latter such small matters as oft aryse amongst the inferior sorte of people, are hard and determined. They haue finally their quarter sessions, wherein they are assisted by the Iustices and Gentlemen of the countrey, and twise in the yeare Gaile deliuerye, at which time the Iudges ride about in theyr circuites, into euerye seuerall countye (where the nobilitye and Gentlemen wyth the Iustices there resiaunt associate them) and mynister the lawes of the realme, wyth great solemnity and Iustice. Howbeit in doing of these thyngs, they retayne still the the olde order of the lande, in vse before the conquest, for they cōmit the full examination of al causes there to be heard, to ỳ cōsideratiō of 12. sober graue, & wise men, chosen out of ỳ same countye (which number they call an enquest) and of these inquests there are more or lesse impanled at euery assize as the nūber of cases there to be handled, doth craue and require (albeit that some one inquest hath often diuers to cōsider of) & when they haue to their vttermost poure consulted and debated of such thinges as they are charged with all, they returne againe to the place of Iustice, wyth theyr Verdicte in wryting, according whereunto the Iudge doth pronounce his sentence, be it for life or death or any other matter, whatsoeuer is brought before him. Beside these officers afore mencioned, there are sundry other in euery countye, as Crowners, whose duety is to enquire of such as come to their death by violence, to attache and present the plees of the Crowne, to make inquirye of treasure founde, &c. There are diuers also of the best learned of the lawe, beside sundry Gentlemen, where the number of Lawyers doe not suffice (and whose reuenues doe amount to aboue twenty pound by the yeare) appointed by especiall commission from the prince, to loke vnto the good gouernement of hir subiectes, in the Counties where they dwell, and of these the least skilfull in the lawe are of the peace, the other both of the peace and quorum otherwise called of Oyer & Determiner, so that the first haue authoritie onely to heare, the other to heare & determine such matters as are brought vnto their presence. These also doe dyrect theyr warrantes to the kepers of the Gayles which in their limitations for the safe keping of such offenders as they shal iudge worthie to be kept vnder warde, vntill the great assizes, to thende their causes may be further examined before the residue of the countye, & these officers were first deuised in the eightēne yeare of Edwarde the thyrde, as I haue bēne informed.

Iustices of peax and quorum.

They mēte also and togither with the Shyrifes, doe hold their Sessions at foure times in the yeare, whereof they are called quarter Sessions, and herin they inquyre of the common anoyaunces of the kings lege people, & sundrie other trespasses determining vppon them as iustice doth require. There are also a thyrde kinde of Sessions holden by the high Constables and Baylifs afore mencioned, called Petie Sessions, wherein the weights & measures are perused by the Clarke of the market for the countey, who sitteth with thē. At these mētings, also Victuallers, & in like sort seruants, labourers, roges, and runnagates are often reformed for their excesses, although the burning of vagabounds thorow their eares, be referred to ỳ quarter sessiōs or higher courts of Assise, where they are adiudged also to death, if they be take the third time & haue not sith their second apprehention applyed thēselues to labor. And thus much haue I thought good to set downe generally of the sayde countles and their maner of gouernaunce, although not in so perfit order as the cause requireth, bycause that of all the rest there is nothing wherewith I am lesse acquainted then with our temporall regiment, which to saye truth doth small concerne my calling.

Two prouinces.

THere are two prouinces in England, of which the firste and greatest is subiect to the se of Cauntorbury, the seconde to that of Yorke. And of these eyther hath hir Archbishop resident continuallye within hir owne limits, who hath not onely the chiefe dealing in thinges appertaining to the Hierarchy and iurisdiction of the churche, but also great authoritie in ciuile affayres, touching the gouernement of the common wealth so farre forth as their seuerall circuites doe extende. The Archbishop of Cantorbury is comonly called Primate of all Englande, and in the coronation of the kings of this lande, his office is to set the Crowne vpon their heades. They beare also the name of their high chaplens perpetually, although not a few of them haue presumed in tyme past to be their requalles and voide of any subiection vnto thē, which maye easilye appeare by their owne actes, epistles, and aunsweres, wherein they haue sought not onely to match, but also to mate them with great rigour and more then opē tirannie. Exampies hereof I could bring many, but this one shall suffice of Anselme, who making a showe as if he had bēne very vnwilling to be placed in the se of Cantorbury, gaue his aunswere to the letters of such his friendes as made request vnto hym to take that charge vpō him. Secularia negotia nescio, quia scire nolo, eorum namq; occupationes horreo, liberum affectans animum. Voluntati sacrarum intendo scripturarum, vos dissonantiam facitis, verendumq; est ne aratrum sancte Ecclesiæ, quod in Anglia duo boues validi & pari fortitudine, ad bonū certantes, id est rex & Archepiscopus, debeant trahere, nunc oue vetula, cum Tauro indomito iugata, distorqueatur a recto. Ego ouis vetula, qui si quietus essem, verbi Dei lacte, & operimento lanæ, aliquibus possem fortasis non ingratus esse, sed si me cum hoc tauro coniungitis, videbitis pro disparilitate trahentium, aratrum non recte procedere. &c. Which is in English thus. Of seculer affayres I haue no skil, bycause I will not know them, for I euen abhorre the troubles that ryse about them, as one that desireth to haue his minde at libertie. I applye my whole indeuour to the rule of the scriptures, you lead me to the contrary. It is to be feared lest the plough of holy church which two strong Oxen of equal force, and both like earnest to contende vnto that, which is good (that is the king and the Archebishop) ought to drawe, shoulde thereby now swarue from the right forrow, by matching of an olde Shepe, with a wilde vntamed bull. I am that olde shepe, who if I might be quiet, coulde peraduenture shew my selfe not altogither vngratfull vnto some, by feeding them with milke of the worde of God, and couering them with woll, but if you matche me with this bull, you shall see that thorowe want of equalitie in draught the plough will not go to right. &c. as followeth in the processe of his letters. Thomas Becket was so proude, that he wrate to king Henry the seconde, as to his Lord, to his king, and to his sonne, offering him his counsell, hys reuerence and due correction. &c. Others in like sort haue protested, that they ought nothing to the kinges of this lande, but their counsell onely, reseruing all obedience vnto the se of Rome: whereby we may easily see the pride & ambition of the clergie in the blinde tyme of ignorance. But as the Archbishop of Cantorbury hath lōg since obtayned the prerogatiue aboue Yorke, (although not without great trouble, sute, some bloodshed and contention) so the Archbishop of Yorke, is neuertheless primate of Englande, as one contenting himselfe with a peece at the least when (all) coulde not begotten. And as he of Cantorbury crowneth the king, so thys of Yorke doth the like vnto the Quēne, whose perpetuall Chaplin he is, and hath bēne from time to time as the writers doe reporte. The first also hath vnder his iurisdiction to the number of one and twentie inferiour bishoppes, the other hath onely foure by reason, that the churches of Scotland are now remoued frō his obedience vnto an Archbishop of their owne, wherby the greatnesse & circuit of the iurisdiction of Yorke, is not a little diminished. In like sort eache of these seuen & twenty sées, haue their Cathedral churches, wherin the Deanes doe beare the chiefe rule, being men especially chosen to that vocation, both for their learning & godlinesse so nere as can be possible. These Cathedrall churches haue in like maner other dignities and Canonries still remayning vnto thē as heretofore vnder the Popish regiment. Howbeit those that are chosen to the same are no ydle and vnprofitable persons, (as in times past they haue bēne when most of these liuinges were either furnished with straungers, especiall out of Italy, or such Idiots as had least skill of all in discharging of those functions, wherunto they were called by vertue of these stipendes) but such as by preaching and teaching can, and doe learnedly set forth the glorie of God, and farder the ouerthrow of Antichrist to the vttermost of their powers.

Moreouer in the sayde Cathedrall churches vpon Sondayes and Festiual dayes, the Canones doe make certayne ordinary sermons by course, whervnto great numbers of all estates doe orderly resort, and vpon the working daies thrise in the weeke one of the sayd Canons doth reade and expounde some peece of holy scripture, wherevnto the people doe very reuerently repaire. The bishops themselues in lyke sorte are not vsle in their callings, for being nowe exempt from Court & counsell, they so applye their myndes to the setting forth of the worde, that there are verie few of them, which doth not euery Sunday or oftner resorte to some place or other, within their iurisdictions, where they expounde the scriptures with much grauitie & skill. They haue vnder them also their Archdeacons, some one, diuers two, & many foure or mo, as their circuites are in quantity, whiche Archedeacons are termed in law the byshoppes eyes: and these beside their ordinarie courtes (which are holden by themselues or their officials once in a moneth at ỹ least) doe kepe yearly two visitations or Sinodes, (as the Bishop doth in euery thirde yeare) wherin they make diligẽt inquisition & serch, aswel for ỹ doctrine & behauiour of the Ministers, as the orderly dealing of the Parishioners in resorting to their parish churches & conformity vnto religiõ. They punish also wᵗ great seuerity al such trespassers as are presented vnto them: or if the cause be of ỹ more weight, as in cases of Heresie, pertinacie, cõtempt & such lyke, they refer them eyther to ỹ Bishop of the Dioceese, or his chauncellour, or else to sundrie graue persons set in authoritye by vertue of an high cõmission directed vnto them frõ the Prince to that end, who in very courteous maner doe sée the offenders gẽtly reformed, or else seuerly punished if necessitie so inforce. Beside this in many of our Archedeaconries, we haue an exercise lately begunne, which for the most part is called a prophecie or conference, and erected only for the examination or triall of the diligence of the clergie in their study of holy scriptures. Howbeit such is the thirstie desire of the people in these dayes to heare the worde of God, ỹ they also haue as it were with zealous violence intruded themselues among them (but as hearers only) to come by more knowledg thorowe their presence at the same. Herein also for the most part two of the yonger sorte of Ministers doe expounde eache after other some peece of the scriptures ordinarily appointed vnto them in their courses (wherein they orderly go thorow with some one of the Euangelistes or of the Epistles, as it pleaseth thẽ to chose at the first in euery of these conferences) and when they haue spent an houre or a little more betweene them, then commeth one of the better learned sort, who supplyeth the rowme of a moderator, making first a briefe rehearsall of their discourses, and then adding what him thinketh good of his owne knowledge, wherby two houres are thus cõmonly spent at this most profitable meeting. Whẽ al is done if the first speakers haue shewed any peece of diligence, they are commended for their trauaile and encouraged to go forward. If they haue béene found to be slacke, their negligence is openly reproued before all their brethren, who go aside of purpose from the laitie after the exercise ended, to iudge of these matters and consulte of the next speakers & quantie of the text to be handled in that place. The laytie neuer spake but are onely hearers, & as it is vsed in some places weekely, in other once in fouretéene dayes, in dyuers monethly, and elsewhere twise in a yere, so is it a notable spurre vnto all the ministers, therby to apply their bookes which otherwyse as in tymes past dyd giue themselues to hawking, hunting, tables, cardes, dyce, typpling at the Alehouse, shooting and other like vanities, nothing commendable in such as shoulde be godly and zealous stewards of the good gifts of GOD, faithful distributers of his worde vnto the people, and diligent paynours according to their calling. Our Elders or Ministers and Deacons (for subdeacons and the other inferiour orders, sometime vsed in the Popish church we haue not) are made according to a certaine forme of consecration concluded vpon in the time of king Edwarde the first, by the clergy of Englande, and sone after confirmed by the three estates of the realme, in the high court of Parliamẽt. And out of the first sort, that is to saye of such as are called to the ministery, are Bishops, Deanes, Archedeacons, & such as haue the higher places, in the Hierarchy of the church elected, & these also as al ỹ rest, at the first cõming vnto any spirituall promotion doe yéld vnto ỹ Prince the entire tare of their liuings for one whole yeare, if it amount in value vnto ten pounde and vpwardes, and this vnder the name of first fruites. They paye the tenthes yearely also of theyr sayde liuynges, according to such valuations as haue béene made lateiye of the same: for the receyt of which two paymentes, an especial office or court is erected, which beareth name of first fruits and tenthes, wherevnto if the party to be preferred, doe not make his duetifull repayre by an appointed tyme after possession taken there to compounde for the payment of his fruites, he incurreth the daunger of a great penalty, lymited by a certayne estatute prouided in that behalfe, against such as doe intrude into the ecclesiasticall functiõ. They pay likewise subsidies wyth the temporaltie, but in suche sort that if these paye after foure shillinges Subsidies for lande, the cleargye paye commonly after sixe shilings of the pounde, so that of a benefice of twentye pounde by the yeare the incumbent thinketh himselfe well acquited, if all thinges being discharged he may reserue fiftéene pounde towarde his owne sustentation and maintenance of his family. Seldom also are they without the compasse of a subsidye, for if they be one yeare cleare from this payment they are lyke in the nexte to here of another graunt, so that I saye agayne they are seldome wythout the limite of a subsidie. The laity maye at euery taxation also helpe themselues, and so they doe thorowe consideration had of their decaye, and hinderaunce, and yet their impouerishmẽt cannot but touch also the Parson or Vicar, as is daily to be séene in their accounpts and tythings.

The other paimẽtes due vnto the Archbishop and Bishop at their seuerall visitatiõs, (of which the first is double to the latter) and suche also as the Archedeacon receyueth at hys Synodes. &c. remaine still as they dyd, wythout any alteration: onely thys I thynke be added within memory of man, that at the comming of euery prince, hys appointed officers doe commonly visite the whole realme vnder the forme of an ecclesiasticall inquisition, in which the cleargy doe paye double * The very cause why sweauers, pedlers & glouers haue béene made Ministers, for ỹ learned refuse such matches, so that yf the Bishops in times past hadde not made such by ouersight & friendship I wote not howe such men shold haue done wyth their aduousons. as for a glouer or a fées, as vnto the Archbishop. Hereby thẽ & by those already remembred, it is founde that the Church of Englande, is no lesse commodious to the Princes coffers then the laitye, if it doe not farre excéede the same, since their paimentes are certayne continuall and seldome abated, howesoeuer they gather vppe their owne dueties, or haue their lyuinges otherwise hardly valued vnto the vttermost fardings, or shrewdely canceled by the couetousnesse of the patrones, * of whom some do bestowe aduousons of benefices vpon theyr Bakers, Butlers, Cokes, and horsekéepers, in stéede of other recompẽce, for their long & faithful seruice which they employ vnto their most aduantage. But to procéede wyth our purpose. The names moreouer vsually giuẽ vnto such as féede the flocke remaine in lyke sort as in tymes past, so ỹ these wordes, parson, Vicar, curate, and such are not, as yet abolished more then the Canon lawe it selfe, which is daily pleaded as I haue sayde elsewhere, although the estatutes of the realme haue greatly infringed the large scope, and brought the exercise of the same into some narrower limits. There is no thing redde in our churches but the canonicall Scriptures, whereby it commeth to passe that the Psalter is sayd ouer once in thirtie dayes, ỹ new Testament foure times, and the olde Testament once in the yeare. And hereunto if the Curate be adiudged by the Bishop or his deputies, sufficientlye instructed in the holye scriptures, he permitteth him to make some exposition or exhortation in his parishe, vnto amendment of lyfe. And for as much as our churches and vniuersities haue béene so spoiled in tyme of errour, as there cannot yet be had such number of learned pastours as may suffise for euery parish to haue one: there are certaine sermones or homelies, deuised by sundry learned men, confirmed for sounde doctrine, by consent of the diuines, and publike authoritie of the prince, and those appointed to be read by the Curates of meane vnderstanding, (which Homelies doe comprehende the principall partes of christian doctrine, as of originall sinne, of Iustificatiõ by fayth, of charity and such lyke) vpon the Sabbaoth dayes, vnto the congregation. Likewise in our common prayer, the lessons are onely certeine appointed chapters, taken out of the olde and newe Testament. The administration moreouer of the sacraments and residue of the seruice, is done in the churches, wholly in our vulgare tong, that eche one present, maye here and vnderstande the same, which also in Cathedrall and Collegiate churches is so ordered, that the Psalmes onely are song by note, the rest being redde (as in common parishe Churches) by the Minister wyth a loude voyce, sauynge that in the administration of the Communion the Quier singeth the answeres, the crede, and sundry other thynges appointed, but in so plaine (I say) and distinct maner, that eche one present may vnderstand what they sing, euery worde hauing but one note, though the whole Harmony consist of many partes, and those very cunningly set by the skilful in that science. As for our Churches themselues, Belles, and times of morning and euening prayer, they remaine as in times past, sauing that all Images, shrines, tabernacls, rodloftes, and monumentes of Idolatry, are remoued, taken downe, and defaced, onely the stories in glasse windowes excepted, which for want of sufficient store of newe stuffe, & by reason of extreame charge that shoulde growe, thorow the alteration of the same into white panes thorowe out the realme, are not altogither abolyshed in moſt places at once, but by lyttle and little ſuffered to decaye, that white glaſſe may be prouided and ſet vp in their romes. Finally wheras there was wont to be a great partiсion betweene the Quire and the body of the Church, nowe it is either very ſmall or none at all: and to ſaye the truth altogither needeleſſe, ſithe the Miniſter sayth his ſeruice commonly in the bodye of the church, wyth his face towarde the people, in a little tabernacle of wainescot prouided for the purpoſe, by which meanes the ignorannt doe not onely learne dyuers of the pſalmes and vſuall prayers by heart, but alſo ſuch as can read doe pray togither with him, ſo that the whole congregation at one inſtant doe poure out their peticions, vnto the liuing God, for the whole eſtate of hys church in moſt earneſt and feruent maner. Thus much briefly of the eſtate of the church of England, I meane touching the regimēt of the ſame, ẏ ſeruice of God, & forme of common Prayer: now will I returne to the particular limites of eache ſeuerall Byſhoprȳe, whereby we ſhall ſée theyr boundes, and how farre theyr iuriſdictions doe extende, beginning firſt with the Sie of Cantorbury in ſuch briefe order as followeth here at hand.

orbu- The iuriſdictiō of Cantorbury (erected firſt by Auguſtine the Monke) yf you haue reſpect to his prouinciall regiment, extendeth it ſelfe ouer all the ſouth part of this Iſland. But if you regarde the ſame onely that belongeth vnto his Sie, it reacheth but ouer one parcell of Kent: the Dioceſſe of Rocheſter enioying the reſt: ſo that in thys one countey the greateſt Archbiſhoprȳcke and at the leſt Biſhoprȳcke of all are vnited & ſtrictly lincked togither. That of Cantorbury hath vnder it one Archedeacō, who hath charge ouer xj. Deaneries or a hūdred thrée ſcore and one pariſhe churches, and in the Popiſh time there went out of this Sie to Rome at euery alienation for firſt fruites 10000. Ducates or Florens (for I reade both) beſide 5000. that the new elect vſually payed for hys pall. I woulde ſpeake ſomewhat of his peculiers diſperſed here & there in other ſhires, but ſith I haue no certaine knowledge of them, I paſſe thē ouer vntill an other tyme.

ieſter. The Sie of Rocheſter is alſo included within ẏ limits of Kent, whoſe Archedeacon hath onelye thrée Deanaries vnder his iuriſdiction containing 132. Pariſhe churches: ſo that hereby it is to be gathered that there are at the leaſt 393. Pariſhe churches in Kent, ouer which theſe two Archdeacons afore remembred doe exercise Eccleſiaſticall authoritie. This Byſhop at euery alienation was wont to pay to the Sie of Rome 1300 Ducates or florens. He was alſo croſſebearer in tyme paſt to the Archbyſhop of Cantorbury and Iuſtus was the firſt Byſhop that was inſtalled in the ſame.

The Sie of London, whereof Mellitus is accoūted to be the firſt Paſtor in the Popiſh Cataloge, is nowe conteyned to be vnder the gouernaunce of a Biſhop, which in olde time had hir Archebiſhop vntill Cantorbury bereft hir of that honour by the practiſe of Auguſtine the monke, who I wote not vpō what priuie occaſion, remoued his Archebiſhops Sie from thence farder into Kent. It includeth Eſſex, Middleſex and part of Herefordſhyre, and is neyther more nor leſſe in quantitie then the auncient kingdome of the eaſt Saxons before it was vnited to that of the weſt Saxons, as our hyſtories doe report. The iuriſdiction of this Sie vnder the biſhop is committed to foure Archedeacons, that is of London, Eſſex, Middleſex, and Colcheſter and thoſe haue amongſt them to the number of 363. Pariſhes or thereabouts, beſide the peculiers belonging to the Archebiſhop, and at euery alienation the new incumbent was bounde to pay to the Biſhop of Rome 3000. Ducates or florenes as I reade. London.

Chicheſter (the beginning of which ſie was in ẏ Iſle of Seleſey, but afterward trāſlated to Chicheſter) hath now Suſſex only, and the wight vnder which are ſixténe Deaneries, containing to ẏ nūber of 551. pariſhs. It paid at euery alienatiō to ẏ Sie of Rome 333. ducates, as I haue reade of late. One Edbert was the firſt biſhop there, thē one Cella ſucceéded, after whom the ſie was voyd by many yeres. It was erected alſo 711. by ẏ decrée of a Synode holden in Suſſex, which ſeparated it frō the iuriſdiction of ẏ ſie of Wincheſter, wherof before it was reputed a parcell. Chicheſter Wincheſter hath Hamſhyre and Surry, & in olde time the Wight wherein are eyght Deanaries and 276. Pariſh churches, and beſide that the Biſhoppe of thys Dioceſſe is perpetuall Prelate vnto the honorable order of the Garter, his taxe at his inſtitution was 12000. ducats or florens. If the old cataloge of the Biſhoppes of this Sie be well conſidered of, and the actes of the greateſt parte of them indifferently weighed, as they are to be reade in our Hyſtories, you ſhall finde the moſt egregious hypocrites, the ſtouteſt warriours, the cruelleſt tyrauntes, the richeſt money mongers, & politicke counſellours in temporall affayres, to haue I wote not by what ſecrete worcking of the diuine prouidence bēne placed here in Wincheſter, ſith the foundation of that Sie, which was erected winche- ſter. The Byſhoppe of Winche- ſter was ſometime called biſhop of the weſtſaxōs or of Dor- cheſter, which town was giuen to Birinus & his ſucceſſours, by Kinigils of the weſt ſaxons and Oſwald king of the Northūbers.

ted by Birinus, 639. (whome Pope Honorius sent hyther out of Italy) and first planted at Dorchester, in the tyme of Kynigils, then translated to Winchester, where it doth yet continue.

Salisbury

Salisbury hath nowe Barckshyre, and Wilshyre onely, for after ỳ death of Hedda, which was [illegible] Winchester was deuided in two, so that onely Hampton and Surrey were left vnto it, & Wilton, Dorset, Barckshyre, Somerset, Deuon, & Cornwall, assigned vnto Salisbury, tyll other order was taken. The valuation hereof in Rome was lately 4000. Ducats or flozens, as the tare therof yet recordeth. Certes I haue not read of any bishop that hath bene a greater ornament to this Sie then Bishop Jewell lately deceased, sith the tyme that Adelme dyd first begynne that Bysshoprycke 704. which was before a perell of the iurisdiction of Winchester, founded at Shirburne, & afterward translated to Salisbury, but I can not well tell in what yeare after the conquest.

Excester.

Excester hath Deuonshyre and Cornewall & the valuation of this liuing was 6000. ducates, which were payde at euery alienation vnto the Bishoppe of Rome.

Bathe.

Bathe, whose Sie was sometyme at Welles, hath Somersetshyre onely, and the value therof was rated at 430. Ducates in ỳ Popish taxation, except I be deceyued. This Bishoprycke was erected 905. in a counsell holden among the Gewises, whereat king Edwarde of the Westsaxons, & Plegimund Archebishop of Cãterbury were present. For that part of the country had bene seauen yeres without any Pastorall cure, and therfore in this counsel it was agreed that for the two Bishoprycks (wherof one was at Winchester another at Shireburne) there should be fiue ordayned, whereby the people there myght be the better instructed. By thys meanes Frithstan was placed at Winchester, and Etheline at Shireburne, both of thẽ being then boyde. Shireburne also sustained the subdiuision, so that Werstane was made Bishop of Cridioc or Deuonshire (whose Sie was at Kyrton) Herstan of Cornewall, and Eadulf of Welles, vnto whome Barkshyre & Dorsetshyre were appointed, but now you se what alteratiõ is made, by consideration of the limites of their present iurisdictions.

The Bysshoprycks of Shiresburne diuided into 3.

Worcester.

Worcester sometime called Epãtus wiccionum hath Worcester & part of Warwijcshyres, and before the Bishoprijc of Glocester was taken out of the same, it payde to the Pope 2000. Ducates of golde at euery chaunge of Prelate. This Sie was begunne either in or not long before the time of Offa, king of the east Angles, and Boselus was the first Bishop there, after whome, succeeded Oskort, then Egwine who went in pilgrimage to Rome, with Kinredus of Mercia & the sayde Offa, and there gate a Monasterie (which he buylded in Worcester) confirmed by Constantine the Pope.

Glocester

Glocester hath Glocestershyre only, wherin are nyne Deanaries and to the number of 294. Parishe churches, as I finde by good record. But it neuer payd any thing to rome, bycause it was erected by king Henry the eyght, after he had abolished the vsurped authoryt of ỳ Pope, except in Quéene Maries, if any such thing were demeaned, as I doubt not but it was.

Hereford

Herefordhe hath Hertfordeshyre and part of Shropshyre and payde to Rome at euery chaunge of Bishop 1800. Ducates or flozens at the least.

Lichel whose was h den fo time a westch ter, th now h a Bish of hys owne.

Lechfield wherunto Couẽtry is added, hath Staffordeshyre Darbyshire part of Shropshire & the rest of Warwijc, that is boyde of subiection to the sie of Worcester. It was erected in the time of Peada king of the south Mertians which lay on this side of ỳ Trent, & therin one Dinas was enstalled about the yeare of grace 656. after whom succeeded Kellac, thẽ Tunher an Englishman, but consecrated by the Scottes. It paid to the Pope 1733. Ducates, in mine opinion a good round fine, but not without a iust punishment, sith that in times past by. 765. Eldulf Bishoppe there vnder king Offa of Mertia woulde haue bereft the sie of Cantorbury of hir pall in the time of Pope Adriane, and so dyd for a season till thinges were reduced into their former order.

Orkord

Orkorde hath Orkorde shyre onely, a verye ponge Jurisdiction, erected by kyng Henry the eyght, and where in the time of Quéene Mary, one Goldwell was Bishop, who as I remember was a Jesuite, dwelling in Rome and more conuersant as the fame went in the blacke Arte, then skilfull in the Scriptures, and yet he was of great countenaunce amongst the Romayne monarches. It is said that obseruyng the Canons of hys order, he regarded not the temporalities, but I haue heard sithens that he wist well ynough what became of those commodities.

Ely.

Ely hath Cambridgeshyre, & the Isle of Ely. It was erected 1109. by Henry the first, being before a riche and welthy abbay. One Heruy also was made Bishoppe there, as I haue fond in a Register, belõging sometime to that house. Finallye it payde to the Pope at euery alienation. 7000. Ducates, as the Registers there doth testifie at large.

North-

Northwich called in old time Episcopatus, domucensis, (whose sée was first at Helmeha, then at Thetford) hath Suffolke and Norfolke. The circuite hereof was once all one, with that of the Kinges of the east Angles, till Ely was taken from the same, & it began about the yeare 632. vnder Sorpenwalde king of the East Sarons, and one Felix of Burgundy, was first Bishop there, who sate seuentéene yeares, and was placed therein by Honorius the Pope, finally it payde at euery alienation. 5000. Ducates to Rome of curraunt money as I reade.

Peterborow sometime a notable monastery hath Northamton, and Rutlande shires, a diocesse erected also by king Henry ỳ eight. It neuer payde first fruites to the Pope, but in Quéne Maries dayes, if ought were then demaunded, because it was a sée not recorded in the auncient Register, of hys first fruites and tenthes.

Bristowe hath Dorcet shyre, sometime belongyng to Salisbury, a sée lately erected by kyng Henry the eyght, who toke no small care for the Churche of Christ, & therfore eased a number of the auncient sées, of theyr superfluous circutes, and bestowed the same vppon such other, as he had appoynted for the better regimente and féeding of the flocke.

Lincolne of all other in times past was the greatest, for although that out of it were taken the Bishoprickes of Oxforde, and Peterborow, yet it reteineth still Lincolne, Leicester, Huntyngdon, Bedforde, Buckingham shyres, and the rest of Hartfordshyre, so that it extended from the Thames vnto the Humber, and payde vnto the Pope for the whole 5000. Ducates, as appeareth by record at euery alienation. It beganne about the beginning of William Rufus, by one Remigius who remoued his Sée to Lincolne frō Dorchester, as Math. Westminster doth report, & thus much of such Bishoprisches as lye within Lhoegres or Englande as it was left vnto Locrinus, nowe it followeth that procéede with Wales.

Lhandaffe or the churche of Tau, contayneth Glamorgan, Monmouth, Brecknoch and Radnor shyres, and payde to Rome 700. Ducats as I reade at euery chaunge of Prelate.

S. Dauides hath Pembroke, and Caermardine shyres, whose liuerie or first fruites to the Sée of Rome was 1500. Ducates at the hardest as I thincke.

Bangor is in north Wales, & hath Caernaruon, Anglisey and Merioneth shyres vnder hir iurisdiction, it paid also to Rome 126. Ducates or florence, as their bookes doe yet declare.

S. Asaphes hath Prestholme and parte of Denbigh & Flintshyres, which beyng layde togither doe amount to little more then one good countye, & therfore iustly supposed to be ỳ left Bishopricke that is to be founde within Wales, yet it paide to Rome 470. Ducates, except my memory doth fayle. And hitherto of the Prouince Caunterburye, for so much thereof as lyeth in thys Iland, nowe it resteth that I procéede with the other of Yorke in such order as I may. S. Asaphes.

The Sée of Yorke beganne aboute the yeare of grace. 625. vnder Iustus of Caunterburye, who ordeyned Paulinus the first Bishop there, in the time of Edwine of king Northumberland. Of it selfe it hath Iurisdiction ouer Yorkshyre, Nottingham shyre, & the rest of Lancaster shire, not subiect to the Sée of Chester, and when the Pope bare authority in this realme it payde vnto his Sée 1000. Ducates, beside also 5000. for the pal of the newe elect, which was more then he coulde well spare, considering the diminution of hys Sée, by meanes of the erection of a new Metropolitane in Scotland, as I haue shewed else where. Yorke.

Chester hath Chestershire, Darbishire, the most part of Lancaster shyre (vnto the Rybell) Richemonde, and a part of Flinte and Denbighe shyres in Wales also vnder one subiection for ecclesiasticall matters. In the olde popish tyme, there was no Bishoprych, called by that name (although the Bysshop of Lechfielde had sometime his Sée pitched in that place, and therefore of some was called Bishop of Chester) sith king Henry the eight was the first, that erected any there. Chester.

Durham hath the county of Durham onely, and Northumberlande, whereof the Bysshoppes haue béene sometimes Earles Palatines, and ruled the rest vnder the name of the Bishoprycke, a Sée in my opinion more profitable, & of lesse countenaunce, then his prouinciall. But whatsoeuer it be for externall apparaunce, sure it is that it payde to Rome 9000. Ducates or Florenes, at euery chaunge, as the recorde yet expresseth, Aydan a Scot was the first Bysshop of this Sée, who helde himselfe as did also manye of his successours, in Lindisfarne Ile, till one came that remoued it to Durham. Durham or Lindesfarne.

Caerleil erected 1132. by Henry the first, & whereof Ethelwolf confessor to Osmond Bysshop of Salisbury, was made originall Bishop, hath Cumberland & Westmerland, as for the Deaneries and number parysshes conteyned in the same, as yet I haue no- Caerleil.

knowledge, more then of many of the other, howbeit of this I am sure, that the Pope receyued out of it at euery chaunge of Bysshop 1000. florenes, albeit that it might haue spared much more as an aduersarie thereto confessed sometyme euen before the Pope himselfe, supposing no lesse but to haue gained by hys tale.

Man. Beside all these we haue another Bishoprycke yet in England, but very obscure, because the Bysshoppe thereof hath not wherewith to maintaine his countenaunce sufficientlye, and that is, the Sie of Mona or Man, sometime named Epātus Sodorensis, whereof one Wimundus was ordeyned the firſt bishop, and John the seconde, in the reigne of king Stephē. The gift of this prelacy resteth in ỳ Erles of Darby, who nominateth such a one from time to tyme, thereto as to them doth seeme conuenient. Howbeit if that Sie might reape hir owne commodities, I doubt not but the estate of hir Bishop would quickly be amended. And thus much of our bishoprycks, and maner how the ecclesiastical iurisdiction of the church of England, is deuyded among the shyres, and countyes of thys realme. Whose Bishops as they haue bene heretofore of greater port and doings in the common wealth, then at this present, so are they nowe for the most part the best learned that are to be founde, in any country of Europe, sith neither high parentage, nor great ryches as in other countreyes, but onelye learning and vertue doe bring them to thys honour. I might here haue spoken of diuers other Bishoprycks, sometime in this part of the Iſlande, as of that of Caerlheon, where Dubritius gouerned, which was afterwarde translated to S. Dauides, and taken for an Archbishoprycke: secōdly of the Bishoprycke of Leircester, whose fourth bishop called Unwon went to Rome with Offa king of Mertia: thirdly of Ramsbyry or Miltō, & of Glocester (of which you shall reade in Math. Weſt. 489) where the bishop was called Eldad: also of Hagulstade, one of the three mēbers wherinto the Sie of Yorke was deuided after the pulsion of Wilfrid. For as I reade when Egfrid the king had driuen him away, he deuided his Sie into three partes, making Bosa ouer the Deiranes that helde his Sie at Hagulstade: Eatta ouer the Bernicians, who sate at Yorke: and Edhedus ouer Lindfar, whose successours were Ethelwine, Edgar and Kinibert, notwithstanding that one Herulfus was ouer Lindfarre before Edhedus, who was Bishop of the Mertians and middle England till he was banished from Lindisse and came into these quarters, to seeke his refuge and succour. I could lykewyse entreate of the Bishoppes of Whiteherne, or ad Candidam Casam, nowe a parcell of Scotland, and of diuers chaūges and alterations happning in these ſies frō time to time, but sith my purpose is to touch only the estate of thinges present, it may suffice to haue sayde thus much of them, though altogither beside mine intended purpose.

Of Vniuersities. Cap. 6.

THere are within the realme of England two noble & famous Uniuersities, wherin are not onely diuers goodly houses builded foure square for the most part of harde free stone, with great numbers of lodginges and chambers in the same for Students after a sumptuous maner, thorow the exceeding liberalitie of Kings, Quēnes, Bishops, Noble men, and Ladies, of the lande: but also large liuinges and great reuenues bestowed vpon them (the lyke wherof is not to be seene in any other region as Peter Martyr dyd oft affirme) to the maintenaunce onely of such cōuenient numbers of poore mens sonnes as the seuerall stipendes bestowed vpō the saide houses are able to support. Of these two that of Oxforde (which lyeth west and by North from London) standeth most pleasauntly of both, being enuironned in maner rounde about with pleasaunt woodes on the hilles aloft and goodly riuers in the medowes beneath, whose courses woulde bréede no small commoditie to that Citie, yf such impediments were remoued, as greatly annoy the same. That of Cambridge is distaunt from London about fourtie and fiue myles north & by east, and standeth very well, sauing that it is somewhat low & nére vnto the Fennes, whereby the holsomnesse of the ayre there, is not a little corrupted. It is excellently well serued with all kindes of prouision, but especially of fresh water fishe and wildefowle, by reason of the Ile of Ely, which is so nére at hande. Duely woodde is one of the chiefe wants to such as studdie there, wherfore this kind of prouisiō is brought them either from Esſer, & other places thereabouts, as is also their cole, or otherwise the necessity therof is supplyed with gall, and sea cole, wherof they haue great plenty lead thither by the Grant. Moreouer it hath no such store of medowe grounde as may suffice for the ordinarie expenses of the towne, and Uniuersitie, wherfore they are inforced in lyke sort to prouide, their haye from other villages about which minister the same vnto them in verye great abundaunce. Oxforde is supposed to containe taine in Longitude eyghténe degrées and eyght and twentie mynutes, and in Latitude one and fiftie degrées and fiftie minuts, wherras that of Cambridge standing more northerly, hath twentie degrées and twentie minutes in Longitude, and therevnto fiftie & two degrées and fifténe minuts in Latitude as by exact supputacion is easie to be founde. The Colledges of Oxford for curious workmanship and priuate commodities, are much more stately, magnificent, and commodious then those of Cambridge: and therevnto the stréetes of the towne for the most part more large and comely. But for vniformitie of building, orderly compactiō and regiment, ẏ towne of Cambridge excédeth that of Oxford (which otherwise is & hath bén the greater of the two) by many a folde, although I know diuers ẏ are of the contrarie opinion Castels also they haue both, and in my iudgment is harde to be sayde, whither of them woulde be the stronger, if both were accordingly repaired: howbeit that of Cambridge is the higher both for maner of building & scituation of grounde, sith Oxforde castell, standeth low and is not so apparant in sight. The commō schooles of Cambridge also are farre more beautifull then those of Oxforde onely the diuinitie schoole at Oxforde excepted, which for fine and excellent workemanship commeth nere the mowlde of the Kings chappell in Chambridge, then the which two with ẏ chappell that king Henry the seuenth dyd buylde at Westminster, there are not in my opinion made of lime & stone thrée more notable pyles within the cōpasse of Europe. In all other thinges there is so great equalitie betwéene these two Vniuersities as no mān cā imagine how to set down any greater, so that they séeme to be the bodye of one well ordered common wealth, onely deuided by distaunce of place and not in friendly consent. In speaking therefore of the one I can not but describe the other: and in commēdation of the first I can not but extolle the latter, and so much the rather for that they are both so déere vnto me, as that I can not redily tell, vnto whyther of them I owe the most good will. Woulde to God my knowledge were such as that neither of thē might haue cause to be ashamed of their pupill, or my power so great that I might worthily requite them both for those manifolde kindenesses that I haue receyued of them. But to leaue these things & procéed with other more conuenient for my purpose. The maner to liue in these Vniuersities is not as in some other of forren countries we sée daply to happen, where the Studentes are inforced for waute of such houses, to dwell in common Innes, and Tauernes, wythout all order or discipline: but in these our Colledges we liue in such exact order and vnder so precise rules of gouernmēt, that the famous learned man Erasmus of Roterodam being here amongest vs fiftie yeares passed, dyd not let to compare the trades of liuing of students of these two places, euen with the very rules and orders of the auncient Monkes: affirming moreouer in flatte wordes, our orders to be such as not onely came neare vnto, but rather farre excéded all the Monasticall institutions that euer were deuised. In most of our Colledges there are also great numbers of studentes, of which many are founde by the reuenues of the houses, and other by the purueighances & helpe of their riche frīēds, wherby in some one Colledge you shall haue two hundred schollers, in others an hundred and fiftie, in diuers a hundred and fourtie, & in dyuers lesse numbers as the capacitie of the sayde houses is able to receyue: so that at this present of one sort and other there are about thrée thousande studentes nourished in them both as by a late suruey it manifestly appeared. Euery one of these colledges haue in lyke maner their professours or readers of the tongues and seuerall sciences, as they call thē, which daily trade vp the youth there abiding, priuately in their halles, to the ende they may be able afterward whē their turne commeth about, to shewe themselues abrode by going frō thence into the commō schooles, and publicke disputations (as it were into the playne battaile) there to trie their skilles, and declare howe they haue profited sithence their comming thither. Moreouer in the publicke schooles of both the Vniuersities, there are founde at the Princes charge (and that very largely) fiue professours and readers, that is to say, of diuinitie, of the ciuile lawe, Physicke, the Hebrue & the Greeke tongues: and for the other publicke lectures as of Philosophie, Logicke, Rethoricke, & the Quadriuials. (Although the later I meane Arithmeticke, Musicke, Geometrie, and Astronomie, and with them all skill in the perfectiues are now small regarded in eyther of them) the Vniuersityes themselues doe allowe competent stipendes to such as reade the same, whereby they are sufficiently prouided for, touching the maintenaunce of their estates, and no lesse incouraged to be diligent in their functions. These professours in like sort haue all the rule of disputations and other schoole exercises, which are dayly vsed in common schooles seuerally assigned to eache of them, and such of their hearers as by their skil shewed

wed in the sayde disputacions, are thought to haue attayned any conuenient ryppenesse of knowledge, (according to the custome of other Uniuersities although not in like order) are permitted solemly to take their deserued degrees of schole in the same science, and facultie, wherin they haue spent their trauaile. From that tyme forwarde also, they vse such difference in apparell as becommeth their callings, tendeth vnto grauitie, & maketh them knowne to be called to some countenance. The first degree of all, is that of the generall Sophisters, frō whence when they haue learned more sufficiently the rules of Logicke, Rethoricke, and obtayned thereto competent skill in Philosophie, and in the Mathematicalles, they ascende hygher to the estate of Batchelers of arte. Frō thence also giuing their minds to more perfit knowledge in some or all ỹ other liberal sciences, and the tongues, they ryse at the last to be called Maisters of art, eche of them being at that time reputed for a Doctor in his facultie if he profesSe, but one of ỹ said sciēces, (besyde philosophie) or for his general skill, if he be exercised in them all. After this they are permitted to chose what other of the hygher studyes them lyketh to follow, whether it be Diuinity, Law, or Phisicke, so that beyng once Maisters of Arte, ỹ next degree if they follow Phisick, is the Doctorship belonging to that profession, and lykewyse in the study of the Law, if they bende their myndes to the knowledge of the same. But if they meane to go forward with Diuinitie, this is the order, vsed in that profession. First after they haue necessarily procēded maisters of Arte, they preach one sermon to the people in Englishe, and another to the Uniuersitie in Latin. They aunswere all comers also in their owne persons vnto two seuerall questions of Diuinity in the opē Scholes (at one time) for the space of two houres, & afterwarde reply twise against some other man, vpō a like number, and on two seuerall dayes in the same place: which beyng done wyth comendation, he receyueth the fourth degree, that is Bacheler of Diuinitie, but not before he hath bene mayster of Arte, by the space of seauen yeares, according to theyr statutes. The next & last degree of all, is the Doctorship after other three yeares, for the which he must once againe performe all such exercises & actes as are afore remembred, and then is he reputed able to gouerne and teach other, and lykewyse taken for a Doctor. Thus we see that from our enterance into the Uniuersity, vnto the last degree receiued is commonly eyghteene or twentie yeares, in which tyme if a Student hath not obteyned sufficient learning, there by to serue his owne turne, & benefite hys common wealth, let him neuer looke by tarying longer to come by any more.

A man maye if he will beginne his studye with the Lawe, or Phisicke, so sone as he commeth to the Uniuersity, if his knowledg in the tongues: and ryppenesse of iudgement serue therefore: which if he doe, then his first degree is Bacheler of Law, or Phisicke, and for the same he must perfourme such Actes in his owne science, as the Bachelers or Doctors of Diuinitie, do for their partes, ỹ onely sermons except, which belongeth not to his calling: but as these are not matters of such importance as may deserue any further tractation, I so will leaue them & go in hande with the rest.

There is moreouer, in euery house a Maister, who hath vnder him a president, and certeine Centors or Deanes, appointed to looke to the behauiour, & maner of the Studentes there, whom they punish very seuerely if they make any default, according to the quantitye & qualitye of their trespasses. Ouer eche Uniuersitie also, there is a seuerall Chauncelour, whose Offices are perpetual, howbeit their substitutes, whome we call Uicechauncelors, are chaunged euery yere, as are also the Proctors, Taskers, Maisters of the Greates & other officers, for the better maintenāce of their policie & estate. And thus much at this time of both our Uniuersities.

To these two also we maye in lyke sorte adde the thirde, which is at London (serueng onelye for such as studye the Lawes of the Realme,) where there are sundrye famous houses, of which three are called by the name of Innes of the Court, the reast of the Chauncery, and all buylded before time for the furtheraunce and commoditie of such as applye their minds vnto the cōmon Lawes. Out of these also come Schollers of greate fame, whereof the most part haue heretofore bene brought vp in one of ỹ aforesaide Uniuersities, & proue such commonly as in processe of time, rise vp (only thorow their profound skil) to great honor in the cōmon welth of England. They haue also degrees of learning among thē selues, & rules of discipline, vnder which they lyue most ciuilye in their houses, albeit that the younger sort of them abroade in the Greates, are scarce able to be bryded by any good order at all. Certes this errour was wont also greatly to raigne in Cābridge & Oxforde, but as it is well left in these two places, so in forreine Countryes it cannot yet be suppressed. Besides these Uniuernersities, also there are great number of Grammer scholes throwe out the Realme, and those very lyberally indued, for the better relefe of poore scholers, so that there are not many corporate townes now vnder the Queenes dominion, ỳ hath not one Gramer-schole at the least, with a sufficient liuing for a Mayster and Vsher, appointed to ỳ same. There are in lyke maner diuers collegiate churches, as Windsor, Wincester, Eaton, Westminster, and in the later three of those a great number of poore Schollers, daily maintayned by the liberalitie of the founders, with meate, bookes, and apparel, from whence after they haue bene well entered in the knowledge of the Latin and Greeke tongues, and rules of versifyng, they are sent to certeine especiall houses in eche Vniuersitye, where they are receyued and trayned vp, in the pointes of higher knowledge in their priuate halles, till they be adiudged meete to showe their faces in the Schooles, as I haue said already. And thus much haue I thought good to note of our Vniuersities, & lykewyse of Colledges in the same, whose names I wyl also set downe here, with those also of their founders, to the ende the zeale which they bare vnto learning may apeare, and their remembraunce neuer perish from among the wyse and learned.

Of Cities and townes, within the realme of Englande. Cap. 7.

26. Cities in Englande.

AS in olde time we read that there were 28. flamines and Archflamines in the south part of this Ile, and so many great cities vnder their iurisdiction, so in these our dayes there is but one or two fewer, & eache of them also vnder the Ecclesiasticall regiment of some one Bishop or Archbishop, who in spirituall cases haue the charge, and ouersight of ỹ same. So many cities therefore are there in Englande and Wales, as there be Bishoprickes and Archbishoprickes: for notwithstanding that Lichfielde and Couentry: and Bathe and Welles, doe seeme to extend the aforesayde number vnto nyne and twentie, yet neyther of these copies are to be accompted, but as one intier citie, and Sie of the bishop, sith one Bishoprycke can haue relation but vnto one Sie, and the sayd Sie be scituate but in one place, after which the bishop doth take his name. It appeareth by our olde and auncient hystories, that the cities of thys southerly portion haue bene of exceeding greatnesse and beautie, whereof some were buylded in the time of the Samotheās, and of which not a fewe in these our times are quite decayed, & the places where they stode woxne out of al remembrance. Such also for the most part as yet remayne are meruaylously altered, insomuch that whereas at the first they were large & ample, nowe are they come eyther vnto a very fewe houses, or appeare not to be much greater in comparison then poore and simple villages. Antoninus the most diligent writer of the thorow fares of Brytaine, noteth among other these auncient townes following, as Sitomagus (which he placeth in the way frō Norwitch as Leland supposeth wherein they went by Colchester to London) Nouiomagus that lyeth betweene Carleill and Cantorbury, within tenne myles east of London, and likewyse Neomagus, and Niomagus which take their names of their first founder Magus, the sonne of Samothes, and second king of the Celtes that reigned in this Iland. Of these moreouer Sir Thomas Eliot supposeth Neomagus to haue stood somewhere about Chester, and George Lilly in his booke of the names of auncient places, iudgeth Niomagus to be the verye same that we doe nowe call Buckingham. And as these & sundry other nowe perished toke theyr denomination of thys prince, so their are dyuers causes, which moue me to coniecture, that Salisbury it self doth rather take the first name Sarron the sonne of the sayde Magus, then of Cæsar, Caradoc or Seuerus as some of our writers doe imagine. But sith coniecturs are no verities & mine opinion is but one mans iudgement, I will not stande now vpon the proofe of this matter, least I shoulde seeme to take great paines in adding new coniectures vnto olde, in such wyse to deteyne the heades of my readers about these trifles, that otherwyse peraduenture woulde be farre better occupyed. To proceede therfore, as sone after the first inhabitation of this Iland, our Cities began no doubt to be buylded, and increased, so they ceased not to multiplye from tyme to tyme, till the lande was thorowly furnished, with hir conuenient numbers, whereof some at this present with their auncient names, doe still remaine in knowledge, though dyuers be doubted of, & many moe perished by continuance of time, and byolence of the enemie. I doubt not also but the least of these were comparable to the greatest of those which stand in our tyme, for sith that in those dayes the most part of the Iland, was reserued vnto pasture, the townes and villages eyther were not at all (but all sortes of people dwelled in the cities indifferentlye an Image, of which estate may yet be seene in Spaine) or at the lest wise stode not so thick, as they dyd afterward in the time of the Romaines,

As for Cair Dorme (another whereof I read likewise) it stood somewhere vpon Nen in Huntingdon shire, but nowe vnknowen, sith it was twise raced to the grounde, first by the Saxons, then by the Danes, so that the ruines therof are not extaunt to be seene. And in like sort I am ignoraunt where they stood, that are noted the far. It should seeme when these auncient cities flourished, that the same towne which we nowe call Saint Albons, did most of all excell: but chiefely in the Romaines time, and was nothing inferiour to London it self, but rather preferred before it, because it was newer, & a colony of the Romaines, wheras the other was old and ruinous, and inhabited only by the Britaines. Good notice hereof also is to be taken by Mathew paris, & other before him, out of whose wrytings, I haue thought good to note a fewe thinges whereby the maiesty of thys auncient citie, may appeare vnto posterity, and the former estate of Verlamcester not lie altogither, as it hath done hitherto raked vp in forgetfulnesse, throwe the negligence of such as might haue deserued better of theyr successours, by leauing the description thereof in a booke by it selfe, sith many particulers thereof were written to their hands, that nowe are lost and perished. Tacitus in the fourteenth booke of hys hystorie, maketh mencion of it, shewyng that in the rebellion of the Brytons, the Romaines there were myserably distressed, Eadem clades (sayth he) municipio Verolamio fuit, and herevpon Nennius in his Cataloge of cities, calleth it Cair Minucip, as I before haue noted. Ptolomy speaking of it, doth place it among the Caty euchlanes, but Antoninus maketh it one and twentie Italyan myles from London, placing Sullomaca nyne myle from thence, whereby it is euident, that Sullomaca stood very neere to Barnet, if it were not the same. Of the copasse of the walles of Verolamium there is yet some mencyon by the ruines, but of ỹ beauty of the citye it selfe, you shal partly vnderstand by ỹ which followeth at hand.

When Albane was martyred, Asclepiodotus was Legate in Britaine.

Sulomaca and Barnet all one, or not far in sunder.

In the time of king Edgar, it fell out that one Eldred was Abbot there, who being desirous to enlarge that house, it came into his mynde, to search about in the ruines of Verolamium, (which nowe was ouerthrowne by the fury of the Saxons & Danes) to see if he might there come by any curious peces of worke, wherewith to garnishe hys buylding taken in hand. To be short, he had no soner begonne to digge among the rubbis, but hee founde an exceeding number of Pillers, peces of Antique worke, threcholdes, dore frames, and sundry other peces of fine masonry for windowes and such lyke, very conuenient for his purpose. Of these also some were of porphirite stone, some of dyuers kyndes of marble, touch, and Alablaster, beside many curious deuises of harde mettall, in fynding whereof he thought himselfe an happy man, and his successe to be greatlye guyded by S. Albane: Besides these also he found sundry pyllers of Brasse, and socketes of Latton, al which he laide aside by great heapes, determinyng in the ende, I say, to laye the foundation of a newe Abbaie, but God so preuented his determinatiõ, that death toke him awaye, before his buylding was begon. After him succeded one Eadmerus, who prosequuted the doinges of Eldrede to the vttermost: and therefore not onely perused what he had left with great diligence, but also caused his pioners to searche yet farder, with in ỹ olde walles of Verolamium, where they not onely found infinite peces of excellent workemanship, but came at the last to certaine vaultes vnder the ground, in which stode dyuers Idolles, and not a fewe aultars, very superstitiously, & religiously adourned, as the Paganes left thẽ (belike) in tyme of necessytie. These Images were of sũdry mettals, & some of pure gold: their aultars likewise were rychly couered, all which ornamentes, Edmerus toke away, and not only conuerted them to other vse in his building, but also destroyed an innumerable sort of other pooles, whose estimation consisted in their formes: & substaunces could doe no seruice. He toke vp moreouer sundrye curious pottes, Jugges, and cruses of stone, & woode most artificially wrought, and carued, & that in such quantitye beside infinite store of fine houshold stuffe, as if the whole furniture of the city had bene brought thither of purpose to be hidden in those vaultes. In proceeding further he toke vp diuers pots of golde, syluer, brasse & glasse, whereof some were fylled with the ashes and bones of the Gentyles, & not a fewe with the copyes of the olde Brytons, and Romaine Emperours. All which vessels the sayde Abbot brake into peces, and melting the mettalle, he reserued it in lyke sorte for the garnysshing of hys church.

He

he founde lykewyse in a stone wall two olde bookes, wherof one conteined the rytes of the gentiles, about the sacrifices of their gods, the other as they now say, ỹ Martyrdome of S. Albane, both of thē written in old brittish letters, which eyther bycause no man then lyuing could read them, or for that they were not worth the kéeping, were both consumed to ashes, sauing that a fewe notes were first taken out of this later, concerning the death of their Albane. Thus much haue I thought good to note of the former beautie of Verolamium, whereof infinite other tokens haue béene found, since that tyme, and diuers within the memory of man, of passing workmanship, the lyke wherof hath no where else béene séene in anye ruynes wythin the compasse of the Ile, eyther for cost or quantitye of stuffe.

Furthermore where as dyuers are not a fraide to saye that the Thames came sometimes by thys citie, in déede it is nothing so, but that the Uerlume, (afterwarde called Were and the Mure) did or doth so (whatsoeuer Gildas talketh herof, whose bookes may be corrupted in that behalfe,) there is yet euident proofe to be confirmed by experience. But thus standeth the case. As those aforesayd workemen digged in those ruines, they happened oftentimes vpon Lempet shelles, péeces of rusty ancres, and Keles of great besselles, whereupon some by & by gathered that either the Thames or some arme of the Sea, did beate vpon that towne, not vnderstandyng that these thinges might aswell happen in great lakes and meres, whereof there was one adioyning to the north side of the citie, which lay thē vnwalled. This mere at the first belonged to the king, and thereby Offa in hys time did reape no small commoditie. It continued also vntill the time of Alfrise the seauenth Abbot of that house, who bought it out right of the king then liuing, & by excessiue charges dreined it so narrowly, that within a whyle he left it drie, bycause there was alwaies contention betwéene the monkes & the kings seruaunts, which fished on that water.

In these dayes there remayneth no maner mencion of this poole, but onelye in one streate, which yet is called fishpoole streate, whereof this may suffise, for the resolution of such men, as séeke rather to yéld to an inconuenience, then that their Gildas shoulde séeme to mistake thys ryuer.

Hauing thus digressed to giue some remēbraunce of the olde estate of Verolamium, it is now time to returne againe vnto my former purpose. Certes I woulde gladlye set downe with the names and number of the cities, all the townes & villages, in england and wales: but as yet I cannot come by thē, in such order as I woulde: howbeit the tale of our cities is some founde by the Bishopryckes, sith euery Sie hath such prerogatiue giuen vnto it, as to beare the name of a citie. Whose particular plots & models with their descriptiōs shal insue, if it may be brought to passe, that ỹ cutters can make dispach of thē before this hystory be published. Of townes and villages likewise thus much will I say, that there were greater store in olde tyme then at this present, & thys I note out of dyuers recordes, charters, & donations (made in times past, vnto sundry religious houses, as Glessenburye, Abbandon, Ramsey, Ely, and such like) that there were many townes and villages, whereof at this present I fynde not so much as the ruines. Lelande in sundrye places complayneth likewise of the decaie of parysches in great cities and townes, missing in some shire, or eyght, or twelue churchs, of all which he giueth particuler notice. For albeit ỹ the Saxōs builded many townes & villages, and the Normans well mo: yet since the first hundred yeares, after the latter conquest, they haue gone againe so fast againe to decaye, that the auncyent number of them is very much abated. Rauulphe the Monke of Chester, telleth of a generall suruey, made in the fourth of the reigne of William Conquerour, surnamed the Bastarde, wherein it was founde that (notwithstanding ỹ Danes had ouerthrowne a great many) there were to the number of 52000. townes, 45002. parish churches, and 75000. Knightes fées, whereof the clergy helde 28015. He addeth moreouer that there were dyuers other buylded since that tyme, wythin the space of an hundred yeares after the comming of the Bastarde, as it were in lieu or recompence of those that William Rufus pulled downe for the erection of his newe Forrest. Howbeit if the assertions of such as wryte in our tyme concerning this matter, eyther is or ought to be of any credite, in this behalfe, you shall not finde, aboue 17000. townes and villages in the whole, which is little more then a fourth part, of the aforesayd number, yf it be thorowly scanned. But to leaue this lamentable discourse of so notable an inconuenience (growing by inrochyng & ioyning of house to house, and lande to lande, whereby the inhabitaunts of any country are deuoured and eate vp.) It is so that our soyle being deuided into Champaigne ground & woodlande, the houses of the first lye vniformely buylded in euery towne togither with stretes & lanes, whereas in the woodlande countries (except here and there in great market townes) they stande scattered abroad, eache one dwelling in the midst of his owne occupying. And as in euery one of the first, there are comonly three hundred or foure hundred families or mansion houses, and two thousande communicantes, or peraduenture moe: so in the other we finde not often aboue fourtie or fiftie housholdes, & two hundred communicantes, whereof the greatest part neuertheles are very poore folkes, oftentymes without all maner of occupying, sith the grounde of the parishe is often gotten vp into a fewe mens handes, yea sometimes into the tennure of two or three, wherby the reast are compelled eyther to be hyred seruaunts vnto the other, or else to begge their bread in misery from doore to doore. A great number complayne of thincrease of pouertie, but few men do see the verye rote from whence it doeth procede, yet the Romaines founde it out, when they florished, and therefore prescribed limites to euery mans tenure and occupying. Homere commendeth Achilles for ouerthrowing of fiue and twentie cities, but in myne opinion Ganges is much better preferred by Suidas for buylding of three score in Inde, where he dyd plant himselfe. I coulde if nede required set downe in this place, the number of religious houses and Monasteries with the names of their founders that haue bene in this Iland, but sith it is a thing of small importaunce, I passe it ouer as impertinent to my purpose. Yet herin I will commende manye of the monasticall votaries, especiallye Monkes, for that they were authors of many goodly borowes and endwares, neare vnto their dwellinges, although otherwyse they pretended to be men separated from the world. But alas their couetous mindes one waye in enlarging their reuenues, & carnall intent an other appeared herein to to much, for being bolde from tyme to tyme to visite their tennants, they wrought oft great wickednesse, & made those endwares litle better the bordelhouses, especially where Nonries were farre of, or else no safe accesse vnto the. But what doe I spende my tyme in the rehearsall of these filthinesses, woulde to God the memorie of them might perishe with the malefactours. My purpose was also at thend of this chapter to haue set downe a table of the Parishe churches and market townes thorowout all England and Wales, but sith I can not performe the same as I woulde, I am inforced to giue ouer my purpose, yet by these fewe that insue you shall easily se what order I woulde haue vsed according to the shyres.

And these I had of a friende of myne, by whose trauayle and hys maisters excellent charges I doubt not, but my country men care long shall se all Englande set forth in seuerall shyres after the same maner that Ortelius hath dealt wyth other countries of the mayne, to the great benefite of our nation and euerlasting fame of the aforesayde parties.

Of Castelles and holdes. Cap. 8.

THere haue bene in tymes past great store of Castelles and places of defence within the realme of Englande, of which some were buylded by the Brytons, many by the Romaynes, Saxons, and Danes, but most of all by the Barons of the realme, in & about the tyme of king Stephen, who licensed eache of them to buylde so many as they would vpon their owne demeasnes, hoping therby that they would haue employed their

vse to his aduauntage and commoditie, but finally when he sawe that they were rather fortified against hymselfe in the ende, then vsed in his defence, he repented all to late of his inconsiderate dealing, sith now there was no remedie but by force for to subdue them. After his decease king Henry the seconde came no soner to the crowne, but he called to minde the inconuenience which his predecessour had suffred and he himselfe might in time sustaine by those fortifications. Therefore one of the first things he dyd was an attempt to race and deface the most parte of these holdes. Certes he thought it better to hazarde the méeting of the enimie nowe and then in the playne field, then to liue in perpetuall feare of those houses, and the rebellion of his Lordes vpon euery light occasion conceyued, who then were full so strong as he, if not more strong, and that made them the redier to withstande & gainesay many of those procéedinges, which he and his successours from time to tyme intended. Hereupon therfore he caused more then aleauen hundred of their castelles to be raced and ouerthrowne, whereby the power of his nobilitie was not a litle restrained. Sithence that time also not a few of those which remained, haue decayed of themselues: so that at this present, there are very few or no castels at all maintayned within England, sauing only vpō the coasts and marches of the countrie for the better kéeping backe of the forrein enemie, whensoeuer he shall attempt to enter and annoye vs.

The most prouident Prince that euer reigned in this lande for the fortificatiō therof agaynst all outwarde enemies, was the late Prince of famous memory king Henry the eyght: sith beside that he repaired most of such as were alreadie standing, he buylded sundrie out of the grounde. For hauing shaken of the more then seruile yoke of the Popish tyrannie, and espying that the Emperour was offended for hys dyuorce from Quéene Catherine his aunt: and therto that the Frenche king had coupled the Dolphin his sonne with the Popes neece: and maryed his daughter to the king of Scottes, (whereby he had cause more iustly to suspect then safely to trust any one of the all as Lambert saith) he determined to stand vpon his owne defence, and therefore with no small spéede, and like charge, he buylded sundrie Blockehouses, Castelles, and Platformes vpon dyuers frontiers of his realme, but chiefely the east and southeast partes of England, whereby no doubt he dyd very much qualifie the conceyued grudges of his aduersaries and vtterly put of their hatty purpose of inuasiō. And thus much briefly for my purpose at this present. For I néede not to make any long discourse of castels, sith it is not the nature of a good Englishman to regarde to be caged vp in a cope, & hedged in with stone walles, but rather to méete wyth hys enemie in the playne fielde at handstrokes, where he may trauaile his grounde, chose his plot, and vse the benefite of sunne shine, winde & wether, to his best aduauntage and commoditie. As for those tales that go of Belton castell, how it shall saue all England on a day, & likewise the brag of a rebellious Barron in olde time that sayde in contempt (of king Henry the thirde, as I gesse)

If I were in my Castell of Bungey Vpon the water of Waueney,
I woulde not set a button by the king of Cockney.

I repute them but as toyes, the first méere vaine, the seconde fondly vttered if any such thing were sayde, as many other wordes are and haue béene spoken of lyke holdes, (as Wallingford. &c.) but nowe growen out of memorie, and with small losse not hearde of among the common sort.

Of Pallaces belonging to the prince, and court of Englande. Cap. 9.

IT lyeth not in me to set downe exactly the number and names of the palaces, belonging to the Prince, nor to make any description of hir Graces Court, sith my callyng is and hath béene such, as that I haue scarcely presumed to pépe in at hir gates, much lesse then haue I aduentured to serch out & know the estate of those houses, and what magnificent behauiour is to to séene wythin them. Yet thus much will I saye generallye of all the houses and honours appertaining vnto hir grace, that they are buylded, eyther of square stone or bricke, or else of both, & therunto although their capacity and hugenesse be not so monstrous, as the lyke of dyuers Forren Princes, are to be séene in ỹ maine, yet are they so curious, nete, and commodious as any of them, both for conueighaunce of offices and lodginges, and excellencye of scituation, which is not the least thing to bée considered of. Those that were buylded before the tyme of King Henry the eyght, retaine to these daies the shew & Image of the auncient kinde of workmanship vsed in this lande, but such as he erected doe represent another maner of paterne, which as they are supposed to excell all the rest that he founde standing in thys Realme, so they are & shal-be a perpetuall p̄cident, vnto those that doe come after, to followe in their wo̲rkes, and buyldinges of impo̲rtaunce. Certes Masonry did neuer better flourish in England then in hys tyme, and albeit that in these dayes there be manye goodly houses erected in the sundry quarters of thys Iland, yet they are rather curious to the eye, then substaunciall fo̲r continuaunce, where as such as hée did set vp excel in both, and therefo̲re may iustly be p̄ferred aboue al the rest. The names of those which come now to my rémebrance, are these. First of al White hall at the west ende of London (which is taken fo̲r the most large and p̄incipall of all the rest) was begun by Cardinall wolsey, and enlarged and finished by king Henry ỳ eyght. Méere vnto ỳ is. S. James, sometime a Nonry, builded likewise by the same p̄nce. Hir grace hath also Otelande, Asheridge, Hatfelde, Hauering, Enuelde, Richemond, Hampton court, (begonne sometime by Cardinall Wolsey, and finished by hir Father) and therevnto Woodstocke, erected by king Henry the seconde, in which the Quéenes maiesty delighteth greatly to so̲iourne, notwythstanding that in time past it was the place of hir captiuity, when it pleased God to try hir by affliction and calamity.

Fo̲r strength Windlesho̲r o̲r Winso̲re, is supposed to be the chiefe, a castell buyloed in tyme past by king Arthur, as it is thought, & repayred by Edwarde the third, who erected also a notable Colledge there. After him diuers of his successours, haue bestowed excéding charges vpon the same, which notwithstanding are farre surmounted, by the Quéenes maiesty nowe lyuing, who hath appointed huge sommes of money to be employed vpon the o̲rnature, and alteration of the mould, acco̲rding to the fourme of buylding vsed in our dayes. Such also hath béene the estimatiõ of this place, that diuers kings haue not onely béene enterred there but also made it the chiefe house of assemblye, and creation of the Knightes, of the honourable o̲rder of the Garter, then the which there is nothing in this lande, mo̲re magnificent and stately. Grénewiche was first buyloed, by Humfrey Duke of Glocester, vpon the Thames side 4. miles east from London, in ỳ tyme of Henry the first, & called Plesance. Afterwards it was gretly inlarged by king Edwarde the fourth, garnysshed by king Henry the seuenth, and finallye made perfite by king Henry the eyght, the onely phenix of his time, fo̲r fine and curious masonrye. Not farre from this is Dartfo̲rde, and not much distaunt also from the south side of that sayd streame, sometime a Nonnery, but now a very cõmodious Pallace, wherevnto it was also cõuerted by king Henry ỳ eight. Eltham as I take it, was buyloed by king Henry ỳ third if not befo̲re. There are beside these mo̲reouer dyuers other, but what shal I néede to take vpon me to repeate all, & tell what houses the Quéenes maiestie hath, sith all is hirs, and when it pleaseth hir in the cõmer season, to recreate hir selfe abo̲roade, and viewe the estate of the countrey, euery noble mans house is hir Pallace, where shée continueth during pleasure, and till shée returne againe to some of hir owne, in which she remaineth so long as pleaseth hir.

The court of England which necessarily is holden alwayes where the P̄nce lyeth, is in these dayes one of the most renowmed and magnificent courtes, that are to be found in Europe. Fo̲r whether you regard the ryche and infinite furniture of houshoolde, o̲rder of Officers, o̲r the interteinement of such strãgers as dailye reso̲rte vnto the same, you shall not finde many equall therevnto, much lesse one excelling it, in any maner of wise. I myght here if I woulde (o̲r had sufficient disposition of matter conceyued of the same) make a large discourse, of the honourable po̲rts of such graue councellours, and noble personages, as giue their dailye attendance vpon the Quéenes maiesty there. I could in lyke so̲rte set fo̲rth a singular commendation of the vertuous beautie, o̲r beautiful vertues of such Ladies and Gentlewomen, as waite vpon hir person, betwéene whose amiable countenaunces and cestlinesse of attyre, there séemeth to be such a daily conflict and contention, as that it is verye difficulte fo̲r me to gesse, wheter of the twaine, shal beare away the p̄cheminence. This farder is not to be omitted to the singular commendation of both so̲rts & sexes of our Courtyers here in Englande, that there are verye fewe of them, which haue not the vse and skyll of sundry speaches, beside an excellent vaine of wryting, befo̲re time not regarded. Truely it is a rare thing with vs nowe, to here of a courtier which hath but his own language, & to say how many Gentlewomen & Ladies there are that beside sound knowledge of the Gréeke & Latin tongues, are therto no lesse skilful in ỳ Spanish Italian & French, o̲r in some one of them, it resteth not in me: sith I am perswaded, that as the noble men, & gentlemen, doe surmount in this behalf, so these come very litle o̲r nothyng at all behind thẽ, fo̲r their parts, which industry god continue.

Of th Court

Beside these thinges I coulde in like so̲rte set downe the wayes and meanes whereby

our auncient Ladies of the Court doe ſhun & auoyde yolenelle, ſome of them exercyſing their fingers with the nædle, other in cauleworke, diuers in ſpinning of ſilke, ſome in continuall reading either of the holye ſcriptures, or hyſtories of our owne, or forren nations about vs, whileſt the yonger ſort in ỹ meane time, applie their Lutes, Citharnes, prickeſong, and all kindes of Muſick, which they vſe only for recreation and ſolace ſake, when they haue leyſure, and are frée from attendaunce vpon the Quénes maieſtye, or ſuch as they belong vnto.

I myght finally deſcribe the large allowances in offices, and yerely lyueries, & thervnto the great plentie of Golde and Syluer Plate, the ſeuerall pæces whereof, are cómonlye ſo great and maſſye, and the quanty therof ſo abundantly ſeruing all the houſholde, that if Midas were nowe liuing and once againe put to his choiſe, I thinke hée coulde aſke no more, or rather not halfe ſo much, as is there to be ſæne and vſed. But I paſſe ouer to make ſuch nædeleſſe diſcourſes, reſoluing my ſelfe, that euen in this alſo the exceéding mercy and louing kindeneſſe of God doth wonderfullye appeare towardes vs, in that he hath ſo largely induced vs with theſe his ſo ample benefites.

In ſome great Princes Courtes, it is a woorlde to ſée what lewde behauiour is vſed among dyuers of thoſe that reſorte vnto the ſame, & what whoredõe, ſwearing, rybaldry atheiſme, dicing, carding, carowſing, drunkenneſſe, Glotony, quareling, and ſuch lyke inconueniences, doe daily take holde, and ſometimes euen among thoſe, in whoſe eſtates ſuch behauiour is leaſt conuenient: all which inormities, are eyther vtterly expelled out of the Court of Englande, or elſe ſo quallified by the diligent endeuour of the chiefe officers of hir graces houſholde, that ſeldome are any of theſe thinges apparantly ſæne there, with out due reprehenſion, & ſuch ſeuere correction, as belongeth to thoſe treſpaſſes. Finally to auoyde yoleneſſe, and preuent ſundrye tranſgreſſions, otherwiſe likelye to be commytted and done, ſuch order is taken, that euerye office hath eyther a Byble, or the bookes of the Actes and monumentes of the Church of Englande, or both, beſide ſome hyſtoryes and Chronicles lying therin, for the exerciſe of ſuch as come into the ſame: whereby the ſtraunger that entereth into the Court of Englande vpon the ſodeine, ſhall rather imagine himſelfe to come into ſome publicke ſchoole of ỹ vniuerſities, where many giue care to one that readeth vnto thẽ, then into a Princes Pallace, if you conferre this with thoſe of other nations. Would to god al honorable perſonages woulde take example of hir Graces Godly dealing in this behalfe, and ſhewe their conformitie, vnto theſe hir ſo good beginninges: which if they woulde, then ſhoulde manye grieuous enormities (where with G D D is highelye diſpleaſed) be cut of and reſtreined, which nowe doe reigne exceédingly, in moſt Noble and Gentlemens houſes, wherof they ſée no paterne within hir Graces gates.

The firme peace alſo that is mainteyned within a certaine compaſſe of the Princes Pallace, is ſuch, as is nothing inferiour to that we ſée daily practized in the beſt gouerned holds, & fortreſſes. And ſuch is the ſeuere puniſhment of thoſe that ſtrike, wythin the limites prohibited, that without all hope of mercy, benefite of clergie, or ſanctuary, they are ſure to loſe their ryght handes, at a ſtroke, and that in very ſolemne maner, the fourme whereof I will ſet downe, and then make an ende of this Chapter, to deale with other matters.

At ſuch time therefore as the party tranſgreſſing is conuicted by a ſufficient enqueſt impanelled for the ſame purpoſe, and the tyme come of therecution of the ſentence, the Sergeaunt of the kings woodyarde prouydeth a ſquare blocke, which he bringeth to ſome appointed place, & therwith al a great béetle, ſtaple, and cordes, wherwith to faſten the hande of the offendor, vnto the ſayde blocke, vntill the whole circumſtance of his execution be perfourmed. The Yoman of the Scullary lykewyſe for the tyme beyng doth prouide a great fire of coales harde by the blocke, wherein the fearing yrons are to be made readie againſt the chiefe Surgeon to the Prince or his Deputie ſhall occupie the ſame. Upon him alſo doth the ſergeaunt or chief farrour attend with thoſe yrons, whoſe office is to deliuer them to the ſayd Surgeõ when he ſhalbe readie by fearing to vſe the ſame. The grome of the Salary for the time beyng or hys Deputie is furthermore appointed to be readie with vineger and colde water, and not to depart from the place vntill the arme of the offender be bounde vp & fully dreſſed. And as theſe thinges are thus prouided ſo ỹ Sergeaunt Surgeon is bound from time to time to be readie to execute his charge, and ſeare the ſtump, when the hande is taken from it. The ſergeaunt of the ſellar is at hande alſo with a cup of red wine, and likewyſe the chiefe officer of the pantry with Manchet bread to giue vnto the ſayde partie, after the execution done, and the ſtomp ſeared, as the ſergeaunt of the Ewery is with clothes, wherein to winde and wrap vp the the arme, the poman of the pultrie with a cocke to lay vnto it, the poman of the Chaũdrie with seared clothes, and finally the maister cooke or his Deputie with a sharpe dressing knyfe, which he deliuereth at the place of execution to the Sargeaunt of the Larder, who doth holde it vpright in hys hande, vntill the execution be perfourmed, by the publicke Officer appointed therevnto. And this is the maner of punishment ordayned for those that stryke within the Princes pallace, or limites of the same. The lyke priuilege is almost giuen to churches and churchyardes, although in maner of punishment great difference doe appeare. For he that bralleth or quarrelleth in eyther of them, is by and by suspended ab ingressu ecclesiæ, vntil he be absolued, as he is also that striketh wyth ỹ fist, or layeth violent handes vpon any whome so euer. But yf he happen to smite wyth staffe, dagger, or any maner of weapon, and the same be sufficiently founde by the Verdict of twelue men at his arrainement, besides excommunication, he is sure to lose one of hys eares wythout all hope of recouerye. But if he be such a one as hath bene twyse condemned and executed, whereby he hath now none eares, then is he marked with an hote yron vpon the cheke, & by the letter F, which is seared into his flesh, he is frõ thencefoorth noted as a common barratour, & fray maker, and thereunto remayneth excommunicate, till by repentaunce he deserue to be absolued.

Of the maner of Buylding and furniture of our houses. Cap. 10.

The greatest parte of our buylding in the cities and good townes of Englande consisteth onely of timber, for as yet fewe of the houses of the comminalty (except here & there in the west country townes) are made of stone, although they may in my opinion in diuers other places be builded so good cheape of the one as of the other. In olde tyme the houses of the Brytons were slitely set vppe with a few postes and many radles, the like whereof almost is to be seene in the fenny countries vnto this day, where for lacke of wood they are inforced to continue this auncient maner of buylding. It is not in vayne therefore in speaking of buylding to make a distinction betweene the playne and woodye countrie, for as in these, our houses are commonly strong & wel timbered, so that in many places, there are not aboue 6. or nine pnches betweene studde and studde, so in the open & champaine soyles they are inforced for want of stuffe to vse no studdes at all, but only rapsines, groundselles, transomes, and vpright principalles, with here and there an ouerthwart post in their walles, whereunto they fasten their Splintes or radles, and then cast it all ouer wyth clay to keepe out the winde, which otherwyse wouldе anoy them. In like sort as euery country house is thus apparelled on the out side, so is it inwardly deuided into sundrie rowmes aboue and beneth, and where plentie of wood is, they couer thẽ with tyles, otherwyse with straw, sedge, or rede, except some quarry of slate be neare hande, from whence they haue for theyr money, so much as may suffice them. The clay wherewith our houses are empanelled is eyther white, redde, or blewe, and of these the first doth participate very much with the nature of our chalke, the seconde is called lome, but the thirde eftsones changeth coulour so sone as it is wrought, notwithstanding that it loke blew when it is throwne out of the pit. Of chalke also we haue our excellent whyte lime made in most places, wherewith we stricke ouer our clay workes & stone walles, in Cities, good Townes, riche fermers, and gentlemens houses: otherwyse in stede of chalke (where it wanteth for it is so scant that in some places it is solde by the pounde) they are compelled to burne a certaine kind of redde stone, as in Wales, and else where other stones, as I haue seene by experience. Within their dores also such as are of ability doe ofte make their flowers, and parget of fine Alabaster burned, which they cal plaster of Paris, whereof in some places we haue great plentie, & that very profitable agaynst the rage of fire. In plastering likewise of our fayrest houses ouer our heades, we vse to lay first a Laire or two of white morter tempered with heire vpon Lathes, which are nayled one by an other, (or sometimes vpõ rede or wickers more daungerous for fyre and made fast here and there with sappelathes for falling downe) and finallye couer all with the aforesayde plaster, which beside the delectable whiteneſſe of the stuffe it selfe, is layed on so euen and smouthly as nothing in my iudgement can be done with more exactneſſe. This also hath bene cõmon in england, contrarie to the customes of all other Nations, and yet to be seene (for example in most stretes of London) that many of our greatest houses haue outwardly bene very simple and plaine to sight, which inwardly haue bene able to receyue a Duke with his whole trayne and lodge them at their ease. Hereby moreouer it is come to passe, that the frontes

of our ſtrẽtes haue not bẽne ſo vniforme & orderly buylded as thoſe of forrain cities, where to ſaye truth, the vtterſide of theyr manſions and dwellings, haue oft more coſt beſtowed vpon them, then all the reaſt of the houſe, which are often very ſimple and vneaſie within, as experience doth confirme. Of olde tyme our country houſes in ſtẽde of glaſſe dyd vſe much lattis and that made eyther of wicker or fine riftes of oke in chekerwyſe. I reade alſo that ſome of the better ſorte in and before the tymes of the Saxons did make panels of horne in ſtẽde of glaſſe, and fyre them in wodden calmes, but as horne is quite layde downe in euery place, ſo our lattiſes are alſo growne into leſſe vſe, bycauſe glaſſe is come to be ſo plentifull, & within a very little ſo good cheape as the other. Heretofore alſo the houſes of our princes and noble men were often glaſed wyth Beril, (an example wherof is yet to be ſeene in Sudley caſtell) & in diuers other places, with fine chriſtall, but this eſpecially in the time of ỳ Romaines, wherof alſo ſome fragmentes haue bẽne taken vp in olde ruines. But nowe theſe are not in vſe, ſo that onely the cleareſt glaſſe is moſt eſtẽmed for we haue diuers ſortes ſome brought out of Burgundie, ſome out of Normandy, much out of Flaunders, beſide that which is made in Englande ſo good as the beſt, and eache one that may, will haue it for his building. Moreouer the manſion houſes of our country townes & villages, (which in champaine groũde ſtande altogither by ſtrẽtes, and ioyning one to an other, but in woodelande ſoyles diſperſed here and there, eache one vpon the ſeuerall groundes of their owners) are buylded in ſuche ſort generally, as that they haue neither dairy, ſtable, nor brudhouſe, annexed vnto them vnder the ſame roffe (as in many places beyonde the ſea) but all ſeparate from the firſt, and one of them from an other. And yet for all this, they are not ſo farre diſtant in ſunder, but that the goodman lying in his bed may lightly heare what is done in eache of them with eaſe, and call quickly vnto his meney if any daunger ſhoulde attache hym. The auncient maners & houſes of our gentlemen are yet & for the moſt part of ſtrong tymber. Howbeit ſuch as be lately buylded, are commõly either of bricke or harde ſtone, their rowmes large and ſtately and houſes of office farder diſtaunt frõ their lodginges. Thoſe of the Nobility are likewiſe wrought with bricke and hard ſtone as prouiſion may beſt be made: but ſo magnificent and ſtately as the baſeſt houſe of a Barren doth often match with ſome honours of princes in olde tyme, ſo that if euer curious buylding dyd flouriſh in Englande, it is in theſe our dayes, wherein our workemen excell, and are in maner comparable in ſkill with olde Vitruuius, and Serlo. The furniture of our houſes alſo exceedeth, and is growne in maner euen to paſſing delicacie: & herein I do not ſpeake of the Nobilitie and gentrie onely, but euen of the loweſt ſorte that haue any thing at all to take to. Certes in Noble mens houſes it is not rare to ſee abundance of Arras, riche hangings of Tapiſtry, ſiluer veſſell, and ſo much other plate, as may furniſh ſũdrie cupbordes to the ſumme oftẽtimes of a thouſand or two thouſande pounde at the leaſt: wherby the value of this and the reaſt of their ſtuffe doth grow to be ineſtimable. Likewiſe in the houſes of Knightes, Gentlemẽ, Marchauntmen, and ſome other wealthie Citizens, it is not geſon to beholde generallye their great prouiſion of Tapiſtrie, Turkye worke, Pewter, Braſſe, fine linen, and therto coſtly cupbordes of plate worth fiue or fyre hundred pounde, to be demed by eſtimation. But as herein all theſe ſortes doe farre excẽde their elders, and predeceſſours, ſo in time paſt, the coſtly furniture ſtayed there, whereas now it is deſcended yet lower, euen vnto the inferiour Artificers and moſt Fermers, who haue learned alſo to garniſh their cubbordes with plate, their beddes with tapiſtrie, and ſilke hanginges, and their tables with fine naperie, whereby the wealth of our countrie doth infinitely appeare. Neyther do I ſpeake this in reproch of any man God is my Iudge, but to ſhew that I doe reioyce rather to ſee how God hath bleſſed vs with hys good giftes, and to behold how that in a time wherein all thinges are growen to moſt exceſſiue prices, we do yet finde the meanes to obtayne and atchieue ſuch furniture as heretofore hath bẽne vnpoſſible. There are olde men yet dwelling in the village where I remayne, which haue noted three things to be marueylouſly altered in Englande within their ſound remembraunce. One is the multitude of chimnies lately erected, wheras in their yong dayes there were not aboue two or three in ſo many in moſt vplandiſh townes of the realme, (the religious houſes, & mannour places, of their Lordes alwayes excepted, & peraduenture ſome great perſonages) but eache one made his fire againſt a rere doſſe, in the hall where he dined and dreſſed his meate. The ſecond is ỳ great amendement of lodginge, for ſayde they our fathers & we our ſelues haue lyen full oft vpon ſtraw pallettes couered onely with a ſheete vnder couerlettes made of dagiwain or hopharlots

Three thinges greatly amended in Englande.

Chimnies

Hardlodging.

(I vſe

(I vse their owne termes) and a good round logge vnder their heades in steade of a boulster. If it were so that our fathers or ỳ good man of the house, had a matteres or flockbed, and thereto a sacke of chafe to rest hys heade vpon, he thought himselfe to be as well lodged as the Lorde of the towne, so well were they contented. Pillowes sayde they were thought méete onely for women in childebed. As for seruants if they had any shéete aboue them, it was well, for seldome had they any vnder their bodies, to kéepe them from the pricking strawes, that ranne oft thorow the canuas, and raced their hardened hides.

Furniture of houshold.

The thirde thinge they tell of, is the exchange of tréene platters into pewter, and woodē spoones into siluer or tin. For so cómon were al sorts of tréene vessellies in old time, ỳ a man should hardly find four peces of pewter (of which one was peraduenture a salte) in a good Farmers house, and yet for al this frugaltie (if it may so be iustly called) they were scarse able to lyue and paye their rentes, at their dayes without selling of a cow, or a horse, or more, although they payde but foure pounds at the vttermost by the yeare. Such also was their pouerty, that if a Fermour or husbundman had béene at the alehouse, a thing greatly vsed in those dayes, amongst fyue or seauen of hys neyghbours, and there in a brauery to shewe what store he had, did dash downe his purse, and therein a noble or fyue shillings in siluer vnto them, it was very likely that all the rest could not lay downe so much against it: wheras in my tyme although peraduenture foure pounde of olde rent be improued to fourty or fiftye pound, yet will the farmer thinke his gaines very small toward the middest of his terme, if he haue not fyue or seauen yeres rent lying by him, therewith to purchase a newe lease, beside a faire garnisshe of pewter on his cowborde, thrée or foure feather beddes, so many couerlettes and carpettes of Tapistry, a siluer salte, a bowle for wine (if not an whole neast) and a dussen of spoones, to furnisshe vp the sute. Thys also he taketh to bée his owne cleare, for what stocke of money soeuer he gathereth in all his yeares, it is often séene, that the landlorde will take such order with him for the same, when he renueth his lease (which is commonly eight or ten yeares before it be expyred, sith it is nowe growen almost to a custome, that if he come not to his his lorde so long before, another shall step in for a reuersion, & so defeate him out right) that it shall neuer trouble him more then the heare of his bearde, when the barber hath washed and shauen it from his chinne.

This was in the time of generall poleneste.

Of Fayres and Markettes. Cap. 11.

There are as I take it, few great townes in England, that haue not their wéekely Markets, in which al maner of prouision for houshold, is to be bought and soulde, for ease and benefite of the countrey rounde about, wherby as it commeth to passe that no buyer shall make any great iourney in the pursueighaunce of his necessities, so no occupier shall haue occasion to trauayle farre of with his commodities, except it be to séeke for the highest prices, which commonly are nére vnto great cities, where rounde and spédiest vtteraunce is alwayes to be had. And as these haue béene in tymes past erected for the benefite of the realme, so are they in many places to to much abused: for the relief and ese of the buyer, is not so much intended in them, as the benefite of the seller. Neyther are the Maiestrats for the most part so carefull in their offices, as of ryght and dewtye they shoulde bée, for in most of these markettes neyther sizes of breade nor orders for goodnesse of graine and other commodities, that are brought thither to be soulde are any whit loked vnto, but eache one suffered to sell or set vp, what, and how himselfe lysteth, & this is one euident cause of darth in time of great abundance.

I coulde if I woulde exemplifie in many, but I will touch no one particularly. Certes it is rare to sée in any market the assize of breade well kept according to the statute, howbeit I finde, in lieu thereof such headdy ale and béere in most of them, as for the mightynesse thereof among such as séeke it out, is commonlye called huffecappe, the madde Dogge, father whoresonne, Aungels foode, Dragons milke &c. And this is more to be noted, that when one of late fell by Gods prouidence, into a troubled conscience, after he had considered well of his reckelesse lyfe, and daungerous estate: another thinking belyke to change his colour and not his mind, carped hym straight to the strongest ale, as to the next Phisition. It is incredible to say how our Maultbugges lug at this liquor, euen as pigges shoulde lye in a rowe, lugging at their dames teates, tyll they lye still againe, & be not able to wagge. Neyther did Romulus and Remus sucke their shé Wolfe Lupa, wyth such eger & sharpe deuotion as these men, hale at huscappe, tyll they be read as cockes, and litle wyser thē their combes, But howe am I fallen from the mercate, into the Ale house. In returning therfore vn-

to my purpose, I find therfore that in corne great abuse is daily suffered, to the great preiudice of the towne & countrey, especially the poore artificer & householder, which tilleth no lande, but labouring all the weeke to buy a bushell or two of corne on the mercate daie, can there haue none for his money, because bodgers, loders, and common carryers of Graine, doe not onely buy vp all, but giue aboue the price, to be serued of great quantities. Shall I go any farther, well I will saye yet a little more, and somewhat by mine owne experience. At Myghelmas tyme poore men must sell their graine that they may paye their rentes. So long then as the poore man hath to sell, ryche men will bringe out none, but rather buy vppe that which the poore bring vnder pretence of seede corne, because one wheat often sowen without chaunge of seede, will sone decay and be conuerted into darnell. For this cause therefore they must needes buy in the markettes, though they be twentye myles of and where they be not knowne, promising there to send so much to their next market, to performe I wote not when.

If this shift serue not (neither doth the fore bie alwayes one tracke for feare of a mare) they wil compound wt some one of the towne where the market is holden, who for a pot of hufcappe or mery go downe, will not let to buy it for them, & that in his owne name. Or else they wage one poore man or other, to become a bodger, & thereto get him a lycence vpon some forged surmize, which being done, they will feede him with money, to buy for them till he hath filled their loftes, and then if he can doe any good for himselfe so it is, if not, they will giue him somewhat for his paines at this tyme, and reserue him for another yeare. How many of these proud ers stumble vppon blynde crekes at the sea coft, I wote not well, but that some haue so done vnder other mens winges, the cause is to playne. But who dare finde faulte with thē, when they haue once a lycence, though it be but to serue a meane Gentlemans house with corne, who hath cast vp al his tillage bicause he boasteth how he can buy his graine in ỹ market better cheape, thē he can sow his lād, as the rich grasier often doth also vpon ỹ like deuise. If any man come to buy a bushel or two for his expences vnto ỹ market crosse, aunswere is made, forsooth here was one euen nowe that badde me money for it, and I hope he will haue it. And to saye the truth, these bodgers are faire chapmē, for there are no more words with them, but let me see it, what shall I giue you, knitte it vp, I will haue it, go carry it to such a chamber. But to proceede by this tyme the poore occupier hath all solde his croppe for neede of money, beyng readye paraduenture to buy againe ere longe. And nowe is the whole sale of corne in the great occuppers handes, who hytherto haue thresshed lyttle or none of their own, but bought vp of other men, so much as they coulde come by. Henceforth also they begin to sel, not by the quarter or loade at the first, but by the bushell or two, or an horselode at the moft, therby to be seene to keepe the market, eyther for a shewe, or to make men eger to buy, and so as they maye haue it for money, not to regarde what they pay. And thus corne wareth deare, but it will be dearer the next market day. It is possible also that they mylyke the price in the begynnyng for whole yeare insuing, as men supposing that corne will be litle worthy for this, and of better price in the next yeare. Herevpon then will they thresshe out three partes of the olde corne, toward the latter ende of the sommer, when newe commeth a pace to hande, and cast the same into the fourth vnthresshed, where it shall lye vntyll the next Spryng, or peraduenture tyl it must and putrifie. Or else they will gyrde their sheues of by the band and stacke it vp of newe in lesse roume to thende it may not onely appeare lesse in quantity, but also giue place to the corne that is yet to come into the barne, or growing the field. If there happen to be such plentye in the market vpon any market day, that they can not sell at their owne price, then will they set it vp in some friendes house, against an other or the thirde day, and not bringe it forth vntyll they lyke of the sale. If they sell any at home, beside harder measure, it shal be dearer to the poore man by two pence or a groate in a bushell then they maye sell it in the market. But as these things are worthy redresse, so I wyshe that God woulde once open their eyes that deale thus, to see there owne errours: for as yet some of them lyttle care howe many poore men suffer extremitie, so that they may fill their purses, and carpe awaye the gaine. I coulde saye more but this is euen ynough, and more peraduenture then I shall be well thanked for: yet true it is though some thinke it no trespasse. This moreouer is to be lamented, that one generall measure is not in vse throwout all Englande, but euery mercate towne hath in a maner a seuerall measure, and the lesser it be, the moe sellers it draweth to resort vnto the same. It is oft founde likewise, that diuers vncōscionable dealers haue one measure to sell by, and another to buy with-all, the lyke is also in weightes. Wherfore it were verye good that these two were reduced vnto one standerd, that is, one bushell, one pound, one quarter one hundred, one tale, one number, so should things in time fal into better order, & fewer causes of contention be moued in this land. But more of this hereafter in the next booke, where I haue inserted a litle treatize, which I sometimes collected of our weights, & measures, and their comparison with those of the auncient Grecians and Romaines. To cõclude therfore in our markets all things are to be solde necessarie for mans vse, and there is our prouision made commonly for all the weeke insuing. Therefore as there are no great townes without one weekely market at the least, so there are very fewe of them that haue not one or two fayres or more within the compasse of the yeare assigned vnto them by the prince. And albeit that some of them are not much better then the common kirkemesses beyonde the sea, yet there are diuers not inferiour vnto the greatest martes in Europe, as Sturbridge Faire neare to Cambridge, Bartholomewe fayre at London, Linne mart, Cold fayre at Newport pond for cattell, and diuers other, all which or at the leastwyse the greatest part of them (to the end I may with the more ease to the reader & lesse trauayle to my self fulfill my taske in their recitall.) I haue set down according to ỹ names of the monethes wherin they are holden at ỹ end of this booke, where you shall finde them at large, as I borowed the same frõ Stow.

Of Armour and Munition. Cap. 12.

HOw well or how strongly our countrey hath bene furnished in tymes past with armor and artillery, it lyeth not in me as of my selfe to make rehearsall. Yet that it lacked both in the late tyme of Quene Mary not onely therperience of myne elders, but also the talke of certaine Spaniards, not yet forgotten, dyd leaue some manifest notice. Upon the first I nede not stand, for few wil denye it. For the seconde I haue heard that when one of the greatest peeres of Spaine espyed our nakednesse in this behalfe, and did solemnely vtter in no obscure place, that it shoulde be an easie matter in shorte tyme to cõquere England bycause it wanted armor, his words were thē not so rashly vttered, as they were politickly noted. For albeit that for the present tyme theyr efficacie was dissembled, and semblaunce made as though he spake but merely, yet at the very enteraunce of thys our gracious Quene vnto the possession of the Crowne, they were so prouidently called to remembrance, and such spedie reformation sought of all handes for the redresse of this incõuenience, that our country was sooner furnished with armour and munition, from diuers partes of the maine, (beside great plentie that was forged here at home) then our enemies could get vnderstãding of any such prouision to be made. By this pollicie also was the no small hope conceyued by Spanyardes vtterly cut of, who of open friendes being nowe become our secrete enemies, and thereto watching a time wherein to atchieue some heauie exploite agaynst vs and our countrye, dyd thereupon chaunge their purposes, whereby Englande obtayned rest, that otherwyse might haue ben sure of sharp & cruel wars. Thus a Spanish worde uttered by one man at one time, ouerthrew or at ỹ leastwise hindered sundry priuy practises of many at another. In times past the chiefe force of Englande consisted in their lõg bowes, but now we haue in maner generally giuen ouer that kinde of artillerie and for long bowes in dede doe practize to shoote compasse for our pastime: which kinde of shooting can neuer yeld any smart stroke nor beate downe our enemies as our country men were wont to doe, at euery time of nede. Certes the Frenchmen and Rutters deriding our new archerie in respect of their corslets, will not let in open skirmish yf any leysure serue to turne vp their tailes and cry shoote Englishe, and all bycause our strong shooting is decayed and layed in bedde. But if some of our English men nowe lyued that serued king Edward the third in his warres with Fraunce, the breche of such a Merlet should haue bene nailed to his bumme with one arrow & an other fethered in his bowels before he shoulde haue turned about to see, who shotte the first. But as our shooting is thus in maner vtterly decayed amõg vs one way, so our countrie men were skilful in sundrie other poyntes as in shooting in small Pieces, the Caleuer, and handling of the Pyke, in the seuerall vses whereof they are become very experte. Our armour differeth not from that of other nations, & therfore consisteth of corslets, almaine riuerets, shirtes of mayle, Jackes quilted and couered ouer with leather, fustien or canuas ouer thicke plates of yron that are sowed in the same, and of which there is no towne or village that hath not hir conuenient furniture. The sayd armour and munition also is kept in one seuerall place appoynted by the consent of the whole parish, where it is alwayes ready to be had and worne within an houres warning. Sometime also it is occupyed whē pleaſeth the Magiſtrate, eyther to view the ableme and take note of the wel kæping of the ſame, or finally to ſée thoſe that are inrolled to exerciſe eache one his ſeuerall weapon accoꝛding to his appointment. Certes there is almoſt no village ſo poꝛe in Englande (be it neuer ſo ſmall) that hath not ſufficient furniture in a readines to ſet foꝛth thꝛée oꝛ foure ſoldioꝛs, oꝛ one archer, one gonner, one pike & a bill man at the leaſt. No there is not ſo much wanting as their verye ſpuerles and cappes, which are left to be accounted of, if any haſte requiꝛed. What ſtoꝛe of munition & armour the Quéenes maieſtie hath in hir ſtoꝛe houſes, it lyeth not in me to yelde accompt, ſith I ſuppoſe the ſame to be infinite. And where as it was commonly ſayde after the loſſe of Calais that Englande ſhould neuer recouer their Oꝛdinance, there left, that ſame is at this time pꝛoued falſe, ſith euen ſome of the ſame perſons doe now confeſſe, that thys lande was neuer better furniſhed wyth theſe thinges in any kinges dayes that raigned ſince the conqueſt. As foꝛ the armouries of diuers of the Nobilitie (wherof I alſo haue ſéene a part) they are ſo well furniſhed wyth in ſome one Barons cuſtodie, that I haue ſéene thꝛée ſcoꝛe coꝛſlets at once, beſide calyuers, handgunnes, bowes, ſheeſes of arrowes, pykes, bylles, pollaxes, flaskes, touchboxes, targettes. &c. the verye ſight wherof appalled my courage, what would ỹ wearing of ſome of thē haue done this trow you, if I ſhould vſe them in the field. I would wꝛite here of our maner of going to ỹ wars, but what hath the long blacke gowne to doe with glitſering armour, what acquaintance can there be betwixt Mars and the Muſes, oꝛ how ſhould a man wꝛite any thing to the purpoſe of that, wherewith he is nothing acquainted.

Of the Nauie of Englande. Cap. 13.

THe Nauie of England may be deuided into thꝛée ſoꝛtes, of which the one ſerueth foꝛ the warres, the other foꝛ burden, & the thirde foꝛ fiſhermen, which get their lyuing by fiſhing on the ſea. How many of the firſt oꝛder are maintained within the realme it paſſeth my cunning to expꝛeſſe, yet ſith it may be parted into the Nauie Royall and common fléete, I thincke good to ſpeake of thoſe that belong vnto the Pꝛince, & ſo much the rather, foꝛ that their number is certaine & well knowne to very many. Certes there is no Pꝛince in Europe that hath a moꝛe beautifull ſoꝛte of ſhippes then the Quéenes maieſtie of Englande at this pꝛeſent, & thoſe generally are of ſuch exceéding ſoꝛce that two of them being well appoynted and furniſhed as they ought will not let to encounter with thꝛée oꝛ foure of them of other countries, and eyther bowge them oꝛ put them to flight, yf they may not bꝛing them home.

Neyther are the mouldes of any foꝛrain Barckes ſo conueniently made to bꝛoke the ſeas in any part of the continent, as thoſe of England, & therfoꝛe the commō repoꝛt that ſtraungers make of our ſhips amongſt thē ſelues is dayly confirmed to be true, which is that foꝛ ſtrength, aſſurance, nimbleſſe and ſwiftneſſe of ſayling, there are no beſſelles in the woꝛld to be compared with ours. The Quéenes highneſſe hath at this pꝛeſent alreadie made and furniſhed, to the number of one and twenty great ſhippes, which lye foꝛ the moſt part in Gillingham Rode, beſide thꝛée Gallies, of whoſe particular names it ſhall not be amiſſe to make repoꝛte at this time.

The firſt of them therefoꝛe is called Bonadventure.

The next hight the Elizabeth Ionas, a name deuiſed by hir grace in remembꝛaunce of hir owne deliuerance from the fury of hir enemies, from which in one reſpect ſhe was no leſſe myꝛaculouſly pꝛeſerued, then was the pꝛophet Ionas frō the belly of the Whale.

Beſide theſe hir grace hath other in hande alſo, of whome hereafter as their turnes doe come about, I will not let to leaue ſome further remēbꝛaunce. She hath likewiſe thꝛée notable Gallies: The Spéede wel, the Tryeryght, and the blacke Galley, with the ſight wherof & reſt of the Nauy Royal, it is incredible to ſaye how marueylouſly hir Grace is delighted: and not without great cauſe, ſith by their meanes hir coaſtes are kept in quiet, and ſundꝛye foꝛren enemies put back, which otherwyſe woulde inuade vs. The number of thoſe that ſerue foꝛ burden, wyth the other, wherof I haue made mencion already, and whoſe vſe is daily ſéene, as occaſi-on seruyth, in time of the warres, is to me vtterly vnknowne. Yet if commō estimatiō be any thing at all to be credited, there are 17. or eightéene hundred of one & other of thē, besides fisher boates, & smal Craiers, which I referre vnto the thirde sort. Of these also there are some of the Quénes maiesties subiectes that haue two or thrée, some foure or fiue, and as I hard of late, one man whose name I suppresse for modesties sake, hath béene knowne, not long since to haue hade fiftéene or seuentéene, and employed them wholly to the waftyng in and out of our marchauntes, whereby he hath reaped no small commoditye and gaine. I myght take occasion, to speake of the notable and difficult voiages made into straūge coūtries by Englishmen, and of their dayly succesle there, but as these thinges are nothing incident to my purpose, so I surcease to speake of them: onely thys will I adde therefore, to the ende all men shall vnderstande somewhat of the great masses of treasure, dayly employed vpon our Nauie, howe there are fewe of those shippes, of the first and seconde sorte that being apparelled and made readie to sale, are not worth one thousand pounds, or thrée thousande Ducates at the least, if they shoulde presently be solde. What shall we shall thinke then of the greater, but especially the Nauy Royall, of which some one vessell is worth two of the other, as ỳ shipwryghtes haue often tolde me. It is possible that some couetous person hearing thys report, will eyther not credite it at all, or suppose money so employed to be nothing profitable to the Quénes coffers, as a good husband said once when he harde there should be prouisiō made for armor, wishing ỳ Quénes money to be rather laide out to some spédier returne of gaine vnto hir Grace. But if he wist that the good kéeping of the sea, is the safegarde of our lande, he woulde alter hys censure, and some giue ouer his iudgement. For in times past when our nation made small account of Nauigation, how some dyd the Romaines, then the Saxons, and last of all the Danes inuade thys Iland, whose cruelty in the ende inforced our countrimen as it were euen agaynst their owne wylles, to prouyde for shippes from other places, and buylde at home of theyr owne, wherby their enimies were oftentymes distressed. But most of all were the Normans therein to be commended. For in a short processe of tyme after the conquest of thys Iland, and good consideration had for the well kéeping of ỳ same, they supposed nothyng more commodious for the defence of the countrey, then the maintenaunce of a strong Nauy, which they spédily prouided, mainteyned, & thereby reaped in the ende their wished securitye, wherewyth before their times this Iland was neuer acquainted. Before the comming of the Romaines, I doe not reade that we had any shippes at all, except a fewe made of wicker & couered with Buffle hides. In the beginning of the Saxons wée had a fewe, but as their number and moulde was lyttle and nothing to the purpose, so Egbert was the fyrst prince that euer thoroughlye began to knowe thys necessitie of a Nauy, in ỳ defence of his country. After him also other princes as Alfrede & Ethelred. &c. indeuoured more & more to store thēselues at the full with ships of al quantities, but chiefly Ethelred, who made a law, ỳ euery man holding 310. hidelandes, should finde a ship furnished to serue him in the warres. Howbeit, and as I sayde before when all their Nauie was at the greatest, it was not comparable to that which afterwarde the Normains prouided, neyther that of the Normaines anye thing lyke to the same, that is to be séene nowe in our dayes. For ỳ iourneys also of our ships, you shal vnderstand, that a well builded bessell, wyll runne or sayle thrée hundred leagues, or nine hundreth myles in a wéeke, or peraduenture some will go 2200. leagues in fiue wéekes and an halfe. And surely if their lading be ready against they come thither, there be of them that will be here, at the west Indies, and home agayne in twelue or thirtéene wéekes from Colchester, although the sayd Indies be eight hundred leagues from the cape or point of Cornewall, as I haue béene informed.

Of Bathes and hote welles. Cap. 14.

AS Almightie God hath in most plentyfull maner bestowed infinite and those very notable benefits vpon this Ile of Britaine, whereby it is not a little enriched, so in hote and naturall Bathes, (whereof we haue diuers in sundrie places) it manifestly appeareth that he hath not forgotten Englande. There are foure Bathes therefore to be found in this realme, of which the first is called S. Vincentes, the second Hally Well, both being places in my opinion more obscure then the other two, & yet not seldome sought vnto by such as stande in néede. For albeit the fame of their forces be not so generallye spreade, yet in some cases they are thought to be nothing inferiour to the other, as diuers haue often affirmed by their owne experience and triall. The third place wher-in hote Bathes are to be founde is neare vnto Burstone (a towne in Darbyshyre, situate in the high Peke not passing fiftéene myles from Manchester or Marketchesterforde, & twenty from Darby) where aboute eight or nine seuerall Welles are to be séene of which thrée are counted to be most excellent. But of al the gretest is the hottest, void of corruption and compared as Iones sayth, wyth those of Somersett shyre so colde indéede, as a quarte of boyling water woulde be made, if fiue quartes of running water were added therunto: whereas on the other side, those of Bathe likened vnto these, haue such heate appropriated vnto them, as a gallon of hote water hath when a quart of colde is mixed with the same. Herevpon the effecte of thys Bath worketh more temperatelye and pleasantlye (as he writeth) then the other. And albeit that it maketh not so great spéede in cure of such as resort vnto it for helpe, yet it dealeth more effectuallye and cõmodiously then those in Somerset shyre, and inferre withall lesse grieuous accidentes, in ỳ restreyning of natural issues, strẽgthening the affebeled members, assisting the lyuelye forces, dispersing annoious oppilations, and qualifyng of sundry grickes, as experience hath oft confirmed. The like vertues haue the other two, but not in such measure and degrée, and therefore their operation is not so spédily perceyued.

The fourth and last place of our Bathes, is a Citie in Sommerset shire, which taketh his name of ỳ hote waters there to be séene & vsed. At the first it was called Cair bledud & not Cair Bledune, as some woulde haue it, for that is the olde name of ỳ auncient castel at Salmesbury, which the Saxons named Yngleburne. Ptolomy afterwarde called it Therme, other Aquæ solis, but nowe it hight generally Bathe in Englishe, & vnder that name it is likely to cõtinue. The city of it self is a very auncient thing, no doubt as may yet appeare by dyuers notable antiquities ingraued in stone, to be séene in the walles thereof. And first of all betwéene the south gate and the west, and betwixt the west gate and the north.

The first is the antique heade of a man, made all flatte, with great lockes of heire, much like to the coine that I haue séene of Antius the Romaine. The seconde betwéene the south & the north gate is an ymage, as I take it of Hercules, for he helde in each hand a serpent, & so doth this. Thirdely there standeth a man on foote with a sworde in his one hand, & a buckler stretched out in the other. There is also a braunch that lyeth foulded & wrethed into circles, like to the wreath of Alcimedon. There are more ouer two naked Images, wherof the one imbraceth the other, beside sundrye antique heades, with ruffeled heire, a greye hounde running, and at hys tayle certeine Romaine letters, but so defaced that no man liuing can reade them at this present. There is moreouer the ymage of Lacon, inuironed with two serpents, & an other inscription, and all these betwéene the south and the west gates, as I haue sayd before.

Now betwéene the west & north gate are two inscriptions, of which some wordes are euident to be red, the residue are cleane defaced. There is also ỳ ymage of a naked man, & a stone in like sort, which hath cupidines et labruscas intercurrentes, & a table hauing at eche hand an ymage vined & finely florished both aboue & beneath. Finally (sauing that I sawe afterwarde the ymage of a naked man grasping a serpent in eache hand) there was an inscription of a tombe or burial, wherein these wordes did plainely appeare vixit annos, x x x. but so defusedly written, that letters stode for whole wordes, and two or thrée letters combined into one. Certes I will not saye whether these were set into the places where they nowe stande by the Gentiles or, brought thither from other ruines of the towne it selfe, & placed afterwarde in those walles, in their necessary reparations. But howsoeuer ỳ matter standeth this is to be gathered by our hystories, that Bladud first buylded that citie there, and peraduenuenture might also kindle the Sulphurous vaines of purpose to burne continuallye, in the honour of Minerua: by which occasion ỳ springs thereabout did in processe of time become hote & not vnprofitable, for sundry kinds of diseases. Indéede the later Paganes dreamed that Minerua was ỳ chiefe goddes and gouernesse of these waters, because of the nérenesse of hir temple vnto the same. Solinus addeth furthermore, howe that in hir sayde temple, the fire which was continuallye kept, did neuer consume into deade sparcles, but so sone as the embers thereof were colde, they congealed into clots of hard stone, all which I take to be nothing else the the effecte of the aforesayde fyre, of the Sulphurous vaine kindled in the earth, from whence the waters doe come. That these bathes or waters are deriued from such, the Marchasites & stones mixed with some copper, and daily founde vpon the mountaynes thereabout will beare sufficient witnesse, though I would write the contrary. Doctor Turner also the father of English Phisicke, Cap. 25.

and an excellent Diuine, supposeth that these springs doe drawe theyr forces from Sulphur, or if their be any other thing mingled withall, he gesseth that it shoulde be salt peter, because he founde an obscure likelyhode of ỳ same, euen in the crosse Bath. But that they participate wt any allume at al, he could neuer til his dying day, be induced to beleue. I myght here if I thought it necessary, intreat of ỳ notable scituation of Bath it self, which standeth in a pleasant botome, enuironed on euery side wyth great hylles, out of the which come so many springs of pure water by sundrye wayes vnto the Citye, and in such abundance as that euery house is serued with the same by pypes of leade, the said metall being the plentious and lesse of value vnto them, because it is had not far of from these quarters. It should not be amysse also to speake of ỳ foure gates, number of parish churches, bridges, religious houses dissolued, and their founders, if place doe serue therefore: but for so much as my purpose is not to deale in this behalfe, I will omit the mention of these thinges, and go in hand wyth the Bathes themselues, whereof in thys chapiter I protested to intreate.

Crosse Bath. There are two springes of water as Lelande sayth, in the west south west part of the towne whereof the biggest is called the crosse Bath, of a certeine crosse that was erected sometime in the middest thereof. This Bath is much frequented by such as are diseased with leapry, pockes, scabbes, & great aches: yet of it selfe it is very temperate, & pleasaunt, hauing a leuen or twelue arches of stone in the sydes thereof, for men to stand vnder, when rayne doth oughts annoy them.

Common Bathe. The common Bathe, or as some call it, the hote Bathe, is two hundreth foote, or ther about from the crosse Bathe, lesse in cõpasse within the wall then the other, and with only seauen arches, wrought out of the mayne inclosure. It is worthily called ỳ hote Bath, for at the first comming into it, men thinke that it would scald their flesh, and lose it frõ the bone: but after a season, and that the bodyes of the commers thereto be warmed thorowlye in the same, it is more tollerable & easie to be borne. Bothe these Bathes be in the middle of a little streate, and ioyne to S. Thomas Hospitall, so that it maye bee thought that Reginalde Bysshop of Bathe, made his house nere to these comon Baths, onely to succour such poore people as shoulde resort vnto them.

Kinges Bathe. The Kings Bathe is very faire and large, standing almost in the middle of the towne, at the west ende of the Cathedrall Church. It is compassed about with a very high stone wall, and the brimmes thereof are mured rounde about, where in be two an thirtie arches for men and women to stande in seperately, who beyng of ỳ gentry for the most part, doe resort thither indifferently, but not in such lasciuious sort, as vnto other Bathes & hote houses of ỳ maine, whereof some write more a greate deale, then modesty should reueale, and honesty performe. There went a fluse out of this Bath, which serued in times past the Priory with water, which was deriued out of it vnto two places, and commonlye vsed for Bathes, but nowe I doe not thinke that they remaine in vsage.

As for the colour of the water of all the Bathes, it is most like to a deepe bleiwe, and reketh much after the manner of a seething potte, commonly yelding somewhat a sulpherus taste, and very vnpleasant sauour. The water that runneth from the two small Bathes, goeth by a dyke into the Auon by West, and beneath the Bridge, but the same that goeth from the Kings Bathe turneth a myl, and after goeth into Auon aboue Bath bridg, where it loseth both force & tast, & is like vnto the rest. In all the three Baths a man may euidently see how the water bubbeleth vp from the springes. This is also to be noted that at certaine times all entraunces into them is vtterly prohibited, that is to say, at highe noone and midnight, for at those two seasons & a while before and after, they boyle very feruently, and become so hote, that no man is able to indure their heate, or any while sustaine their force and vehement worcking. They purge themselues furthermore from all such filth as the dyseased doe leaue in eache of them, wherefore we doe forbeare the rashe entraunce into them, at that time, & so much the rather for that we wolde not by contractiõ of any new diseases, departe more grieuously affected, then we came vnto the citie, which is in deede a thing that eche one should regard. For these causes they are commonlye shut vp from halfe an houre after ten of the clocke in the forenone, to halfe an houre after one in the afternone, & likewise at midnight: at which tymes the keeper of them resorteth to his charge, openeth the gates, and leaueth free passage vnto such as come vnto them, hytherto I leaue what cost hath of late beene bestowed vpon these Bathes, by diuers of the Nobility, gentry, cõmonalty and clergy, it lieth not in me to declare, yet as I here they are not onely very much repaired and garnished, but til sundry curious peces of workemanshipe, partely touchyng their commendation, and partely for the ease and benefite of such as resorte vnto them: but also better ordered, cleanlier kept, and more friendely prouision made for such pouerty as daily repaire thether. But notwythstanding all this, such is the general estate of things in Bath, that the rich men may spend while they will & the poore begge whilest they list, for their maintenaunce and dyet so long as they remaine there. And yet I deny not but ỳ there is very good order there for all degrées, but where shall a man find any equal regard of poore & rich, though god do giue these his gifts freely vnto both alyke. I would here intreate further of ỳ customes vsed in these baths, what nũber of Phisitions daily attend vpon those waters, for no mã (especially such as be able to entertaine them) doth enter into these Bathes before he consult with the Phisition: also, what diet is to be obserued, what particular diseases are healed there, & to what ende the comers thither doe drinke oft times of that medicinable liquor, but thẽ I should excéede the lymittes of a description, wherfore I passe it ouer vnto other, hoping that some man ere long will vouchsafe to performe that at large, which the famous clarke Docter Turner hath brefely yet happily begun, touching the effects and working of the same, for hitherto I doe not knowe of manye that haue trauayled in the natures of those Bathes of our countrey, wyth any great commendation, much lesse of any that hath reuealed them at the full for the benefite of our nation, or commoditie of straungers.

¶ Of Parkes and Warrens. Cap. 15.

IN euery shyre of Englande there is great plentye of Parkes, whereof some here and there appertaine vnto the Prince, the rest to such of the Nobilitye and Gentlemen, as haue their lands and patrimony lying nére vnto ỳ same. I would gladly haue set downe the iust number of these inclosures, to bée founde in euery countye, but sith I can not so doe, it shall suffise to say, that in Kent and Eſſex only are to the number of an hundred, where in great plentie of fallowe Déere is cherished and kept. As for Warrens of Conies, I iudge thẽ almost innumerable, & daily like to increse, by reasõ that ỳ black skins of those beasts are thought to counteruaile, ỳ prises of their naked carkases, & this is the onely cause why the gray are lesse estéemed. Néere vnto London their quyckest marchaundise is of the yong rabets, wherfore ỳ older conies are brought frõ farder of, where there is no such spédy vtterãce of Rabbets & sucklings in their seasõ, nor so great losse by their skins, sith they are suffered to grow vp to their full greatnesse wt their owners. Our Parkes are generally inclosed wyth strong pale made of Oke, of which kinde of woode there is great store cherished from time to tyme in eache of them, onely for the maintenaunce of the sayde defence, and safe kéeping of the Déere from raunging about the countrey. The circuite of these inclosures in lyke maner containe oft times a walke of foure or fiue myles, and sometimes more or lesse, whereby it is to bée séene what store of ground is employed vpon that vayne cõmoditie which bringeth no maner of gaine or profit to the owner, sith they cõmonlye giue awaye their flesshe, neuer taking penny for the same, because venisson in england is neither bought nor soulde by the right owner, but maintained only for hys pleasure, to the no smal decay of husbandry, & diminution of mankinde. For where in times past, many large and welthy occupiers, were dwelling within the compasse of some one parke, and therby great plenty of corne & cattell séene & to be had amongst them, beside a more copious procreation of humaine issue, wherby the realme was alwaies better furnished with able men to serue the Prince in his affaires: now there is almost nothing kept but a sort of wilde & sauage beasts, cherished for pleasure and delite, and yet the owners styll desirous to enlarge those groundes, doe not let daily to take in more, affirming that we haue already to great store of people in england, and that youth by maryyng to some doe nothing profite the countrey but fill it full of beggers.

Certes if it be not one curse of the Lorde, to haue our countrey conuerted in such sorte from the furniture of mankinde, into the walkes and shrowdes of wylde beastes, I know not what is any. How many families also these great and small games (for so most kéepers call them) haue eaten vp, & are likely hereafter to deuoure, some men may coniecture, but many more lamẽt: sith there is no hope of restraint to be loked for in this behalf, but if a man may priuẽtly giue a gesse at ỳ vniuersality of this euill by contemplation of the circumstances, he shall saye at ỳ last, that the twentieth parte of the realme is imployed vpon Déere and Conies already, which séemeth very much, if it be duely considered of. We had no Parkes in Englande before the comming of the Normanes, who added this calamity also to the [illegible]

The decaie of the people is the destruction of a kingdome, neyther is any man borne to possesse the earth alone.

our nation, making men of the best sort furthermore to become kéepers of their game, whilest they lyued in the meane time vppon the spoyle of their reuenues, and daily ouerthrew townes villages, & an infinite sort of families, for the maintenance of their Venery. Neyther was any park supposed in these times to be stately enough, that conteined not at the least eyght or tenne hidelandes, that is so many hundred acres, or families, or as they haue béene alwaies called in some places of the Realme, carrucates or cartwares, of which one was sufficient in olde time to maintaine an honest Yeoman.

It should séeme that forrests haue alwaies béene had and religiously preserued in thys Iland for the solace of the Prince, and recreation of his nobilitie: howbeit I read not that euer they were inclosed more then at this present, or otherwise fenced then by vsual notes of limitacion, wherby their bounds were remembred from time to tyme for the better preseruation of such venery and vert of all sortes as were nourished in the same. Neyther are any of the auncient lawes prescribed for their maintaynaunce before the dais of Canutus now to be had, sith time hath so dealt with them, that they are perished & lost. Canutus therfore séeing the daily spoyle that was made in all places of his game, dyd at the last make sundrie Sanctions and Decrées, whereby from thencefoorth the red and fallow déere, were better loked vnto throughout his whole Dominiõs. We haue in these dayes diuers forrestes in England & Wales as Walthã forrest, Windsor, Pickering, Fecknam, Delamore, Deane, Penrise, and many other nowe cleane out of my remembraunce, and which although they are farre greater in circuit then many Parckes and Warrennes, yet are they in this our tyme lesse deuourers of the people then these later, sith beside much tillage, many Townes are founde in eache of them, whereas in Parkes and Warrẽs we haue nothing else then either the kéepers lodge, or at the best wise the manour place of the chiefe Lorde, & owner of the soyle. I coulde say more of forrestes and the aforesayde inclosures, but it shall suffice at this time to haue sayde so much as is set downe alreadie. Howbeit that I may restore one antiquitie to light, which hath hytherto lyen as it were raked vp in the embers of oblituon, I will gyue out the same Lawes that Canutus made for his forrest, whereby many thinges shall be disclosed concerning the same (whereof peraduẽture some lawiers haue no knowledge) & diuers other notes gathered touching the ancient estate of ỹ realm not to be founde in other. But before I deale with the great charter, (which as you maye perceyue is in many places impẽrãt by reason of corruption crept in by length of tyme, not by me to be restored) I will note an other briefe law, which he made in the first yeare of his reigne at Winchester, and afterward inserted into these his latter constitutions Canone 32. and beginneth thus in his owne Saxon tongue. I will that eic one. &c. I will and graunt that eache one shalbe worthy of such venery as he by hunting can take eyther in the playnes or in the woods, or within his owne fée or dominiõ (out of the forrest) but eache man shall abstaine from my venerie in euery place, where I will that my beastes shall haue firme peace and quietnesse vpõ paine to forfaict so much as a man may forfaict. Hytherto the statute made by the aforesayde Canutus, which was afterwarde confirmed by king Edwarde surnamed the confessour in the fourth yeare of his reigne. Now followeth the great Charter it selfe in Latine, as I finde it worde for worde, & whiche I woulde gladly haue turned into English if it might haue founded to any benefite of the vnskilfull and vnlearned.

HÆ sunt sanctiones de forresta, quas ego Canutus rex cum consilio primariorum hominum meorum condo & facio, vt cunctis regni nostri Angliæ ecclesijs & pax & Iustitia fiat, & vt omnis delinquens secundum modum delicti, & delinquentis fortunam patiatur.

1. Sint iam deinceps quatuor ex liberalioribus hominibus qui habent saluas suas debitas consuetudines (quos Angli pegened appellãt) in qualibet regni mei prouincia constituti, ad Iustitiam distribuendam vna cum pena merita & materijs forrestæ cuncto populo meo, tam Anglis quam Danis per totum regnum meum Angliæ, quos quatuor primarios forrestæ appellandos censemus.

2 Sint sub quolibet horum, quatuor ex mediocribus hominibus (quos Angli Lespegend, nuncupant, Dani vero young men vocant) locati, qui curam & onus tum viridis tum veneris suscipiant.

3. In administranda autem Iusticia nuillatenus volo vt tales se intromittant: mediocresq; tales post ferarum curam susceptam, pro liberalibus semper habeantur, quos Dani Calder-men appellant.

4. Sub horum iterum quolibet sunt duo minutorũ hominũ quos Tineman Angli dicunt cunt hi nocturnam curam & veneris & viridis tum seruilia opera subibunt.

5. Si talis minutus seruus fuerit, tam cito quam in forresta nostra locabitur, liber esto, omnesq; hos ex sumptibus nostris manutenebimus.

6. Habeat etiam quilibet primariorũ quolibet anno de nostra warda quam Michni Angli appellant, duos equos, vnum cum sella, alterum sine sella, vnũ gladium quinq; lanceas, vnum cuspidẽ, vnum scutum & ducentos solidos argenti.

7. Mediocrium quilibet vnum equum, vnã lanceam, vnum scutum & 60. solidos argenti.

8. Minutorum quilibet, vnam lanceam, vnam arcubalistam & 15. solidos argenti.

9. Sint omnes tam primarij, quam mediocres, & minuti, immunes, liberi, & quieti ab omnibus prouincialibus summonitionibus, & popularibus placitis, quæ Hundred laghe Angli dicunt, & ab omnibus armorũ oneribus quod Warscot Angli dicunt & forinceſis querelis.

10. Sint mediocrium & minutorum causæ & earum correctiones tam criminalium quam ciuilium per prouidam sapientiam & rationẽ primariorum Iudicate & decisę: primariorum vero enormia si quę fuerint (ne scelus aliquod remaneat inultum) nosmet in ira nostra regali puniemus.

11. Habeant hi quatuor vnam regalem potestatem (salua nobis nostra presentia) quaterq; in anno generales forestæ demonstrationes & viridis & veneris forisfactiones quas Muchehunt dicunt, vbi teneant omnes calumniam de materia aliqua tangente forestam; eantq; ad triplex Iudiciũ quod Angli Ofgangfordell dicunt. Ita autem acquiratur illud triplex Iudicium. Accipiat secum quinque & sit ipse sextus, & sic iurando acquirat triplex Iudicium, aut triplex iuramentum. Sed purgatio ignis nullatenus admittatur nisi vbi nuda veritas nequit aliter inuestigari.

12. Liberalis autem homo. 1. Pegen, modo crimen suum non sit inter mariora, habeat fidelem hominem qui possit pro eo iurare iuramentum. 1. Forathe: si autem non habet ipsemet iuret, nec pardonetur ei aliquod iuramentum.

13. Si aduena vel peregrinus qui de longinquo venerit sit calumpniatus de foresta, & talis est sua inopia vt nõ possit habere plegium ad primam calumniam, qualẽ ✶ nullus Anglus iudicare potest: tunc subeat captionem regis & ibi expectet quousque vadat ad iudicium ferri & aquę: attamen si quis extraneo aut peregrino de longe venienti ✶ sibi ipsi nocet si aliquod iudiciũ iudicauerint.

14. Quicunque coram primarios homines meos forestę in falso testimonio steterit & victus fuerit, non sit dignus imposterũ stare aut portare testimoniũ, quia legalitatẽ suam perdidit, & pro culpa soluat regi decem solidos quos Dani vocant Halfehange, alias halshang. Halfhang.

15. Si quis vim aliquã primarijs forestę meæ intulerit, si liberalis sit amittat libertatem & omnia sua, si villanus abscindatur dextra.

16. Si alteruter iterum peccauerit reus sit mortis.

17. Si quis cõtra autẽ cũ primario pugnauerit in plito, emendet secundũ præcium sui ipsius quod Angli Pere & pite dicunt, & soluat primario quadraginta solidos. Pere and pite.

18. Si pacem quis fregerit ante mediocres forestę quod dicunt Gethbreche emendet regi decem solidis. Gethbrech

19. Si quis mediocrium aliquem cum ira percusserit, emendetur prout interfectio feræ regalis mihi emendari solet.

20. Si quis delinquens in foresta nostra capietur, pœnas luet secundũ modum & genus delicti.

21. Pena & forisfactio non vna eademque erit liberalis (quem Dani Elderman vocant) & illiberalis: domini & seruinoti & ignoti: nec vna eademq; erit causarum tum ciuilium tum criminaliũ, ferarũ forestę, & ferarum regalium: Viridis & veneris tractatio: nã crimen veneris ab antiquo inter maiora & non inmerito numerabatur: viridis vero (fractione chaceę nostre regalis excepta) ita pusillum & exiguum est, quod vix ea respicit nostra constitutio: qui in hoc tamen deliquerit, sit criminis forestæ reus. Ealderma

22. Si liber aliquis feram forestę fugerit, siue casu, siue prehabita voluntate, ita vt cursu celeri cogatur fera anhelare, decem solidis regi emendet, si illiberalis dupliciter emendet, si seruus careat corio.

23. Si vero horum aliquot interfecerit, soluat dupliciter & persoluat, sitque præcij sui reus contra regem.

24. Sed si regalem ferã quam Angli à stag-gon appellant alteruter coegerit anhelare, alter per vnum annum, alter per duos careat libertatę naturali: si vero seruus, pro vtlegato habeatur quem Angli Frendlesman vocant. Steggon. Frendlesman.

25. Si vero occiderit, amittat liber scutum libertatis, si sit illiberalis careat libertate, si seruus vita.

26. Episcopi, Abbates & Barones mei non calumnibuntur pro venatione, si non regales feras occiderint: & si regales, restabunt rei regi pro libito suo, sine certa emendatione.

27. Sunt aliæ (præter feras forestę) bestię, que dum inter sępta & sæpes forestę continentur, emendationi subiacent: quales sunt capreoli, lepores, & cuniculi. Sunt & alia quam plurima animalia quę quanquã infra septa forestę viuunt, & oneri & curę mediocrium subiacẽt, Bubali olim in Anglia.

foreſte tamen nequaquã cenſeri poſſunt, qualia ſunt equi, Bubali, vaccæ, & ſimilia. Vulpes & Lupi, nec foreſtæ nec veneris habentur, & proinde eorum interfectio nulli emendationi ſubiacet. Si tamen infra limites occiduntur, fractio ſit regalis chaceę, & mitius emendetur. Aper vero quanquam foreſte ſit nullatenus tamen animal veneris haberi eſt aſſuetus.

28. Boſco nec Subboſco noſtro ſine licentia primariorum foreſtæ nemo manum apponat, quod ſi quis fecerit reus ſit fractionis regalis chaceę.

29. Si quis vero Ilicem aut arborem aliquam qui victum feris ſuppeditat ſciderit, præter fractionem regalis chaceę, emendet regi viginti ſolidis.

30. Volo vt omnis liber homo pro libito ſuo habeat venerem ſiue viridem in planis ſuis ſuper terras ſuas, ſine chacea tamen. Et deuitent omnes meam, vbicunque eam habere voluero.

Greyhũds

31. Nullus mediocris habebit nec cuſtodiet canes quos Angli Griehunds appellant. Liberali vero dum genuiſciſsio eorum facta fuerit coram primario foreſtę licebit, aut ſine genuiſciſsione dum remoti ſunt à limitibus foreſtæ per decem milliaria: quando vero proprius venerint, emendet quodlibet miliare vno ſolido. Si vero infra ſepta foreſtę reperiatur, dominus canis forisfaciet & canem, & decem ſolidos regi.

Melter Langerã.

32. Velteres vero quos Langeran appellant quia manifeſte conſtat in ijs nihil eſſe periculi, cuilibet licebit ſine genuiſciſsione eos cuſtodire. Idem de canibus quos Rambundt vocant.

Ramhundt.

33. Quod ſi caſu inauſpicato huiuſmodi canes rabidi fiant & vbique vagantur negligentia dominorum, redduntur illiciti, & emẽdetur regi pro illicitis. &c. Quod ſi intra ſepta foreſtæ reperiantur, talis exquiratur herus, & emendet ſecundum precium hominis mediocris, quod ſecundũ legem merimorum eſt ducentorum ſollidorum.

34. Si Canis rabidus momorderit ferã, tunc emendet ſecundum precium hominis liberalis quod eſt duodecies ſolidis centũ. Si vero fera regalis morſa fuerit, reus ſit maximi criminis.

And theſe are the conſtitutions of Canutus concerning the foreſt very barbarouſly trãſlated by thoſe that toke the ſame in hande. Howbeit as I finde it ſo I ſet it downe without any alteration of my copie in any iote or tytle.

Of Wooddes and marriſes. Cap. 16.

Great abundance of wood ſometime in England.

IT ſhoulde ſeeme by auncient recordes, and the teſtimony of ſundrie authors, that the whole countries of Lhoegres and Cambria now England and Wales, haue ſometimes been very well repleniſhed with great woods and groues, although at this tyme the ſayde commoditie be not a little decayed in both, and in ſuch wyſe that a man ſhall oft ryde tenne or twentie myles in eache of them and finde very little or rather none at all, except it be neare vnto townes, gentlemens houſes and villages where the inhabitauntes haue planted a few Elmes, Okes, Haſelles, or Aſhes about their dwellings for their defence from the rough windes, and képing of the ſtormie weather frõ anoyaunce of the ſame. This ſcarſitie at ẏ firſt grew as it is thought eyther by the induſtrie of man, for maintaynaunce of tillage (as we vnderſtand the lyke to be done of late by the Spaniards in the Weſt Indes, where they fiered whole woodes of very great compaſſe thereby to come by groũd wheron to ſow their graines) or elſe throwe the couetouſneſſe of ſuch as in preferring of paſture for their ſhéepe and greater cattell, doe make ſmall account of firebote and tymber: or finally by the cruelty of the enemies, whereof we haue ſundrie examples declared in our hyſtories. Howbeit where the rockes and quarry grounds are I take the ſwart of the earth to be ſo thinne, that no trée of anye greatneſſe other then ſhrubbes & buſhes is able to grow or proſper long therein for want of ſufficient moyſture wherwith to fede them with freſh humour, or at the leaſt wyſe of mould, to ſhrowd ſtay vpright, and chearith the ſame in the bluſtering winters weather, till they may growe vnto any greatneſſe, and ſpread or yeld their rootes down right into the ſoyle about them: and this either is or may be one other cauſe, wherefore ſome places are naturally voyde of woodde. But to proceede, although I muſt néedes cõfeſſe that there is good ſtore of great wood or tymber here and there, euen nowe in ſome places of England, yet in our dayes it is farre vnlike to that plentie, which our auncеſters haue ſéene hertofore, when ſtately buylding was leſſe in vſe. For albeit that there were then greater nũber of meſuages & manſions almoſt in euery place, yet were their frames ſo ſlite and ſlender, that one meane dwelling houſe in our time is able to counteruayle very many of them, if you conſider the preſent charge with the plentie of timber that we beſtow vpon them. In times paſt men were contented to dwell in houſes, buylded of Sallow, Willow, Plummetrée, Hardebeame, and Elme, ſo that the vſe of Oke was in maner dedicated wholy vnto churches, religious houſes, Princes palaces

Noble-

Noblemens lodgings and nauigation, but now all these are reiected and nothing but oke any whit regarded: & yet see the chaũge, for when our houses were buylded of Willowe then had we Oken men, but nowe that our houses are come to be made of Oke, our mẽ are not only become willow, but a great many altogither of straw, which is a sore alteratiõ. In those the courage of ỹ owner was a sufficient defence to kepe the house in safetie, but now the assurance of the timber must defende the man from robbing. Nowe haue we manye chimnyes and yet our tenderlinges complaine of rewmes, catarres and poses, then had we none but reredosses, and our heades did neuer ake. For as the smoke in those dayes was supposed to be a sufficient hardning for the timber of the house, so it was reputed a farre better medicine to kẽpe the goodman and his family from the quacke or pose, wherewith as then very few were acquainted.

We haue manye woodes, forrestes and parkes which cherish trées abundantly, although in the woodlande countries there is almost no hedge that hath not some store of the greatest sort, beside infinite numbers of hedgerowes, groues, and springes, that are maintayned of purpose for the buylding and prouision of such owners as doe possesse the same. Howbeit as euery soile doth not beare all kindes of wood, so there is not any wood, park, hedgerow, groue, or forrest, that is not mixed with many, as Oke, Ashe, Hasell, Hawthorne, Byrche, Beéche, Hardbeame, Hull, Sorke, wilde Cherie, and such lyke, wherof Oke hath alwayes the prehemineñce as most méete for buylding wherevnto it is reserued. This trée bringeth forth also a profitable kinde of mast, whereby such as dwell neare vnto the aforesayde places do cherishe and bring vp innumerable herdes of swine. In tyme of plentie of this mast, our redde and fallowe déere will not let to participate with our hogges, more then our other nete, yea our common poultrie also if they may come vnto them: but as this abundance doth prowe very pernicious vnto the first, so the egges which these latter doe bring forth beside blackenesse in colour & bitternesse of taste haue not seldome béene founde to breéde diuers diseases vnto such persons as haue eaten of the same. I might adde in lyke sort the profite insuing by the barke of this woodde, wherof our tanners haue great vse in dressing of leather, and which they buy yearly in May by the faggame, as I haue oft seene, but it shall not néede at this time to enter into any such discourse, only this I wish that our sole & vpper lethering, may haue their due time and not be hacked on by extraordinarie slightes, as with Ashe barcke. &c. Whereby as I graunt that it séemeth outwardly to be very thicke and wel done, so if you respect the sadnesse thereof, it doth prowe in the ende to be very hollow and not able to holde out water. Of Elme I haue not séene any great store togither in woodes or forrestes, but where they haue béene first planted and then suffered to spreade at their owne willes. Yet haue I knowen great woodes of Béeche & Hasell in many places, especially in Barckeshyre, Oxfordshyre and Buckinghamshyre, where they are greatlye cherished, and conuerted vnto sundry vses by such as dwell about thẽ. Ash commeth vp euery where of it selfe, and with euery kinde of woodde, and as we haue very great plenty and no lesse vse of these in our husbandrie, so are we not wythout the plane, the Aghe, the sorse, the chestnutte, the line, the blacke chérie, and such like. And although that we enioye them not in so great plentie now in most places, as in times past or the other afore remembred, yet haue we sufficient of thẽ all for our necessarie turnes and vses, especially of Aghe as may be séene betwixt Rotheram and Sheffilde, and some stédes of Kent also as I haue béene informed. The Firre, Frankencence, and Pine, we doe not altogither want, especially the firre, wherof we haue some store in Chatley more in Darbyshyre, Shropshyre, Anderneste, and a mosse néere Manchester. As for the Franckencense & Pine, they haue béene planted in Colledges, and Cloysters, by the the cleargie and religious in tymes past, wherefore in my opinion we may rather say that we want thẽ altogither, for except they dyd growe naturally & not by force, I sée no cause why they shoulde be accounted for parcell of our cõmodities. I might here take occasion to speke of the great sales yerly made of wood, wherby an infinite deale hath béene destroyed within these few yeres, but I giue ouer to deale in this behalfe, howbeit thys I dare affirme that if woodes doe go so fast to decay in the next hundred yeare of grace as they haue done & are like to doe in this (sometymes for increase of shepe walkes, & some maintaynaunce of prodigalitie & pompe, for I haue known a × gentlemã that hath borne thrée score at once in one paire of galigaskõs, to shew his strẽgth & brauery) it is to be feared that brome, turfe, gal, heth, firze, brakes, whinnes, ling, dies, hassocks, flags, straw, sedge, réede, rush, & seacole will be good marchãdize euen in the citie of Londõ, whervnto some of them alreadie haue gotten readie passage & taken vp their Innes in the greatest marchauntes parlers. A man woulde thincke that our lawes were able ynough to make sufficiēt prouision for ỹ redresse of this errour, and enormitie likely to insue: but such is the nature of our country men, ỹ as many lawes are made, so they will kepe none, or if they be urged to make answere, they will rather seeke some crooked construction therof to the encrease of their priuate game, then yelde themselues willing to be guided by the same, for a common wealth and profite: so that in the ende, whatsoeuer the lawe sayeth we will haue our willes, whereby the wholesome ordinances of ỹ prince are contemned, the trauaile of the nobilitie and counsellours as it were derided, the common wealth impouerished, and a fewe only inriched by this peruerse dealing: whereas many thousande persons doe suffer hinderance, by this their crooked behauiour, whereby the wholesome lawes of the Prince are oft defrauded, the good meaning maiestrate in consultation about the common wealth seduced. I woulde wishe that I might liue no longer then to see foure thinges in thys lande reformed. That is, the want of discipline in the church. The couetous dealing of most of our marchants, in the preferment of other countries, & hinderance of their owne. The holding of faires & markets vpon the sondaie, to be abolished and referred to the wednesdayes. And that euery man wyth in what soeuer soile enioyeth foure Acres of lande (and vpwards after that rate) either by free deede, or coppie hold, or fee farme, might plant one Acre of wood, or sow the same with mast, beside that which remayneth already to be cherished & kept. But I feare me that I should then liue to long, & so long that I should eyther be weary of the worlde, or the world of me, & yet they are not such thinges, but they may easily be brought to passe.

Certes euery small occasion in my time is inough to cut downe a great woode, & euery trifle sufficeth to laye infinite Acres of corne ground vnto pasture. As for ỹ taking downe of houses, a small fine will beare out a great manye. Woulde to God we might once take example of the Romaines, who in restreint of superfluous grasinge made an exact limitation, how many head of Cattel eche estate myght keepe, and what numbers of Acres shoulde suffise, for that and other purposes, neyther was woode euer better cherished or mancion houses maintained, then by their lawes and statutes. But what doe I meane to speake of these sith my purpose is onely to talke of woods: well take this then for a final conclusion in woodes, that within this fortie yeares, we shall haue little newe Timber, growing aboue two and fortie yeares olde, for it is cōmonly seene that those yong staddies which we leaue standing, at one and twenty yeres fal, are vsually at the next sale cut downe, without any daunger of the statute, & serue for fire bote, if it please the owner, to burne them.

Mariles and Fenny Bogges we haue many in England, but more in Wales, if you haue respect vnto the seuerall quantities of ỹ countries, howbeit as they are very profitable, in somer half of the yere, so are a number of them to small commoditie in the winter part, as common experience doth teach, yet this I find of many of these mores, that in times past they haue bēne harder ground, and sundrye of them well replenished wyth great woodes, that now are voyde of bushes: and for example hereof, we maye see the tryall (besides the rootes that are daily found in the depes of Monemouth, where turfe is digged, also in Wales, Abergeyny, and Merioneth) in sundry parts of Lancashyre, where the people go vnto this daye into their Fennes, and Mariles with long spittes, which they dashe here and there, vp to the verye stronge into the grounde, in which practise, (a thinge commonly done in winter) if they happen to smite vpon a tree or blocke, they note the place, and about harueste time, when the ground is at the driest, they come againe and get it vppe, and afterwarde carrying it home, applye it to their vses. The lyke doe they in Shroppeshyre with fire woode, which hath bēne felled in olde time, wythin seauen miles of Salop, some of them fondlyke suppose the same to haue lyen there sith Noes flood: and other more fonde then the rest, imagine them to growe, euen in the places where they finde them, without all consideration, that in times past, the moste parte, if not all Lhoegres and Cambria was generally replenished with woode, which being felled or ouerthrowne, vpon sundry occasions, was left lying in some places still on the grounde, and in procesſe of time, became to be quite ouergrowen with earth and mouldes, which mouldes, wanting their due sadnesse, are nowe turned into mosy plots, whereby it commeth to passe also, that great plentye of water commeth betweene the new lose swart and the olde hard earth, that being drawne awaie, might some leaue a drie soyle to the great lucre and auantage of the owner. We find in our histories, that Lincolne, was sometime buylded by Lud, brother to Cassibillane, who called it Cair

Lud-

Ludcolte of the great store of woodes, that enuironed the same, but now the comodity is vtterly decayed there, so that if Lud were a liue againe in our time, he would not call it his Cittie in ỳ wood, but rather his towne in ỳ plaines: for the wood I say, is wasted altogether about ỳ same, the hils called ỳ Peke, were in lyke sort named Pennith Coit, that is, the woodey hiles, but howe much wode is now to bee seene in those places, let him that hath beene there testifie, if he liste, for I here of none by such as trauayle that waye, and thus much of woodes and mynes, and so farre as I can deale with the same.

¶ Of the Antiquities, or auncient Coines found in England. Cap. 7.

HAuing take some occasion to speak here and there in thys treatise of Antiquities, it shall not be amysse to speake yet more in this chapter, with some of them apart, & by themselues, whereby the secure authorite of the Romaines ouer thys Iland maye in some cases more manifestly appeere. For such was theyr possession of this Islande on this side of the Tynethat they held not one or two or a fewe places onely vnder there subiection, but all the whole countrey from east the to west, from the Tyne to the Brittish Sea, so that there was no region voyd of theyr gouernaunce, notwythstanding that vntil the death of Lucius & extinction of his issue, they did permit ỳ successors of Lud & Cimbælyne to reigne & rule amongst thē, though vnder a certeine tribute, as else where I haue declared. The chief cause that vrgeth me to speake of Antiquities, is the paines that I haue taken to gather great numbers of them togither, entending if euer my Chronology shal happē to come abroad, to set downe the liuely protraitures of euery Emperour ingraued in the same: also the faces of Pompey, Crassus, the seauen kinges of the romaines, Cicero and diuers other which I haue prouided ready for the purpose, beside the monuments & liuely Images of sundrye Philosophers, and Kinges of thys Islande, sithens the time of Edwarde the confessor, whereof although presently I want a fewe, yet I doe not doubt but to obtaine them all, if eyther friendeship or money shall be able to preuaile. But as it hath done hetherto, so the charges to be employed, vpon these brasen or coper Images, will hereafter put by the impression of my booke, whereby it maye come to passe, that long trauaile shall some prooue to be spent in vaine, and much cost come to very small successe, whereof yet I force not greatly, sith by this meanes, I haue reaped some commoditie vnto my selfe, by searching of the histories, which often my nistre store of ensamples, ready to be vsed as occasion shall compell me. But to proceede with my purpose. Before the comming of the Romains, there was a kind of copper money currant herein bryteine, as Cæsar confesseth in ỳ fifth booke of his comentaries, whervnto he addeth a report of certeine rings, of a proportionate weight, which they vsed in his time, in steed likewise of money. But as hetherto it hath not beene my luche to haue the certeine viewe of any of these, so after the cōming of ỳ Romaines, they inforced vs to abandon our owne and receiue such imperiall coine, as for the payment of ỳ Legions was daily brought ouer vnto vs. What coynes ỳ romaines had it is easie to be knowne, & frō time to time much of it is founde in manye places of this Islande, aswell of Golde and Siluer, as of copper, brasse, and other mettall, much lyke steele, almost of euery Emperour, so that I account it no rare thyng to haue of the Romaine coyne, albeit, that it stil represent an ymage of our captiuity, & maye be a good admonition for vs, to take hede howe we yelde our selues to the regiment of straungers. Of the store of these monies, found vpon the Kentishe coast, I haue alreadye made mention, in the description of Richborowe, and chapiter of Iles Adiacent vnto the Brittish Albion, and there shewed also howe simple fisher men haue had plentye of them, and that the very coynes in making proofers and holes to bræde in, haue scraped them out of the grounde in very great abundance. In speaking also of S. Albanes, in the chapter of townes and villages, I haue not omitted to tell what plenty of these coynes haue beene gathered there, wherfore I shall not néede here to repeate the same againe: Howbeit this is certaine, that the most part of all these Antiquities, to be founde with in the lande, & distant from the shore, are to be gotten eyther in the ruines of auncient Cities & Townes decayed, or in inclosed borowes, where their legions accustomed sometime to winter, as by experience is dailye confirmed. What store hath beene seene of them in the citie of London, which they called Augusta, of the Legion that soiourned there, & likewise in Yorke named also Victrix, of the Legion, Victoria or (Altera Roma, because of beautie and fine buylding of the same) I my selfe can partely witnesse, that haue seene, and often had of them, if better testimony were wāting. The like I may affirme of Colchester, where those of Claudius Hadriane, Traiane, Vespasian and other, are of tentymes plowed vp or founde, by other meanes: also of Cantorbury, Andreschester, (now decayed) Rochester then called Durobrevum, Winchester and diuers other beyonde the Thames, which for breuities sake I doe passe ouer in silence: onely the chiefe of all & where most are founde in deede is nere vnto Carleon & Cairgwent in Southwales, about Kenchester, three myles aboue Hereford, Aldborow, Ancaster, Brauoon, Dodington, Cirnechester, Winchester, Camalet, Lacock vpō Auon, Lincolne, Dorchester, Warwick, & Chester, where they are often had in verye great abundaunce. It seemeth that Ancaster hath been a great thing, for many square & coloured pauemēts, vaults, and arches are yet found, & oft layde open by such as digge and plowe in the fieldes about the same, & amongst these, one Wrelby or Roseby, a plowmā, did ere vp not lōg since a stone lyke a trough couered wyth an other stone, wherein was great abundaunce of the aforesayde coynes: the lyke also was seene not yet fourtie yeare agone about Grantham: but in kyng Henryes the eyght hys dayes an husbandman had far better lucke at Harlestone, two miles from the aforesaid place, where he founde not only great store of this coyne, but also an huge brasse pot, and therein a large helmet of pure golde, rychely fretted wyth pearle, & set with all kindes of costly stones: he toke vppe also cheaines much lyke vnto beades of siluer, all which, as being (if a man might gesse any certaintie by their beautie) not likely to be long hidden, he presented to Quéene Catherine then lying at Peterborow, and therewithall a fewe auncient rowles of Parchment written long agone, though so defaced with mouldinesse, and rotten for age, that no man coulde well holde them in hys hand without falling into péces, much lesse reade them by reason of their blindnesse. In the beginning of the same kinges dayes also at Killey a man found as he eared, an arming girdle, harnised wyth pure golde, & a great massy pomell with a crosse hilt for a swoorde of the same mettalle, beside studdes and harnesse for spurres, and the huge long spurres also of lyke stuffe, whereof doctor Kathall got part into his handes. The borowghes or buries whereof, I spake before, were certaine plots of ground, wherein the Romaine souldiours dyd vse to lye when they kept in the open fieldes as chosen places, from whence they might haue easie accesse vnto their aduersaries, yf any outrage were wrought or rebellion moued against them. And as these were the vsuall abodes for those able Legiōs that serued dayly in the warres, so had they other certaine habitations, for the olde and forworne souldiours, whereby diuers cities grewe in time to be replenished with Romaine colonie, as Cairleon, Colcester, Chester, and such other, of which Colcester bare the name of Colonia long tyme, and wherin A. Plautius builded a temple vnto the goddes of victorie (after the departure of Claudius) which Tacitus calleth Arcem sempiternæ dominationis, a perpetuall monument of that our Brittish seruitude. But to returne vnto our borowes they were generally walled about wyth stone walles, and so large in cōpasse that some dyd containe thirtie, fourtie, three score, or eyghtie Acres of grounde within their limites: they had also diuers gates or portes vnto eache of them, and of these not a fewe remayne to be séene in our time, as one for example not far from great Chesterforde in Essex, nere to the limites of Cambridgshire, which I haue often viewed, and wherein the compasse of the very wall wyth the places where the gates stoode is easie to be discerned: the lyke also is to be séene within two miles south of Burton, called the borow hilles. In these therefore and such lyke, is much of their coyne also to be founde, and some péces or other are dayly taken vppe, which they call borowe pence, dwarfes money, beggers pence, fairy groates, Jewes money, and by other foolishe names not worthie to be remembred. At the comming of the Saxons the Britons vsed these holdes as refuges for their cattell in the daye and night when their enemies were abroade, the lyke also dyd the Saxons against the Danes, by which occasions (and nowe and then by carying of their stones to helpe forwarde other buyldings néere at hand) many of them were throwne downe and defaced, which otherwyse myght haue continued for a longer time, and so your selues would say, yf you shoulde happen to perbse the thicknesse and maner of buylding of those walles & borowes. It is not long since a siluer saucer of verye auncient making, was founde nére to Saffron Walden, in the open field among the Sterthyry hilles, and eared vp by a plough, but of such massy greatnesse, that it weighed better then twentie ounces, as I haue heard reported, but yf I shoulde stand in these thinges vntill I had sayde all that might be spoken of them, both by experience and testimonie of Lelande in his Commentaries of Britayne, and the report of diuers yet liuing, I might make a greater chapter then woulde be either conuenient or profitable to the reader: wherefore these shall serue the turne for this time that I haue sayde alreadie readie of antiquities founde within our Iſlande, eſpecially of coyne, whereof I purpoſed chiefely to treate.

Of the Maruelles of England. Cap. 18.

SUch as haue written of the wonders of our countrie in olde time, haue ſpoken no doubt of many things which deſerue no credite at all, and therefore in ſeeking thanckes of their poſteritie by their trauayle in thys behalfe, they haue reaped therewarde of iuſt reproch, and in ſtead of fame purchaſed vnto thẽſelues, nought elſe but mere diſcredit in theyr better Treatiſes. The lyke cõmõlye happeneth alſo to ſuch as in reſpect of lucre doe publiſhe vnprofitable and pernicious volumes, whereby they doe conſume theyr tymes in vayne, and in manifolde wyſe become preiudicial vnto their cõmon welthes: For my part therefore, hauing (I hope) the feare of God before my eyes, I purpoſe here to ſet downe no more, thẽ either I know my ſelfe to be true, or am credibly informed to be ſo, by ſuch godly men, as to whom nothing is more deare then to ſpeake the truth, & not any thing more odious then to defile themſelues by lying. In writing therefore of the rs wonders of England, I finde that there are
r foure notable thinges, which for their rareneſſe amongſt the cõmon ſort, are takẽ for the foure myracles & wonders of the lande. The firſt of theſe, is a vehement & ſtrong wynde, which iſſueth out of certaine hilles called the Peke, ſo violent & ſtrong that certaine tymes if a man do caſt in his cote or cloake into the caue frõ whence it iſſueth, it driueth ẏ ſame backe againe hoyſing it aloft into the open ayre with great force and vehemencie. Of this alſo Giraldus ſpeaketh. The ſeconde is the myraculous ſtanding or rather hanging of certaine ſtones vpon the playne of Salſbury, wherof the place is called Stonehẽge, and to ſay the truth, they may well be wondered at, not onely for the maner of poſition, whereby they become very difficult to be nũbered, but alſo for their greatneſſe & ſtrong maner of lying of ſome of them one vpon an other, which ſeemeth to be with ſo tickle holde that fewe men go vnder them without feare of their preſent ruyne. Howe and when theſe ſtones were brought thyther, as yet I can not reade, howbeit it is moſt likely that they were rayſed there by the Brytons after the ſlaughter of their nobilitie at the deadly banket, which Hengeſt and his Saxons prouided for them, where they were alſo buried and Wortigerne, their king apprehended & ledde away as captiue: I haue heard that the like are to be ſeene in Irelande, but how true it is as yet I can not learne: the report goeth alſo that theſe were brought from thence but by what ſhippe on the ſea and cariage by land, I thinke fewe men can imagine. The third is an ample and large hole vnder the ground, which ſome call Carrer Eole, but in Engliſh Chedderhole: whereinto many men haue entred and walked very farre, howbeit, as the paſſage is large and nothing noyſome, ſo diuers that haue aduentured to go vnto ẏ ſame coulde neuer as yet finde the end of that way, neyther ſee any other thing then prettie riuerettes and ſtreames, which they often croſſed as they went from place to place: Thys Chedderhole or Cheder rocke, is in Somerſethyre, and thence the ſayde waters runne till they mẽte with the ſeconde aye that riſeth in Dwky hole. The fourth is no leſſe notable then any of the other, for weſt warde vpon certaine hils a man ſhall ſee the clowdes of raine gather togither in faire weather vnto a certaine thickeneſſe, & by & by to ſpreade themſelues abroade, and water their fieldes about them, as it were vpon the ſodaine, the cauſes of which diſperſion, as they are vtterly vnknowne, ſo many men coniecture great ſtore of water to be in thoſe hilles, and very nere at hand, if it were needeful to be ſought for. Beſide theſe foure maruelles there is a litle rocky Iſle in Aber barry (a riueret that falleth into the Sauerne ſea) called Barry, which hath a rift or clift next the firſt ſhore, whereunto if a man doe lay his eare, he ſhall heare ſuch noyſes as are commonly made in ſmithes forges by clincking of yron barres, beating with hammers, blowing of bellowes, and ſuch like, whereof the ſuperſtitious ſorte doe gather many toyes, as the gentiles dyd in olde tyme of their lame God Vulcanes potte. The riuer that runneth by Cheſter chaungeth hir chanel euery moneth, the cauſe whereof as yet I cannot learne, neyther doth ſwell by force of any lande ſoude, but by ſome vehement winde, it oft ouerrũneth hir banckes. In Snowdony are two lakes, whereof one beareth a moueable Iſlande, which is caryed to & fro as the winde bloweth, the other hath three kindes of fiſhes in it, as eeles, trowtes, & perches, but herein reſteth the wonder, that all theſe haue but one eye a peece onely, and the ſame ſcituate in the right ſide of their heades, & this I find to be confirmed by authours. There is a Well in the forreſt of Guareſborow, whereof the ſayd forreſt doth take the name, which in a certaine periode of time knowne, cõuerteth wood, fleſh, leaues of trees, and moſſe into harde ſtone, without alteratiõ or chaung-

ing of shape. The lyke also is seene there in frogges, wormes, and such lyke lyuing creatures as fall into the same, & find no ready issue. Of this spring also before mentioned this a litle aboue Marche, but at the farder bank of Rode ryuer as I came, I sawe a Well of wonderfull nature, called Dropping well, because the water thereof distilleth out of great rockes harde by vntoo continually, which is so colde, and thereto of such nature, that what thing soeuer falleth out of ỹ rocks into this pit, or groweth neere thereto, or be cast into it by mans hande, it turneth into stone. I may be saith he, that some sand or other fine ground issueth out wt this water, from these harde rockes, which cleauing vnto those thynges, petreth them in tyme the fourme of stone &c. In parte of the hylles east southeast of Alderly, a myle fro Kingeswode, are stones daily founde, perfitly fashioned like cockles, and mighty Oysters, which some deame to haue lyen there since ỹ floud. In the cliftes betweene the blacke heade and Trewardeth bate in Cornwal, is a certeine caue, where thinges appeare lyke ymages gilded, on the sides of the same, which I take to be nothing else but the shining of ỹ bright Ore of copper & ther mettals, redy at hād to be foūd ther, if any diligēce were vsed. Howbeit because it is marueled at as a rare thing I do not think it conuenient to be placed amōgst our wonders. M. Guise had of late and stil hath for ought ỹ I knowe, a maner in Glocester shyre, where certeine okes doe growe, whose rootes are verye hardē stone. And beside thys the grounde is so fertyll there as they saye, that if a man hewe a stake of anye woode, and pitche it into the grounde, it will growe and take rooting beyond all expectation. Is it any wonder think you to tel of sundrye caues neere vnto Bromwham, on the west side of the ryuer Aymote, wherein are halles, chambers, and al offices of houshold, cut out of the harde rocke. If it be, then maye we increase the number of marueyles very much by the rehearsall of other also, for wee haue many of ỹ like, nere as of to S. Asaphes, vpō the bank of Elwy, and about the head of Uendraeth vehan in Wales, whereinto men haue often entered and walked, & yet founde nothing but large rowmes, & sandy ground vnder their feete, and other elsewhere. But sith these thinges are not strange, I let them alone, and go forward with the rest.

In the paryshe of Landsarnam in wales, and in the side of a stony hil, is a place wherin are foure and twentye seates, hewen out of the harde rockes, but who did cut them, & to what ende, as yet it is not learned. As for the huge stone that lyeth at Pember, in Cuthery parish, and of the notable cachas that is affirmed to lye vnder the same, there is no cause to touch it here, yet were it well done to haue it regarded though it were but onely to see what it is, which the people haue in so great estimation & reuerence. There is also a pole in Logh Taw, among ỹ blacke mountaines in Breknocke shyre, (where as some saye, is the head of Taw that commeth to Swansey) which hath such a property that it will breede no fishe at all, and if any be cast into it, they dye without recouery. There is also a Lake in Wales, which in the one side beareth trowtes so redde as Salmons, and on the other which is the west lyke side, very white and delicate.

Where is a Well not farre from Stonye Stratford, which conuerteth many things into the stone, and another in Wales, which is sayde to double or trible, the force of any edge tole that is quenched in the same. In Megenia a parcell of Wales, there is a noble Well, I meane in the paryshe of Kilken, which is of marueilous nature, for although it be fiue myles from the Sea, it ebbeth and floweth, twise in one daye, alwayes ebbyng when the sea doth vse to flowe, & in flowing likewise when the sea doth vse ebbe, whereof some doe fable, that this Well is lady & mystresse of the Deeane. Not far from thence also is a medicinable spring, called Schynaun of olde time, but nowe Wenefrides Well, in the edges whereof doth breede a very odoriferous and delectable mosse, wherewith the heade of the smeller is marueyloullye refreshed. Other Welles we haue lykewise, which at some times burst out into huge streames, though at other seasons they run but very softly, whereby the people gather some alteratiō of estate to be at hand. Some of the greater sort also giue ouer to runne at all in such times, whereof they conceyue the like opinion. What the folish people dreame of the hell Kettles, it is not worthy the rehersall, yet to the ende the lewde opinion conceyued of them, maye growe into contempt, I will say thus much also of those pits. There are certeine pittes or rather three litle poles, a myle from Darlington, and a quarter of a myle distant from the These bankes, which ỹ people call the Kettes of hell, or the deuils Ketteles, as if he shoulde seethe soules of sinfull men and women in them: they adde also that the spirites haue oft beene harde to crye and yell about them, wyth other like talke sauouring altogether of pagane infidelitye. The truth is (& of this opiniō also was Cuthbert Tunstall Bysshop of Durham) that the Colemines, in those places are kindled or if there be no coles, there may a mine of some other vnctuous matter be set on fire, which beyng here and there consumed, the earth falleth in, and so doth leaue a pitte. In deede the water is nowe and then warme as they saye, and beside that it is not cleere, the people suppose them to be an hundred faddame deepe, the byggest of them also hath an issue into the These. But ynough of these wonders least I doe seeme to be touched in thys description, & thus much of the hel Kettles.

Colemines,

There is a Well in Darby shyre, called Tiddeswell, whose water often seemeth to ryse and fall, as the Sea which is foure mile from it: doth vsually accustome to ebbe and flowe, and hereof an opinion is growen, that it keepeth an ordinary course, as the sea doth, howbeit sith dyuers are knowne to haue watched the same, it may be ỳ at sometimes it ryseth but not continually, and that it so doth I am fullye perswaded to beleeue. But ynough of the wonders lest I do seeme by talking longer of them, wonderouslye to ouershote my selfe, and forget howe much doth rest behynde of the dyscription of my countrey.

¶ Of the foode and diet of the Englishe. Cap. 1.

The situation of our region, lying neere vnto the nozth, doth cause the heate of our stomaches somewhat to increase, and become of greater force, wherefore our bodies doe craue somewhat more ample nourishment, then the inhabitantes of the hotter regions are accustomed withall: whose dygestyue force is not altogither so behement, because their internall heate is not so strong as ours, which is kept in by the coldnesse of the ayre, that from time to tyme especially in winter doth enuiron our bodies.

It is no marueyle therfore that our tables are oftētimes more plētifully garnished thē those of other nations, & this trade hath continued with vs euen sithence the very beginning, for before the Romaines founde out & knewe the waye vnto our country, our predecessours fedde largely vpon flesh & milke, whereof there was great abundance in thys Ile, because they applyed their chief studies vnto pasturage and feeding. After this maner also did our Welch Brytons order thēselues in their dyet so long as they liued of themselues, but after they became to be vnited & made equal with the Englishe, they framed their appetites to liue after our maner, so that at thys day there is very litle difference betweene vs in our dyets. In olde time the nozth Brytons did giue themselues generally to great abstinence, and in tyme of warres their souldiours would often feede but once or twice at the most in two or three dayes, especially if they helde themselues in secrete, or couloe haue no issue out of their Bogges and maryses, thozowe the presence of the enimie. In this penurye also they vsed to creepe into the water or mozish plots vp vnto the chinnes, and there remaine a long tyme, only to qualify the heates of their stomackes by violence, which otherwyse would haue wrought and beene readye to oppresse them for hunger and want of sustinance. In those daies likewise it was taken for a great offence amongst them, to eate eyther goose, hare, or henne, because of a certaine superstitious opinion which they had conceyued of those three creatures, howbeit after that the Romaynes had once founde an entrannce into this Iland, it was not long ere open shipwracke wracke was made of this religious obseruation, so that in proceſſe of time, ſo well the Britons as ẏ Romaines, gaue ouer to make anye ſuch difference in meates, as they had done before time.

From thencefoorth alſo vnto our dayes, & euen in this ſeaſon wherein we liue, there is no reſtraint of any meate, eyther for religions ſake, or publike order, but it is lawfull for euery man to fede vpon whatſoeuer he is able to purchaſe, except it be vpon thoſe dayes whereon eating of fleſhe is eſpecially forbidden, by the lawes of the realme, which order is taken only to the ende our numbers of cattell maye be the better increaſed, and that abundaunce of fiſhe which the ſea yeldeth, more generally receyued. Beſide this there is great conſideration had in making of this lawe for the preſeruatiõ of the nauy, & maintenaunce of conuenient numbers of ſea faryng men, both which woulde otherwyſe greatlye decaye, if ſome meanes were not found, wherby they might be increaſed. But howſoeuer this caſe ſtandeth, white meates, as milk, butter & cheeſe, which were wont to be accoũted of as one of the chiefe ſtayes throwout the Iſland, are now reputed as fode appertinent only to the inferiour ſort, whyleſt ſuch as are more wealthie, doe fede vpon the fleſhe of all kindes of cattell accuſtomed to be eaten, all ſortes of fiſhe taken vpõ our coaſtes and in our freſhe ryuers, & ſuch diuerſitie of wilde and tame foules as are eyther bredde in our Iſlande or brought ouer vnto vs from other countries of the maine.

In number of diſhes and change of meate, the nobilitie of Englande doe moſt exceede, ſith there is no daye in maner that paſſeth ouer their heades, wherein they haue not onely beefe, mutton, veale, lambe, kidde, porke, conie, capon, pigge, or ſo many of theſe as the ſeaſon yeldeth: but alſo ſome portiõ of the redde or fallow deere, beſide great varietie of fiſhe and wildefowle, and thereto ſundrie other delicates wherin the ſweet hande of the Portingale is not wãting: ſo that for a man to dine with one of them, and to taſt of euery diſhe that ſtandeth before him (which fewe vſe to doe, but to fede vppon that him beſt liketh for the time) is rather to yelde vnto a conſpiracie with a great deale of meate for the ſpedie ſuppreſſion of naturall health, thẽ to ſatiſfie himſelfe with a competent repaſt, to ſuſtayne his lyfe withall. But as thys large feeding is not ſeene in their geſtes, no more is it in their owne perſons, for ſith they haue dayly much reſort vnto their tables, (& many tymes vnlooked for) and thereto retayne great numbers of ſeruaunts, it is very requiſite for them to be ſomewhat plentifull in this behalfe. The chiefe part lykewyſe of their dayly prouiſiõ is brought in before thẽ, & placed on their tables, whereof when they haue takẽ what it pleaſeth thẽ, the reſt is reſerued & afterward ſent downe, to their ſeruing men & waiters, who fed thereon in lyke ſort with conuenient moderatiõ, their reuerſion alſo being beſtowed vpõ the poore, which lye ready at their gates in great numbers to receyue the ſame. This is ſpokẽ of the chiefe tables whereat the nobleman, his ladie and gueſtes are accuſtomed to ſit, beſide which they haue a certayne ordinarie allowaunce dayly appointed for their halles, where the chiefe officers, and houſholde ſeruaunts, (for all are not permitted to waite vppon theyr maiſter) & with them ſuch inferiour gueſtes do fede as are not of calling to aſſociate the noble mã himſelf: ſo that beſides thoſe afore mencioned which are called to the principall table, there are commonly fourtie or three ſcore perſons fed in thoſe halles to the great reliefe of ſuch ſtrãgers, as oft be partakers thereof. As for drincke it is not vſually ſet on the table in pottes or cruſes, but each one calleth for a cup of ſuch as he liſteth to haue, or as neceſſitie vrgeth him: ſo ẏ whẽ he hath taſted of it he deliuereth the cuppe againe to ſome one of the ſtanders by, who making it cleane, reſorteth it to the cubborne frõ whẽce he fetched the ſame. By this occaſion much pole tippling is furthermore cut of, for whereas if the full pottes ſhoulde continually ſtande nere the trencher, diuers woulde alwayes be dealing with them, whereas now they drincke ſeldome only to auoide the note of great drinkers, or often troubling of ẏ ſeruitours. Neuertheleſſe in the noble mẽs halles, this order is not vſed, neyther in any mans houſe commonly vnder the degree of a knight or Squire of great reuenues. The gentlemen and marchant kepe much about one rate, and eache of them contenteth himſelfe with foure, or fiue or ſixe diſhes, when they haue but ſmall reſorte, or peraduenture with one or two, or three at the moſt, when they haue no ſtraungers to accompanie them at their owne table. And yet their ſeruauntes haue their ordinarye dyet aſſigned, beſide ſuch as is left at their maſters boordes, and not appointed to be brought thither the ſeconde time, which is often ſeene generally in veniſon, or ſome eſpeciall diſhe, whereon the Marchaunte man himſelfe lyketh to fede whẽ it is colde, or peraduenture is better ſo then yf it were warme or hote. To be ſhort, at ſuch time as the marchauntes doe make their ordinarie or voluntarie feaſts, it is a woꝛlde to sée what great pꝛouision is made of all maner of delicate meates, from euery quarter of the country, wherein beside that they are oftẽ comparable herein to the nobilitie of the lande, they will seldome regarde any thing that the butcher vsually killeth, but reiect the same as not woꝛthie to come in place. In such cases also geliffes, conserues, suckettes, codinacs, marmilates, marchepaine, sugred bꝛead, gingerbꝛeade, flozentines, wildfowle, venison of all soꝛtes, & outlandish confectiõs do generally beare ỹ sway, with other infinite deuises of our owne not possible foꝛ me to remember. But amõg all these, the kinde of meate which is obtayned with most difficultie is commonly taken foꝛ the most delicate, & therupon eache guest will soneste desire to fæde. And as all estates doe excéede herein, (I meane foꝛ number of costly dishes) so these foꝛget not to vse ỹ like excesse in wine, insomuch as there is no kind to be had (neither any where moze stoze of al soꝛtes then in Englãd) wherof at such great mẽtinges there is not some poꝛtion pꝛouided. Furthermoze when these haue had their course which nature yeldeth, sundꝛy soꝛtes of artificial stuffe, must in like maner succéede in their turnes, besíde Ale & bére which neuertheless beare the greatest bꝛunt in dꝛinking, and are of so many soꝛtes & ages as it pleaseth the Bꝛuer to make them. The bere that is vsed at noble mens tables is commõlye of a yéare olde, (oꝛ peraduenture of two yeres tunning oꝛ moze, but this is not generall) it is also bꝛued in Marche & therefoze called Marche bere, but foꝛ the housholde it is vsually not vnder a monethes age, eache one couetíng to haue ỹ same stale as he may so that it be not soure, and his bꝛeade new as is possible, so that it be not hote. The artificer, and husbandman, make greatest accompt of such meate, as they maye soneste come by and haue it quicklyest readie: their fode also consisteth pꝛincipally in Béefe and such meate as the Butcher selleth, that is to say Mutton, Veale, Lamb, Poꝛke. &c. wherof the Artificer findeth great stoze in the markets adioyning, beside Souse, Bꝛawne, Bacon, Fruite, Pyes of fruite, Foules of sundꝛie soꝛtes, Chéese, Butter, Egges. &c. as the other wãteth it not at home, by his owne pꝛouision, which is at the best hande, & commonly least charge. In feasting also this latter soꝛt doe excéede after their maner: especially at Bꝛydales, purifications of women, and such like odde mẽtinges, where it is incredible to tell what meate is consumed and spent, eache one bꝛinging such a dishe, oꝛ so many, as hys wyfe and he doe consult vpon, but alwayes with this consideration that the lésser friende, shall haue the best intertainement. This also is commonly séene at these bankets, that the goodman of the house is not charged with any thing sauing bꝛead, dꝛinke, house rowme and fire. But the artificers in cities and good townes doe deale farre otherwyse, foꝛ albeit that some of them doe suffer their iawes to go oft befoꝛe their clawes, & diuers of thẽ by making good cheare do hinder themselues and other men, yet the wiser soꝛt can handle the matter well ynough in these Junkettinges, and therefoze their frugalitie deserueth commendation. To conclude both the artícer and the husbandman, are sufficiently liberall, and very friendly at their tables, and when they mẽte, they are so merie without malice, and plaine without inwarde craft & subtilty that it woulde doe a man good to be in companie among them. Herein onely are the inferiour soꝛt to be blamed, that being thus assembled their talke is now and then such as sauoureth of scurrilitie and ribaldꝛye a thing naturallye incident to carters, & clownes, who thincke themselues not to be merie and welcome, yf their folish vaines in this behalfe be neuer so little restrayned. This is mozeouer to be added in these assembles, that if they happen to stumble vpon a péece of venison and a cup of wine oꝛ very strong bére oꝛ ale, which latter they commonly pꝛouide agaynst their appoynted dayes, they thincke their cheare so great, and themselues to haue fared so well, as the Lozde Mayoꝛ of London, with whome when their bellies be full they will often make comparison. I might here talke somewhat of the great silence that is vsed at the tables of the honozable & wyser soꝛt, generally ouer all ỹ realme, likewyse of the moderate eating and dꝛincking that is dayly séene, and finally of the regard that eache one hath to kéepe himselfe from the note of surfetting and dꝛunkennesse, (foꝛ which cause salt meate except béefe, bacon, and poꝛke are not any white estéemed, and yet these thꝛée may not be much powdered) but as in rehearsall thereof I should commende the noble man, marchant, and frugall artificer, so I coulde not cleare the meaner soꝛt of husbandmen, and country inhabitaunts of very much babbling (except it be here and there some odde man) & nowe & then surfeting and dꝛunkennesse, which they rather fall into foꝛ want of héede taking, thẽ wilfully following oꝛ delighting in those errours of set minde and purpose. The bꝛeade thoꝛowout the lande is made of such graine as the soyle yeldeth, neuertheless the gentilitie commõly pꝛouide themselues sufficiently of wheate for their owne tables, whylest their houshold and poore neighbours are inforced to content themselues with Rye, or Barley, yea & in tyme of dearth with breade made eyther of beanes, pease, or Otes, or of al togither, of which scourge the poorest do soonest tast, sith they are least able to prouide themselues of better. I will not say that this extremitie is oft so well to be seen in tyme of plentie, as of dearth but if I should I could easily bring my triall: for albeit that there be much more grounde eared nowe almost in euerye place, then hath béene of late yeares, yet such a price of corne continueth in eache towne and market wythout any iust cause, that the artificer and poore labouring man, is not able to reach vnto it, but is driuen to cõtent hymselfe with horsecorne, I meane, beanes, pease, otes, tares, and lintelles: and therefore it is a true prouerbe, and neuer so well verified as now, that hunger setteth his first foote into the horse manger. If the world last a while after this rate, wheate and rye will be no graine for poore men to fede on, & some catterpillers there are that can saye so much already. Of breade made of wheat we haue sundry sortes, daily brought to the table, whereof the first and most excellent is the manchet, which we commonlye call white breade, in latin primarius panis, whereof Budeus also speaketh, in his first booke de asse. The second is the cheate, or wheaton bread, so named because the colour thereof resembleth the graie wheat, and out of this is the coursest of the brennes (vsually called gurgeons or pollarde) taken. The raueled is a kinde of chete breade also, but it retayneth more of the grosse, and lesse of the pure substance of the wheate: and this beyng more sleightly wrought vp, is vsed in the houses of the nobilitie, and gentry onely, whereas the other is baked in cities and good townes of an appointed size (according to such price as the corne doth beare) by a statute prouided in that behalfe. The next sort is named browne breade of the colour, of which we haue two sortes, one baked vp as it commeth from the mille, so that neyther the brennes nor the floure, are any whit diminished, thys Celsus called Autopirus panis. lib. 2. and putteth it in the seconde place of nourishment. The other hath little or no floure left therein at al, howbeit he calleth it panem Cibarium, and it is not onely the worst and weakest of all the other sortes, but also appointed in olde tyme for seruants, and the inferiour kinde of people. Hereunto likewise because it is dry and brickle in the working (for it will hardely be made vp handsomely into loues) some adde a portion of rye meale, wherby the rough drynesse or drie roughnesse thereof is somewhat qualified, and then it is named misselen, that is, bread made of mingled corne, albeit that diuers doe mingle wheate and rye of purpose at the mille, & sell the same at the markettes vnder the aforesayde name.

A famine at hand is first séene in ỹ horse maunger, when the poore doe fall to horsecorne

Primarius panis.

The size of breade is very ill kept or not at all lo=ked vnto in the cõtrey townes & markets.

Panis Cibarius.

In champeigne countryes much rye and barly breade it eaten, but especiallye where wheate is scant and geson. As for the difference that is betwéene the summer & winter wheate, most husbandmen knowe it not, sith they are neyther acquainted with summer wheat, nor winter barley: yet here and there I finde of both sortes, but in so small quantities, as that I dare not pronounce them to be any thing common among vs.

Our drinke whose force and continuance is partly touched already, is made of barley, water, and hoppes, sodden and mingled togither, by the industry of our bruers, in a certaine exact proportion. But before our barley doe come vnto their handes, it sustaineth great alteration, and is conuerted into mault, ỹ making wherof, I will her set down in such order, as my skill therein may extend vnto, (for I am scarse a good maultster) chiefly for that forreine writers haue attẽpted to describe the same, & the making of our bére, wherein they haue shot so farre wyde as the quantity of ground was betwéene thẽselues and their marke. In the meane tyme beare with me gentle reader, (I beséech thée) that leade thee from the description of the plentyfull diet of our countrey, vnto the fonde reporte of a seruyle trade, or rather from a table delicately furnished, into a muskye mault house, but such is now thy hap, wherefore I praye thée be contented.

Mau

Our Mault is made of the best Barley, which is steéped in a cysterne, in greater or lesse quantitye, by the space of three dayes, and three nyghtes, vntyll it be thorowelye soked. This beyng done the water is drayned from it by lyttle and lyttle, tyll it bée quite gone. Afterwarde they take it out, and laying it vpon the cleane floure on a rounde heape, it resteth so vntill it be ready to shote at the rote ende, which maltsters call comming. When it beginneth therefore to shote in thys maner, they saye it is come, and then forthwith they spreade it abroade, first thick and afterwarde thinner and thinner vppon the sayde flower (as it commeth) and there it lyeth (with turning euery daye foure or fiue times) by the space of one and twenty daies at the least, the worke man not suffring it in any wise to take any heate, whereby the bud ende shoulde spire, that bringeth forth the blade, blade, and by which ouerſight the maulte woulde be ſpoyled, and come to ſmall cõmoditie. When it hath gone or bëne turned ſo long vpon the floure, they carye it to a kyll couered wyth heire cloth, where they gyue it gentle heates (after they haue ſpʒede it there very thinne abʒoad) till it be dʒye, and in the meane while they turne it often, that it may be vnifoʒmly dʒied. For the moʒe it be dʒyed the better the mault is, and the longer it will continue, whereas if it be not dʒyed downe (as they call it) but ſlackely handled, it wyll bʒeed a kind of woʒme, called a wiuel, which groweth in the flowʒe of the coʒne, and in pʒoceſſe of time, will ſo eate out it ſelfe, that nothing ſhal remaine of the graine but euen the rinde or huſke. The beſt mault is tryed by the hardneſſe & colour, for if it will write lyke a pëce of chalke, after you haue bytten a kyrnell in ſunder in the middeſt, then you may aſſure your ſelf ỳ it is dʒyed downe. In ſome places it is dʒyed with wode alone, or ſtrawe alone, in other with wode and ſtraw togither, but of all the ſtrawe dʒyed is the moſt excellent. For the wode dʒyed mault when it is bʒued, beſide that it is higher of collour, it doth hurt and annoye the heade of him that is not vſed thereto becauſe of the ſmoke. Such alſo as vſe both indifferẽtly do cleaue and dʒye theyr wode, to remoue all moyſture that ſhoulde pʒocure the ſmoke, & thys mault is in the ſeconde place, and with the ſame likewiſe, that which is made wyth dʒyed fyʒze, bʒome, &c. whereas if they alſo bë occuppyd grëne, they are in manner to pʒeiudiciall to the coʒne, as the moiſt wode. And thus much of our Maultes in bʒuyng whereof they grynde the ſame ſomewhat groſelye, and in ſëthyng well the liquour that ſhall bë put vnto it, they adde to euerye nine quarters of mault one of headecoʒne, which cõſiſteth of ſundʒy graine, as wheate, Otes, Peaſon, &c. They ſëth theyr woʒt alſo twiſe, that is once befoʒe they maſhe, or mixe it with the mault, and once after after, adding furthermoʒe vnto this later ſëthing, a certeine number of engliſhe hops, (for the outlandiſh are founde nowe to be the woʒſt) accoʒding to whoſe quantitie, the continuaunce of the dʒinke is determined. For it fëdeth vpon the hoppe, and laſteth ſo long as the foʒce of the ſame continueth, which being extinguiſhed the dʒinke dyeth, and becõmeth of no value. In this trade alſo our bʒuers obſerue very diligently the nature of the water which they daily occuppye, for all waters are not of lyke goodneſſe in thys buſyneſſe, wherefoʒe the diligent woʒkeman doth redëme the iniquity of that element, by changing of his pʒopoʒtions, which trouble in ale (ſometime our onelye, but nowe taken with many only for olde & ſickmens dʒinke) is neuer ſëne noʒ harde of. Howbeit as the bëre well bʒued and ſtale, is clëre and well coloured as muſcadell or malueſey, ſo our ale which is not at all or verye little ſodden, and without hoppes, is moʒe thicke, fulſome and of no ſuch continuance, which are thrë ontable thynges, to bë conſidered in that liquoʒ, but what for that. Certes I knowe ſome ale knightes ſo much addicted therevnto, that they will not ceaſe from moʒow vntyll euen, to viſite theſame, clenſing houſe after houſe, till they defile themſelues. Such ſleights alſo haue the alewiues for the vtterraunce of this dʒinke, that they wyll mixe it with roſen and ſalt, but if you heate a knyfe redde hotte, and quench it in the ale, ſo nëre the bottome of the pot as you can put it, you ſhal ſëe the roſe hanging on the knife. As for the foʒce of ſalt, it is well knowne by the effecte, for the moʒe the dʒinker tipleth ỳ moʒe he may, and ſo doth hë cary a dʒy dʒunken ſoule to bed with him, except his lucke be the better, but to my purpoſe. In ſome places of england, there is a kind of dʒink, made of apples, which they call cidar or pomage, but ỳ of peares is named pirry. Certs theſe 2. are very common in Kent, Woʒceſter, & other ſtëdes, where theſe kindes of fruites doe abounde, howbeit they are not theyr oneiye dʒyncke, at all tymes, but referred vnto the delicate ſoʒtes of dʒinke, as Metheglin is in Wales, wherof the welchmen make no leſſe accompt, then the Grëkes did of theyr Ambroſia, or Nectar, which for the pleaſantneſſe thereof, was ſuppoſed to bë ſuch as the goddeſſe themſelues did vſe. There is a kind of ſwith ſwath made alſo in Eſſex, and dyuers other places, wyth Hony and water, which the countrey wiues putting ſome pepper & a little other ſpice among, call meade, verye good in myne opinion for ſuch as loue to bë loſſe bodied, otherwiſe it differeth ſo much from the true Metheglin, as chalke doth from chëſe. Truely it is nothing elſe but the waſhing of the combes, whë the hony is wʒong out, and one of the beſt things that I knowe belonging thereto is, ỳ they ſpend but little labour and leſſe coſt in making of the ſame, and therefoʒe no great loſſe if it were neuer occuppyd.

Hetherto of the dyet of my Countreymenne, and ſome what moʒe at large peraduenture then manye menne will like of, wherefoʒe I thinke good nowe to fynyſhe thys chapter, and ſo will I when I haue added a few other thinges incident vnto that

which goeth before, whereby the whole proceſſe of the ſame ſhall fully be deliuered, and my promiſe to my friend in this behalfe performed. Heretofore there hath bene much more tyme ſpent in eating and drincking the commonly is in theſe dayes, for whereas of olde we had breakfaſtes in the forenoone, beuerages, or nuntions after dinner, & therto rere ſuppers generally when it was tyme to go to reſt (a toy brought in by hard Canutus) nowe theſe odde repaſtes thancked be God are verye well left, and eache one in maner (except here and there some young hungry ſtomache that cannot faſt till dinner tyme,) contenteth himſelfe with dinner and ſupper onely. The Normans miſlyking the gurmandize of Canutus, ordayned after their arriualle, that no table ſhoulde be couered aboue once in the day, which Huntingdon imputeth to their auarice: but in the ende either wery of their owne frugalitie, or ſuffering the cockle of olde cuſtome to ouergrowe the good corne of their newe conſtitution, they fell to ſuch libertie, that in often feeding they ſurmounted Canutus ſurnamed the hardy. For whereas he couered his table, but three or foure times in the day, they ſpred their clothes fiue or ſixe tymes, and in ſuch wiſe as I before rehearſed. They brought in alſo the cuſtome of long and ſtately ſitting at meate, which is not yet left, although it be a great expence of tyme, and woorthye reprehenſion. For the nobilitie gentlemen & marchant men, eſpecially at great meetings doe ſit commonly till two or three of the clocke at afternoone, ſo that with many it is an hard matter, to ryſe from the table to go to euening prayer, & returne from thence to come tyme ynough to ſupper. For my part I am perſwaded that the purpoſe of the Normans at the firſt was to reduce the auncient Romaine order in feeding once in the day, and towarde the euening as I haue reade & noted. In deede the Romaines had ſuch a cuſtome, and lykewyſe the Gretians as maye appeare by the woordes of Socrates, who ſayd vnto ỹ Athenians Oriente ſole conſilium, occidente conuiuium eſt cogitandum. Plato called the Sicilians monſters in that they vſed to eate twiſe in the day: Among the Perſians onelye the king dined when the ſonne was at the higheſt, and ſhadowe of the ſtile at the ſhorteſt: the reaſt (as it is reported) went alwayes to meate as their ſtomackes craued it. Howbeit at the laſt they fell generally to allow of ſuppers toward the ſetting of the ſunne, bycauſe they woulde haue all their family to go to meate togither, & whervnto they woulde appoynt their gueſtes to come at a certayne length of the ſhadow, to be perceyued in their dialles. Their ſlaues in lyke ſort were glad, when it grewed to the tenth foote for then were they ſure ſone after to go to meate. In the ſcripture we read of many ſuppers and fewe dinners, only for that dining was not greatly vſed in Chriſts tyme, but taken as a thing lately ſprong vp, when pampering of the belly began to take holde, occaſioned by ydleneſſe and great abundaunce of riches. It is prettie to note in Iuuenall, how he taunteth Marius for that he gaue himſelf to drincking before the * ninth houre of the day, for thincking three houres to be to litle for the filling of his belly, he beganne commonly at eyght, which was an houre to ſone. Afterwards ſixe houres onely were appointed to woorke and conſult in, and the other ſixe of the day to fede & drincke in, as the Verſe ſayeth.

Sex horæ tanto rebus tribuantur agendus viuere poſt illas littera zetha monet.

But how Martial deuided his day, and with him the whole troupe of the learned and wiſer ſort, theſe verſes following doe more euidently declare.

Thus we ſee how the auncient maner of the gentils was to fede but once in the day and that towarde night, till glotonie grewe on, and altered that good cuſtome. With vs the nobilitie, gentrie and ſtudents, doe ordinarily go to dinner at aleauen before none, and to ſupper at fiue, or betweene fiue and ſixe at afternoone. The marchaunts dine and ſuppe ſeldome before 12. at none, & ſixe at night eſpecially in London. The huſbandmen dine alſo at high none as they call it, & ſup at ſeauen or eyght: but out of the terme in our Vniuerſities the ſcholers dine at tenne. As for the pooreſt ſort they generally dine and ſup when they may ſo that to talke of their order of repaſt, it were but needeleſſe matter.

Of our apparell and attire. Cap. 2.

A Nenglishman indeuouring ſometime to write of our attire, made ſundry platformes for his purpoſe, ſuppoſing by ſome of them them to finde out one stedfast ground whereon to builde the summe of his discourse. But in the ende (like an oratour, long without exercise) when he saw what a difficult péece of worke he had taken in hande, he gaue ouer his trauelle, and onelye drue the picture of a naked man, vnto whome he gaue a paire of sheares in the one hande, and a péece of cloth in the other, to the ende he should shape his apparrell after such fashion as himselfe liked, sith he could finde no kind of garment that coulde please him any whyle togyther, and this he called an Englishman. Certes thys writer (otherwise being a learned and vngracious priest) shewed himselfe herein not to be voyde of iudgement, sith the phantasticall follye of our nation is such, that no forme of apparrell liketh vs longer then the first garment is in the wearing, if it continue so long and be not layde aside, to receyue some other trinket newly deuised by the sicle headded Taylours, who couet to haue seuerall trickes in cutting, thereby to draw fond customers to more expence of money. For my part I can tell better howe to inueigh against this enormitie, then describe our attire: sithens such is our mutabilitie, that to day there is none to the Spanishe guise, to morowe the French toyes are most fine and delectable, ere long no such apparell as that which is after the high Almaine fashion, by and by the Turkish maner is generally best liked of, otherwise the Persico gownes and the Barbarian sléeues make such a comelye vesture, that except it were a dog in a dublet, you shall not sée anye so disguised, as are my cõtrey men of england. And as these fashiõs are diuers, so likewise it is a worlde to se the costlinesse and the curiositie: the excesse and the vanitie: the pompe and the bravery: the chaunge and the variety: and finally the sicleneſse and the folly that is in all degrées: insomuch that nothing is more constant in england then inconstancie of attire. Neither cã we be more iustly burdened with any reproche, then inordinate behauiour in apparrell, for which most nations deride vs, as also for that we men doe séeme to bestowe most cost vpon our arses & much more then vpon all the rest of our bodies, as women do likewise vpon their heads and shoulders. In women also it is most to be lamented, that they doe now farre exceede the lightnesse of our men (who neuertheleſse are transformed from the cap euen to the very shoe) and such staring attire as in time past was supposed méete for none but light housewiues onely, is now become an habit for chast & sober matrones. What should I say of their dublets wyth pendaunt codpises on the breast full of iags and cuts, and sléeues of sundry colours, their galligascons, coloured nethersocks, and such lyke, whereby their bodies are rather deformed then commended. I haue met with some of them in London so but disguised, that it hath passed my skill to discerne whyther they were men or women. Thus it is now come to passe, that womẽ are become men, and men turned into monsters: & those good giftes which almightie God hath giuen vnto vs to relæue our necessitie withall, not otherwyse bestowed them in all excesse as if we will not otherwise howe to consume and waste them. I pray God that in this behalfe our sinne be not lyke vnto that of Sodoma and Gomorha, whose errors were pride, excesse of diet, & abuse of Gods benefits abundantly bestowed vpon them, besides want of charitie toward the poore, and certaine other pointes which ỹ Prophet shutteth vp in silence. Certes the commõ wealth can not be sayde to florishe where these abuses reigne, but is rather oppressed by vnreasonable exactions made vpõ farmers & tenants, wherwith to maintayne the same. Neither was it euer merye with Englande then when an Englishmã was knowne by his owne cloth, and contented himselfe with his fine carsie hosen, and a meane slop: his coate, gowne & cloake of browne blew or puke, with some prette furniture of velvet or furre, & a doublet of sadde Tawny, or blacke Velvet, or other comelye Sylke, without such gawrish coulours as are worne in these dayes, & neuer brought in but by the consent of ỹ french, who thincke thẽselues the gaiest men, when they haue most diuersitie, & chaunge of coulours about them. I might here name a sort of hewes deuised for the nones, wherewith to please fantasticall heades, as gooseturde greene, the Deuell in the heade, (I shoulde say the hedge) and such like, but I passe them ouer thincking it sufficient to haue sayd thus much of apparell generally, when nothing can particularly be spoken of any constancie thereof.

¶ Of the Lawes of England.

Cap. 3.

THat Samothes or Dis gaue the first Lawes vnto the Celtes (whose kingdome he erected about the fiftéene of Nymrote) the testimonye of Berosus, is prowe sufficient. For he not only affirmeth him to publish the same in the fourth of Ninus, but also addeth thereto, howe there lyued none in hys dayes of more excellent wisdome, nor pollilike inuention then he, whereof he was named Samothes, as some other doe affyrme.

Albion. What his lawes were it is now altogyther vnknowne, as most things of thys age, but that they were altered againe at the cõming of Albion, no mã cã absolutly deny, sith new Lordes vse commonly to gyue newe lawes, and conquerours abolish such as were in vse before them.

Bzute. The lyke also maye be affirmed of our Bzute, notwythstanding that the certayne knowledge so well of the one as of the other is perished, & nothing worthy memory left of all theyr doyngs. Somewhat yet we haue of Mulmutius Mulmutius, who not only, subdued such pzinces as reigned in this land, but also brought the Realme to good order, that long before had bene torne wyth ciuill discorde. But where his lawes are to be found, and which they be from othermens, no man lyuing in these dayes is able to determine.

The pzaise of Dunwallon. Certes there was neuer Pzince in Bzyteyne, of whome his subiectes conceyued better hope in the beginning, then of Bladudus, and yet I reade of none that made so ridiculous an ende: in lyke sorte there hath not reigned any Monarche in thys Ile, whose wayes were more feared at ẏ first, thẽ those of Dunwallon, (king Henry the fift excepted) & yet in the end he pzoued such a Pzynce, as after hys death, there was in maner no subiecte, that did not lament his funerralles. And this only for his pollicy in gouernance, seuere administration of iustice, and pzouident framing of his lawes, and constitutions. His people also coueting to continue his name vnto posterity, intituled those his ordinaunces according to theyr maker, callyng them by the name of the lawes of Mulmutius, which indured in execution among the Bzytons, so long as our homelynges had the dominiõ of this Ile. Afterward when the Saxons had once obteyned the superiozitie of the kingdome, the maiestie of these laws fell for a time into such decaye, that although non penitus cecidit, tamen potuit cecidisse videri, as Leland sayth, and the lawes themselues had vtterlye perished in deede at the very first bzunt had they not bene pzeserued in wales, where they remayned amongst the reliques of the Bzytons, and not onely vntil the comming of the Normans, but euen vntill the time of Edwarde the first, who obteyning the souereinty of that portion, indeuoured to extinguishe those of Mulmutius, and to establishe his owne.

But as the Saxõs at their first arriuall did what they coulde to abolishe the Bzyttishe lawes, so in pzocesse of time they yelded a little to relent and not so much to abhorre and mislike of the lawes of Mulmutius, as to receyue and embzace the same, especially at such time as the Saxon pzinces entered into amitie with the Bzittish Pzinces, and after that ioyne in matrimonie, with the Bzytishe Ladyes. Wherof also it came to passe in the ende, that they were contented to make a choise and insert no small numbers of them into their own volumes, as may be gathered by those of Atherbert ẏ great surnamed king of Kent, Inas & Alfrede, kinges of the west Saxons, and diuers other yet extant to be sene. Such also was the lateward estimation of them, that when anye of the Saxon Pzinces went aboute to make anye newe lawes, they caused those of Mulmutius which Gildas sometime translated into Latine, to be expounded vnto them, and in thys perusall if they founde anye there alreadye framed, that might serue their turnes, they forthwith reuiued the same, and annexed them to their owne. But in this dealing, the diligence of Alfrede is most of all to bee commended, who not onelye chose out the best, but gathered togither all such whatsoeuer the sayde Mulmutius had made: & then to the ende they shoulde lye no more in corners as forlorne bookes and vnknowne, he caused them to be turned into the Saxon tongue, wherein they continued long after hys decease. As for the Normans, who neither regarded the Bzittish, nor cared for the Saxon lawes, they also at the first vtterlye mislyked of the, till at the last when they had well weighed that one kinde of regiment is not cõuenient for al peoples, & that no stranger beyng in a forreine Countrey newely brought vnder obedience, coulde make such equall ordinaunces, as he might thereby gouerne his new cõmon wealth without some care of trouble: they fell in so wyth a desire to see by what rule the estate of the land was gouerned in time of the Saxons, that hauing perused the same, they not onely commended their maner of regiment, but also admitted a great part of their lawes, (nowe currant vnder the name of S. Edwardes lawes, and vsed as pzinciples and groundes) whereby they not onely qualified the rygor of theyr owne, and mittigated their almost intollerable burden of seruitude which they had lately layde vpon the shoulders of the English, but also left vs a great nvmber of Mulmutin lawes, wherof the most part are in vse to thys daye as I sayde, albeit that we knowe not certeinly howe to distinguish them from other, that are in strength amongst vs.

After Dunwallon, the next lawe gyuer

was Martia whome Lelande surnameth Proba, & after him John bale also, who in hys Centuries doth iustely confesse himselfe to haue bene holpen by the sayde Leland, as I my selfe doe likewise for many thinges conteined in thys treatize. She was wyfe vnto Gutteline king of ỹ Brytons: & being made protectrix of the realme, after hyr husbands decease in the nonage of hyr sonne, and seing many thinges daily to growe vp among hir people worthy reformation, she deuised sundry and those very politike lawes, for the gouernaunce of hyr kingdome, which hir subiectes when she was deade and gone, did name the Martian statutes. Who turned them into latine, as yet I doe not read, howbeit as I said before of the lawes of Mulmucius, so the same Alfrede caused those of thys excellently well learned Lady (whome diuers cõmende also for hir great knowledge, in the Greke tong) to be turned into hys owne language, whereupon it came to passe that they were dailye executed among hys subiectes, afterwarde allowed of (among the rest) by the Normans, and finally remaine in vse in these dayes, notwithstanding that we can not discreuer them very redily from the other.

The 7. alteratiõ of lawes was practised by the Saxons, for I ouerpasse the lawes made by the Romaines, whose order do partly remaine in publike notice, vnder ỹ names of the mercian, and the Saxon Lawe. Beside these also I reade of the Danelawe, so that the people of middle england, were ruled by the first, the west Saxons by the seconde, as Esser, Norffolke, Suffolke, Cambridgshire, and part of Herford shyre, were by the third, of al the rest the most inequal & intollerable. Among other things also vsed in the time of ỹ Saxons, it shal not be amysse to set downe the forme of their Ordalian law, which they brought hither with them from beyonde the Seas, and vsed onely in the tryall of giltye and vngiltinesse. Certes it conteyned not an ordinary procéding by dayes and termes, as in the Ciuile and common lawe we see practised in these dayes but a shorte dispatch and tryall of the matter, by fyre, or water, whereof at this present I will deliuer the circumstance, as I haue faithfully translated it out of an auncient volume, and conferred wyth a prynted coppie, lately published by W. Lambert, nowe ertaunt to be redde.

The Ordalian saith the aforesayd authour, was a certaine maner of purgation vsed two wayes, whereof the one was by fire, the other by water. In thexecution of that which was done by fire, the party accused shoulde go a certaine number of paces, with an hote péce of yron in his hande, or elles bare foted vpon certaine plough shares, redde hotte, according to the maner. This Iron was sometime of one pounde weight, and then was it called single Ordalium, sometimes of three, & then named treble, Ordalium, and whosoeuer did beare or treade on the same without hurt of his body, he was adiudged giltlesse, otherwyse if his skin were scorched, he was forthwith condemned as gylty of the trespasse whereof he was accused.

There were in lyke sorte two kinds of triall by ỹ water, that is to say, either by hote, or colde: & in this tryall the partye thought culpeable, was eyther tumbled into some pond, or huge vessell of colde water, wherein if he continued for a season, without wrestling or strugling for lyfe, he was forthwyth acquited as giltlesse of the facte whereof hée was accused: but if he beganne to plunge, & labor once for breath immediately vpon his falling into that lyquour, he was by and by condemned, as gilty of the crime. Or else he did thurst his arme vp to the shoulder into a leade, copper, or Caldron of sething water, from whence if he withdrewe the same without any maner of damage, he was discharged of farder molestation: otherwyse hée was taken for a trespasser, and punished accordingly. The fiery maner of purgation belonged onely to noble men and women, and such as were frée borne, but the husbandmen and villaines, were tryed by water, whereof to shewe the vnlearned dealing and bysnde ignorance of those times, it shall not bée impertiment to set forth the whole maner, which continued here in England vntill the time of King John, who seyng the manifold subtilties in the same, did extinguish it altogither as flat lewdenesse and bouerye. The Rubrik of ỹ treatize entereth thus. Here beginneth ỹ execution of Iustice, whereby the giltie or vngiltie are tried by hote Iron. The & followeth. After accusatiõ lawfully made, and three dayes spent in fasting and prayer, the Preist being cladde in all his holly vestures, sauing his vestiment, shall take the Iron layde before the alter with a payre of tongues, and singing the himme of the three children, that is to saye, O all yée workes of God the Lorde, and in latine Benedicite omnia ópera, &c. he shall cary it solemly to ỹ fire (already made for ỹ purpose) & first say these words ouer the place where ỹ fire is kindled wherby this purgation shall bée made in latin as insueth. Benedic domine deus locum, istum vt sit nobis in eo sanitas, sanctitas, castitas, virtꝰ et victoria, et sanctimonia, humilitas, bonitas, lenitas, et plenitudo Legis, et obediētia deo patri et filio et spiritui sancto. Hec Benedictio, sit super hunc locum, et super omnes habitantes in eo, in Englisshe: Blesse thou O Lorde this place that it may be to vs health holynesse, chastity, vertue, and victory, pureness, humilitie, goodnesse, gentlenesse, and fulnesse of the lawe, and obedience to God the father, the sonne, & the holy ghost. This blessing be vpon this place, and all that dwel in it. Then followeth the blessing of the fire.

Domine deus, pater omnipotens lumen indeficiens, exaudi nos, quia tu es conditor, omnium luminum. Benedic domine hoc lumen, quod ante sanctificatum est, qui illuminasti omnē hominem, venientem in hunc mundū, (vel mundum) vt ab eo lumine accedamur igne claritatis tuæ, & sicut igne illuminasti, Mosen, ita nunc illumina corda nostra, et sensus nostros, vt ad vitam eternam, mereamur peruenire, per christum. &c. Lorde God father almighty, light euerlasting, heare vs, for thy art the maker of all lyghtes. Blesse O Lorde this light, ỹ is already sanctified in thy sight, which hast lightned all men that come into the worlde, (or the whole worlde) to the ende that by the same lyght, we may be lightned wyth the shining of thy brightnesse. As thou diddest lighten Moyses, so nowe illuminate our hearts, and our senses, that we may deserue to come to euerlasting lyfe, thorowe Christ our &c. Thys beyng ended let him saye the pater noster. &c. then these wordes. Saluum fac seruum &c. Mitte ei auxilium deus &c. De Sion tuere eum. &c. Dominus vobiscū. &c, that is. O Lorde saue thy seruant, &c. Sende him helpe O God frō thy holy place defende him out of Syon. &c. Lorde here. &c. The Lorde be with you. &c.

The prayer. Benedic domine sancte pater omnipotens deus, per inuocationem sanctissimi nominis tui, et per aduentum filij tui, atq; per donum spiritus paracleti, ad manifestādum verum iudicium tuum, hoc genus metalli, vt sit sanctificatum, et omni demonum falsitate procul remota, veritas veri iudicij tui fidelibus tuis manifesta fiat, per eundem dominum. &c. in Englisshe. Blesse we beseech thee O Lorde, holy father, euerlasting God, thorowe the inuocation of thy most holy name, by the comming of thy sonne, and gyft of the holy ghost, and to the manifestation of thy true iudgement, this kinde of mettall, that being hallowed, and all fraudulent practises of the deuils vtterly removed, the manifest truth of thy true iudgement, maye be reuealed, by the same Lorde Jesus. &c.

After this, let the yron be layde into the fyre, and sprinckled with holy water, and whilest it heateth, let the Priest go to masse, and doe as order requireth, and when he hath receiued the host, he shal call the man that is to be purged (as it is written hereafter) first adiuring him, and then permitting hym to communicate according to the maner.

The Office of the masse.

Iustus es domine, &c. O Lorde thou art iust. &c.

The Prayer.

ABsolue quesumus domine delicta famuli tui, vt a peccatorum suorum nexibus quæ pro sua fragilitate contraxit, tua benignitate liberetur, & in hoc iudicio quoad meruit iustitia tua præueniente, ad veritatis censuram peruenire mereatur. per Christum dominum. &c. That is. Pardon wee beseech thee O Lorde, the sinnes of thy seruaunt, that being deliuered from the burden of his offences, wherewith he is intangled, he may be relieued by thy benignitie, and in thys hys tryal (so farre as he hath deserued, thy mercy preuenting him) he maye come to the knowledge of the truth, by christ our Lorde. &c.

The Gospell. Mar. 10.

IN illo tēpore, cum egressus esset Iesus in via, procurrens quidā genu flexo ante eum, rogabat eum dicens, Magister bone, quid faciam vt vitam eternam percipiā. Iesus autem dixit ei, quid me dicis bonum? &c. In those dayes when Jesus went forth towarde hys iourney, & one meeting in him the way running, & kneling vnto him, asked him saying. Good Maister what shal I doe that I may possesse eternall lyfe. Jesus sayd vnto him, why callest ỹ me good. &c. Then followeth the secrete and so foorth all of the rest of the masse. But before the partye doth communicate, the Priest shall vse these wordes vnto hym. Adiuro te per patrem, & filium, & spiritum sanctum, & per veram christianitatem quam suscepisti, & per sanctas relliquias quæ in ista ecclesia sunt, & per baptismum quo te sacerdos regenerauit vt non presumas vllo modo communicare, neque accedere ad altare, si hoc feciſti aut cōsensisti &c. I adiure thee by the Father the sonne and the holy Ghost, by the true christē dome which thou hast receyued, by the holly relliques which are in this Church, and by the baptisme, wherewith the Priest hath regenerated thee, that thou presume not by any maner of meanes, to communicate, nor come about the aultar, if thou hast done or consented vnto thys, whereof thou art accused. &c. Here let the Priest suffer him to communicate, saying. Corpus hoc, & sanguis dominī nostri Iesu Christi, sit tibi ad probationē hodie. This body & this bloud of our Lorde Jesus Christ, be vnto thee a tryall this daye. Th

The prayer. Perceptis domine deus noster sacris muneribus, supplices deprecamur, vt huius participatio sacramenti a proprijs nos reatibus expediat, & in famulo tuo veritatis sententiam declaret. &c. Hauing receaued O Lord God these holy misteries, we humbly beseeche thee that the participation of thys sacrament, maye ryddo vs of our guiltynesse, and in this thy seruaunt set forth the truth. Then shall followe Kyrieleson, the Letanye, and certayne Psalmes, and after all them Orenus, Let vs praye, Deus qui per ignem signa magna ostendens Abraham puerum tuum de incendio Chaldeorum quibusdam pereuntibus eruisti, Deus qui rubum ardere ante conspectum Moysis & minime comburi permisisti. Deus qui de incēdio fornacis Chaldaicis plerisque succensis, tres pueros tuos illesos eduxisti. Deus qui incendio ignis populum Sodomæ inuoluens, Loth famulum tuū cum suis salute donasti, Deus qui in aduentu sancti spiritus tui, illustratione ignis fideles tuos ab infidelibus decreuisti, Ostēde nobis in hoc pravitatis nostræ examine virtutē eiusdem spiritus &c. Et per ignis huius feruorem discernere infideles, vt a tactu eius cuiꝰ inquisitio agitur, conscius, exhorrescat, & manus eius comburatur, innocens vero pœnitus illæsus permaneat, &c. Deus cuius noticiam nulla vnquam secreta effugiunt, fidei nostræ tua bonitate respōde, & presta vt quisquis purgandi sē gratia, hoc ignitum tulerit ferrum, vel absoluatur vt innocens, vel noxius detegatur. &c. in Englishe thus. O God which in showing great tokens by fire diddest deliuer Abraham thy seruaunt frō the burnyng of ỹ Chaldeis, whilest other perished. O god which sufferedst the bushe to burne, in ỹ sight of Moyses, & yet not to consume. O God which deliueredst the three childre frō bodily harme in the Fornace of the Chaldies, whilest others were consumed. O God which by fyre diddest wrap the people of Sodome in their destruction, and yet sauedst Lot & his daughters from perill. O God which by the shyning of thy brightnesse at the comming of the holly ghost in likewyse of fire, diddest seperate the faithfull, from such as helæued not, shew vnto vs in ỹ tryall of this our wickednesse, the power of the same spirit. &c. And by ỹ heate of this fire discerne the faithfull from the vnfaithfull, that the giltie whose cause is nowe in tryall, by touching thereof, maye tremble and feare, and his hands be burned, or beyng innocent, that he maye remaine in safety. &c. O God frō whom no secretes are hidden, let thy goodnes answere to our faith, & graunt that whosoeuer in thys purgation, shall touch and beare thys Iron, may either be tryed an innocent, or reuealed as an offēder. &c. After this the Priest shall sprynckle the Iron wyth Holly water, saying. The blessing of God, the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost, be vpon this Iron, to the reuelation of the iust iudgement of God. And forthwith lette hym that is accused, beare it by the length of nyne foote, and then lette his hande be wrapped and sealed vppe for the space of three dayes, after thys yf anye corruption or rawe flesshe appeare where the Iron touched it, lette him be condemned as guiltie: yf it be whole and sounde, let hym giue thankes to God. And thus much of the verye Ordalia, wherevnto that of the water hath so precyse relation, that in setting forth of the one, I haue also described the other, wherefore it shall be but in vaine, to deale any farder withall. Hetherto also as I thinke, sufficiently of such lawes as were in vse before the conquest. Nowe it resteth that I should declare the order of those, that haue bēne made sith the comming of the Normās, but for asmuch as I am no lawier, & therfore haue but lyttle skyll to proceede in the same accordingly, it shall suffice to set downe some generall discourse of such as are vsed in our daies, and so much as I haue gathered by report and common bere saye. We haue therfore in Englād sundry lawes, and first of all the ciuile, vsed in the chauncery, admiraltie, and diuers other courtes, in some of which, the seuere rygor of Iustice is often so mittigated by conscience, that diuers thinges are thereby made easie and tollerable, whyche otherwyse woulde appeare to be mere iniurye and extremity. We haue also a great part of the Cannen lawe daily practised among vs, especially in cases of tithes, contracts of matrimony, and such lyke, as are vsually to be sene in the consistories of our Bishoppes, where the exercyse of the same is verye hotely followed. The third sorte of lawes, that we follow, are our owne, and those alwaies so variable, and subiect to alteration and change, that oft in one age, diuers iudgementes doe passe vpon one maner of casse, wherby the saying of the Poet maye very well be applyed vnto such as be, yng vrged with these wordes in such a yeare of the Prince this opinion was taken for sounde lawe, doe aunswere nothing else, but that the iudgement of our lawyers is nowe altered, so that they saye farre otherwyse. The regiment that we haue therefore after our owne ordinaunces dependeth vpon Statute lawe, Common law, Customary law, & Prescription.

Parliament law.

The first is deliuered vnto vs by Parliament, which court is the highest of all other, and consisteth of three seuerall sortes of people, that is to say, the Nobility, Clergy, and commons of this Realme, and there to is not somoned, but vppon vrgent occasion when the prince doth see his time, and that by seueral writtes, dated commonly fiue sixe weekes before it begin to be holden. Such lawes as are agreed vpō in the higher house by the Lordes spirituall and temporall, and in the lower house by the commons and bodye of the realme, (whereof the conuocation of the clergy holden in Powles is a member,) there speaking by the mouth of the knights of the shire and burgesses, remaine in the ende to be confirmed by the Prince, who commonly resorteth thither vppon the first and laste daies of this court, there to vnderstande what is done, & giue his royall consent to such estatutes as him lyketh of. Comming therefore thither into the higher house, and hauing taken his throne, the speaker of the Parliament (for one is alwayes appointed to go betweene the houses, as an indifferent mouth for both) readeth openlye the matters there determined by the sayde three estates, and then craueth the Princes consent and confirmation to the same.

The king hauing heard the somme & principall pointes of each estatute briefly recited vnto him, aunswereth in French with great deliberation vnto such as he lyketh, (Il nous plaist) but to the rest Il ne plaist, whereby the latter are vtterly made voyde and frustrate. That also which his Maiestie liketh of, is euer after holden for law, except it be repealed in any the lyke assembly. The number of the commons assembled in the lower house, beside the clergie cōsisteth of ninetie knights. For eache shyre of England hath two gentlemen or knights of greatest wisedome and reputation chosen out of the bodye of the same for that only purpose, sauing that for wales one only is supposed sufficient in euerie countie, whereby the number afore mentioned is made vp. There are likewyse fourtie and sixe Citizens, 2 3 9. Burgeses, and fourteene Barons, so that the whole assembly of the layetie of the lower house, cōsisteth of foure hundred thirtie and nine persons, if the iust number be supplyed. Of the lawes here made lykewyse some are penall and restraine the common lawe, and some againe are founde to inlarge the same. The one sort of these also are for the most part take strictlye according to the letter, the other more largely and beneficially after their intendement and meaning.

Comm Lawe.

The Common Lawe standeth vppon Sundrye Maximes or Principles, and yeares or termes, which doe conteine such cases as by great studye and solemne argument of the iudges, and thereto the deepest reach & foundations of reason, are ruled and adiudged for lawe. Certes these cases are otherwise called plees or actiōs, whereof there are two sortes the one criminall & the other ciuile. The meanes & messengers also to determine those causes are our writtes, whereof there are some Originall and some Judiciall. The parties plaintife and defendant when they appeare procēde (if the case do so require) by plaint or declaration, aunswere, replication and reioynder, and so to issue, the one side affirmatiuely, the other negatiuely. Our trialles, and recoueries are eyther by verdict and demourre, confession or default, wherein if any negligence or trespasse hath bene committed, eyther in processe & forme, or in matter & iudgement, the partie grieued may haue a writte of errour to vndoe ỳ same but not in the same court where the former iudgement was giuen. Customarie law consisteth of certaine laudable customes vsed in some priuate country, entended first to beginne vppon good and reasonable considerations, as gauell kinde which is all the male children to inherite, & cōtinued to this day in Kent: or Burrow kinde where the yongest is preferred before the eldest, which is the custome of many countries of this region, & so forth of such like to be learned else where.

Custome Law.

Prescription is a certayne custome, which hath continued time out of minde, but it is more particular then customarie lawe, as where onely a parish or some priuate person doth prescribe to haue common, or a way, in another mans soyle, or tithes to be payde after this or that maner, I meane otherwyse then the common course & order of the lawe requyreth, whereof let thys suffice at thys tyme, in steede of a larger discourse of our owne lawes, least I shoulde seeme to enter farre into that whereof I haue no skill. For what hath the meditation of the lawe of God to doe with any precise knowledge of the law of man, sith they are seuerall trades and incident to diuers persons. There are also sundrie vsuall courtes holde once in euery quarter of the yeare, which we commonlye call tearmes of the latin worde Terminus, wherein all cōtrouersies are determined, that happen within the Queenes dominions. These are commonly holden at London except vpō some great occasion they be transferred to other places, at what times also they are kept the table insuing shal easily declare. Finally howe well they are followed by suters, the great welth of our lawiers without any trauayle of mine can easily expresse. This furthermore is to be noted, that albeit the princes heretofore reigning in this lande haue erected sundry courtes especially of the chauncerie at Yorke and Ludlow for the ease of poore men dwelling in those parties, yet will the poorest (of all men commonly most contencious) refuse to haue his cause heard so nere home, but indeuoureth rather to his vtter vndoing to trauaile vp to Londō, thinking there soonest to preuaile against his aduersary, though his case be neuer so doubtful. But in this toye our Welchmen doe exceede of all that euer I heard, for you shall here & there haue some one odde poore Dauid of thē giuen so much to contention and strife, that without all respect of charges he will vp to London, though he go bare legged by the waye, and carye his hosen on his necke (to saue theyr feete from wearing) bycause he hath no chaunge. When he commeth there also he will make such importunate begging of his countreymē, and hard shift otherwise, that he will sometymes carye downe fyre or seuen wyttes in his purse, wherwith to molest his neighbour, though the greatest quarrell be scarsely worth the price that he payd for any one of thē. But ynough of this least in reuealing the superfluous follye of a fewe brablers in this behalfe, I bring no good will to my selfe amongst the wyselt of that natiō. Certes it is a lamentable case to see furthermore how a number of poore men are dayly abused and vtterly vndone, by sundrie barlets that go about the countrey as brokers betweene the petty foggers of the lawe, and the common people, onely to kyndle coales of contention, wherby the one side may reape commodity and the other be put to trauayle. But of all that euer I knew in Eller, Denis and Mainford excelled, till Iohn of Ludlow aliās Mason came in place, vnto whome in comparison they two were but childzen and babes, for he in lesse thē three or foure yeres, did bring one man (among many elsewhere in other places almost to extreme misery, (if beggery be the vttermost) who before hee had the shauing of his beard, was valued at two hundred pounde (I speake with the lest) who finally feeling that he had not sufficent wherwith to sustaine himself, & his familie, & also to satisfie that greedie rauenour, that still called vpon him for new fees, he went to bed and within foure dayes made an ende of his woefull life, euen with care & pensiuenesse. After his death also he so hādled his sonne, that there was neuer sheepe shorne in Wale, so neere clypped of hys fleece present, as hee was of manye to come, so that he was compelled to let away his lease land, because his cattell and flocke were consumed, and he no longer able to occupie the ground. But hereof let this suffise, and in stede of these enormities, two tables shall insue, whereof the first shall containe the names of the Countyes, Cities, Boroughes and Portes, which send knightes, Burgeses and Barons to the Parliament house, the other an infallible report of the beginnings and endes of euery tearme with their returnes, according to the maner, as I haue borrowed them of my friende Iohn Stow, whyleste this impression was in hande.

¶ Note that the lawedayes of this tearme are altered by meane of Whitsuntyde, & the first sitting is kept alwayes on the first lawe daye after the feast of the holy Trinitie, and the seconde session is kept the first lawe daye after Corpus Christi, except Corpus christi daye fall on some daye aforenamed: which chaunceth sometime, and then the latter daye is kept. And after the second session account foure dayes or thereabout, and then loke which is the next feast daye, and the fyrst lawe daye after the sayde feast, shall bee the thirde session. The other lawe dayes followe in order, but so many of them are kept, as for the time of the yere shalbe thought meete.

¶ And note generally that euery day is called a lawe daye that is not Sundaye or holly daye: and that if the feast day being knowne of any court day in any terme, the first or seconde daye followyng be Sundaye, then the court daye is kept the daye after the sayd holy daye or feast.

Of the degrees of people in the common wealth of Englande. Cap. 4.

WE in Englande deuide our people commonlye into foure sortes, as Gentlemen, Citizens or Burgeses, Yeomē, and Artificerers or labourers. Of gentlemē the first & chiefe next the king be the Prince, Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Viscontes and Barons: and these are called the Nobilitie, they are also named Lordes and noble men, and next to them be Knightes and Esquires, and simple gentlemen.

The tytle of Prince doth peculiarly belong to the Kinges eldest sonne, who is called Prince of Wales, and is the heire apparant to the Crowne, as in Fraunce the kings eldest sonne hath ỹ title of Dolphine, and is named peculiarly Monsieur. So that the Prince is so termed of the latine worde, quia est principalis post Regem. The Kinges yonger sonnes be but gentlemen by byrth, till they haue receyued creation of hygher estate to bee eyther Viscontes, Earles or Dukes: & called after their names, as Lord Henry, or Lorde Edwarde wyth the additiō of the worde Grace, properly assigned to the king and prince, and by custome conueighed to Dukes, Marquises, and their wyues.

Duke. The title of Duke commeth also of the Latine worde Dux, à ducendo, because of hys valoir and power ouer the army. In times past a name of Office due to the chiefe gouernour of the whole armie in the warres, but now a name of honour.

In olde tyme he onely was called Marquise Qui habuit terram limitaneam, a marching prouince vpon the enemies countreis. But that also is chaunged in common vse, & reputed for a name of great honour next the Duke, euen ouer Counties and sometimes small cities, as the Prince is pleased to bestowe it.

Erle. The name of Earle likewyse was among the Romaines a name of Office, who had Comites sacri palatij, Comites ærarij, Comites stabuli and such like, howbeit it appereth that with vs it hath the next place to ỹ Marquise, and he that beareth it is called peradaenture Comes à comitiua, quia dignus est ducere comitiuam in bello. Or else because he is Comes Ducis, a companiō of the Duke in the warres. And he hath his follower the Viscont, called eyther Pro Comes, or vicecomes: who in tyme past, gouerned in the coūtie vnder the Earle, and nowe without any such seruice or office, it also is become a name of dignitie next after the Earle, and in degree before the Baron.

Viscont.

Baron. The Baron is such a free Lorde, as hath a Lordship or Barony, whereof he beareth his name, & holding of him diuers knightes & freholders: who were wont to serue the king in the warres and helde their landes in Baronia, for doing such seruice. These Bracton (a learned writer of the lawes of Englande in king Henry the thirdes tyme) tearmeth Barones, quasi robur belli. The worde Baro is older the that it may easily be found frō whence it came: for euen in the oldest histories both of the Germaines & Frenchmen, we reade of Barons, and those are at this day called among the Germaines Liberi, vel ingenui, as some men doe coniecture.

Bishops. Unto this place I also refer our Bishops, who are accounted honourable, and whose countenaunces in time past was much more glorious then at this present it is, because those lusty Prelates sought after earthly estimation, stimation and authoritie wyth far more diligence then after the lost shéepe of Christ, whereof they had small regarde, as men being otherwise occupyed & voyde of leysure to attende vnto ẏ same. Howbeit in these daies their estate remayneth still honourable as before, and the more vertuous they are that be of this calling, the better are they estéemed with highe and lowe. Herein therefore their case is growen to be much better then before, for whereas in tymes past the clergie men were feared bycause of theyr authoritie and seuere gouernement vnder the Prince, now are they beloued generally (except peraduẽture of a fewe hungrie wõbes that couet to plucke and snatch at their lose endes) for their painefull diligence shewed in their calling, and vertuous conuersation. Finally how it standeth with the rest of the clergie, I neyther can tell nor greatly care to know, neuertheleſſe wyth what degrées of honour and worshyp they haue béene matched in times past Iohannes Bohemus in hys De Asia. cap. 12. De omnium gentium moribus and other doe expresse. But as a number of these comparisons and ambitions tytles are now decayed & worthily shrenke in the wetting, so giuing ouer in these daies, so maintayne such pompous vanitie, they thincke it sufficient for the to preache the worde and holde their liuinges to their ſies from the handes of such as inoeuour to diminisho them. This furthermore will I adde generally in commendation of the clergie of Englande that they are for their learning reputed in Fraunce, Portingale, Spaine, Germany & Polonia, to be the most learned deuines, & therto so skilfull in the two principal tongues that it is accounted a maime in any one of them, not to be exactely séene in the Gréeke and Hebrue, much more then to be vtterly ignorant or nothing conuersaunt in them. As for the latine tongue it is not wanting in any, especially in such as haue béene made within this twelue or fourtéene yeares, whereas before there was small choyse, and many cures were left vnserued bycause they had none at all.

Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Viscontes, and Barons, either be created of the Prince, or come to that honour by being the eldest sonnes or highest in succeſſiõ to their parẽts. For the eldest sonne of a Duke during hys fathers lyfe is an Earle, the eldest sonne of an Erle is a Baron, or sometymes a Viscont, according as the creation is. The creation I call the originall donation and condition of the honour giuen by the Prince for the good seruice done by the first auncestor, with some aduauncement, which with the title of that honour is alwayes giuen to hym & to his heires males onely. The rest of the sonnes of the nobilitie by the rigour of the law be but Esquires: yet in common speach all Dukes and Marquises sonnes, & Earles eldest sonnes be called Lordes, the which name commõly doth agrée to none of lower degrée then Barons, yet by lawe & vse these be not estéemed Barons. The Baronny or degrée of Lords doth aunswere to the degrée of Senatours of Rome: and the tytle of nobilitie as we vse to call it in England to the Romaine Patricij. Also in Englãd no man is created Baron except he may dispende of yerly reuenues so much as may fully maintayne and beare out his countenaunce and port. But Viscounts, Earles, Marquises and Dukes excéede them according to the proportiõ of their degrée & honor. But though by chaunce he or his sonne haue lesse, yet he kéepeth his degrée: but if the decay be excessiue & not able to maintayne the honour, as Senatores Romani were moti Senatu: so sometymes they are not admitted to the vpper house in the parliament, although they kepe the name of Lord still, which cannot be takẽ from them, vpon any such occasion.

Knight. Knyghtes be not borne, neyther is any mã a knight by succeſſion, no not the King or Prince: but they are made eyther before the battaile to encourage them the more to aduenture and trie their manhode, or after, as an aduauncement for their courage & prowesse alreadie shewed, or out of the warres for some great seruice done, or for the singular vertues which doe appeare in them. They are made eyther by the king himselfe, or by his commission and Royall authoritie giuen for the same purpose: or by his lieutenaunt in the warres. This order seemeth to aunswere in part to that which the Romaines called Equitũ Romanorum. For as Equites Romani were chosen ex censu, that is according to their substaunce and riches: so be Knightes in Englande most commonly according to their yearelye reuenues or substaunce and riches, wherewith to maintaine the estate. Yet all that had Equestrem censum, were not chosen to be knights, no more be all made knightes in England that maye spende a knightes landes, but they onelye whom the Prince will honour. The number of the knightes in Rome was vncertaine: and so is it of knyghtes wyth vs, as at the pleasure of the Prince. We call him knight in English that the French calleth Cheualier, and the latine Equitem, or Equestris ordinis virum. And when any man is made a knight, he kneeling downe is stricken of the Prince or his substitute with his swoorde naked vpō the shoulder, the Prince &c. saying, Soyes chevalier au nom de Dieu. And when he ryseth vp the Prince sayth Aduances bon chevalier. This is the maner of dubbing knightes at this present, and the tearme (dubbing) is the olde terme for that purpose and not creation.

At the Coronation of a King or Quēne there be knightes made with longer & more curious ceremonies, called Knightes of the Bath. But howsoeuer one be dubbed or made knight, his wyfe is by and by called Madame, or Ladye, so well as the Barons wyfe, he himselfe hauing added to his name in common appellatiō this sillable Sir, which is the title whereby we call our knightes here in Englande.

The other order of knighthod in Englād & the most honorable is that of ỳ Garter, instituted by king Edwarde the third, who after he had gayned many notable victories, taken king Iohn of France, & king Iames of Scotland (& kept them both prysoners in the Tower of London at one time) expulsed king Henry of Castil the bastarde out of his realme, and restored Don Petro vnto it (by ỳ helpe of the Prince of Wales & Duke of Aquitaine his eldest sonne called the blacke Prince) He then inuented this societie of honour, & made a choise out of his owne realme & dominions, & thorowout all Christendome of the best most excellent and renowmed persons in all vertues & honour, & adourned thē with ỳ title to be knightes of his Order, giuing thē a Garter garnished with golde & precious stones, to were daily on the left leg only, also a kirtle, gowne, cloke, chaperon, coler & other solemne and magnificent apparell, both of stuffe and fashion exquisite & heroicall to weare at high feastes, as to so high and Princely an Order appertayneth. Of this company also he and his successours Kinges and Quēnes of Englande, be the Soueraignes, and the reast by certaine statutes and lawes amongst themselues be taken as brethren and fellowes in that order to the number of fyre and twentie, as I finde in a certayne Treatize written of the same an example whereof I haue here inserted woorde for woorde as it was deliuered vnto me, beginning after this maner.

I might at this present make a long tractation of the Rounde table and order of the knightes thereof, erected sometymes by Arthur the great monarche of thys Iland: and thervnto intreate of the number of his knightes and ceremonies belonging to the order, but I thincke in so doing that I shoulde rather set downe ỳ latter inuentions of other men, then a true description of such auncient actions as were performed in deede. I could furthermore with more facilitie describe the Royaltie of Charles the great & his twelue Peeres, with their solemne rites and vsages but vnto this also I haue no great deuotion, considering the truth hereof is nowe so stayned wyth errours and fables inserted into the same by the lewde religious sort, that except a man shoulde professe to lye with thē for company, there is little sounde knowledge to be gathered hereof worthie ỳ remēbraunce. In lyke maner diuers alwell subiectes as Princes haue attempted to restore againe a rounde table in this lande, but such was ỳ excessiue charges appertayning thervnto (as they dyd make allowaunce) and so great molestation dayly insued therevpō beside the breeding of sundrie quarrels among the knightes and such as resorted hyther frō forrein countries (as it was first vsed) that in fine they gaue it ouer & suffred their whole inuentions to perishe and decaye, vntill Edwarde the third deuised an other order not so much pestered with multitude of knightes as the rounde table, but much more honourable for princely port and countenance, as shall appeare hereafter.

The order of the Garter therefore was deuised in the time of king Edward the third, and as some write vppon this occasion. The Quēnes maiestie thē liuing, being departed from his presence the nert way towarde hir lodging, he following some after, happened to finde hir Garter which slacked by chaunce and so fel from hir legge. His gromes & gentlemen passed by it, as disdaining to stoupe & take vp such a trifle: but he knowing ỳ owner commaunded one of them to staye & take it vp. Why and like your Grace saieth a Gentlemen it is but some womans garter that hath fallen frō hir as she followed ỳ Quēnes maiestie. Whatsoeuer it be quoth the kyng take it vp and giue it me. So whē he had receyued the garter, he sayde to such as stode about him: you my maisters doe make small account of this blew garter here (and therewith held it out) but if God lende me lyfe for a fewe monethes, I will make the prowdest of you all to reuerence the like: and euen vpon this slender occasion he gaue himselfe to the deuising of this order. Certes I haue not read of any thing that hauing had so simple a beginning hath growne in the ende to so great honour and estimation. But to proceede, after he had studyed a whyle about the performaunce of his deuise & had set downe such orders as he himselfe had inuented concerning ỳ same, he proclaimed a royall feast Peraduēture it was but a blew Ribbon.

What order of electiõ, and what estatutes were prescribed vnto the elected at this first institution, as yet I can not exactely vnderstande, neyther can I learne what euerye Prince afterwarde added therevnto before the fire and thirtieth yeare of king Henry the eyght, and thirde of king Edwarde the first: wherfore of necessitie I must resort vnto the estate of the sayde order as it is at this present, which I will set downe so briefely as I may. When any man therefore is to be elected (vpon a rowme found voyd for his admissiõ) into this fellowship, the king directeth his letters vnto him, notwithstanding that he before hande be nominate vnto the same, to this effect. Right trustie and welbeloued we greete you well, assertayning you, that in consideration aswell of your approued trueth & fidelitie, as also of your courageous and valiant actes of knighthode, with other your probable merites knowne by experiẽce in sundrie parties and behalfes: we with the companions of the noble order of the Garter assembled at the election holden this day within our manour of N. haue elected & chosen you amongst other to be one of the companions of the sayd Order, as your desertes doe condignely require. Wherfore we will ỳ with conuenient diligence vpõ the sight hereof, you repaire vnto our presence, there to receyue such thinges as to the sayde order appertayneth. Dated vnder our signet at our maner of Grenewich the 24. of April. These letters as it shoulde seeme were written An. 3. Edwardi sexti, vnto the Earle of Huntingdon, & the Lorde George Cobham your Lordshippes honourable father, at such time as they were called vnto the aforesaide company. I finde also these names subscribed vnto the same.

Beyng elected preparation is made for his enstalling at windsore (the place appointed alwaies for this purpose) wherat it is required that his Banner be set vppe, at two yardes and a quarter in length, and three quarters in breedth, besides the frynge. Secondly his sworde of whatsoeuer length hym seemeth good, thyrdely his helme, which frõ the charnell vpwards ought to be of three ynches at the least, fourthly the creest, wyth mantelles to the helme belonging of such conuenient stuffe and biggenesse, as it shall please him to appoint.

Item a plate of armes at the backe of hys stall, and creest with mantelles and beastes supportant, to be grauen in mettall.

Item lodging scoucheons of hys armes in the garter, to be occupyed by the way.

Item two mantelles one to the remayne in the colledge at Windsore, the other to vse at hys pleasure, with the scocheon of the armes of S. George in the garter with Laces Tasselettes, and knoppes of blewe silcke and Golde belonging to the same.

Item a Surcote or Gowne of redde or crimosine veluet, with a whoodde of the same lyned wyth white Sarcenet or Damaske.

Item a collor of the garter of thirtie ounces of golde troye weight.

Item a tablet of S. George, richely garnished with precious stones, or otherwyse.

Item a Garter for his (left) legge, hauing the buckle and Pendaunt garnished wyth Golde.

Item a booke of the statutes of the sayde order.

Item a scocheon of ỳ armes of S. George in ỳ garter to set vpon the mantell. And thys furniture is to be prouided against his installation.

When any knight is to bee installed, he hath, with hys former letters, a garter sent vnto him, and when he commeth to be installed, ied, he is brought into the Chapter houſe, where incontinently his commiſſion is read before the ſouereigne, or his deputie, and the aſſemblye preſent: from hence he is lead by two Knyghtes of the ſayde order, accompanied with the other of the Nobilitie, and Officers towarde the chappell, hauing hys mantel borne before him, eyther by a knight of the order, or elſe the king at armes, to whome it ſecondarily appertaineth to beare it. Thys mantel ſhall be deliuered vnto hym for his habite, after his othe taken before his ſtall, and not before: which done he ſhall returne vnto the chapter houſe, wher the ſouereigne, or his deputie, ſhall deliuer him hys collor, and ſo he ſhall haue the full poſſeſſion of his habit. As for his ſtall, it is not giuē according vnto the calling, & countenāce of the receyuer, but as the place is that happeneth to be voyde, ſo that eache one called vnto this knyghthode, (the ſouereigne, & Emperours, and Kinges, and Princes alwaies excepted) ſhall haue the ſame ſeate which became voyd by the death of hys predeceſſor, howſoeuer it fall out, whereby a knight onely oftentimes, doth ſit before a Duke, wythout anye murmuring or grudgyng at hys rome, except it pleaſe the ſouereigne, once in hys lyfe, to make a generall alteration, of thoſe ſeates, and to ſette eache one accordyng to hys degrée.

Nowe as touching the apparell of theſe knyghtes, it remaineth ſuch as King Edwarde the firſt deuiſed of thys order left it, that is to ſay, euery pere one of the cullours, that is to ſay, Scarlet, Sanguine in graine, blewe and white. In lyke ſorte the Kinges Grace, hath at his pleaſure the content of cloth for hys Gowne & whodde, lyned wyth white Satine, or Damaſke, and multitude of garters with letters of Golde.

The Prince hath fiue yardes of cloth for his Gowne and whodde, and garters with letters of Golde at his pleaſure, beſide fiue timber of the fyneſt mineuer.

A Duke hath fiue yardes of wollen cloth, fyue timber of mineuer, 120. garters with title of Golde.

A Marquiſſe hath fiue yardes of wollen clothe, fiue timber of mineuer 110. garters of ſilke.

An Earle fiue yardes of wollen clothe, fiue timber of mineuer, and 100. garters of ſilke.

A Viſcount, fiue yardes of wollen cloth, fiue timber of mineuer, 90. garters of ſilke.

A Baron fiue yardes of wollen cloth, three timber of mineuer: greſſe 80. garters of ſilke.

A Banneret, fiue yardes of wollen cloth, three timber of mineuer 70. garters of ſilke.

A Knight, fiue yards of wollen cloth, three timber of mineuer 60. garters of ſilke.

The Biſhop of Wincheſter Chaplaine of the garter, hath eyght and twentie timber of mineuer pure, nyneténe timber of gr. three timber and a halfe of the beſt and foure and twentie yardes of wollen cloth.

The Chauncellour of the Order 5. yardes of wollē cloth, three timber of mineuer pure.

The regiſter of the Order fiue yardes of wollen cloth, three timber of mineuer pure, and this order to be holden generally amōg the knights of this companie, which are fiue and twentie in number, and whoſe patrone in time of ſuperſtition was ſuppoſed to be S. George, of whome they were alſo called S. Georges knightes as I haue heard reported.

Furthermore at his inſtallation, he is ſolemnely ſworne, the maner whereof I haue thought good alſo to annexe, in this maner. You being choſen to be one of the honorable companie of the order of the Garter, ſhall promiſe and ſweare vpon the holly Euangelies by you bodily, touched to be faithful and true to the kings mageſtie, and to obſerue & kéepe all the poyntes of the ſtatutes of the ſayde order, and euery article in them contayned, the ſame being agréeable and not repugnant to the kings highneſſe other godly procédings, ſo farre as to you belongeth and appertaineth, as God you helpe. &c. And thus much haue I thought good to note concerning the premiſſes. As touching the eſtatutes belonging to this order they are many, and therefore not to be touched here. Howbeit yf any doubt doe aryſe aboue the interpretation of them, the king who is the perpetuall Soueraine of that order hath to determine and reſolue ỹ ſame. Neither are any choſen therevnto vnder the degrée of a knight, and that is not a gentleman of bloud and of ſounde eſtimation. And for the better vnderſtanding what is meant by a gentill man of bloude, he is defined to deſcend of three deſcentes, of nobleneſſe, ỹ is to ſay, of name & of armes both by father and mother. There are alſo foure degrées of reproch, which may inhibit from the entraunce into this order: of which ỹ firſt is hereſie lawfully proued, the ſeconde high treaſon, the thirde is flight from the battaill, the fourth ryot and prodigall exceſſe of expences, wherby he is not likely to holde out, and maintayne the port of knight of this order, according to the dignitie thereof. Moreouer touching the wearing of their aforeſaid apparell it is their cuſtome to weare ỹ ſame,

when they enter into the Chappell of Saint George, or be in the chapter house of their order, or finally doe go about any thing appertaynyng to that company. In lyke sort they weare also theyr mantelles vpon the euen of S. George, & go with the Souereine, or his deputie in the same in maner of procession from the kings great chamber vnto the chapel, or vnto the Colledge, and likewyse back againe vnto the aforesayde place, not putting it from them, vntill supper be ended, & the auoyde done. The next daye they resorte vnto the chappell also in the lyke order, and from thence vnto diner, wearing afterward theyr sayde apparell vnto euenyng prayer, & lykewyse all the supper tyme, vntill the avoyd be finished. In the solemnity likewise of these feastes, the thirteene chanons there, & fiue and twentie poore knightes, haue mantelles of the order, whereof those for the chanons are of Murrey with a roundell of the armes of S. George, the other of redde, with a scocheon onely of the sayde armes. If anye knyght of thys order bee absent from thys solemnety vpon the euen and daye of S. George, and be inforced not to be present eyther through bodily sickenesse, or hys absence out of the land: he doth in the Church Chappell, or Chamber where he is remaynyng, prouide an honorable stall for ỳ kings maiestie in the ryght hande of the place with a cloth of estate, and cushions, & scochion of the Garter, and therein the armes of the order. Also his owne stal of which side soeuer it be distaunt from the kinges or the Emperours in his owne place, appoynted so nyghe as he can, after the maner & scituation of his stall at Windsore, there to remaine, ỳ firsteuenyng prayer on ỳ euen of S. George, or three of the clocke, & likewise the next day duryng the time of the diuine seruice, vntyll the Morning prayer, and rest of the seruyce be ended: and to weare in the meane time his mantell onely, wyth the George and the the lace, without eyther whodde, collor or surcote. Or if he be so sicke that he doe keepe his bedde, he doth vse to haue that habite laid vpon him during the times of diuine seruice aforesaide. At the seruice time also vpon the morrow after S. George, two of the chyefe knights (sauing the deputy of the souereigne if he himselfe be absent) shall offer the kings banner of armes, then other two the swoorde with the hyltes forwardes, which being done the first two shall returne againe, and offer the helme and creast, hauing at eache time two Harraldes of armes going before, according to the statutes. The Lorde Deputy or Leeftenaunt vnto the kings Grace, for the tyme beyng, alone and assisted with one of the chiefe Lordes, doth deliuer at his offering a peece of Golde, & hauing all the king of armes and Heraldes going before him, he so proceedeth to the offring. When hee hath thus offered for ỳ Prince, he returneth with lyke solemnity vnto hys stall, and next of all goeth againe with one Haralde to offer for himselfe, whose oblation beyng made, euery knight according to their stalles, wyth an Harald before him proceedeth to the offring.

Sicke or absent.

Offering.

What solemnitie is vsed at ỳ burail of any knight of ỳ garter, it is but in vain to declar wherefore I will shewe generally what is done at ỳ disgrading of one of these knights, if thorowe any grieuous offence he be separated from this companye. Whereas otherwyse the signe of the order is neuer taken from him vntill death doe ende and finishe vp his dayes. Therfore when any such thing is to be done, promulgation is made therof much after thys maner insuing. Burial.

Be it knowne vnto all men that. N. N. knyght of the most noble order of the Garter, is founde guilty of the abhominable and detestable cryme of high treason, for he hath most trayterously cõspired against our most high and mightie Prince soueregne of the sayde order contrary to all ryght, his duety, and the faithful othe, which he hath sworne & taken. For which causes therfore he hath deserued to be deposed from thys noble order, & felowship of the Garter. For it may not be suffred that such a traytour & disloyall member remayne among the faithfull knights of noble stomacke and bountifull prowesse, or that hys armes should be myngled wyth those of noble chiualry. Wherefore our most excellent Prince and supreame of this noble order, by the aduyse and counsell of his Colleges, willeth and commaundeth that hys armes which he before time had deserued shall be from hencefowth taken awaye and throwne downe: and he himselfe cleane cut of from the society of this renowmed order, and neuer from this day reputed any more for a member of the same, that all other by hys example may hereafter beware howe they committe the lyke trespasse, or fall into such notorious shame and rebuke. Thys notice beyng gyuen, there resorteth vnto the party to be desgraded certaine officers with diuers of his late fellowes appointed, which take frõ him his George, & other inuestiture, after a solemne maner. And thus much of this most honorable order, hoping ỳ no man wil be offẽded wt me, for vttering thus much. For sith the noble order of the Fleyson Dor or Golden fleece, with the ceremonies appertey-teyning vnto the creation and inuestiture of the fire and thirtie knightes thereof: And lykewyse that of S. Michaell and hys one & thirtie knights, are discoursed vpon at large by the hystoryographers of those countreys, wout reprehension or checke, I trust I haue not gyuen any cause of displeasure, briefely to set forth those things that appertaine vnto our renoumed order of the Garter, in whose compasse is written commonly, Honi soit qui mal y pense. which is so much to say, as euill come to him that euill thinketh: a very sharpe imprecation, and yet such as is not contrary to the worde, which promyseth lyke measure to the meater, as he doth meat to others.

There is yet an other order of Knights in England called Knightes Bannerets, who are made in the fielde with the ceremony of cutting of the point of his pennant of armes, and making it as it were a Banner. He being before a Bacheler Knight, is nowe of an higher degrée & alowed to display his armes in a banner as Barrons doe. Howbeit these Knights are neuer made but in the warres, the kinges Standard being vnfolded.

Esquire (which we call commonly Squire) is a Frenche worde, and so much in latine as Scutiger vel armiger. and such are all those which beare Armes, or Armoires, testimonies of their race from whence they be discended. They were at the first Costerelles or the bearers of the Armes of Barrons, or knightes, and therby being instructed in Armes, had that name for a dignitie giuen to distinguishe them from common souldiours, when they were togither in the fielde.

Gentlemen be those whome their race and blode doth make noble and knowne. The latines call them Nobiles & generosos, as the Frenshe doe Nobles. The Etimologie of the name expounded the efficacie of the worde, for as Gens in latin betokeneth the race and surname. So the Romaines had Cornelios, Sergios, Appios, Fabios, Æmilios, Iulios, Brutos. &c. of which, who were agnati and therfore kept the name, were also called Gentiles, gentlemen of that or that house and race. As the king or Quéene doth dubbe knights, and createth the Barons and higher degrées, so gentlemē whose auncestours are not knowē to come in with Willia Duke of Normandie, do take their beginning in Englād, after this maner in our tymes. Whosoeuer studieth ỳ lawes of the realme, who so studieth in the Vniuersitie, or professeth Phisicke and the liberall Sciences, or beside his seruice in the rowme of a capitaine in the warres, can liue solely and without manuell labour, and therto is able and wil beare the port, charge and countenaunce of a gentleman, he shall be called Master (which is the title that men giue to Esquires and Gentlemenne) and reputed for a Gentleman, which is so much the lesse to be disalowed, as for that ỳ Prince doth lose nothing by it, ỳ gentlemā being so much subiect to tares and publicke paymēts as is the Yeoman or husbandman, which he also doth beare the gladlyer, for the sauing of his reputation. Being called to the warres, whatsoeuer it cost him, he will both arraye and arme himselfe accordinglye, and shewe ỳ more manly courage and all the tokens of ỳ person which he representeth: No mā hath hurt by it but himself, who peraduenture wil now and then beare a bigger sayle then hys boate is able to sustaine.

Citizens and Burgeses haue next place to gentlemen, who be those that are free within the cities, and are of some substaunce to beare Office in ỳ same. But these citizens or Burgeses are to serue the cōmon wealth in their cities and Borowghes, or in corporate townes where they dwell. And in the common assembly of the realme to make lawes (called the Parliament,) the ancient Cities appoint foure, and the borowghs two Burgeses to haue voyces in it, and to giue their consent or dissent vnto such thinges as passe or stay there in the name of the citie or Borowe, for which they are appointed. Citizens.

In this place also are our Marchauntes to be enstalled as amōg the Citizens, whose number is so increased in these our dayes, that their onely maintenaunce is the cause of the exceeding prices of forreine wares, which otherwyse when eache nation was permitted to bring in hir owne commodities, were farre better cheape and more plentifully to be had. Among the Lacedemonians it was founde out that great numbers of Merchauntes were nothing to the furtheraunce of the state of the common wealth: wherefore it is to be wyshed that the heape of them were somewhat restreigned, so should the rest liue more easily vpon their owne, & few honest chapmē be brought to decaye, by breaking of the bankerupt. I doe not denie but that the naule of the lande is in part maintained by their traffick, and so are the highe prices of thinges kept vp now they haue gotten the only sale of things into their handes: whereas in times past when the strange bottomes were suffered to come in, we had Suger for foure pence the pounde, that nowe is worth halfe a crowne, Raisons Marchāts of Cozinth foz a peny that now are holden at six pence, and sometime at eight pence & ten pence the pound: nutmegges at two pence halfe peny the ounce: Ginger at a penny an ounce, Pzoynes at halfe penye farthing: Great reysons three pounde foz a peny, Cinnamon at foure pence the ounce, Cloues at two pence, and Pepper at twelue, and fiftene pence the pounde. Whereby we maye see the sequele of thinges not alwayes to be such as is pretended in the beginning. The wares that they carry out of the Realme, are foz the moste part brode clothes & carsies of all colours, lykewyse cottons, freses rugges, tinne, woll, leade, felles, &c. which being shipped at sundry pozts of our coasts, are borne from thence into all quarters of the worlde, and there either exchaunged foz other wares, oz ready money: to the great gaine and commoditie of our Merchauntes. And whereas in times past our chiefe trade was into Spaine, Pozingall, Fraunce, Flaunders, Danske, Pozway, Scotlande, and Iseland onely: so in these dayes, as men not contented wyth these iourneyes, they haue sought out the East and West Indies, & made voyages not only vnto the Canaries, and newe Spayne, but likewyse into Cathaia, Moscouia, Tartaria, & the regions thereabout, from whence as they pretende they bring home great commodities.

Not seene in a bate-ment of price of thinges.

Our Peomen, are those which by our Lawyers are called Legales homines, free men borne English, and maye dispende of theyr owne free lande in yerely reuenewe, to the summe of 40. s. sterling. This sozte of people haue a certaine preheminence and mozer estimation then labourers and artificers, and commonly liue welthely, kepe good houses, & trauelleth to get rythes. They are also foz the most part farmers to gentlemen, & with grazing frequenting of markets and keping of seruants (not yole seruantes as the gentlemen doth, but such as get both their owne & part of theyr Maisters lyuing) doe come to great wealth, insomuch that many of them are able and doe buy the landes of vnthrifty gentlemen, & often setting theyr sonnes to the Scholes, to the Vniuersities, and to the Innes of the Court, oz otherwise leauing them sufficient landes whereupon they maye liue without labour, doe make their sayde sonnes by that meanes to become gentlemen. These were they that in times past made al Fraunce afrayd. And the kings of England in foughten battailes, were wont to remaine among these Peomen who were their footemen, as the French kings did amongst theyr horsemen: the Prince thereby shewing where his chiefe strength did consist.

The fourth and last sozt of people in Englande are day labourers, poze husbandmē, and some retaylers (which haue no free lande) copy holders, & al artificers, as Taylours, Shoomakers, Carpenters: Brickemakers, Masons, &c. As foz slaues & bondmē we haue none. These therfoze haue neither voice noz authozitie in y common welth, but are to be ruled, & not to rule other: yet they are not altogither neglected, foz in cities and cozpozate Townes, foz default of Peomen they are fayne to make vp their enquestes of of such maner of people. And in Villages they are commonly made Church wardens Sidemen, Aleconners, Constables, & many tymes enioye the name of hedbozowghes. Thys furthermoze amonge other thynges I haue to saye of our husbandmen and artificers, that they were neuer so excellent in theyr trades as at this present. But as the workemanshippe of the later sozt was neuer moze fine and curious to the eye, so was it neuerlesse strong and substanciall foz continuance and benefite of the buyers. Certes there is nothing that hurteth our artificers moze then hast, and a barbarous oz slauishe desire, by riddinge their worke to make spedy vtteraunce of theyr wares: which inforceth thē to bugle vp & dispatch many thinges they care not howe so they be out of theyr handes, whereby the buyer is often soze defrauded, and findeth to hys cost, that hast maketh waste, accozdyng to the prouerbe. But to leaue these thinges and proceede wyth our purpose, and herein (as occasion serueth) generally to speake of the common wealth of Englande, I find that it is gouerned and maintained by three soztes of persons.

The Prince Monarch and heade gouernour which is called the king, oz (if y crowne fall to the Woman) the Quene: in whose name and by whose authozitie, all thynges are administred.

The Gentlemen, which be deuided into two parts, as y Barony oz estates of Lozds, (which conteyneth Barons and all aboue that degree) and also those that be no Lozds, as Knightes, Esquiers, and simple Gentlemen, &c.

The third and last sozt is named the Peomanrye, of whome and their sequele, the labourers and Artificers, I haue sayde somewhat euen nowe.

No slaues nor bondman in Englande.

¶ Of prouision made for the poore. Cap. 5.

There is no common wealth at this day in Europe, wherein there is not great store of poore people, and those necessarily to be relieued by the welthier sort, which otherwise would starue and come to vtter confusion. With vs the poore is commonly deuided into three sortes, so that some are poore by impotencie, as the fatherlesse childe, the aged, blind and lame, and the diseased person that is iudged to be incurable: the second are poore by casualtie, as the wounded souldier, the decayed housholder, and the sicke person visited with grieuous and vncurable diseases: the third consisteth of thriftlesse poore, as the riotour that hath cõsumed all, the vagabond that will abide no wheres, but runneth vp and downe frõ place to place (as it were seeking worke and finding none) and finally the roge and strumpet which are not possible to be diuided in sonder.

Three sortes of poore.

For the first two sortes, that is to say the poore by impotencie and the poore by casualtie, which are there ỹ true poore in dede, & for whome the word doth bind vs to make some daily prouision: there is order taken throwout euery parish in the Realme, that weekely collection shalbe made for their helpe and sustentation, to the end they should not scatter abrode, and by begging here and there, annoy both towne and countrey. Authoritie also is gyuen vnto the Iustices in euery Countie (and great penalties appoynted for such as make defaulte) to see that the intent of the statute in thys behalfe be truely executed, according to the purpose and meaning of the same so that these two sortes are sufficiently prouided for: and such as cã liue within the limites of their allowance (as eache one wyll doe that is godly and well disposed) may well forbeare to rome & range abrode: But if they refuse to be supported by this benefite of the lawe, and will rather indeuour by going to and fro to maintayne theyr idle trades, then are they adiudged to be parcell of the third sort, and so in stead of curteous refreshing at home, are often corrected wt sharpe execution, & whip of iustice abrod. Many there are, which notwithstãding the rigour of the lawes prouided in that behalfe, yelde rather with this libertie (as they call it) to be daily vnder the feare & terrour of the whippe, then by abiding where they were borne or bred, to be prouided for by the parish. I found not long since a note of these latter sort, ỹ effect wherof insueth. Idle beggers are such eyther throwow other mens occasiõ, or throwgh their own default. By other mens occasion, (as one way for example) when some couetous man espying a further commoditie in theyr commons, holdes, and tenures, doth find such meanes as therby to wipe many out of their occuppyings, & turne the same vnto their priuate gaynes. Herevpon it followeth, that although the wise & better minded, do so behaue themselues that they are worthyly to be accompted among the second sort, yet the greater part commõly hauing nothing to stay vpon are wilfull, and therupõ doe eyther prowue idle beggers, or else continue starke thæues till the gallowes doe eate them vp.

I thinke often so.

It shalbe hande shall be blonde these be red.

Such as are vole beggers throwow theyr owne default are of two sortes, and cõtinue theyr estates either by casual or mere volũtary meanes: Those that are such by casuall meanes, are iustly to be referred either to the first or second sort of poore: but degenerating into the thriftlesse sort, they doe what they can to cõtinue their miserie, & with such impediments as they haue to stray and wãder about as creatures abhorring all labour and euery honest exercise. Certes I call these casuall meanes, not in respect of the originall of their pouertie, but of the continuance of the same, from whence they will not be deliuered throwow their owne vngracious lewdnesse, and froward disposition. The volũtary meanes procede frõ outwarde causes, as by making of corrosiues, and applying the same to ỹ more fleshie parts of their bodies: and also laying of Ratsbane, Spere wort, Crowfote, and such like vnto theyr whole mẽbers, thereby to raise pitieus and odious sores, and moue the goers by such places where they lie, to lament their miserie, and bestowe large almes vppon them.

Vnto this neast is another sort to be referred, more sturdie then the rest, which hauing sound and perfite lymmes doe yet notwithstanding sometime counterfeit the possession of al sortes of diseases. Diuers times in their apparell they will be like seruing men or labourers: Often tymes they can play the mariners, and seeke for ships which they neuer lost. But in fine, they are all thæues and Caterpillers in the common wealth, and by the word of God not permitted ted to eate, sith they doe but licke the sweate from the true labozers bzowes, and bereue ẏ godly of that which is due vnto thē, to mainteine their excesse, consuming the charitie of well disposed people bestowed vpon them, after a most wicked, horrible, and detestable maner.

It is not yet .50. yeares sith this trade began: but how it hath prospered sithens that tyme, it is easye to iudge, for they are nowe supposed of one sere and another, to amount vnto aboue .10000. persons as I haue harde repozted. Mozeouer, in counterfaiting the Egyptian roges, they haue deuised a lāguage among themselues, which they name Canting, but other pedlars Frenche. A speache compact 30. yeares since of English, & a great nomber of odde wozds of their owne diuising without all ozder oz reason: and yet such is it as none but themselues are able to vnderstand. The first deuiser thereof was hanged by the necke, a iust reward no doubt for his desartes, and a common ende to all of that profession. A Gentleman also of late hath taken great paines to search out the secrete practises of this vngracious rable. And among other things he setteth downe and describeth .22. soztes of them, whose names it shal not be amisse to remēber: whereby each one may gather, what wicked people they are, and what villany remaineth in them.

The punishment that is ozdained for this kind of people is very sharpe, and yet it can not restraine them frō their gadding: wherfoze the ende must nedes be Martiall lawe to be exercised vpon them, as vpon thēues, robbers, despisers of all lawes, and enemies to the commō wealth and welfare of ẏ land. What notable roberies, pilferies, murders, rapes, and stealings of children they doe vse (which they disfigure to begg withal) I nede not to rehearse: but for their idle roging about the countrie, the law ozdeineth this maner of cozrection. The Roge being apprehēded, committed to prison, and tried in ẏ next assizes (whether they be of Gaole deliuerie oz sessions of the peace) if he happen to be conuicted for a vagabond either by inquest of office, oz the testimonie of two honest and credible witnesses vpon theyr othes, he is then immediatly adiudged to be grieuously whipped & burned thozow the gristell of the right eare ẅ an hot iron of the compasse of an inch about, as a manifestation of his wicked life, and due punishment receyued for the same. And this iudgement is to be executed vpon him, except some honest person wozth fiue poundes in the Quēnes bookes in goods, oz twentie shillings in lands, oz some rich houshoulder to be allowed by the Justices, wil be boūd in a recognisance to retaine him in his seruice for one whole peare. If he be take the seconde time and proued to haue forsaken his sayd seruice, he shall then be whipped againe, bozed likewise thozowe the other eare and sette to seruice: from whence if he departe befoze a peare be expired, and happen afterward to be attached againe, he is condemned to suffer paines of death as a fellon (except befoze excepted) without benefite of clergie oz sanctuarie, as by the statute doth appere. Among roges and idle persons finally, we finde to be comprised al Pzoctozs that go vp and downe with counterfeit licences, Coziners, and suche as go about the countrey vsing vnlawfull games, practizers of Phisiognomie and Palmestrie, tellers of foztunes, fencers, bearwards, players, minstrels, iugglers, pedlers, tinkers, scholers, shipmen, prisoners gathering for fees, and others so oft as they be taken without sufficient licence. Each one also that harbozoweth oz aideth them with meat oz money, is tared and compelled to fine with the Quēnes maiestie for euery time that he shall so succoure them as it shall please the Justices of peace to assigne, so that the taration excede not 11. shillings as I haue bene informed. And thus much of the poze, and such prouision as is appoynted for them within the Realme of England.

Of sundrie punishments appointed for malefactors. Cap. 6.

The greatest and most grieuous punishment vsed in Englād, for such as offend againſt the ſtate, is drawne from the priſone to the place of execution vpon an hardle or Sled, where they are hanged til they be half dead, and then taken downe and quartered, after that their mẽbers and bowels are cut from their bodies, and throwne into a fire prouided neare hand and within ſight, euen for the ſame purpoſe. Sometimes if the treſpaſſe be not the more hainous, they are ſuffred to hang til they be quite dead, and when ſo euer any of the Nobilitie are conuicted of high treaſon, this maner of their death is cõuerted into the loſſe of their heads onely, notwithſtanding that the ſentence doe runne after the former order. In triall of caſes cõcerning treaſon, felonie, or any other grieuous cryme, the partie accuſed doth yelde yf he be a noble man to be tryed by his Peeres: if a gentleman, by gentlemen: and an inferiour by God and by the countrie: and being condemned of felonie, manſlaughter. &c. he is eftſoones hanged by the necke til he be dead, and then cut downe and buryed. But yf he be conuicted of wilfull murder, he is eyther hanged aliue in chaynes neere the place where the facte was committed, (or elſe firſt ſtrangeled with a rope) and ſo continueth till his bones conſume to nothing. We haue vſe neither of the wheele nor of ỹ barre, as in other countries, but when wilfull manſlaughter is perpetrated, beſide hanging the Offendour hath his right hande commonly ſtricken of at the place where the acte was done, after which he is led forth to the place of execution, & there put to death according to the law. Vnder the worde felonie are manie grieuous crimes contained, as breche of priſon An. 1. of Edward the ſecond. Diſfigurers of ỹ Princes lege people. An. 5. of Henry the fourth. Hunting by nyght with painted faces and Miſours An. 1. of Henry the ſeuenth. Rape or ſtealing of women and maydens An. 3. of Henry the eight. Conſpiracy againſt the perſon of the Prince An. 3. of Henry the ſeauenth. Embeſilling of goodes committed by the maiſter to the ſeruaunt, aboue the value of fourtie ſhillings. An. 17. of Henry the eyght. Carying of horſes or mares into Scotland. An. 23. of Henry the eyght. Sodomy and Buggery An 25. of Henrye the eyght. Stealing of Hawkes egges. An. 31. of Henry the eyght. Cõiuring, ſorcerie, Witchcraft and digging vp of Croſſes. An. 33. of Henry the eyght. Prophecying vpõ armes, cogniſaunces, names, and badges. An. 33. of Henry ỹ eyght. Caſting of ſlanderous billes. An. 37. of Henry ỹ eyght. Wilfull killing by poyſon. An. 1. of Edward ỹ firſt. Departure of a ſoldier frõ the field. An. 2. of Edward ỹ firſt. Diminution of coyn, al offences within caſe premunire, embeſeling of recordes, goodes taken frõ dead men by their ſeruaunts, ſtealing of whatſoeuer cattell, robbing by the high way, vpon the ſea, or of dwelling houſes letting out of pondes, cutting of purſes, ſtealing of Deere by night, counterfectous of coyne, euidences, charters, and writings, & diuers other needleſſe to be remembred. Periury is puniſhed by the pillorie, burning in the forehead wt the letter P. and loſſe of all ỹ moueables. Many treſpaſſes alſo are puniſhed by ỹ cutting of one or both eares from the heade of the offendour, as the vtteraunce of ſedicious wordes againſt the maieſtrates, fraymakers, pettie robbers. &c. Roges are burned thorow the eares, carpers of ſheepe out of the land by the loſſe of their hãds, ſuch as kill by poyſon are eyther ſkalded to death in lead or ſeething water. Heretiks are burned quicke, harlottes & their mates by carting ducking and doing of open pennaunce are often put to rebuke. Such as kill thẽſelues are buryed in the fielde with a ſtake driuen thorow their bodies. Witches are hanged or ſometymes burned, but theeues are hãged euery where generally, ſauing in Halifax where they are beheaded after a ſtrãge maner, & wherof I find this report. There is & hath ben of ancient tyme a law or rather a cuſtome at Halifax, that whoſoeuer doth cõmit any felony: and is taken with the ſame, or confeſſe the facte vpon examination, yf it by valued by fower conſtables to amount to the ſomme of thirténe pence halfe peny, he is forthwt beheaded vpon the next market day (which fall dually vppon the tueſdayes, thurſdayes, and ſaterdayes,) or elſe vpon the ſame day ỹ he is ſo conuicted, yf market be then holde. The engine wherwt the execution is done, is a ſquare blocke of wood of the length of foure foote and an halfe, which goeth ryde vp and downe in a flot, rabet, or regall betweene two peeces of timber, that are framed and ſet vpright of fiue yards in height. In the neather ende of the flyding blocke is an Axe keyed or faſtened wyth Iron into the wood, which being drawne vp to the top of the frame is there faſtned with a woodden pinne, (the one ende ſet on a peece of woodde, which goeth croſſe ouer ỹ two rabets, & the other ende being let into the blocke, holding the Axe, with a notche made into the ſame after the maner of a Sampſons poſt,) vnto the middeſt of which pinne there is a long rope faſtened that commeth downe among the people, ſo that when the offendour hath made his confeſſion, and hath layde his neck ouer the neatthermoſt blocke, euery man

there presēt doth eyther take hold of ỳ rope, (or putteth forth his arme, so nére to ỳ same as he can get, in token that he is willing to sée true iustice executed,) and pulling out the pinne in this maner, ỳ head blocke wherin the are is fastened doth fall downe wyth such a violence that yf the necke of the transgressour were so bigge as that of a bull, it should be cut in sunder at a strocke, and roll from the bodie by an huge distaunce. If it be so that the offendour be apprehended for an ore, or orē, shéepe, kine, horse, or any such cattell: the selfe Beast or other of the same kinde, haue the ende of the rope tyed somewhere vnto them, so that they drawe out the pin whereby the offendour is executed. And thus much of Halifax law, which I set down onely to shew the custome of that country in this behalfe. Roges and vagabondes are often stocked and whipped, scoldes are ducked vpon cuckingstooles in the water. Such fellons as stand mute and speake not at their arraynement are pressed to death by huge weightes, and these commonly holde theyr peace, thereby to saue their goodes vnto their wyues and children, which yf they were condemned shoulde be confiscated to the prince. Théeues that are saued by their bookes and cleargie, are burned in the left hande, vppon the brawne of the thombe with an hote Irō, so that yf they be apprehended agayne, that marke bewrayeth them to haue béene arrayned of fellonie before, whereby they are sure at that time to haue no mercy. I do not read that this custome of sauing by the booke is vsed any where else then in Englande, neyther doe I finde after much diligent inquiry what Saxon Prince ordayned that lawe. Howbeit this I generally gather therof, that it was deuised at the first to traine the inhabiters of this lande to the loue of learning, which before contempned letters, & all good knowledge, as men only giuing themselues to husbandrie and the warres, the like wherof I read to haue béene amongst ỳ Gothes, & Vandales, who for a time would not suffer euen their princes to be learned for weakening of their courages, nor any learned men to remayne in the counsel house, but by open proclamation would commaunde thē to auoyde. Pyrates and robbers by sea, are condemned in the court of the Admyraltie, & hanged on the shore at lowe water marke, where they are left til thrée tides haue ouerwashed them. Finally such as hauing wals & bankes nére vnto the sea, and doe suffer the same to decay (after cōuenient admonition) wherby the water entreth and drowneth vp the countrymare by a certayne custome apprehended, condemned & staked in ỳ breache, where their remayne for euer as parcell of the foundation of the newe wall that is to be made vpon them, as I haue hard reported.

Of sauuage beastes and vermines. Cap. 7.

IT is none of the least blessings wherewith God hath indued thys Iland, that itis void of noysome beasts, as Lions: Beares, Tygers, Pardes, Wolfes, and such like, by meanes whereof our countrymen may trauaile in safetie, and our herdes and flockes remayne for the most part abroade in the fielde, without any herdeman or kéeper.

This is chiefely spoken of the south & southwest part of the Iland. For whereas we that dwell on this side of the Twede, maye safely boast of our securitie in this behalfe. Yet can not the scottes doe the lyke in euery point with in their kingdome, sith they haue grieuous Wolfes continually conuersaunt among them to the generall hinderaunce of their husbandmen, and no smal damage vnto the inhabiters of those quarters. The happy & fortunate want of these beasts in Englande is vniuersally ascribed to the politike gouernement of king Edgar, who to the intent the whole Countrie might once be clensed and clerely ridde of them, charged the conquered Welchmen (who were then pestured with these rauenous creatures aboue measure) to paye him a yearely tribute of Wolfes skinnes, to be gathered within the lande. He appointed them thereto a certaine number of thrée hundred, with frée liberty for their prince to hunt and pursue them ouer al quarters of the realme as our Chronicles doe report. Some there be which write how Ludwall Prince of Wales payde yearely to king Edgar this tribute of 300. Wolfes, and that by meanes thereof within the compasse and terme of foure yeres none of those noysome creatures were left within Wales and England Since this tyme also we read not that anye Wolfe hath béene séene here that hath bene breedde within the bondes and limites of our country. Howbeit there haue béene diuers brought ouer from beyonde the sea for grædinesse of gaine & to make money onely by the gasing and gaping of the people vpon them, who couet oft to sée them beyng straunge beastes in their eyes and seldome knowne in Englande.

Of Fores we haue some but no great store, and also Badgiers in our sandy & light groundes, where woodes, furzes, broome, and plentie of shrubbes are to shrowde them in, when

when they be from their boꝛrowes, and therto Warrens of Coneys at hand to fede vpon at will. Otherwise in clate which we call ỹ cledgie mould, we seldome here of any, because the moisture and toughnesse of the soile is such, as will not suffer them to dꝛawe and make their boꝛrowes depe. Certes if I may freely say what I thinke, I suppose that these two kindes (I meane Fores and Badgers) are rather preserued by Gentlemẽ to hunt & haue passime with all at their owne pleasures, then otherwise suffered to lyue, as not able to be destroyed because of theyꝛ greate numbers. Foꝛ such is the scantitye of them here in England in comparison of the plentie that is to be seene in other countryes, and so earnestly are the inhabitants bent to rote thẽ out, that except it had bene to beare thus vẽ the recreations of their superiozs, it could not otherwise haue ben chosen, but that they should haue bene vtterly destroyed by many yeares agone.

I might here intreat largely of other vermine, as the Polcate, the Minuer, the Weasel, Stote, Squirrill, Fitchew, and such like. Also of the Otter and Beuer, of which, as the first soꝛtes are plentifull in euery wode and hedgerow: so these latter, especially the Otter, (foꝛ to say the truth we haue not manye Beuers, but only in the Deitie in Wales) is not wanting oꝛ to seeke in many streames & riuers. But it shal suffice in this soꝛt to haue named them as I doe also the Partern, although foꝛ number I woꝛthily doubt whether that of our Beuers oꝛ Parternes, may be thought to be the lesse.

Beuers.

Otters.

Parternes.

Other pernicious beastes we haue not except you repute the great plentie of red and fallow Deare, and soꝛe of Conies amongst the hurtful soꝛt. Which, although that of thẽselues they are not offensiue at all, yet theyꝛ great numbers are thought to be very preiudicial, and therfoꝛe iustly repꝛoued of many as are in lyke soꝛt our huge flocks of shẽpe, where on the greatest parte of our soyle is emploied almost in euery place. The male of the red Deare was sometime called among the Saxons a staggon, but now a stagge, oꝛ vpon some consideratiõ an Harte, as the female is an Hinde. And this is one parcell of the Uenery wherof we intreated befoꝛe, and whose pꝛoper dwelling is in the large and woody foꝛrests. The fallow deare as Bucks and Does, are nourished in Parkes, & Conys in warrens and boꝛrowes. As foꝛ Hares they runne at theyꝛ owne aduenture, except some Gentleman oꝛ other foꝛ hys pleasure doe make an inclosure foꝛ them. Of these also the stagge is accompted foꝛ the most noble game, the fallow Deare is the next, then the Roe (whereof wee haue indifferent stoꝛe) and last of all the Hare: all which (notwythstanding our custome) are passimes moꝛe meete foꝛ Ladies and Gentlewomen to exercise, then foꝛ men of courage to followe, whose hunting should pꝛactise theyꝛ armes in talking of theyꝛ manhode and dealing wỏ such beastes as ettsones wyll turne agayne and offer them the hardest, rather then theyꝛ feete, whych many tymes may cary dyuers from the fielde. Surely this noble kinde of hunting onely did great Pꝛinces frequent in times past, as it may yet appeare by the hystoꝛies of theyꝛ times, and there to (beside that whych we read of the vsuall hunting of the Pꝛinces and Kings of Scotland, of the wild Bull, Wolfe. &c.) the example of king Henry the second of England: who disdayning as he termed it to followe oꝛ pursue cowards, cherished of set purpose sundꝛy kinds of wilde beastes at Woodstocke, and one oꝛ two other places in England, whych he walled about wyth hard stone, & where he would often fight wyth them hande to hande, when they did turne againe & make any reise vpon him.

Stagges.

King Henrye the fift in hys beginning, thought it a mere scoffery to pursue any fallow Deare wyth hounds oꝛ greyhounds, but supposed hym selfe alwayes to haue done a sufficient acte, when he had tired them by his owne trauaile on foote, and so killed them wyth hys handes, in the vpshot of that exercise and ende of hys recreation. And thus did very many in lyke soꝛt wyth the Harte, as I doe reade, but I thincke it was very long agone, when men were farre higher and swifter then they are now, and yet I deny not but the hunting of the redde Deare is a ryght Pꝛincely passime. In diuers foꝛren cuntries they cause theyꝛ redde and fallow Deare to dꝛaw the plowgh as we do our Oxen and hoꝛses. In some places also they milke theyꝛ Hindes as we doe here our Kine and Gotes. And the experience of this latter is noted by Gyraldus Cambꝛiensis to haue bẽne seene and vsed in Wales, where he did eate chẽese made of hindes milke, at such time as Baldwine Archbishop of Caunterburie pꝛeached the Croysade there, when they were both lodged in a Gentlemans house, whose wyfe of purpose kept a dairy of the same. As foꝛ ỹ plowing wyth Ares (whych I suppose to be vnlikely) and Alkes a thyng commonly vsed in the East countries, here is no place to speake of it, since we now want these kinde of beasts. Neither is it my purpose to intreat of other thyngs then are to be seene in England, land, wherfore I wil omitte to say any more of wilde and sauage beastes at thys tyme, thinking my selfe to haue spoken already sufficiently of this matter, if not to much in the iudgement of the curious.

Hinde haue milke

¶ Of Cattell kept for profite. Cap. 8.

There is no kinde of tame Cattell vsually to be seene in these parts of the world whereof we haue not some, and that great store in England, as Horses, Oxen, Shéepe, Goates, Swine, & far surmounting the like in other countries, as maye be proued with ease. For where are Oxen commonlye more large of bone, Horses more decent & pleasant in pace, Shéepe more profitable for woll, Swine more holsome of flesh, & Goates more gainefull to their kéepers, then here with vs in England. But to speake of them peculiarly, I suppose that our Oxen are such as the lyke are not to be founde in any countrye of Europe both for greatnesse of bodye and sweetenesse of flesh: or else woulde not the Romaine writers, haue preferred them before those of Liguria. Their hornes also are knowne to be more fayre and large in England then in any other places, which quantity albeit that it be giuen to our brééde generally by nature, yet it is oft helped by arte. For when they be verye yonge, many Graziers will oftentimes annoynte their budding hornes, or typpes of hornes, with Hony, which mollifieth the naturall hardenesse of that substaunce, and thereby maketh it to growe vnto a notable greatnesse. Certes, it is not straunge in England, to sée Oxen whose hornes haue ỳ length of a yarde or thrée foote betwéene the typpes, and they themselues thereto so tall, as the heigth of a man of meane and indifferent stature, is scarce comparable vnto them.

Our Horses moreouer are highe, and although not commonly of such huge greatnesse as in other places of the maine, yet yf you respect the easinesse of theyr pace, it is harde to saye where their lyke are to be had. Our lande doth yéelde no Asses, and therefore the most parte of our carryage is made by these, which remaining stoned, are either reserued for the cart, or appointed to beare such burthens, as are conuenient for them: Our Carte horses therfore are commõly so strong, that fiue of them will drawe thrée thousande weyght of the greatest tale with ease for a lõg iourney. Such as are kept also for burden, will cary foure hundreth waight commonly without any hurt, or hinderance. Thys furthermore is to be noted, that our Princesse and the Nobilitye, haue their cariage commonly made by cartes, whereby it commeth to passe, that when the Quéenes maiestie doth remoue from any one place to another, there are vsually 400. carewares, appointed out of the Countryes adioyning, whereby hir carryage is conueighed safely vnto ỳ appointed place, & herby also the auncient vse of sommers and sumpter horses, is in maner vtterly relinquished.

Such as serue for the saddle are cõmonly gelded, and now growne to be very dere among vs, especially if they be well coloured, iustly ymmed, and haue thereto an easie ambling pace. For our countrimen séeking their ease in euery corner where it is to bée had, delight very much in these qualyties, but chiefly in their excellent pates, which besides that it is in maner peculiar vnto horses of our soyle, and not hurtfull to the rider or owner sitting on their backes: it is moreouer verye pleasaunt and delectable in hys eares, in that the noyse of theyr well proportioned pase doth yéeld comfortable sounde. Yet is there no greater deceit vsed any wher then among our horsekéepers, horsecorsers, and Hostelers: for such is the subtill knauery of a great sort of them (wythout exception of anye be it spoken which deale for pryuate gaine) that an honest meaning mã shall haue verye good lucke among them, if he be not decepued by some false tricke or other. Geldings.

Our shéepe are very excellent sith for sweetnesse of flesh they passe all other, & so much are our woolles to be preferred before those of other places, that if Iason had knowne ỳ valne of them that are brédde, and to be had in Englande, he woulde neuer haue gone to Colchos, to seke for any there. What fooles then are our countrymen, in that they séeke to bereue themselues of this commoditie, by practising daply howe to transferre the same to other nations, in carying ouer their rammes and ewes to brééde an increase among them. But such is our nature, and so blinde are we in déede, that we sée no inconuenience before we féele it: and for a present gaine we regarde not what damage may ensue to our posterity. Hereto some other mã would adde also the desire, that we haue to benefite other countries, and to impeche our owne. And it is so sure as God lyueth, that euery tryfle which cõmeth from beyonde the sea, though it bée not worth thrée pence, is more estéemed then a continuall commoditie at home, which farre exceédeth that value. It is furthermore to be noted, for the lowe Countries of Belgy knowe it, and dailye experience Shepe.

(notwithstanding the sharpenesse of oure lawes to the contrarye) doth yet confirme it: that although our Rammes & Wethers doe goe thether from vs neuer so well headed according to their kinde, yet after they haue remained there a whyle, they cast there their hornes, and from thencefowrth they remayne polled, without any hornes at all.

Shéepe without hornes.

Certes this kinde of Cattell is more cherished in Englande, then standing well wyth the commoditie of the commons, or prosperitie of dyuers townes, whereof some are wholy conuerted to their féeding: yet such a profitable sweetenesse is founde in theyr fleece, such necessity in their flesh, & so great a benefite in ỳ manuring of barraine soyle with their dung & pisse, that their superfluous numbers are the better borne withall, and there is neuer an husbande man, (for now I speake not of our great shéepemaisters) but hath more or lesse of thys cattell féedyng on his fallowes. There are & peraduenture no small babes, which can make accompt of euery tenne kine to be clerely worth twenty pound in common and indifferent yeares, if the milke of fyue shéepe be daily added to the same: but as I wote not howe true this surmyse is, so I am sure hereof, that some huswyues can and doe adde daily a lesse proportiõ of ewes milke vnto so many kine, wherby their chéese doth the longer abyde moist, and eateth more brickle and mellowe then otherwyse it woulde.

Goates.

Goates we haue plenty in the west partes of England, especially in & toward Wales, and amongst the rocky hilles, by whom the owners doe reape no small aduantage: some also are cherished elsewhere in sundrye stédes, for the benefite of such as are diseased with sundry maladies, vnto whom (as I here) it is iudged very profitable and therfore inquired for of many farre and nére.

Swine.

As for Swine there is no place that hath greater store nor more wholsome in eating, thẽ are these here in england & of these, some we eate gréene for porcke, & other dryed vp into Bacon to haue it of more continuance, Larde we make little because it is chargeable, neyther haue we such vse thereof as is to be séene in other Countries, sith we do either bast all our meate with butter, or suffer the fattest to baste it selfe by leysure.

Boares.

Of our Boares we make Brawne, which is a kinde of meate not vsually knowen to straungers (as I take it) otherwyse woulde not the swart Rutters and frenche cookes, at the losse of Callis, (where they founde great store of this prouision almost in euery house) haue attempted with ridiculous successe to roste, bake, broyle, and frye the same for their maisters, til they were beter informed. I haue harde moreouer, howe an noble man of england did send ouer an hoggeshead of brawne ready souced to a Catholike Gentlemen of Fraunce, who supposing it to be fishe reserued it vntill Lent, at which time hée did eate thereof with verye great frugalitye. Therto he so wel liked of the prouision it self, that he wrote ouer for more of the same fish, againe the yeare insuing: whereas if he had knowen it to haue béene flesh, he would not haue touched it I dare saye for a thousande crownes, without ỳ popes dispensatiõ. With vs it is accompted a great peece of seruice at the table from Nouember vntyll Februarye be ended, but chiefely in the Christmas time.

Wyth the same also we begin our dinners eche day after other: & because it is somwhat harde of digestion, a draught of Madneby, Bastarde or Muscadell, is vsually druncke after it, where either of them may conueniently to be had, otherwyse the meaner sorte content themselues wyth their owne drink, which at that season is cõmonly very strong, and stronger in déede, then in all the yeare beside.

It is made commonly of the fore part of a tame Bore, set vppe for the purpose by the space of an whole yeare or two (especially in Gentlemens houses) for the husbandman & farmers neuer francke them for their owne vse aboue thrée or foure monethes, or halfe a yeare at the most) in which time he is dyeted with otes and peason, and lodged on the bare planckes of an vneasie coate, tyll hys fat be hardened sufficiently for their purpose. Afterwarde he is killed, scalded and cut out, & then of his former partes is our Brawne made, the reast is nothing so fat and therefore it beareth the name of souce only, and is commonly reserued for the seruing man and and hinde. The necke péeces being cut of rounde are called collers of Brawne, the shoulders are named shildes, only the ribbes retayne the former denomination, so ỳ these foure péeces deserue the name of Brawne. The bowels of the beast are commonly cast away, bycause of their ranckenesse, & so were also his stones, till a foolish fantasie gat hold of late amongst some delicate Dames who haue now founde the meanes to dresse them with great cost for a delicate dish and bring them to the boarde as a seruice though not without note of their desire to ỳ prouocation of fleshly lust, which by thys one acte is not a lyttle reuealed. But to returne againe vnto our purpose. When the Bore is thus cut out, eache péece is wrapped vp, eyther with bul-rushes,

ruſhes, oſier peles, packethrēd or ſuch like, and then ſodden in a leade or caldron togyther tyll they be ſo tender that a manne may thruſte a bruſed ruſhe or ſoft ſtrawe cleane through the fatte, whyche being done they take it vp and laye it abroade to cole. Afterward putting it into cloſe veſſels, they poure either good ſmall ale or bēre mingled wyth vergeous and ſalt thereto tyll it be couered, and ſo let it lye (nowe and then altering and changing the ſowring drincke leaſt it ſhould ware ſoure) till occaſion ſerue to ſpend it out of the way. But of Brawne thus much, and ſo much may ſēme ſufficient.

Of vvilde and tame Fowles. Cap. 9.

ORder requireth that I ſpeake ſomewhat of the Fowles alſo of Englande, which I may eaſily deuide into the wilde and tame, but alas ſuch is my ſmall ſkill in Fowles, that to ſay the truth I cā neyther recite their nombers nor well diſtinguiſhe one kinde of them from an other. Yet thys I haue by generall knowledge, that there is no nation vnder the ſunne which hath in time of yere more plentie of wild Fowle then we, for ſo many kindes as our Iland doth bring forth. We haue therfore the Crane, the Bitter, the wilde and tame Swanne, the Bullarde, the Hieron, the Curlew, the Snite, the Wilde goſe, Dotterel, Brant, Larke, Plouer, Lapwing, Teele, Wigeon, Mallard, Sheldrake, Shoueler, Pewet, Seamewe, Barnacle, Quaile, Woodcocke, Partrich and Feaſant, beſides diuers other, whoſe names to me are vtterly vnknowne, and much more the taſte of their fleſh wherewith I was neuer acquainted. But as theſe ſerue not at all ſeaſons, ſo in their ſeuerall turnes, there is no plentye of them wanting, wherby the tables of the Nobilitie and Gentrie ſhould ſēme to be dayly vnfurnyſhed. But of all theſe the production of none is more marueilous then that of the Barnacle, whoſe place of generatiō we haue ſought oft times ſo farre as the Orchades, where as peraduēture we myght haue found the ſame nearer home, and not onely vppon the coaſtes of Ireland, but euen in our owne riuers. If I ſhoulde ſaye howe either theſe or ſome ſuch other Fowle not muche vnlyke vnto them doe breede yerely in the Thames mouth, I doe not thincke that many will beleue me, yet ſuch a thing is there to be ſeene, where a kinde of Fowle hath hys beginning vpon a ſhort tender ſhrubbe ſtanding vppon the ſhore from whēce when their time commeth they fall downe either into the ſalt water and liue, or vpon the dry land and periſh, as Pena the French Herbariſt hath alſo noted in the very ende of hys Herball. As for Egretes, Pawperes and ſuch like, they are daily brought vnto vs from beyonde the ſea, as if all the Fowle of our countrey could not ſuffice to ſatiſfie our delicate appetites. Our tame Fowle are ſuch for the moſt parte as are common both to vs and to other Countreys, as Cockes, Hennes, Gēſe, Duckes, Pecockes of Inde, blew Pecocks, Pigeons and ſuch lyke whereof there is great plenty in euery Fermours yeard. They are kepte there alſo to be ſolde eyther for ready money in the open markettes, or elſe to be ſpent at home in good company amongſt their neighbours wythout reprehenſion or fines. Neyther are we ſo miſerable in England (a thing only graunted vnto vs by the eſpeciall grace of God and liberty of our Princes) as to dine or ſuppe wyth a quarter of a Hen, or to make ſo great a repaſt with a cocks combe as they doe in ſome other Countreys: but if occaſion ſerue the whole carcaſes of many Capons, Hennes, Pigeons and ſuch lyke doe oft goe to wracke, beſide Beefe, Mutton, Veale and Lambe: all which at euery feaſt are taken for neceſſary diſhes amongſt the comminalty of England. The gelding of Cockes, where by Capons are made, is an auncient practiſe brought in of olde time by the Romaines when they dwelt here in thys lande: but the gelding of Turkies or Indiſh Peacockes is a newer deuiſe: and certainely not vſed amiſſe, ſith the rancknes of that byde is very much abated therby, and the taſt of the fleſh in ſundry wiſe amended. If I ſhould ſay that ganders growe alſo to be geloed, I ſuppoſe that no man will beleue me, neyther haue I talked at any tyme of ſuch a fowle ſo ſerued, yet haue I heard it more then once to be vſed in the Countrey, where they Gēſe are driuen to the fielde like herdes of cattell by a Goſeheard, a toy alſo no les to be merueiled at then the other. For as it is rare to heare of a gelded gander, ſo it is ſtraunge to me, to ſee or heare of Gēſe to be ledde to the field lyke ſheepe: yet ſo it is, and their Goſeherd carryeth a rattle of paper or parchement wyth hym when he goeth about in the morning to gather the Goſlings together, the noyſe whereof commeth no ſoner to their eares, then they fall to gaggling, and haſten to goe wyth hym. If it happen that the gates be not yet open, or that none of the houſe be ſtirring, it is ridiculous to ſee how they will pēpe vnder the doores, and neuer leaue crying and gāgling til they be let out vnto him to ouer take their fellowes. I might here

make mention of other fowles which we repute vncleane, as Crowes, Pies, Choughs, Rookes, &c: but sith they abound in all countries, (though peraduenture most of all in Englande by reason of our negligence) I shall not nede to spend any tyme in ỹ rehersall of them. Neyther are they cherished of purpose to catch vp the wormes that breede in our soyles, (as Pollidore supposeth,) sith there are no vplandishe townes but haue or shoulde haue nettes of their owne in store to catche them withall. Sundrie actes of Parliament ars likewyse made for their vtter destruction. Nothing therefore can be more vnlykely to be true, then that these ruinous and noysome foules are nourished amongst vs to deuour our Wormes, whych doe not abounde much more in Englande then elsewhere in other countries of the mayne.

Of fishe taken vpon our Coastes. Cap. 10.

AS our foules haue their seasons, so lykewise haue all sorts of fish, wherby it cometh to passe that none, or at the leastwyse very few of them are to be had at all tymes. For my part I am greatly acquainted neyther with the seasons nor yet with the fish it selfe, and therefore yf I shoulde take vppon me to describe or speak of either of them absolutely, I should enterprise more then I am able to performe, & go in hande with a greater matter then I can well bring about. It shall suffice therefore to declare what sortes of fishes I haue most often seene, to the ende I may not altogither passe ouer this chapter without ỹ rehearsall of some thing, although the whole somme of that which I haue to say be nothing in deede, yf the full discourse hereof be any thing duly considered.

Of fishes therfore as I finde fiue sorts, the flat, the roūd, the long, the legged & shelled, so the flat are deuided into the smoothe, scaled & tailed. Of the first are the Plaice, the Butte, the Turbut, Dorrey, Dabbe, &c. Of the seconde, the Soles, &c. Of the thirde, oure Chattes, Maidens, Kingsones, Flathe and Thornebacke, whereof the greater be for the most parte either dryed and caryed into other countries, or soddē, sowsed, & eaten here at home, whylest the lesser be fryed or buttered, sone after they be takē, as prouision not to be kept long for feare of putrefaction. Vnder the round kindes are commonly comprehended Lumpes an vgly fish to sighte, and yet very delicate in eating, yf it be kindlye dressed. The Whighting, (an olde waiter or seruitor in the Court) the Rochet, Gurnard, Hadocke, Codde, Herring, Pilchard, Sprat, & such like. And these are they wherof I haue best knowledge and be commonly to be had in their tymes vppon our coastes. Vnder this kinde also are all the great fishe contained as the Seale, the Dolphin, the Porpasse, the Thirlepole, Whale, and whatsoeuer is round of body, be it neuer so great and huge. Of the long sort are Cungres, Eles, Carefishe and suche other of that forme. Finallye of the legged kinde we haue not manye, neyther haue I seene any more of thys sort then the Polipus, called in Englishe the Lobstar, the Crafish, and ỹ Crabbe. As for the little Crafishes, they are not taken in the sea, but plentyfully in our freshe ryuers in banckes and vnder stones where they kepe themselues in most secret maner, and oft by lykenesse of coulour with the stones among which they lye, they deceiue euen the skilful takers of them, except they vse great diligence. I might here speake of sundrie other fishes nowe and then taken also vppon our coastes, but sith my minde is onely to touche eyther all such as are vsually gotten, or so many of them onely as I can well rehearse vpon certayne knowledge, I thincke it good at thys tyme to forbeare the further intreatye of them. As touching the shelly sorte we haue plentie of Dysters, Muscles and Cockles. We haue in lyke sort no small store of great Whelkes, and Perewinckles, & eache of them brought farre into the land from the sea coast in their seuerall seasons. And albeit our Dysters are generally forborne in the foure hote monethes of the yeare, that is to say, May, June, July, & August. Yet in some places they be continallye eaten, where they be kept in pittes as I haue knowen by experience. And thus much of our sea fishe, as a man in maner vtterlye vnacquainted with their diuersitie of kindes: yet so much haue I yelded to do, hoping hereafter to say somewhat more, and more orderly of them, if it shall please God that I may liue and haue leasure once againe to peruse this treatise, & so make vp a perfit peece of worke of ỹ, which as you now see is very slenderly begunne.

Of Hawkes and Rauenous foules. Cap. 11.

I Can not make as yet any iust report howe many sortes of Hawkes are breedde wythin this realme. Howbeit which of those that are vsually had amongest vs are disclosed with this laude, I thincke it more easie and lesse difficulte to set downe. First of all therfore that we haue the Eagle, common experience rience doth euidently confirme, and diuers of our rockes whereon they bréede, yf ſpeach did ſerue, could well teſtifie the ſame. But the moſt excellent aiery of all is not much from Cheſter at a caſtle called Dinas Bren, ſometime buylded by Brennus, as our writters do coniecture. Certes this caſtell is no great thing, but yet a pyle very ſtrong and in acceſſible for enemyes, though nowe all ruinous as many other are. It ſtandeth vpon an harde rocke in the ſide whereof an Eagle bréedeth euery yeare. Certes this is notable in the ouerthrow of hir neaſt (a thing oft attempted) that he which goeth thither muſt be ſure of two large baſkets, and ſo prouide to be let downe thereto, that he may ſitte in the one and be couered with the other: for otherwyſe the Egle would kill hym and teare the fleſhe from his bones with their sharpe talons though his apparell were neuer ſo good. Next vnto ỳ Egle we haue the Irō or Erne (as the Scottes doe write) who call the Egle by ỳ name. Certes it is a Rauenous bird & not much inferiour to the Egle in déede. For though they be black of colour & ſomewhat leſſe of bodie, yet ſuch is their greatneſſe that they are brought by diuers into ſundrie partes of this realme and ſhewed as Egles onely for hope of gaine, which is gotten by the ſight of thē. Their chiefe bréeding is in the Weſtcountry, where the commons complaine of great harme to be done by thē in their fieldes, for they are able to beare a yong lambe or kidde vnto their neaſtes, therwith to fréede their yong and come againe for more. Some call thē Gripes. We haue alſo the Lanner & the Lanneret: the Tercell and the Goſehawke: the Muſket and the Sparhawke: the Jacke and the Hobby: and finallye ſome though very fewe Harlions. And theſe are all the Hawkes that I doe here to be bredde within this Iſlande. Howbeit as theſe are not wanting with vs, ſo are they not very plentifull: wherfore ſuch as delite in Hawking doe make their chiefe prouiſion for the ſame out of Danſke, Germany, and the Eaſtcountries, from whence we haue thē in great aboundaunce & at exceſſiue prices, whereas at home and where they be bredde they are ſolde for almoſt right naught and vſually brought to the markets as chickins, pullets and Pigeons are with vs, and there bought vp to be eaten (as we doe the aforeſayde foules) almoſt of euery man. But to proceede with ỳ reſt. Other rauenous birdes we haue alſo in very great plentye, as the Buſſarde, the Kite, the Ringtaile Dunkite, and ſuch as often annoye oure Countrie dames by ſpoyling of their yong broodes of chickins, Duckes and Goſlings, whereunto our very Rauens and Crowes haue learned alſo the way: and ſo much are our rauēs giuen to this kinde of ſpoyle, that ſome of ſet purpoſe haue manned reclaymed and vſed them in ſtéede of Hawkes, when other could not be had. I haue ſéene Crowes ſo cunning alſo of theyr owne ſelues that they haue vſed to ſoare ouer great riuers (as the Thames for example) & ſodenly comming downe haue caught a ſmall fiſhe in their féete and gone away withall wout wetting of their wings. And euen at this preſent the aforeſayde ryuer is not without ſome of them, a thing in my opinio not a litle to be wondred at. There is no cauſe wherfore I ſhoulde deſcribe the Cormorant amōgſt Hawkes (except I ſhold call him a Water Hawke) but ſith ſuch dealing is not conuenient, let vs nowe ſée what may be ſayde of our venemous Wormes, & how many kindes we haue of them within our realme and countrie.

¶ Of venemous beaſtes. &c. Cap. 12.

IF I ſhoulde go about to make any long diſcourſe of venemous Beaſtes, or Wormes bredde in Englande, I ſhould attempt more then occaſion it ſelfe woulde offer, ſith wée haue very fewe Wormes but no Beaſtes at all, that are thought by nature to bée eyther venemous or hurtfull. Firſt of all therefore wée haue the Adder, which ſome men doe not raſhely take to bée the Vyper. Certes if it bée ſo, then is not the Vyper Authour of the death of hir * Parents, as ſome hyſtories affyrme. And it may well be, for I remember that I haue reade in Philoſtrate, howe he ſawe a Vyper lycking of hyr yong. I did ſée an Adder once my ſelf that laye as I thought ſléeping on a moulehyll, out of whoſe mouth came aleuen yong Adders of twelue or thirtéene ynches in length a péece, which plaied to and fro in the Graſſe one wyth another, tyll ſome of them eſpyed me. So ſone therefore as they ſawe me, they ran againe into the mouth of theyr damme whome I kylled, and then founde eache of them ſhrowded in a diſtinct celle, or pannicle in hyr belly, much like vnto a ſoft white ielly, which maketh me to be of the opinion that our Adder is the Viper in déede. Their colour is for ỳ moſt part ruddy blew, and their ſtinging bryngeth death wythout preſent remedie be at hand, the wounded neuer ceaſſing to ſwell, neyther the venyme to worke till the ſkin of the one breake, and the other aſcende vpwarde to the hart, where it finiſheth finisheth. The effect, the length of thē is most commonly two foote and somewhat more, but seldome doth it extende vnto two foote five ynches, except it be in some rare and monsterous Adder: whereas our Snakes are much bygger and séene sometymes to surmount a yarde, or three foote, although their poyson be nothing so grieuous & deadly as ỳ others. Our Adders lie in winter vnder stones in wholes of the yearth, rotten stubs of trées, & amōgst the dead leaues: but in the heate of the sommer they come abroade, and lye eyther rounde in heapes, or at length vpon some hillocke, or elsewhere in the grasse. They are found only in our woodland countryes and highest groundes: as for our snakes they commonlye are séene in mores, fennes, and low bottomes. And as we haue great store of Todes where Adders cōmonly are found, so doe Frogges abound where Snakes doe kéepe their residence. We haue also the Sloworme, which is black & grayish of colour, and somewhat shorter then an Adder. We haue in lyke sort Eftes, both of the land and water, & likewise Swiftes, wherof to say any more it should be but losse of time, sithe they are well knowne and no regyon voyd of many of them. As for flies (sith it shal not be amysse a lyttle to touch them also) wée haue none that can doe hurt or hynderance naturally vnto any, for whether they be cut wasted, or whole bodyed, they are voyde of poyson & all venimous inclination. The cut wasted, for so I Englishe the worde Insecta are, the Hornettes, Waspes, Bées, and such lyke, whereof wée haue great store, and of which an opinion is conceiued, that the first doe brēde of the corruption of deade horses, the second of Peares and Apples corrupted, and the last of Kine and Oxen: which maye be true, especially the first and latter in some partes of the beast, and not their whole substaunces, as also in the seconde, sith we haue neuer Waspes, but whē our frute beginneth to ware rype. In déede Virgill and others speake of a generatiō of Bées, by kyllyng or smouthering of a brouled bullocke or calfe, and laying hys bowels or hys flesche wrapped vp in hys hyde in a close house for a certaine season, but how true it is as yet I haue not tryed. Yet sure I am of thys that no one liuing creature corrupteth without the production of an other as we may see in shepe also for excessiue numbers of flesh flies, if they be suffered to lye vnburyed or vneaten by the dogges and Swine, who often preuent such needelesse generations.

Thus much farder will I adde of Bées, that whereas some ancient writers affirme thē to be a cōmodity wanting in our Iland, it is nowe founde to be nothing so. In olde time peraduenture we had none in déede, but in my dayes there is such plenty of them in maner euery where, that in some vplandysh Townes, there are one hundreth, or two hundreth hiues of them, although the saide hiues are not so huge as they of the east countrey, but farre lesse, as not able to containe aboue one bushel of corne, or fiue peckes at ỳ most. Our hony also is taken and reputed to be the best bycause it is harder, better wrought & clenlyer vesselled vp, thē that which cōmeth from beyond the sea, where they stampe and straine their combes, Bées, & young Blowinges altogither into the stuffe, as I haue béene informed. In vse also of medicine our Phisitions and Apothecaries eschewe the forren, & chose the home made, as breéding lesse choler, which is oftentimes (and I haue séene by experience) so white as suger, and corned as if it were salt. Our hiues are made commonly of Rye straw, and wadled about with bramble quarters. But some make thē of wicker and cast them ouer with clay. We cherish none in trées, but set our hiues somewhere on the warmest side of the house, prouyding that they may stande dry and without daūger of the mouse. This furthermore is to bé noted, that whereas in vesselles of oyle, that which is nérest the toppe is accounted the best, and of wine that in the middest, so of hony the best is alwayes next the bottome, which euermore casteth and dryueth his dragges vpwarde toward the very top, contrary to the natures of other liquide substaunces, whose groundes and lies, doe generally settle downewardes. And thus much as by the waye of our Bées and Englishe Hony.

As for the whole bodied, as the Cantharides and such venymous creatures, we here not of them. Yet haue we Bettles, Horseflyes, Turdbugges (called in latine Scarabei) the Locust or the Grashopper and such lyke, whereof let other intreate, that make an exercise in catchyng of Flyes, but a farre greater sport in offering them to spyders as did Caligula sometyme and an other Prince yet lyuing, who delyted so much to see the foly combattes betwixt a stout flye and an old Spider, that diuers men haue had great rewardes giuen them for their paineful prouision of flyes made onely for thys purpose. Some also in the time of Caligula coulde deuyse to set their Lorde on worke, by lettyng flesche flies into his chamber, which he forthwith woulde egerly haue hunted all other businesse set apart, & neuer ceased til he had caught hir into his fingers. There are some Cockescombes here and there in England * which make account also of this pastime as of a notable matter, telling what a sight is seene betweene thē, if either of them be lusty and couragious in his kinde. One also hath made a booke of the Spider & the Fly, wherin he dealeth so profoundly and beyonde all measure of skill, that neyther he himselfe that made it, neither any one that readeth it, can reache vnto the meaning therof. But if those lolly fellowes in steede of the straw that they thrust into the Flies taple (a great iniurie no doubt to such a noble champion) woulde bestow the cost to set a fooles cap vpon there owne heades: then might they with more securitie, and lesse reprehension beholde these notable battayles.

Of Englishe Dogges. Cap. 13.

THere is no country that may (as I take it) compare with ours in number, excellencie, and diuersitie of Dogges: all which the learned Doctour Caius in his Treatise vnto Gesnere de canibus Anglicis doth bring into three sortes: that is, the gentle kinde serving for game: the homely kind apt for sundry necessarie vses: and the curriſh kinde, meete for many toyes. For my part I can saye no more of them then he hath done alreadie, wherfore I wil here set downe only a somme of that which he hath written of their names and natures, with the addicion of an example or two now lately had in experience, whereby the courages of our Mastiffes shall yet more largely appeare.

The first sort therefore he deuideth eyther into such as rowte the beast and continue the chase: or springeth the Birde, and bewrayeth hir flyght by pursute. And as these are commonly called Spanyels, so the other are named Hounds, whereof he maketh eight sortes; of which the formoste excelleth in pearce smelling: the seconde in quicke lepping, the third in swiftnesse and quicknesse: the fourth in smelling and nimblenesse &c. & the last in subtilty and deceitfulnesse: The first kinde of these are also commonlye called Harryers, whose game is the Fore, the Hare, Wolfe, (if we had any) Hart, Bucke, Badger, Otter, Polcat, Lobstart, Weesel, Conyes &c: the second hight a Terrer, as it hunteth the Badger and Grey onely: the third a bloudhound, whose office is to follow the fierce, and nowe and then to pursue a theefe or beast by hys dry foote: the fourth a Gasehounde, who hunteth by the eye: the fifth a Greyhounde, cherished for hys strength and swiftnesse: the first a Lyemmer, that excelleth in smelling and swift running: the seuenth a tombler, and the eight a theefe, whose offices (I meane of the latter two) encline onely to deceite, wherein they are oft so skilfull, that fewe men woulde thinke so mischeuous a witte to remayne in such two creatures. Hauing made thys enumeration of Dogges which serue for y chase and hunting, he commeth next to suche as serue the Falcons in theyr times, whereof he maketh also two sortes. One that vnderh hys game on the lande, an other that putteth vp such Fowle as keepeth the water. And of these thys is commonly moste vsuall for the nette or traine, the other for the Hawke, as he doeth shewe at large. Of the first, he sayeth that they haue no peculiar names assigned vnto them seuerally, but eache of them is called after the birde whych by naturall appointment he is allotted to hunt: for which consideration some be named Dogges for the Feasant, some for the Falcon, and some for the Partriche. Howe be it, the common name for all is Spanniell, as if these kindes of Dogges had bene brought hyther out of Spaine. In like sort we haue of water Spanniels in theyr kinde. The third sort of Dogs of the gentle kinde is the Spaniell gentle, or comforter: or as the common terme is the fisting hound, and called Melitei, of the Iland Malta, frō whence they were brought hither. These Dogges are little and prettie, proper and fine, and sought out far and neere to satisfie the nice delicatie of daintie dames, and wanton womens willes. Instruments of folly to play and dally withal, in trifling away the treasure of time to withdrawe theyr minds from more commendable exercises, and to consume theyr corrupt concupiscences with vaine disport, a silly poore shift to shun theyr irksome idlenesse. These puppies the smaller they be (and thereto if they haue an hole in the forepartes of theyr heads) the better they are accepted, the more pleasure also they prouoke as meete plaifellowes for mincing mistresses to beare in theyr bosomes, to keepe company with all in theyr chambers, to succour with sleepe in beddes, and nourych with meate at boorde, to lye in theyr lappes, and licke theyr lippes as they lie (like ponge Mianaes) in theyr wagons. And good reason it should be so, for courtesie with courtesie hath no fellowship, but courtesie with courtesie hath neighborhood inough. That plausible prouerbe therfore verified sometime vpon a tyrant, namely y he loued hys Sowe better then hys sonne, may well by applied to some of thys kinde of people, who delight more in theyr dogges, that are deprined of all possibi-

litye of reason, then they doe in childzen that are capable of wisdom and iudgement. Yea, they ofte feede them of the best, where the powze mans child at theyz dozes can hardly come by the worst. But the fozmer abuse peraduenture raigneth where there hath ben long want of issue, els where barēnes is the best blossom of beauty: oz finally, where pozemens childzen foz want of theyz owne issue are not redy to be had. It is thought of some that it is very holesome foz a weake stomake to beare such a Dogge in ones bosome, as it is foz hym that hath the palsie to feele the daily smell of a Fore. But how truly thys is affirmed let the learned iudge: onely it shall suffice foz D. Caius to haue sayd thus much of Spaniels and Dogges of the gentle kinde.

Dogs of ỹ homely kinde, are eyther shepheardes curres, oz Mastiffes. The first are so common, that it nēdeth me not to speake of them: Theyz vse also is so well known in keping ỹ herd together (either when they grase oz go before the shepheard,) that it should be but in vaine to spend any time about them. Wherfoze I will leaue thys curre vnto hys owne kinde, and goe in hande wyth the Mastiffe oz banddogge, which is an huge dogge, stubborne, ougly, eagre, burlienous of body, (and therfoze but of litle swiftnesse,) terrible and feareful to behold, and mozefearse and fell then any Archadien curre. Our Englishmen to the entent that these Dogges maye be mozefell and fearse, assist nature wyth some art, vse & custome. Foz although thys kinde of dogge be capeable of courage, violent, valiant, stout and bolde: yet will they increase theyz stomackes by teaching them to bait the Beare, the Bull, the Lyon, and other such lyke cruell and bloudy beasts wythout any coller to defende theyz throtes, and oftentimes thereto, they traine them vp in fighting and wrastling wyth a man, having foz the sauegard of his life either a pike staffe, clubbe, sword, oz priuie coate, wherby they become the mozefearse and cruell vnto straungers. Of Mastiffes, some barke onely with fearse and open mouth but wil not bite, some do both barke and bite, but the cruellest doeth eyther not barke at all, oz bite before they barke, and therefoze are mozeto be feared then any of the other. They take also theyz name of the word mase and theefe (oz maister theefe if you will) because they often put such persones to theyz shiftes in townes and villages, and are the principall causes of theyz apprehension and taking. The force wheych is in them surmounteth all beleefe, and ỹ fast holde wheych they take with theyz teeth exceedeth all credite, foz three of them against a Beare, fowze against a Lion are sufficient both to trie maistries with them, and vtterly ouermatch them. King Henrye the seuenth, as the reporte goeth, commaunded all suche curres to be hanged, because they durst presume to fight against the Lion who is theyz king and soueraigne. The like he did with an excellent Falcon, because he feared not hand to hand to match wyth an Eagle, willing his Falconers in his owne presence to plucke of hys heade after he was taken downe, saying that it was not meete foz any subiect to offer such wrong vnto his Lord and superiоz. But if king Henrye the seuenth had liued in our time, what would he haue done to one English Mastiffe, which alone and wythout anye help at al, pulled downe first an huge Beare, then a Parde, and last of al a Lyon, eathe after other before the Frenche King in one day: wherof if I should wryte the circumstāces, that is, how he toke his aduantage being let lose vnto them, and finally oz aue them into such exceding feare, that they were al glad to runne away when he was taken frō them, I should take much paines, and yet reape but small credite, wherfoze yt shall suffice to haue sayd thus much thereof. Some of our Mastiffes will rage onely in the nyght, some are to be tied vp both day and night. Such also as are suffered to go lose about the house and parde, are so gentle in the day time, that childzen may ride vpon theyz backes & play with thē at theyz pleasures. Some of them also will suffer a straunger to come in and walke about the house oz parde where him listeth, without giuing ouer to folow him. But if he put fozth his hand to touche any thyng, then will they flie vpon him & kill hym if they may. I had one my selfe once, wheych would not suffer any man to bring in hys weapon farder then my gate: neither those that were of my house to be touched in his presence. Oz if I had beaten any of my childzen, he would gently haue assayed to catch the rodde in hys teethe and take it out of my hande, oz else plucke downe theyz clothes to saue them frō ỹ stripes: which in my opinion is worthy to be noted, & thus much of our Mastiffes. The last sozt of Dogges consisteth of the currish kinde meete foz many toyes: of wheyche the wap oz pricheard curre is one. Some mē cal them warners, because they are good foz nothing else but to giue warning when any body doth sturre oz lie in waite about the house in the nyght season. It is vnpossible to describe these curres in any ozder, because they haue no one kinde proper vnto themselues, but are a confused companye mirte of all the rest. The seconde sozte of them are called turne spittes, whose office is not vnknowne to any. And as these are onely reserued for this purpose, so in manye places our Mastiffes are made to drawe water in greate wheeles out of deepe welles, going much like vnto those which are framed for cure turne spittes, as is to be seene at Royston, where this feate is often practised.

The last kind, of tyrish curres, are named dauncers, and those being of a mongerel sort also, are taught & exercised to daunce in measure at ỹ musicall sound of an instrument, as at the iust stroke of a dromme, sweete accent of the Citharne, and pleasaunt harmony of the Harpe, shewing many tryckes by the gesture of theyr bodyes. As to stand bolt vpryght, to lye flat vpon the grounde, to tourne round as a ryng holding their tayles in their teeth, to saw and begge for meate, & sundrye such properties, which they learne of theyr pole rogishe maisters, whose instrumentes they are to gather gaine, as olde Apes clothed in motley, and coloured short wasted Jackets are for the lyke vagabondes, who seeke no better lyuing, then that which they may get by fonde pastime and yolenesse. I myght here intreat of other Dogges, as of those which are bredde betweene a bytche & a Wolfe, and betweene a bytche & fore, or a beare and a mastife. But as we vtterly want the first sort, except they be brought vnto vs, so it happeneth sometime, that the other two are ingendred and seene amongst vs. But of all the rest heretofore remembred, in this Chapter there is none more vglye in sight, cruell and fearce in deede, nor vntractable in hande, then ỹ which is begotten betwæn the Beare & the banddoge. For whatsoeuer he catcheth hould of, he taketh it so fast that a man may sooner teare & rend his body in sunder, then get open his mouth to separate his chappes. Certes he regardeth neyther Wolfe, Beare, nor Lyon, and therfore may wel be compared with those twoo dogs which were sent to Alexander out of India (and procreate as it is thought betweene a Mastiffe and male Tygeras bee those also of Hyrcania) or to them that are bred in Archada, where copulation is oft seene betwæn Lions and Byches, as the like is in fraunce betweene the Wolfes and Dogges, whereof let this suffise.

¶ Of English Saffron. Cap. 14.

AS the Saffron of England is the most excellent of all other, (for it glueth place neyther to that of Cilicia, whereof Solinus speketh, neither to any that commeth from Etolia, Sicilia, Cirena, or Lycia, in sweetenesse tincture and continuance) so of that which is to be had amongst vs, the same that groweth about Saffron Walden in the edge of Essex, surmounteth all the rest, and therfore beareth worthily the heigher price, by fyue pence, or twelue pence most commonly in the pounde.

The rote of the herbe that beareth this commoditie is rounde, much like vnto an indyfferent Onion, and yet it is not cloued, as the lylly, nor flaked as the Scalion, but hath a sad substaunce inter bulbosa, as Orchis and Statyrion. The collor also of the rind is not much differing from the innermost shell of a chestnutte, although it be not altogither so blacke as the sayd shell, neither altogither so bricle as is the pill of the Onion.

The leafe or rather the blade thereof is long and narrowe as Grasse, & in the winter times our Cattel delight very much to fede vpon the same, which come vppe alwaies in October after the flowres bee gathered and gone. The whole hearbe is named in greeke Crocos, but of some as Dioscorides saith Castor, Cynomorphos or Hercules bloud. Yet in the Arabian speach, from whence we take the name that we giue thereunto, I find that it is called Zahafaran, as Rembert doth here witnesse. The cause wherefore it was called Crocus was this as the Poetes feigne, especially from whome Galene hath borowed the hystorye which he noteth in hys ninth booke, de medicamentis secundum loca, where hee writeth after thys maner. A certaine yong Gentleman called Crocus went to playe at coytes in the fielde with Mercury, and beyng bedeleste of himselfe, Mercuries coite happened by his mishappe to hit him on the heade whereby hee receyued a wounde, that ere long killed him altogither, to the great discomfort of his friends. Finally in the place wher he bled, Saffron was after found to grow, whereupon the people seeyng the color of the chiue as it stode, (although I doubt not but it grewe there long before) adiudged it to come to the blonde of Crocus, and therefore they gaue it his name.

In deede the chiue while it remaineth whole vnbruised resembleth a darke redde, but being broken and conuerted into vse, it yeldeth a yelow tincture. But what haue we to do wyth fables. The heads of Saffron are raised in July either wyth plough or spade, and being scowred from theyr Rose, and seuered from such beades as are ingendred of them since the last setting, they are enterred againe out of hand by rankes or rowes, and being couered wyth moulds, they rest in the earth, where they cast forth litle filets & smal rotes like vnto a scalion vntill September, in the beginning of whych moneth ẏ ground

Paring. is pared, and all weedes and grasse that groweth vpon the same remoued, to the intente that nothing may annoy the flower when his time doth come to rise.

Gathering These things being thus ordered in the later ende of the afore sayd moneth, the flower beginneth to appeare of a whitish blewe colour, and in the ende shewing it selfe in the owne kinde, it resembleth almosse the Leucotion of Theophrast, sauing that it is lõger,
See Rembert. and hath in middest thereof, either three or foure chiues, very red and pleasant to behold. These flowers are gathered in the morning before the rising of the Sunne, whych would cause them to welke or flitter: and the chiues being picked from the flowers, these are throwne in to the dunghill, the other dryed vpon little kelles couered wyth straigned canuasses ouer a soft fire: wherby and by the waight that is layed vpon thẽ, they are dried & pressed into cakes, & then bagged vp for ẏ benefite of theyr owners. In good yeares we gather an 100. poundes of wette Saffron of an aker, which being dried doth yelde twentie pound of dry and more. Wherby and sith the price of Saffron is commonly about twentie shillings in money, it is easie to see what benefit is reaped by an acre of thys commoditie, toward the charges of the setter.

Raising. The heads are raised euery third yeare about vs, and commonly in the first yeare after they be set they yelde very litle increase, yet that which commeth is coũted the finest, and called Saffron du hore. The next crop is much greater, but the third exceedeth, and then they raise againe. In thys Periode of time also the heads are sayd to childe, that is to yelde out of some parties of them diuers other bedlets, wherby it hath bene seene that some one head hath bene increased to 3. or 4. or 5. or 6. whych augmentation is the onely cause whereby they are sold so good cheape. For to my remembrance I haue not knowne a quarter of them to be valued much aboue two shillings eight pẽce, except in some odde yeres, when ouer great store of winters water hath rotted ẏ most of them as they stood vnder the ground. It is thought that at euery raising they encrease cõmonly a third part.

In Norffolke and Suffolke they raise but once in seuen yeres, but as theyr Saffron is not so fine as that of Cambridge shyre and about Walden: so it wil not tigne nor holde colour wyth all, wherin lieth a great part of the value of thys stuffe. Some craftie lackes vse to myxt it wyth the flower of Sonchus, whych commeth somewhat neare in deede to the hew of our good Saffron, but it is soone bewrayed both by the colour and hardnesse. Such also was the plenty of Saffron about 20. yeares passed, that some of the townes men of Walden not thankful for the abundance of Gods blessing bestowed vpon them, (as wishing rather more scarcitie therof because of the keping vp of the price) in moste contemptuous manner murmured agaynst him, saying that he did shite Saffron at that present, therwith to choke ẏ market. But as they shewed them selues no lesse then ingrat infidels in thys behalfe, so the Lord considering theyr vnthankfulnesse, gaue them euer since suche scarsitie, as the greatest murmurers haue now the least store, and moste of them are eyther worne out of occupying, or remain scarse able to maintain their grouns wythout the helpe of other men. Certes it hath generally decayed about Walden since the sayd time, vntill now of late wyth in this two yeares, that men began againe to plant and renew the same. But to procede, when the heads be raised and taken vp, they will remaine 16. or 20. daies out of the earth. And I know it by experience, in that I haue caried some of them to London wyth me, and notwythstanding that they haue remayned there vnset by the space of. 15. daies, yet some of them haue brought forth 2. or 3. flowers a pece, and some flowers 4. or 5. chiues to the great admiration of such as haue gathered the same, and not bene acquainted wyth the countrey where they grew. The Crokers or Saffron men doe vse an obseruation a little before the comming vppe of the flower by opening of the heads, to iudge of plentye and scarcitie of thys commoditie to come. For if they see as it were many small heary vaines of Saffron to be in the middest of the bulbe, they pronounce a frutefull yeare: And to say truth, at the cleaning of each head a mã shall discerne the Saffron by the colour, and see wherabouts it will issue out of the rote.

Warme nights, swete dewes, fat grouns (chiefly the chalky) and misty mornings are very good for Saffron, but frost and cold doe kill and kepe backe the flower: And thus much haue I thought good to speake of English Saffron whych is hote in the seconde and dry in the first degree.

Now if it please you to heare of any of the vertues therof, I will note these insuing at the request of one who required me to touche a fewe of them wyth whatsoeuer breuitye I listed. Therfore our Saffron is very profitably mingled with those medicines whych we take for the diseases of the brest, of ẏ longes, of the liuer, and of the bladder. It is good also ſo for the ſtomacke if you take it in meate, for it comforteth the ſame and maketh good digeſtion: being ſodden alſo in wine, it not only kéepeth a man from drunkenneſſe, but encourageth alſo vnto procreation of iſſue. If you drinke it in ſwéete wine it enlargeth the breth and is good for thoſe that are troubled with the teſike and ſhortneſſe of ỹ wind. Mingled wyth milke of a woman and layed vpon the eyes it ſtayeth ſuch humors as deſend into the ſame, and taketh away the red wheales and pearles that oft groweth about them. It is verye profitably layde vnto all inflammations, painefull Apoſtemes, and the ſhingles, and doth no ſmall eaſe vnto dyuers if it be mingled wyth ſuch medicines as are beneficiall vnto the eares. It is of great vſe alſo in riping of botches and al ſwellings proceding of raw humors. Or if it ſhal pleaſe you to drinke the rote therof with Maluelie it will maruellouſly prouoke vrine, diſſolue and expell grauell, and yélde no ſmall eaſe vnto them that make theyr water by droppe meales. Finally, three drammes thereof taken at once (whych is about the weighte of one ſhil. 9. pence halfepeny) is deadly poyſon as Dioſcorides doth affirme. There groweth ſome Saffron in many places of Almaine, and alſo about Vienna in Auſtria, whych later is taken for ỹ beſt that ſpringeth in other quarters. In ſteade of thys alſo ſome doe vſe the Carthamus (called amongſt vs baſtarde Saffrō) but neyther this is of any value, nor the other in any wiſe comparable vnto ours, whereof let this ſuffice as of a commoditye brought into this Ilande not long before the time of Edward the third, and not commonly planted vntill Richard ỹ ſecond did raign. It would grow very well as I take it about Chiltern hilles, & in all the vale of the whyte horſe.

Of Quarries of ſtone for buylding. Cap. 15.

QUarryes with vs are pittes or Mines out of which we digge our Stone to bvilde withall, and of theſe as we haue great plentie in Englande, ſo are they of diuers ſortes and thoſe very profitable for ſundrie neceſſary vſes. In times paſt ỹ vſe of ſtone was in maner dedicated to the buylding of churches religious houſes, princely pallaces Biſhoppes manours and holdes onely: but now that ſcrupulus obſeruatiō is altogither infringed, and buylding with ſtone ſo commonly taken vp that amongeſt noble men & gentlemen the timber frames are ſuppoſed to be not much better then paper worke, of little countinuaunce and leaſt countinuance of all. It farre paſſeth my cunning to ſet down how many ſortes of ſtone for buylding are to be founde in Englande, but much farder to call each of thē by their proper names. Howbeit ſuch is the curioſity of our countrymen that notwithſtanding Almightie God hath ſo bleſſed our realme in moſt plentifull maner with ſuch and ſo many Quarries apt and méete for pyles of longeſt countinuance, yet we as lothſome of this aboundaunce, or not liking of the plenty, doe commonly leaue theſe naturall giftes to moulde and finder in the ground, and take vp an artificiall bricke, in burning whereof a great part of the wood of this lande is dayly conſumed and ſpent to the no ſmall decay of that commoditie and hinderaunce of the poore that periſh oft for colde. Our elders haue from tyme to tyme following our naturall vice in miſlyking of our own commodities at home, and deſiring thoſe of other countries abroade, moſt eſtéemed the Cane ſtone that is brought hyther out of Normandie, & many euen in theſe our dayes folowing the ſame vaine doe couet in their workes almoſt to vſe none other. Howbeit experience on the one ſide and our ſkilful Maſons on the other (whoſe iudgment is nothing inferiour of thoſe of other countries) do affirme that in the North partes of Englād and certayne other places, there are ſome quarries which for hardeneſſe & beautie are equall vnto the outlandiſh gréete. This may alſo be confirmed by the kinges chappell at Cambridge, the greateſt part of the ſquared ſtone wherof was brought thyther out of the North. Some commend the vaine of white frée ſtone, ſlate, & méere ſtone which is betwixt Pentowen and the black head in Cornewall, for very fine ſtuffe. Other doe ſpeake much of the quarries at Hamden nine miles from Wylbery, & paving ſtone of Burbecke. For Tophe ſtone not a few allow of ỹ quarrey that is a Dizilley, diuers miſlyke not of the vaine of harde ſtone that is at Oxforde and Burford. One prayſeth the fré ſtone at Mancheſter and Pyeſtburye in Gloceſter ſhyre. Another the quarryes of the lyke in Richemont. The third liketh wel of the hard ſtone in Clée hill in Shropſhire. The fourth of that of Thorowbridge, Welden, & Terringtō. Where by it appeareth that we haue quarries ynough in Englande ſufficient for vs to buylde withall, if the peeuiſh comtempt of our owne commodities and delectacions to enriche other countries dyd not catch ſuch folliſhe holde vppon vs. Thereby it is alſo verifyed (as any other waye) that all Nations haue rather néede of Englande, then Englande of any other. And thys I thincke may suffice for the substance of our woꝛkes. Now if you haue regarde to their oꝛnature, how many Mines of sundꝛie kindes of course and fine marble are then to be had in Englād. But chiefly one in Staffoꝛdshyꝛe, an other nēre to the Peke, the thirde at Mauldꝛy, the fourth at Snothill, (longing to the Loꝛd Chaundois) the fifth at Eglestone, whiche is of blacke Marble spotted with gray oꝛ white spottes, the firt not farre from Durhā. But what meane I to go about to recite all oꝛ the most excellent, sith these which I haue named alreadie are not altogither of ẏ least noꝛ scarcely of any value in comparison of those whose places of growth are vtterly vnknowne vnto me, & wherof the blacke marble spotted with grēne is none of the vyleſt soꝛt, as may appeare by parcell of the pauement of the lower part of ẏ quire of Paules in London where some pēces thereof are yet to be sēne and marked, yf any will loke foꝛ them. If marble will not serue then haue we the finest Alabaster that may elsewhere be had, as about S. Daudes of Wales. Also nēre to Beau Maner, which is about foure oꝛ fiue miles from Leicester, and taken to be the best, although there are diuers other quarries hereof beyond ẏ Trent, whose names at this tyme are out of my remembꝛaunce. What shoulde I talke of the plaster of Archolme, (foꝛ of that which they dig out of the earth in sundꝛie places of Lincolne & Darbyshyꝛes wherwith they blaūch their houses in stēd of lime, I speake not). Certes it is a very fine kinde of Alabaster, but sith it is solde commonly but after twelue pence the loade, we iudge it to be but vyle and course. Foꝛ my part I cannot skill of stone, yet in my optniō it is not without great vse foꝛ plaster of pariſſe, and such is the Mine of it that the stones lye in flakes one vppon an other like planckes oꝛ tables, and vnder the same is an harde stone verye pꝛofitable foꝛ building as hath oft tymes bēne pꝛoued. If neyther Alabaster noꝛ Marble doth suffice, we haue the Touche stone called in latin Lydius lapis, eyther to matche in sockets with our pillers of Alabaster oꝛ contrariwise: if it pleaseth the woꝛke man to ioyne pillers of Alabaster oꝛ Touche with sockets of bꝛasse, pewter, oꝛ copper, we want not these mettalles: So that I thincke no nation canne haue moꝛe excellent and greater diuersitie of stuffe foꝛ buylding, then we may haue in Englande, yf our selfes coulde so like of it: but such alas is our nature that not our own but other mens do moſt of all delite vs: and foꝛ desire of nouelti we oft exchange our finest Cloth, Coꝛne, Tinne and Woolles foꝛ halfe penny cockhoꝛses foꝛ childꝛen, dogges of were, two penny tabers, leaden swoꝛdes, painted feathers, gewgawes foꝛ fooles, dogetrickes foꝛ doltes, hawkes whoodes, and such lyke, whereby we reape suche mockage and repꝛoch. I might remember here our pittes foꝛ Milstones that are to be had in diuers places of our country as in Angleſey, also at Quene hope of blew grēte, of no lesse value then the collein, yea then the French stones. Our grynstones foꝛ hardware men. Our whetstones and slate of sundꝛy coullours are euery where in maner to be had, as is ẏ flint and chalke, the shalder and the peble. Howbeit foꝛ all this we must fetch them still from farre, as dyd the hull men their stones out of Islande, wherwith they paued their towne foꝛ want of the like in Englande: oꝛ as Sir Thomas Gresham dyd, when he bought the stones in Flanders, wherewith he paued the Burse, but as he will aunswere that he bargened foꝛ the whole moulde and substaunce of his woꝛkmanshippe in Flaunders: so the Hullanders oꝛ Hull men will say, howe that stockefishe is light loding and therefoꝛe they dyd balase their vessels with these Islande stones to kēpe them from turning ouer in their so daungerous a voyage.

¶Of sundry Mineralles. Cap. 16.

WYth howe great benefites thys Ilande of oures hathe bēne indued from the beginning, I hope there is no godly man but wyll redily confesse, and yēlde vnto the Loꝛde God his due honour foꝛ the same. Foꝛ we are blessed euery way, & there is no tempoꝛall commoditie necessary to bē had oꝛ craued by any nacion at Gods hand, that he hath not in moſt abundaunt maner bestowed vpon vs Englishmen if we coulde sē to vse it, and be thankefull foꝛ thē same. But alas (as I sayd in ẏ chapter pꝛecedent,) wē loue to enrych them that care not foꝛ vs, but foꝛ our great commodities: and one trysling toye not woꝛth the carpage, cōming (as the pꝛouerbe saith), in thrē shyps from beyonde the sea is moꝛe woꝛth with vs, thē a ryght good Jewel, easie to be had at home. They haue also the cast to teach vs to neglect our owne thinges, foꝛ if they sē that wē beginne to make any accounte of our commodities (if it be so that they haue also ẏ like, in theyꝛ owne countryes) they will sodainely abase the same, to so lowe a pꝛice that our gaine not beyng woꝛthy our trauaile, & the same commoditie with lesse cost ready to be had at home from other countries (though but for a whyle) it causeth vs to gyue ouer our indeuours, and as it were by and by to forget the matter whereabout we went before, to obteine them at their hands. And this is the onely cause wherefore our commodyties are oft so litle esteemed. Some of them cã say wont any teacher, that they wil by ỳ ease of a Fore of an English man for a grote, & make him afterward giue twelue pence for the tayle. Woulde to God wee myght once were wyser, and eache one indeuour that the common wealth of Englande may flourish againe in hir olde rate, and that our cõmodities may bee fully wrought at home, as cloth if you will for an example, and not caryed out to be shorne and dressed abroade, whiles our clothworkers here doe seruc and beg their bread, & for lacke of dayly practise, vtterly neglect to be skilfull in thys science: But to my purpose. We haue in englãd great plẽty of quick Syluer, Antimony, Sulphur, black Lead, and Orpiment red and yealow. We haue also the finest Alume (wherein the diligence of one of the greatest fauourers of the common wealth of Englande of a subiect hath bene of late egregiously abused, & euen almost with barbarous incluility) the natural Cinnabarum or Vermilion, the Sulphurus glebe called Bitumen in olde tyme vsed for morter, and yet burned in lampes where Oyle is scant and geason: the Chrysocolla, Coperous, ỳ Minerall stone, wherof Petreolum is made, and that which is most straunge the minerall Pearle, which as they are for greatnesse and coulour most excellent of all other, so are they digged out of the maine land, and in sundry places farre distãt frõ the shore. Of Tole mines we haue such plentie in the North, and Westerne partes of our Iland as may suffice for all the Realme of Englande. And so must they doe hereafter in deede, if wood be not better cherished then it is at this present, and to say the truth, notwithstanding that very many of them are caryed into other Countryes of the maine, yet theyr greatest trade beginneth nowe to growe from the Forge into ỳ Kitchyn and Hall as maye appeare already in most Cities and Townes that lye about the cost, where they haue little other fewell, except it be turfe, and hassocke. I marueyle not a little that there is no trade of these into Sussex and Southampton shire, for want whereof the Smithes doe worke theyr yron with charre coale. I thinke that farre carriage be the only cause, which is but a slender excuse to inforce vs to carye them vnto the mayne from hence.

Beside our coale mines we haue pyttes in lyke sorte of white plaster, and of fatte and white Marle, wherewith in many places the inhabitors doe compest their soile. We haue Salte Peter for our ordinaunce, and Salt Soda for our glasse, and therto in one place a kinde of earth (in Sotherey as I weene harde by Codington, and sometime in the tenure of one Croxton of London) which is so fine to make mouldes for goldsmithes & casters of mettal, that a lode of it was worth fiue shyllinges thirtie yeares a gone. None such againe they say in England. But whether there be or not, let vs not be vnthankefull to God for these and other his benefites bestowed vpon vs, wherby he sheweth hymselfe a louing and mercifull father vnto vs, which contrarywyse returne vnto hym in lieu of humilitie and obedience, nothing but wickednesse, auarice, meere contempt of hys will, and notable ingratitude.

¶ Of common or artificiall Salt made in Englande. Cap. 17.

THere are in Englande certaine welles where Salt is made, whereof Lelande hath written aboundantly in his comentaryes of Britaine, and whose words onely I wyll set downe in Englishe as he wrate thẽ, because he seemeth to haue had diligent consideration of the same, without adding any thing of my owne vnto hym, except it bee where necessitie doth inforce me for ỳ meere aid of the reader, in the vnderstanding of his mynd. Directing therefore his iourney from Worcester in his peregrination and laborious trauaile ouer Englande, he saith thus. From Worcester I rode to the Wiche by inclosed soyle, hauing meetely good Corne grounde, sufficient wood and good pasture, aboute a fre myles of. Wiche standeth somewhat in a valley or lowe grounde, betwixt two small hylles on the left ripe (for so he calleth the bancke of euery brooke thorow out all his Englishe treatizes) of a prettie ryuer which not farre beneathe the Wiche is called Salope brooke. The beautye of the Towne in maner standeth in one street, yet be there many lanes in the Towne besides.

There is also a meane Church in ỳ maine streate and once in the weeke, an indifferent rounde markette. The Towne of it selfe is somewhat foule and durty when any rayne falleth by reason of much caryage thorowe ỳ streates, which are very ill paued or rather not paued at all. The great aduauncement also hereof, is by makyng of Salte, and though the commoditye thereof be singuler great, yet the Burgesses be poore generally because Gentlemen haue generallye for the most parte gotten the great gaine of it into their handes, whilest the poore Burgesses yelde vnto all the labour. There are at this present time three hundred Salters: and three Salt springs in the Towne of Wiche, whereof the principall is within a butshote of the ryght rype (or banke) of the riuer that there commeth downe: and this spring is double so profitable in yelding of Salte lyquor, as both the other. Some say (or rather fable) that this Salte spring did fayle in the tyme of Richarde dela Wiche Bysshoppe of Chichester, and that afterwardes by his intercession it was restored to the profit of the olde courle (such is the superstiton of the people) in remembraunce whereof, or peraduenture for the zeale which the Wiche men and Salters did beare vnto Rycharde Dela Wiche there countryman, they vsed of late times on his daye (which commeth once in the yere) to hange this Salt spring or Well about which tapissery, and to haue sundry games, drinkinges, and foolish reuelles at it. But to procede. There be a great number of Salte cotes about this Well, wherin the Salte water is sodden in leades, and brought to the perfection of pure white salt. The other two Salte springes be on the left side of the ryuer a prety waye lower then ẏ first, and as I founde at the very ende of the Towne. At these also be diuers fornaces to make Salt, but the profite & plenty of these two are nothing comparable to the gayne, ẏ ryseth by the greatest. I asked of a Salter how many fornaces they had at all the three springes, and he numbred them to eighténe score that is three hundred and sirtie, saying howe euery one of them payde yearely fiue shillings and eight pence to the king. The truth is that of olde they had liberties giuen vnto them for three hundreth furnaces or mo, and therevpon they gyue a fée farme (or vectigall) of one hunnreth pounde yearely. Certes the pension is as it was, but the number of fornaces is nowe increased, to foure hundreth. There was of late serch made for another Salte spring there aboutes by the meanes of one Neweport a Gentleman dwelling at the Wiche, and the place where it was appeareth, as doth also the woode and Timber which was set aboute it, to keepe vp the earth frõ falling into the same. But thys pitte was not sence occupied, whether it were for lacke of plentie of the salt spring, or for letting, or hindering of the profite of ẏ other three. We thinke that if woode and sale of Salte would serue, they might digge and find more salt springes about the Wich thé three, but there is somewhat else in the wind. For I hard that of late yeares a salt spring was founde in an other quarter of Worcester shire, but it grew to be without any vse sith the Wich men haue such a priuiledge, that they alone in those quarters shall haue the making of salte. The pittes be so set about with gutters that ẏ salt water is easily turned to euerye mans house, and at Nantwich very many troughes go ouer the riuer for the commoditie of such as dwell on the other side of ẏ same. They séeth also their salt water in fornaces of leade, and lade out the Salte some in Cases of wicker, thorowe which the water drayneth, and the Salt remayneth. There be also two or three but very lyttle Salt springes at Dertwiche in a low bottome, where Salt is sometyme made.

A cõmon plage in all thinges of any great commodity for one beateth ẏ bushe but another catcheth ẏ the birdes, as we may see in Batfowling.

Priuileges some harme

Of late also a myle from Cumbremere abbay a pece of an hill dyd sincke & in ẏ same pit rose a spring of salt water where the Abbot begunne to make salt, but the men of the Citie compounded with the Abbot and Couent that there shoulde be none made there, whereby the pit was suffered to go to losse. And although it yelded salte water stil of it selfe, yet it was spoyled at the lack and filled vp with filth. The Wich men vse the commoditie of their salt spring in drawing and decocting the water of them only by fire monethes in the yere, that is from Midsomer to Christmasse, as I gesse to maintayne ẏ price of salte, or for sauing of wood, which I thinke to be their principall reason. For making of salt is a great and notable destructiõ of wood and shall be greater hereafter, except some prouision be made for the better increase of fiering. The lacke of wood also is already perceiued in places nére the Wiche, for where as they vsed to buye and take their woodde nére vnto their occuppings, those wonted springes áre nowe decayed, and they be inforsed to séeke their wood so farre as Worcester towne and all the partes about Breinisgraue, Alchitche, and Alcester. I asked a salter how much wood he supposed yearly to to be spent at these fornaces, and he aunswered that by estimation there was consumed about fiue thousande load, and it was rounde poale woode for the most, which is easy to be cleft, and handsomely reuen in péces. The people that are about the fornaces are very ill coloured, and the iust rate of euery fornace is to make foure loades of salt yearely and to euery loade goeth fine or sire quarters as they make their account. If the fornace men make more in one fornace then foure loades it is as it is sayde imployed to their owne auayle. And thus much hath Le-

lande left in memorie of our whyte salt, who in an other boke not now in my handes hath touched the making also of Bay salt in some part of our coūtry. But sith ỳ is boke deliuered againe to the owner, the tractatiō of bay salt can not be framed in any order, bycause my memorie will not serue to shew the true maner and the place. It shall suffice therfore to haue gyuen such notice of it, to thende the reader may knowe that aswell the Baye as whyte are wrought and made in Englande, and more white also vpon the west coast, towarde Scotlande out of the salt water betweene Wyre and Cokermouth. Finally hauing thus intermedled our artificiall Salt with our Minerals, let vs giue ouer and go in hande with such mettals as are growing here in Englande.

Of Mettalles. Cap. 18.

IT was not sayde of olde tyme without great reason that all countries haue nede of Britaine and Britaine it self of none. For truely yf a man regarde such necessities as nature onely requireth, there is no Nation vnder the sun, that can say so much as ours: sith we doe want none that are conuenient for vs. Certes if it be a benefite to haue any golde at all, we are not voyde thereof, neyther lykewyse of siluer. And albeit that we haue no such aboundaunce of these as some other countries doe yelde, yet haue my rych countriemen store ynough of both in theyr purses, where they were wont to haue leaft, bycause the garnishing of our churches, tabernacles, ymages, shrynes and apparell of the Priestes consumed the greatest part as experience hath confirmed.

Tinne and Lead are very plentifull wyth vs, the one in Cornewall, Deuonshire, & elsewhere in the North, ỳ other in Darby shire, Weredale, and sondry other places of thys Iland: whereby my countreymen doe reape no small commodity, but especially our pewterers, who in time past employed the vse of pewter only vpon dishes and pottes, and a fewe other trifles for seruice, whereas nowe they are growen vnto such exquisite cūning, that they can in maner imitate by infusion any forme or fashion of cuppe, dish, salt, bowle or goblet, whyche is made by Goldsmithes craft though they be neuer so curious & very artificially forged. In some places beyond the sea a garnish of good flat English pewter (I say flat, because dishes and platters in my time begyn to be made depe like basons, and are in dede more conuenient both for sawse and keeping the meat warme) is almost esteemed so precious as the like number of vessels that are made of fine siluer, and in manner no lesse desired amōgst the great estates, whose workemen are nothing so skilfull in that trade as ours, neyther theyr mettall so good, nor plenty so great, as we haue here in England. There were mines of Lead sometimes also in Wales, which indured so long till the people had consumed all theyr wode by melting of the same, as they did also at Comerystwith, fiue miles from Stradfleur. And here by the way it is worthy to be noted of a Crow which a miner of tinne, dwelling nere Comerystwith had made so tame that it would daily flie & folow him to hys worke and other places where so euer he happened to trauaile. Thys labourer working on a time in the bottome where the first Myne was knowne to be, did lay his purse and girdle by him, as meircōmonly doe that addresse them selues to apply theyr businesse earnestly, and he him selfe also had vsed from time to time before. The Crow likewyse was very busie flittering about him, and so much molested hym in deede, that he waxed angry wyth the byrde & in his fury threatned to wring of his necke, if he myght once gette hym into hys handes: To be short, in the ende the Crow hastily caught vp his girdle and purse, & made away wyth all so fast as hir wyngs could carry hyr. Herevpon, the poore man fallyng into great agony (for he feared to lose peraduenture all hys money) threwe downe hys mattocke at aduenture and ranne after the bird, cursing and menacing that he should lose hys life if euer he gotte him againe: but as it fell out, the Crow was ỳ meanes wherby hys lyfe was saued, for he had not bene long out of the mine, ere it fell downe and killed all his fellowes. If I should take vpon me to discourse of the dealing of thys byrde at large, I should peraduenture set my selfe further into the byers then wel finde which way to come out agayne: yet I am perswaded that the Crow was Gods instrument herein, wherby the lyfe of thys poore labourer was preserued. It was done also in an other order then that whych I reade of an other tame Crow kept vp by a shomaker of Dutch lād in hys shop or stoue: who seeing the same to sitte vpon the pearch very heauily & drouse, sayde vnto the birde, What ayleth my Jacke, why art thou so sad and pensiue? The Crow hearyng his maister speake after this sort vnto him, answeared (or else the Deuill wythin it) out of the Psalter. Cogitaui dies antiquos & eternos in mente habui, but whether am I digressed, frō lead vnto Crowes, and from Crowes vnto Deuils. Certes it Psal. 76.

is now high time to retourne vnto our mettals, and resume the tractation of such things as I had earst in hand.

Iron. Iron is found in many places, as in Sussex, Kent, Wercdale, Mendip, Walthall, Manchester and elsewhere in Wales: of which mines diuers doe bring forth so fine and good stuffe as any that commeth from beyond the sea. It is also of such toughnesse, that it yeeldeth to the making of Claricord wire in some places of the realme.

Copper. Copper is lately not found, but rather restored againe to light, for I haue read of Copper to haue béene heretofore gotten in our Iland. Howbeit, as straungers haue most commonly the gouernaunce of our mines, so they hytherto make small gaines of thys in hande in the North partes: for as I am informed the profit doth very hardly counteruaile the charges, whereat wyse men doe not a little marualye, considering the aboundaunce whych that mine do séeme to offer and as it were at hande. Lelande our countryman noteth sundrie great lykelyhodes of copper Mines to be Eastwardes, as betweene Dudman and Trewardith in the sea cliffes, beside sundry other places, wherof diuers are noted here & there in sundry places of this booke already, and therfore it shalbe but in vaine to repete them here agayne. In Dorset shyre also a copper Mine lately found is brought to good perfection.

Stéele. As for our Stéele it is not so good for edge tole as that of Culien, and yet the one is often solde for the other, and lyke tale vsed in both, that is to say thirtie gaddes to the shieke and fiue shiekes to the burdē. Our Alchumy is artificiall & thereof our spones and some saltes are commonly made & preferred before our pewter. The common sort call it Alcamine, but when I know more of the substance and mixture of this metall my selfe, I will not let to write thereof at large, whereas now I must néedes conclude bicause I haue no more to say of the mettalles of my country, except I should talke of brasse, bell mettall, & such as are brought ouer for marchandize from other countries, but what is that to my purpose.

Some tell me ỳ it is a mixture of brasse, lead and tinne.

Of precious stones. Cap. 19.

THe olde writers remember fewe other stones of estimation to be founde in this Iland then that which we call Geat, & they in latine Gagates: whereunto furthermore they ascribe sundry properties as vsually practized here in times past, whereof none of our writers doe make any mencion at all. Howbeit whatsoeuer it hath pleased a number of straungers to write of ỳ vsages of this oure Countrie, aboute the tryall of the virginitie of our maidens by drinking of the powder of thys stone against the tyme of their bestowing in marryage: certaine it is that euen to this day there is some plenty to be had of this commoditie in Darby shyre & about Barwycke, although that in many mens opinions nothing so fine as that which is brought ouer by marchauntes from the mayne. But as these men are drowned with the common errour of our nation, so I am sure that in discerning the price and value of things, no man now liuing can go beyond ỳ iudgemēt of the old Romaines, who preferred the geate of Britain before ỳ like stones bred about Lube & all other coūtries. Moreouer as Geat was one of ỳ first stones of this Ile wherof any forre in account was made, so our pearles also did match with it in renowne, in so much that the only desire of thē caused Cæsar to aduenture hyther, after hée had séene the quantities & hard of our plenty of them, whyleste he abode in France. Certes they are to be founde in these our dayes, and thereto of diuers coulours, in no lesse numbers then euer they were in olde tyme. Yet are they not now so much desired bycause of they' smallnesse, and also for other causes, but especially sith churchwork as copes, vestements, Albes, Tunicles, altar clothes, canapies, and such trash are worthily abolished, vpon which our countrymen heretofore bestowed no small quantities. For I thinke there were fewe churches and Religious houses besides Bishoppes Myters & Pōtifical vestures, but were either thorowly fretted or notably garnished wt huge nūbers of them. But as the Brittish Geat or orient Pearle were in olde tyme estéemed aboue those of other countries, so tyme hath since the conquest of the Romaines reuealed many other: in so much ỳ at this season there are founde in England the Ætites and the Hematite and these very pure and excellent, also ỳ Calcedony, the Porphyrite, ỳ Christal, & those other, which we call Calaminares, & specularis beside a kinde of Diamōd or Adamant, which although it be very fair to sight is yet much softer thē * those ỳ are brought hyther out of other countries. We haue also vpon our coastes the white corall and other stones daily founde in cliffes and rockes, whereof such as finde them haue eyther no knowledge at all, or else doe make but small account, being seduced by outlādish Lapidaries, whereof the most part discourage vs frō the fetching and séeking out of our owne cōmodities, to the ende that they may haue the more more free vtterance of their naturall and artificial wares, wherby they get great gaines amongst such as haue no skill. I haue harde that the best triall of a stone is to laye it on the nayle of our thombe, and so to go abroade into the cleere light, where if the coulour hold in all places a like, the stone is thought to be natural. &c. But if it alter especially towarde ỹ nayle, thẽ is it not sound, but rather an artificiall practize. If this be true it is an experiment worthy ỹ noting. (Cardane also hath it in his De subtilitate) yf not I haue reade neere more lies then this, as one example out of Cato, who sayeth that a cuppe of Iuy will holde no wine at all, but I haue made some vessels of ỹ same wood, which refuse no kind of liquor, and therefore I suppose that there is no such Antipatha betweene wyne & Iuy as some of our reading Philosophers without all maner of practize will seeme to inferre amongest vs. What shoulde I saye more of stones? truely I can not tell, sith I haue sayde what I may already & peraduenture more then I thought. This yet will I adde that yf those which are founde in Muskelles (for I am vtterly ignoraunt of the generatiõ of pearles) be good pearle in deede I haue at sundrie times gathered more then an ounce of them, of which diuers haue holes already entred by nature, some of them not much inferiour to great peason in quantitie, & thereto of sundrie colours as it happeneth amõgst such as are brought from the Easterly coast to Saffron Walden in Lent, when for want of flesche, stale stincking fishe & welked Muskles are thought to be good meate for other fishe is to to deere amongst vs.

¶Of the Coynes of Englande. Cap. 20.

THe Saxon Coyne before the Conquest is vtterly vnknowne vnto me: how bee it if my coniecture be any thing, I suppose that the shillynges of siluer, in those dayes did counterpeise our common ounce, though afterwarde it came to passe that it arose to twentie pence, and so continued vntyll the tyme of King Henry the eyght, who first brought it to three shillings and foure pence, and afterwarde our Syluer Coyne vnto base & copper monies, by reason of those inestimable charges, which diuers wayes oppressed him. But as king Edward his sonne began to restore ỹ aforesayde Coine againe vnto fine siluer: so Quene Mary his successour did continue his good purpose: notwithstanding that in hir time the Spanish money was very common in England, by reason of hir marriage with Philyp King of Spayne.

Siluer restored.

After hir discease the Lady Elizabeth hyr sister, and now our most gracious Quene, and souereigne Prince, did finish the matter wholly, vtterly abolishing the vse of copper Coine, and conuerting the same into fine Syluer, as peeces of halfpeny fardyng, of a peny, of three half pens, peeces of two pence, of three pence, of foure pence (called ỹ groate) of fiue pence vsually named the testone, and shilling of twelue pence, whereon shee hath imprinted hir owne ymage, & emphaticall superscription. Our Gould is eyther olde or new. The old is that which hath remained since ỹ time of king Edwarde the thirde, or beene Coyned by such other Princes, as haue reigned since his discease, without abasing of the fynesse of that mettall. Therof also wee haue yet remayning, the Ryall, the George noble, the Henry Ryall, the Salut, the Angell, and their smaller peeces, as halfes or quarters, though these in my time, are not so common to be seene. I haue also beholde the Souereine of twenty shillinges, & the peece of thirtie shillynges, I haue harde lykewise of peeces of forty shillings, three pounde, fiue pounde, and tenne pound. But sith there were fewe of them coined, and those only at the commaundement of the kings, yearely to bestow where their maiesties thought good in lieu of new yeres gyftes and rewardes: it is not requisite that I should remember them here amongst our currant coynes.

Olde gold

The newe Golde is taken for such as beganne to be coyned in the latter dayes of king Henry the eyght, at which time the fynesse of the mettall began to be very much alayed, and is not likely to bee restored for ought that I can see: yet is it & such as hath beene coyned since by hys successours princes of this Realme in value and goodnesse equall and not inferiour to the coyne and currant Golde of other nations, where eche one doth couet to gather vppe our olde finer Golde: so that the Angels, Ryalles, & Nobles, are more plentifully seene in Fraunce and Flanders, then they be by a great deale within the Realme of England. Our peeces nowe currant are of tenne shillinges, fiue shillings, & two shillinges and fiue pence only: and those of sundry stampes and names, as half souereines, quarters of Souereines, (otherwyse called Crownes,) & halfe Crownes: lykewise Angels, halfe Angels, & quarters of Angels, or if there be any other, in good soth I knowe them not, as one scasely acquainted with any siluer at all, much lesse then God it wote with any store of Goulde.

New gold

The

The first currant shilling, or peces of twelue pence were coyned by kyng Henry the eight: those of fyue shillinges, & of 2. shil. & 6. pence, & the half shil. by king Edward ỹ first: but the odde peces aboue remẽbred vnder the groat, by our high & mighty Princes Quẽne Elizabeth, the name of ỹ groat peny: 2. pence: ob. & farding, being more auncient then ỹ I can wel discusse of the time of their beginnings. Yet thusmuch I read that king Edwarde the first in the eight yeare of his reigne, did first coine the peny & smallest peces of siluer roundewyse, which before were square, and wont to haue a doubble crosse wyth a creek, in such sorte that the peny might easily be brokẽ, eyther into halfs or quarters, by which shift onely the people came by halfe pence and fardinges, that otherwyse were not stamped nor coyned of set purpose.

Of forren coynes we haue both the Ducates, the single and the double: the Crusadoes, with the lõg crosse & the short: ỹ Portigue, a pece very solemly kept of dyuers, & yet oft times abased with washing, or else absolutely coũterfeicted: and finally ỹ french and flemish crownes, onely currant among vs, so long as they holde weight. But of siluer coynes none at all: yet are the Dalders and such, often tymes brought ouer, but neuertheless exchanged as Bullion, according to their fineneſſe and weight, and afterwarde conuerted into coyne, by such as haue authority.

In olde time we had sundrye Mintes in Englande, and those commonly kept in Abbaies and religious houses before the conqueſte, where true dealing was commonly supposed: most of all to dwel. As at Ramseye, Bury, Caunterbury, Glaſſenbury and such like, sundry exemplificats of ỹ graunts whereof are yet to be seene in wryting. But after the Normans had once gotten the maſterye, they trusted themselues best wyth the ouersight of their Myntes, and therefore erected diuers of their owne, although they afterwarde permitted some for small peces of Siluer, vnto sundry of the houses afore sayd. In my time diuers mints are suppressed as Southwarke, Brystow, &c. and al coinage is brought into one place, that is to say the Tower of London, where it is continually holden and perused, but not without great gaine to such as deale wall. There is also coinage of Tin holdẽ yearly at two seuerall times, that is to saye Midsomer and Michaelmas in the west country, which at the first hearing, I supposed to haue bene of money of the sayde metall and graunted by Priuiledge from the Prince, vnto ỹ townes of Haylstone, Truro, & Lostwithiel. Howbeit vpon farder examinatiõ of the matter, I finde it to be nothing so, but an office onely erected for the Prince, wherein he is allowed the ordinary customes of the mettall: and such blockes of Tinne as haue passed ỹ handes of his Officers, are marked wyth an especiall stampe, whereby it is knowne that the custome due for the same, hath ordinarily bene aunswered. It should seeme & in my opinion is very likely to be true, that whyle Romains reigned here, Kingstone vppon Thames was the chiefe place of their coynage for this prouince. For in eearing of the grounde about that Towne in tymes past, and nowe of late (besides the curious fundation of many goodly buyldinges that haue bene ripped vp, and diuers coines of brasse, siluer, and Golde, with Romaine letters in painted pots that haue bene found there) in the dayes of Cardinall Wolsey, one such pot was discouered ful as it were of new siluer lately coined. Another with plates of siluer ready to be coyned. And the thirde wyth cheanes of siluer, ready as it should appeare to bee melted into coine, whereof let thys suffice to countenaunce out my coniecture.

Of our accompt of time, and partes thereof. Cap. 21.

AS Libra is As or Asis vnto ỹ Romains for theyr waight, & the foote in standard measure: so in our accompt of the partes of time, we take the houre to be the greatest of ỹ least, and least of the greatest, wherby we kẽpe our reckening. For my part I do not see any great difference vsed in the obseruatyon of tyme and hir partes betwẽne oure owne and any other forreine nation, wherefore I shal not nede to stand long vpon this matter. Howbeit, to the ende our exact order herein shall appeare vnto all men, I wil set downe some short rehearsall therof, and that in so briefe maner as vnto me is possible. As for our Astronomicall practises, I meane not to meddle wyth them, sith theyr course is vniformely obserued ouer all. Our common order therfore is to begin at the minute, as at the smallest part of time knowne vnto the people, notwythstanding that in most places they descend no lower then the halfe quarter or quarter of the howre, and from whence they procede vnto the houre, whych is the 24. part of that whych we call the common and naturall day, & doth begin at midnight. Of vnequall houres or dayes, our natiõ hath no regard, and therefore to shew theyr quantities tities & differences, it should be but in vaine. In lyke sort, whereas the Egyptians, Italians, Bohemians, and Iewes begin their day at the Sunne set ouer night: the Persians, Babylonians, Grecians, and Nouibergians at the Sunne rising (each of them accoũting their dayes and nights by vnequall houres) also the Athenienses, Arabians, Dutchmen and Astronomers at hygh nœne: We after the Romain maner vsed in the Church there of long time chose the very poynte of midnight, from whence we accompt. 12. equall houres vnto midday ensuing, and other. 12. againe vnto the aforesaid poynt. And this is our generall order for the naturall day. Of the artificiall we make so farre account, as that we recken it to be day when the Sunne is vp, and nyght when it leaueth our Horizon: otherwyse also we deuide it into two partes, that is to say, forenoone and afternoone, not regarding the ruddy, shining, burning and warming seasons (of thẽ vnequal houres a peece,) whych other seme to obserue, and wherof I read these verses.

Solis equi lucis dicuntur quatuor horæ.
Hæc rubet, hæc splendet, hæc calet, illa tepet.

In deede our Philitians haue another partition of the day, as men of no lesse learning no doubt then the best of forrein countryes if we could so conceaue of them. And herein they concurre wyth those of other nations, who for distinction in regiment of our humours, diuide the artificiall day and night in such wise as these verses doe import, and are in deede a generall rule whych each of them doth follow.

Tres lucis primas, noctis tres sanguinis imas.
Vis cholere medias lucis sex vendicat horas.
Datq; melam primas noctis, tres lucis & imas.
Centrales ponas sex noctis phlegmatis horas.

Or thus, as Tanstetter hath geuen them forth in hys Prælections.

A nona noctis donec sit tertia lucis,
Est dominus sanguis, sex inde sequẽtib⁹ horis
Est dominans cholera, dum lucis nona sit hora
Post niger humid ineſt donec sit tertia noctis.
Post hæc phlegma venit, donec sit nona quietis

In English thus in effect.

Three houres ere sun do rise, & so many after, Blud,
Frõ 9. to 3. at after none, hot choler beares the sway,
Euen so to 9. at night, swart Choler hath to rule,
As Phlegme from thence to 3. at morne: 6. houres eache one I say.

In like sort for the nyght we haue none other partes then the twylight, darkenyght, midnight, and cockes crowing. Whereas the Latines diuide the same into. 7. partes, as Vesper the Euening, which is immediately after the setting of the Sunne. Crepusculum the twylight, when it is betweene day and night, lyght and darkenesse, or properly neyther day nor night. Conticinium the still of the nyght, when each one is layd to rest. Intempestum, the dul or dead of the night, when mẽ be in theyr first or dead sleepe. Gallicinium the cockes crowing. Matutinum the breache of the day: and Diluculum siue aurora, the ruddy, orenge, golden or shining coloure, seene immediately before the rising of the Sunne. Other there are whych doe recken by watches, diuiding the nyght into 4. equal partes. Of whych the first beginneth at Euening, called the first watch, and continueth by 3. vnequall houres, and so forth vntill the ende of the nynth houre, wherat the fourth watch entreth whych is called the morning watch, because it partly concurreth with ỹ morning & breache of the day before the rising of the Sunne. As for the originall of the worde houre, it is very auncient, but yet not so olde as that of the watch whych was deuised first among souldiers for theyr better safegarde and chaunge of watchmen in theyr campes, the lyke whereof is almost vsed among our seafaring men, whych they call clearing of the glasse, and performed from time to time wyth great heede and some solemnitie. Certesse the worde Hora among the Grecians, signified so well the 4. quarters of the yeare, as the 24. part of ỹ day, but what stand I vpon these things to let my purpose stay. To proceede therefore. Of naturall dayes is the weeke. weeke compacted, which consisteth of 7. of them. The first entreth with Monday, wherby it commeth to passe that we rest vpon the Sunday, whych is the 7. in number, as almighty God hath commaunded in his word. The Iewes begin theyr weke vpon our Saterday at the setting of the Sunne, and the Turkes with the Saterday: wherby it commeth to passe, that as the Iewes make our last day the first of theyr weeke, so the Turks make the Iewish Sabaoth the beginning of theyr Hebdoma, because Mahomet theyr prophet (as they say) was borne & dead vpõ ỹ friday, & so he was in deede, except their Alcharõ deceaue me. The Iewes doe recken theyr dayes by theyr distance from theyr sabaoth, so that the first day of theyr weeke, is the first day of the sabaoth, and so forth vnto the sixte. The Latines accompted theyr dayes after the 7. Planets, chosing the same for the denominator of the daye, that entreth hys regiment wyth the first vnequall houre of the same after the Sunne be risen. Howbeit, as thys order is not wholly retcined wyth vs, so the vse of the same is not yet altogither abolyshed, as may appeare by our Sonday,

Monday,

Monday, and Saturday. The reſt were chãged by the Saxons, who in remembrance of Theut ſometime theyr prince, called the ſecond day of ẏ weeke Theutſdach ẏ is. Woden, Othin, or Othen, Wodenſdach. Lykewiſe of Thor, they named the iiij day Thorſdach, and of Frea wyfe to Woden the v. was named Freadach. Albeit there are (and not amiſſe as I thinke) that ſuppoſe them to meane by Thor, Iupiter, by Woden Marcury, by Frea Venus, and finallye by Theut Mars: which if it be ſo, then it is an eaſie matter to finde out the Germaine Mars, Venus, Mercury and Iupiter wherof you may reade more hereafter in my Chronologie. The truth is, that Frea had 7. ſonnes by Woden, as Woden the firſt, father to Wecca, of whome deſcẽded thoſe that were afterwards kings of Kent, Fethelgeta was the ſeconde, and of hym came the kings of Mertia. Balday 3. father to the kings of the Weſtſaxõs. Beldagius 4. parent to the kings of Brennicia or Northumberland. Weogodach 5. author of the kings of Deyra. Caſer. 6. rote of the Eſſangle race, and Paſcad originall burgeaunt of the kings of Eſſex. As for the kings of Suſſex although they were of the ſame people yet were they not of the ſame ſtreigne, as our old monuments do expreſſe. But to proceede. Of weekes, our monethes are made whych are ſo called of the Mone, each one conteining 28. dayes, or 4. weekes, wythout any further curioſity. For we reckẽ not our time by the yeare of the Mone, as the Iewes, Grecians or Romains did at the firſt, or as the Turks, Arabians & Perſians do now: neyther any parcell therof by ẏ ſayd planete as in the Weſt Indies, where they haue neither weke, moneth nor yere, but only a general accoũt of hundreds & thouſands of Mones: wherfore if we ſay or write a moneth, it is to be expounded of 28. dayes or 4. weekes only. Or (if you take it at large) for a moneth of the common Kalender, whych neuertheleſſe in plees and ſutes is nothyng at all allowed of, ſith the Mone maketh hir full reuolutiõ in 28. dayes, that is, vnto the place where ſhe left the Sunne, notwythſtanding that he be now gone, and at hir returne not to be found where ſhe departed from hym.

In olde time eche Moneth of the Romaine Calender, was reconed after the courſe of ẏ Mone, and theyr entraunces were incertaine, as were alſo the changes of that Planet. But after Iulius Cæſar had once corrected the ſame, the ſeuerall beginninges of euerye one of them dyd not onely remayne fyxed, but alſo the olde order in the deuiſion of their partes continued ſtill vnaltered: ſo that the Moneth is yet deuided as before into Calendes, Ides, and Nones, albeit that in my daies, the vſe of the ſame be but ſmall, & their order retained only in our Calenders, for the better vnderſtanding of ſuch tymes, as the hiſtoriographers and olde authors do remember. The reconing alſo of ech of theſe goeth as you ſee after a prepoſtereus order, whereby the Romaynes dyd rather note howe many dayes were to the nert chaunge from the precedent, then contraywiſe, as by peruſall of ẏ ſame you ſhall more eaſily perceyue. The daies alſo of the change of ẏ Moneth of ẏ Mone, are called Calendæ, which in time of Paganiſme were conſecrated to Iuno, & ſacrifice made to that goddeſſe on ẏ ſame. On theſe daies alſo, and on ẏ Ides and Nones they would not marye. Likewiſe the morow after eche of thẽ were called dies Atri, blacke daies, as ſome bookes doe yet remember. The word Calendæ (in Greeke Neomenia) is deriued of the worde Calo, to call: for vpon the firſt daye of euery Moneth, the Prieſt vſed to call the people of the Citie & country togither, and ſhewe them by a cuſtome howe many daies were from the ſaide Calendes to the Nones, and what feaſts were to be celebrated betweene that and the nerte chaunge. The Nones commonly are not a boue 4. or 6. in euery Moneth, and ſo long as the Nones laſted, ſo long did the Mercates continue, & therfore they were called Nonæ quaſi Nundinæ. In them alſo were neyther Hollydayes (more then at thys preſent except ẏ day of the Purification of our Lady) nor ſacrifice offred to the gods, but each one applied hys buſineſſe and kept hys market, reckening the firſt day after the Calends or chaũge, to be the 4. or 6. day before the faire ended. Some thinke that they were called Nonæ, of the word Non, quia in iiſdem dij non coluntur, or as Ouide ſayeth. Nonarum tutela deo caret. But howſoeuer it be, ſure it is that they were ẏ mart dayes of euery moneth wherein the people bought, ſolde, and dyd nothing elſe. The Idus are ſo named of the Hetruſcien worde Iduare to deuide, and before that Cæſar altered the Calender, they deuided the moneth commonly by the myddeſt. But afterward when he had added certaine dayes thereto, thereby to make it agree wyth the yeare of the ſunne (whych he intruded about the ende of euerye moneth, becauſe he would not alter the celebration of theyr vſuall Feaſtes) then came they ſhorte of the myddeſt, ſometime by two or three daies. In theſe therfore (which alwaies are eyght) the Marchauntes had layſure to packe vp and conueigh theyr mar-marchaundise, to paye their creditors and make merry with their friendes. After the Idus do the Calendes followe, but in a decreasing order, as the Mone doth in light when shée is past the full. But herein lyeth all the mysterie, if you can saye so many dayes before the next chaunge or newe Mone, as the number there expressed doth betoken. As for 16. cal. so many dayes before the next coniunctiõ. &c. Of these Calendes, I meane touching their number in euery Moneth, I fynde these verses insuing.

Ianus & Augustus denas nouemq; Decẽber,
Iunius, Aprilis, Septẽber & ipse Nouember,
Ter senas retinent, Februus bis Octo Calẽdas
Iulius October Mars Maius Epadecemq;.

In Englishe thus.

December, Ian, and August moneth full nyneteene Calendes haue.
September, Iune, Nouember and Aprill twyse nine desire,
Syxteene foule Februarie hath, no more can he well craue.
October, Maye and Iuly hote, but seauenteene doe require,

In lyke maner of nones and Ides.

Sex maius Nonas, October, Iulius & Mars
Quatuor at reliqui, dabit Idus quilibet octo.

To Iuly, March, October, May, sixe nones I hight,
The rest but 4, as for your Ides they aske but eight

Agayne touching the number of dayes in euery moneth.

Iunius, Aprilis, Septemq;, Nouemq; tricenos vnũ plus reliqui, Febru⁹ tenet octo vicenos,
At si bissextus fuerit super additur vnus.

Thirty dayes hath Nouember
Aprill, Iune and September,
Twentie and eyght hath February alone,
and all the rest thirty and one,
But in the leape you must adde one.

Our yeare is accounted after the course of the sunne, and although the church hath some vse of that of the Mone for the obseruation of certaine moueable feastes, yet it is reducted to that of the Sunne, which in our ciuile dealinges is chiefly had in vse. Herein onely I finde a scruple that the beginning thereof is not vniforme and certaine, for our recordes beare Date the 25. of March, and our Calenders of the first of Ianuary. Our sundrie officers also haue sundrie entraunces into their charges of custome, which breedeth great confusion, whereas if all these might be referred to one originall (and that to be the first of Ianuarie) I do not thincke but there would be more certaintie and lesse trouble for our historiographers and offices in their account of the yeare. Furthermore, whereas our intercalation for the Leape yeare is somewhat to much by certayne minutes (which in 309. yeares do amount vnto an whole day) yf one intercalation in so many were omitted, our Calender would be the more perfite: & I woulde wish that the same yeare wherein the saide intercalation should be ouerpassed, might be called Annus magnus Elizabethæ in perpetual remembrance, of our noble and soueraign princesse. Certes the next omission is to be performed yf all Princes woulde agrée thereto in the Leape yeare that shall be about the yeare of grace 1700. If it shall please God that the worlde may last so long. Aboue the yeare we haue no more partes of Time, that cary any seuerall names with them, except you will affirme the worde age, to be one which is taken for 100. yeares, & signifieth in Englishe so much as Seculum or Euum doth in latine, whereof this may suffice. But to conclude withal, you shall haue a table of the names of the dayes of the wéeke, after the olde Saxon and Scottish maner, which I haue borowed from amongest our auncient writers.

The present names.	Thunresdeg.
Monday.	Firgesdeg.
Tuesday.	Saterdeg.
Wednesday.	Sunnandeg.
Thursday.
Fryday.	The Scottish vsage.
Saterday.	Diu Luna.
Sunday.	Diu Mart.
	Diu Yath.
The olde Saxon names.	Diu Ethamon.
Monendeg.	Diu Friach.
Tuesdeg.	Diu Satur.
Wodnesdeg.	Diu Serol.

Of the maner of measuring the length and bredth of things after the Englishe vsage. Cap. 22.

THe first and smallest of our measures is the Barly corne, whereof three being taken out of the middest of the ere, well dried and layde endewardes one to another, are sayde to make an ynche, which the Latines measure after the bredth of the thombe, and therfore of some is called Pollicare, although the true name thereof be Vncia, as I haue often reade. That which they call Digitus or the finger bredth, is not in vse with vs: yet is it the sixtenth part of theyr fote, as the inche is the twelfth of ours. Each palme or hand bredth cõtaineth also foure of theyr fingers, as by the figure héere insuing, may easily be perceyued, whych I haue set downe onely to the ende that who so liketh may beholde the diuersity, Inche.

Finger bredth.

diuersity not onely betweene the Romaine measure & ours, but also of their owne standard which hath chaunged oft among them.

Certes it coulde not well be brought to passe, to giue out the whole foote because the quantitie of the page would not suffer mee so to doe, wherefore I haue exemplified only in the halfe, which I hope shall abundauntly satisfie eche one that is desirous to see and perceyue their difference. The first columne therefore setteth downe the halfe foote after the standerd of Englād. The 2. seemeth to be a Romain foote, found out of late by Bartholomeus Marlianus, and set downe to be seene in his Topography of Rome. Therin also euerye synger breadth conteineth two of the old assize, wherby hee maketh not 16. but onely eyght in the whole, as you may there beholde. The third is that which Budeus had sometime delyuered vnto him, who was very curyous in serching of the weights, and measures, of olde tyme as maye yet appeare by his excellent treatize De asse, wherin hys syngular skill in thys behalfe doth euidently appeare.

The fourth was foūde long since, by Leonard⁹ de Portis, in a Garden at Rome, belonging vnto Angelus Colotius. The fift is the halfe foote of Paris, diuyded by the ynche, and yet equall to ỳ Romaine standerd described by Budeus. The last sheweth the the quantitie of their Palme, whereof their foote hath foure, and eche Palme conteyneth 4. fingers as I haue saide already. By this Tablet also as you may see, howe eche standerde exceedeth or commeth shorte of other. Wherefore it shall not nede for me to stay any longer vppon theyr differences, which may so well and better be determined by the eye. Of our measures therefore.

Three Barly cornes do make an ynche.

Twelue ynches yelde a foote.

Three foote are our yarde.

One yarde and nyne ynches giue an elne.

Seauen foote yelde a fadam.

By the standerde. Although we vse commonly to call the space betweene the toppes of our middle fingers (when our armes bee stretched out at length) by that name also: the same likewyse beyng called Passus sometimes, as the height of a man is Status, & supposed to be all one with the lesser fadam, or extention of his armes. But to proceede.

Sixteene foote & an halfe, or 5. yardes & an halfe do make a pole in whose Area are 272. of our feete & an half. Foure poles in length, and one in breadth, do yeeld a rodde, or rode of grounde, which some call a yardendele or yardlande. Foure roddes doe gyue an Acre, whose plotte hath 43600. or fortie pole in length, and thereto foure in breadth.

The auncient Romaynes had for theyr land as Columella saith. lib. 5. cap. 1.

The finger breadth.

The foote of sixteene finger breadthes.

The pace fiue foote.

Actus euery way had a 120. foote. In Hispania Betica, it hight Agna: but in Gallia Arepē. Iugerum, had two Actus and was so called tāquam a iunctis Actibus: so that it conteined one way 240. foote, and 120. another, that is, 28800. foote in the whole plot.

Porca. 7200. feete.

Versus, 8640. Agna. 14400.

The furlong hath 125. paces, or 625. feete. Eyght furlonges also made a myle.

Centuria, hath 200 Iugera, but in olde time onely, 100. for notwithstanding that the first be doubbled, yet it retaineth still the primitiue denomination, as we see in the worde tribe, which was at the first but one part of the three, wherinto ỳ whole people of Rome were seuered & deuided. But let vs returne vnto our owne againe.

¶ It lyke sort for such as trauaile.

Fyue foote measured by the sayde ynche make a pace & 125. paces doe yelde a furlong.

Eyght furlonges or 1000. paces is a mile, and after ths Geometricall pace are our myles measured, which some notwithstanding doe recone by about 278. tournes of a

Carte

Carte wheles, whose compasse is commonly of eyghtene foote of the standerd, and and height fyue foote and an halfe, as I haue bene informed by Wherightes in the citie.

By the foote also we measure glasse, and Tymber, and all others our buyldings. By the yarde our woollen cloth, tapissery, Arras Spikes, and Laces: but our linnen by ẏ elne. Finally our woodes and pastures are layed out by the pole, and therto our hedging, and ditching, after the same rate: although the depth of our ditches is measured by the foote & likewise their bredth as experience dayly cõfirmeth. Besids this we haue also another kind of measuring, & that is by the fadam, the vse whereof is onely seene in the digging of pittes, welles & mines, measuring of ropes, & sounding the depth of the sea, when dreade of perill inforceth our mariners to see vnto their safegarde. It is furthermore a common opinion amongst vs, that euery hundred acres of grounde, containe iust a myle in compase rounde aboute: but as I haue not yet examined howe truely thys is saide, so I am most sure that a plot of 400. Acres, shall not ẏelde a lyke proportion, by the one halfe, whensoeuer you walke about it. And euen thus woulde I ende, with this chapter, concerning our maner of measuring before remẽbred were it not that I thinke good to set downe what I haue gathered of the lyke measurynges as they haue ben vsed in other countries where they also doe reconne by the Graine, making their accompt much after such maner as followeth.

The Digitus or finger breadth hath foure graines layd side to side.
The Vncia maior, three fingers.
The palme hath foure fingers.
Their dichas two hande breadthes or eyght fingers.
Their spanne three hand bredthes or twelue fingers bredthes.
Their foote is fyftene fingers or foure hand-bredthes.
Their foote and halfe in latine, Sesquipes or Cubitus, 24. finger bredthes.
The steppe two foote and an halfe.
The common pace three foote.
The Geometricall fyue foote.
The Orgia fyue foote, as I gather out of Suidas.
The league three myles English.
The common dutche myle 4000. paces.
The greate dutch myle 5000 paces.
¶ In lyke sorte the Latines & we doe measure our iourneys by myles.

The Grecians by furlonges.
The frenche and spanishe by leagues.
The Egiptians by Signes.
The Persians by Parasangas, of which ech one conteyneth thirtie furlonges.

As for the olde Brytishe myle that includeth 1500. paces english, it shal not greately neede to make any discourse of it, & so much the lesse, sith it is yet in vse and not forgotte among the Welch men, as Leland hath noted in his commentaries of Brytaine: wherfore it may suffise to haue saide thus much of the same, and so of all the rest, beyng mindfull to goe forwarde and make an ende of this treatize.

Of Englisn weightes and their comparison with others. Cap. 23.

THe least of our waightes is a grayne, betweene which and the ounce we haue the halfe quarter, the half, and three quarters of the ounce. In olde tyme these smaller partes were commonlye reconed by peeces of coyne and not by quarter and halfe quarter as we doe nowe. As by the farding or fourth part of a peny, which waighed eyght graines, the halfepeny that peysed sixtene, and peny that counterpeysed 32. and was in deede the 32. part of an ounce, so that for the halfe quarter we sayd two pence halfepeny, for the quarter fiue pence, and halfe ounce tenne pence, which is nowe growne out of vse, & our coine so inhaunced that 60. of our pence doe hardly make an ounce, and aleane graines suffice with the more to counterpeyse a peny.

The Athenien ounce was lesse then ours by 64. graynes, and deuided into his partes after this maner following.

Lepta the seauenth part of two graynes.
Granum. A graine.
Chalchus two graines and seauen Leptæ.
Siliqua foure graines.
Semiobolus fiue graines or three Chalchi.
Obolus hath twelue graines.
Scriptulum two Obolos.
Drachma 3 Scriptula or 72. graines.
Vncia 8 Drachmes: 24. Scriptulas: 48. Obolos 576. graines, whereby they differed not also from the Romaines in their vncia who reconed their small waightes after this maner following.

A graine the least of all.
Siliqua had 4. graines.
Semiobolus 6. graines.
Obolus 12. graines.
Victoriatus one thirtenth part of an ounce

or

of 41. graines and $\frac{1}{14}$ of a graine.

Denarius the seauenth part of an ounce.

Sextula the sixt part.

Sicilicus the fourth part.

Duella the thirde part.

Semuncia the second part, or half an ounce otherwyse called a Stater.

Vncia the ounce which had two Semuncias 3. Duellas: 4. Sicilicos: 6. Stextulas: 7. Denarios: 14. Victoriatus: and 576. graines, as they themselues doe number them.

Epiphanius in his De mensuris & ponderibus, speaking of the ounce deuideth it into two Stateres, 4. Siclos, and 8. Drachmes, whereby he maketh the Stater to containe halfe an ounce or two Didrachmas. And as he agreeth with vs in 8. Drachmes to the ounce, so he maketh the lesse Holcen to counteruaile the Drachme, and the greater the Sicle: after which also the heare of Absolon was weighed and founde to haue Holcen siclorum 125. that is two pounde and an halfe as he maketh vp his reckening.

That the Siclus was once called Talentum I referre you to Eusebius his 9. booke De preparatione Euangelica, where he alledgeth the authoritie of Eupolemus, writing of Dauid, Salomon and the building of the Temple at large. In the 30. of Exodus we finde the Iewish Sicle to containe 20. obolos, which Iosephus expounding in the thirde of his Antiquities, sayth that the Sicle of the Hebrues did counteruaile foure Drachmes of Athens. The like doeth Jerome affirme vpon the fourth of Ezechiel. Hereof also Eupolemus gathereth manifestly that the 10. talentes of golde which Salomon gaue vnto eache of those workemen that wrought vpon his Temple, were but so many Sicles of his authoritie be founde. But to our owne.

We haue also a weight called the pounde, whereof are two sortes the one taking name of Troy containing twelue ounces (after which our liquide & drie measures are weighed and our plat golde) the other commonly called Haberdupois, whereby our other artificers and chapmen doe buye and sell theyr wares. The first of these containeth 7680. graines wheras the other hath 10240. Each of them also are deuided into the halfe quarter, quarter, and halfe pounde, & three quarters as we haue sayde before in the description of the ounce. Nowe in conference of the same with the Grecian weightes if you respect the Mna commonly vsed amongest the Phisitions and Surgeons (I meane for number of ounces) you shall finde small difference betweene these and our Haberdupois, but if you better consider of their difference in ounces, you shall see some oddes which I will hereafter sette downe. Furthermore as we haue two sortes of poundes in Englande, so the Greekes beside the fore alleadged, haue three kindes of Mnas, whereof the first called the greater or the newe, hath

12. ounces and foure Drachmes, or
100. Drachmes, or
600. Obolos, or Semiobolos 1200.
3600. Calchos, or 25200. Leptas: of these Liuie speaketh.

Their second is called the olde Mna, whose proportion is giuen out after thys maner, and hath

9. ounces and three Drachmes, or
75. Drachmes, or
450. Obolos, or
900. Semiobolos, or 2700. Calchos
18900. Leptas.

As for theire Apothecary Mna, it conteined after their common accoupt,

25. ounces or
112. Drachmes, and an halfe, or
337. Scruptulas and an halfe, or
675. Obolos, whereof let this suffice.

In lyke sort the Romaines hauing but one Libra, deuided it also into these euen partes insuing, 12. ounces or 576. graines.

2. Semisses or 6. ounces.
3. Trientes, or 4. ounces.
4. Quadrantes, or 3. ounces.
6. Sextantes, or 2. ounces.
8. Sescuncias or one ounce and an halfe.

Beside these also they had certaine odde weightes (percelles of their Libra) which did hrun as it were betweene these, and whose names for helpe of the diligent in hystoricall studie I will set downe as thus,

Denux of 11. ounces.
Dextans of 10. ounces.
Dodrans of 9. ounces.
Bes of 8. ounces.
Septunx of 7. ounces.
Quincunx of fiue ounces, whereby we see that the Romaine Libra is not all one with the Atheniен Mna as may likewyse be farther seene by this diuision insuing for the Romaine Libra hath 12 Vncias.

24 Semuncias.
36 Duellas.
48 Sicilicos.
72 Sextulas.
84 Denarios.
168 Victoriatus & 288 Scruptula.

And as Libra surmounteth the olde Mna, so the new Mna exceedeth the Libra, and so doe also the Apothecarie weight as I haue sayde before. But yet to say somewhat more of the Romaine Libra or pounde & other like poyses, I thinke it very expedient for the helpe of such as shall mete with the same in reading of the Hystories, & better conference of their proportion with ours.

It is to be noted that As or Asis, is a worde properly to be applyed vnto any thing that may be deuided into partes, wherby it commeth to passe that as the fote is As vnto the smaller measure, and Libra vnto the smaller coyne, so Libra or Pondo is As or Asis, vnto the partes of hys diuision being left of the greatest, & greatest of the smallest weights.

Of Libra also the pound weight was sometyme called Libralis, 2. pounde Bilibris, three pounde Trilibris &c. And in like sort was Pondo vsed and also As, so that for the aforesayde poyses we shall reade Pondo, dupondius, trepondius in the one: and for 3. pound, 4. pounde 9. pounde, and 10. pounde, Tressis, Quadrasis, Nonusis, and Decusis in the other. Also for two Decuses 3. Decuses and 10. Decuses: Vicesis, Tricesis, and Centussis, that is, 20. Asses, 30. Asses and 100: Asses or poundes as the authours doe expound it. In like sorte Apondus or Asipondius is a pounde weight, Dua pondo, two pound, Trepondo three pounde, as by reading may be found out. Whensoeuer you find Pondo put with an other worde of weight, it signifieth the worde simply whervnto it is referred, as Pondo, Libra a pound, Pondo vncia an ounce and so forth in the rest. I might here say that the brasse penny of the Romaines weight at the first wayed 10. pounde, of which Sestertius being the fourth parte contayned two pounde and an halfe: but when they begunne to coyne siluer money, the siluer denarius or Libra was valued after the estimation of the substaunce at 10. pounde of the brasen mettall, and yet ye shall not reade that the Romaines did euer vse the worde As, Asis at any time for the siluer coine, but Libella which I doe take as a thing worthie to be noted. In like sort Quinarius was the halfe of the denarius, and Quadrans, a coyne of three ounces in brasse, whereof this may suffice. Further more in obseruation of the word Sestertium. You shall vnderstande that mille Sestertium, mille Sestertium numum, mille Numum and mille Sestertij are all one. In like sort Sestertia in the Neuter gender, doe counteruaile mille Sestertios in the Masculine gender. But if any Aduerbe of number be added vnto them, it signifieth hundreds of thousandes. Decem Sestertia therefore are 10000. Sestertium or Sestertios. And decies Sestertios, or Sestertiũ is all one with 100000. Sestertios or Sestertium, as Budens Glarean and other haue set downe.

Thus it shall nowe be an easie matter to finde the difference betweene these here remembred & our English poises, if the number of odde graines be duely considered, and these resolued into ounces or lesse weight, as occasiõ doth require. Hitherto also I haue spoken of small weightes, nowe let vs see what they be that are of the greater sort, but first of such as are in vse in Englande, reckoning not after troye weight, but Haberdupois, whose pounde hath sixteene ounces, as I haue sayde before. Of great waight therfore we haue

The cloue weighing 7 pound or half a stone.
The halfe quarterne of 14. pounde, in woll a stone, whereof 26. do make a sacke.
The quarterne of 28. pound, in wool a Todde
The halfe hundred of 56. pounde.
The hundred of 112. or 1792. ounces.

And these are vsually reconed next vnto the hundred weight, which is the greatest of all that we doe commonly vse, and of which dyuers other are commonly made about the sale of our Tinne, Leade, Flare, Spyce, and all kinde of marchaundize with others, whose quantities & names are vtterly vnknowne vnto me. Beefe is eyther solde by ỹ stone of eyght pounde or by the score. Cheese by the weigh. And hereof we finde two seuerall weightes, whereof one containeth 32 Cloues, eache cloue being of seauen pound, (although some Bookes haue one but of fiue) whereby the one weigh hath 224. the other 256. pound, that is 36. cloues & foure pounde ouer weight. This is moreouer to be noted, that the worde hundred, is not alwayes vsed after one sort in waight or tale, for as fiue score are oft taken for an hundred in some respect as in money & men: so 120. do make but an hundred as in cattell. &c. after another accoũt. But if you deale by waight thẽ 112. is alwayes your iust number. And as the hundred is the greatest here in England, so the talent was the greatest in Greece & other countries. Howbeit as our hundredes in tale doe differ from our hundredes in waight, so did the talents differ one from another, and also from them selues, for

The great talent of Athens weyghed 1000. of theyr ounces.
The lesse of Athens 750. ounces, or 6000. drachmes.
That called Egyneũ 1250. ounces (of theirs) or 10000. drachmes.
That of Syria 187. oũces, or 1500. drachms.
That of Babylon 875. ounces, or 7000.

drachmes.
And all after the rate of the Athenian ounce, vnto whose talent also the Euboike did seme to come very neare, as may appeare by conference. Now to make some collation of our weightes and these afore remembred togither, and so farre as shalbe necessary for the reading of forreine hystories.

¶ Of the Dunce.

You shall vnderstand that our ounce exceedeth the ounce of the Romains or Grecians by 64. grains, as may easily be gathered by that whych is already set downe.

Our drachme therfore must nedes cõtaine 80. graines, which is 8. more then any of the other.

Our Scriptulum (if we had any) 26. grains, and a third part of two graines.

Our Obolus 13. graines and third part of a grain, so that in our mony after 5. shillings to the ounce 7. pence ob. is the iust waight of a drachme, wherby it is easie to cast the true quantitie of the lesse.

¶ Of the Mna.

The first also of the three Mnas afore remembred called the greater, being cast after his proportion, hath 11. ounces and two drachmes, that is 56. shillings and 3. pence, whereby it wanteth somewhat of a pounde of Troy waight.

The olde Mna hath 67. drachmes and an halfe, that is 8. of our ounces, & three drams, or 42. shillings, and 2. pence ob. after our English reckening.

The thirde Mna hath 13. ounces & a halfe, that is 3. pound English, 7. shillings 6. pence farding, and halfe farding.

The fourth Mna first of all remembred, (I meane of 16. ounces) hath in like sort 14. ounces, 3. drachmes 16. graines or 3. pounde 12. shillings of currant money of Englande, after 5. shillings to the ounce.

¶ In lyke sort of Talents.

The great talent of Athens hath 900. ounces, that is of our money 225. pound.

The small talent of Athens, hath 671. ounces and 7. drachmes: or 167. pounde 19. shillings 4. pence ob. English.

The third talent of Aegyneũ 1156. ounces 2. drachmes, that is 289. pound English, one shilling and 3. pence.

The fourth of those afore remembred 168. ounces 2. drachmes or 42. pound, one shilling 6. pence English.

The last, 787. ounces and 4. drachmes, or 196. pound, 17. shil. 6. pen. englysh, as I haue truely cast it, except I mistake oughts in my reckening, whych is a thing some done: only thys can not faile, that 3. pounde in coyne is one pound in waight, after 5. shillings to the ounce, wherof let thys suffice, for the talent in waight. I say in waight, because there was a peece of coyne called also a talent, as I haue noted out of Eupolemus before, who confoundeth it wyth a sicle. And thereof I read furthermore that the Hebrues Tetradrachma was such a talent. As for that of the Athenienses, it contained 3. Stateres and of thys also ynough.

Of liquide measures. Cap. 24.

HItherto haue I spoken of waights, now it resteth that I doe the lyke of suche liquide measures as are presently vsed in England, and haue bene of olde time amongst the Grecians and Romaines. Wherin I wil deale so faithfully as I may, to the ende thys trauaile of mine may be some helpe to suche as shal come after in conferring forren with our home made weights and measures, and for the better vnderstanding of the hystories, wherein such thyngs are spoken of. The first therfore of our English measures, is

A sponeful, which hath one of our drachmes and 6. graines.
An assay, take or sippet 4. sponefuls: or 4. drachmes and 24. graines.
A fardendele is a quarter of a poũd, pinte, or 3. ounces of Troy.
An Muytch 6. ounces or halfe a pinte.
A pinte 12. ounces, or a pounde, or 4. fardendeles.
A quart 24. ounces, two pintes, or 2. pounde Troy.
A pottle, 48. ounces or 4. pounde, or so many pintes.
A gallon 96. ounces, or 8. pound, or 8. pintes.
A firkin 8. gallons or 64. pound, and thys in Ale, Sope, and Herring.
The kilderkin 16. gallons.
The barrell 32. gallons. And these are our meare English liquide measures. The rest ẏ we haue are outlandish vessels, and such as are brought ouer vnto vs wyth wares from other countreys. And yet are we not altogither guided by thys rate (the more pitye) but in some thyngs seuerall measures are vsed and receyued, as for example.

The fyrkin of beare hath 9. gallons.
The kilderkin 18. gallons.
The barrel 36. As for the hogshead of bere it is lately come vp, and because I see none made of thys assize, but onely the emptye caskes of wine reserued to thys vse, I passe ouer to say any thing thereof. If it were according to the standarde for bere, it shoulde

containe

containe 72. gallons, which now hath but 64

¶ But of Ales and Beare.

The firkin 8. gallons and an halfe.
The halfe barrell 21. gallons.
The barrell 42. gallons.
The butte 84. gallons. Perfourme eſtatutes limit our Ale meaſure in all equalitie vnto that of Hoggeſheds, of whych 108. go to the hūdred and 8 & 10. to the laſt, as they are commonly ſolde.

¶ Of wine and ſuch veſſels thereof as come from beyond the ſeas we haue the rundlet of 18. gallons and a pottle.
The barrell whych is rare of 31. gallons.
The hogſhed of 63. gallons.
The tiers of 84. gallons.
The pipe or butte of 126. gallons.
The tunne of 252.

There are alſo thirdes of pipes or hoggeſheads, and of barrelles, which are likewiſe called tertians; but of theſe I ſay nothing, becauſe theyr deuiſion is eaſie. Suche alſo hath bene the care of our maieſtrates heretofore, that theſe very veſſels haue had theyr limitation of waight, in ſo much that
The firkin ſhould wey 6. pound 6. ounces.
The halfe barrell or kilderkin 13. pound.
The barrell 26. li. whereof let this ſuffice.

And theſe are the quantities and names of moſt of our liquide meaſures, whereunto we will adde firſt thoſe of the old Grækes, whereby they meaſured theyr wines, oyle and honey, and wherof the firſt is.

The ſponeful, which weygheth one drachme halfe a Scriptula, 2. graines & 2. fifth partes of a graine.
Cheme hath 2. ſponefuls or 2. drachmes, one ſcriptulum 4. graines and $\frac{4}{5}$ of a graine in waight.
Myſtrum 2. ſponefulles and an halfe, or 3. drachmes in weight of theyrs.
Concha 2. Myſtra, or 5. ſponefulles, or fiue drachmes.
Cyathus 2. Conchas, or one ounce & a drachme.
Oxybaphon 3. Conchas or 15. ſponefulles, in weight 2. ounces 3. drachmes.
Quartarius 2. Oxybapha, or 4. ounces and 4. drachmes.
Cotyla alias Hemina or Tryblion, 2. quartaries, in weight 9. ounces of their owne.
Sextarius 2. Cotylas or 120. ſponefulles: in weight 18. of theyr ounces.
Chus, Choa, or Choeus, 6. ſextarios 108. ounces or 9. pound.
Metretes, Cadus, Ceraunius or Chous 1296. ounces, and theſe were certē: howbeit they had other meaſures that bare the name of ſome of theſe, as Concha the greater, of 2. ounces 2. drachmes equall wyth the Oxybapha.

Myſtrum the greater of 3. drachmes $\frac{3}{4}$ of a drachme.
Myſtrum the leſſe of two drachmes one ſcriptulum and $\frac{4}{5}$ partes of a graine.
Cheme the greater of 3. drachmes.
The leſſe of 2. drachmes.
Cochlearium the greateſt as afore.
The leſſer which the part of a Cyathus.
The leſſe hath the 24. or 30. part of a Cyathus, for this was alſo diuers, as I do finde in Budeus, Agricola and the Grecian wryters, eſpecially for theyr townes) becauſe I read of an other ſtandard in the rurall popſe whereof I will not let alſo to make mention, becauſe I would omitte nothing that may be beneficiall to the reader, ſo neare as I can poſſibly. Of rurall popſes therefore in the aforeſayde meaſures I finde that the Myſtrum weygheth 4. drachmes and a halfe.
Cyathus 4. Myſtra or 2. ounces & 2. drachmes.
Oxybapha 6. Myſtra or 3. ounces and three drachmes.
Cotyle 4. Oxybapha one pound one ounce & an halfe.
Chus hath 12. Cotylas or thirteene pound.
Amphora 4. Cotylas, or 54. pound.
Metretes 2. Amphoras 108. pound, as likewiſe the Pedymnus.

Now let vs ſee the liquide meaſure of the Romaines, whych is all one wyth theyr dry, therfore theyr Ligula Cochlearū or ſponefull hathe 240. graines or 3. drachmes in weight, whereby it farre ſurmounteth the Grecian ſponefull and an halfe.
Cyathus 4. ſponefuls, or 960. graines.
Acetabulum a Cyathus and an halfe, or fiue ſponefuls, or 2 ounces.
Quartarius 2. Acetabula or 5. ounces.
Hemina 2. Quartario or 10. ounces.
Sextarius 2. Heminas or 20. ounces.
Congius 6. Sextarios or 10. pound.
Vrna 4. Congios or 40. pound.
Amphora 2. Vrnas or 80. pound.
Culeus 20. Amphoras or 1600. pound. After the Romaine ſtandard, ſo well in the dry as in the liquide meaſures. And thus muche of theſe in generall.

¶ Now let vs compare them with ours & ſet what proportion or odds is to be had betwæne them.

Our ſponefull hath a Drachme and fiue graines and two fift partes of a graine after our ſtandard of Drachmes, whereof one is alwayes the eyght part of an ounce.

Theyr Cheme is of ours Drachmes 12

graines and $\frac{4}{5}$ part of a graine.

Their Mystrum one Drachme and one graine.

Concha fiue Drachmes or 32. graines or 3. shillinges and peny halfe peny after fiue shillinges to the ounce.

Cyathus one ounce and eyght graines.

Oxybaphon two ounces and 16. graines.

Quartarius foure ounces and 32 graines.

Cotyla eyght ounces 64. graines or three quarters of a Drachme and foure graines.

Sextarius sixtéene ounces, one Drachme 48. graines.

Choa 97. ounces one Drachme or eyght pounde Troy, one ounce one Drachme and 48. graines.

Metretes 1166. ounces and three Drachmes, or 97. pounde Troye two ounces and three Drachmes, which is all one with 12. gallons & a pint after our englishe measure.

Their rurall measures also being compared with ours, yelde thys proportion.

Mystrum hath foure Drachmes 4. graines

Cyathus two ounces and sixtéene graines.

Oxybapha 3. ounces 24. graines or a quarter of a pint and somewhat more.

Chus twelue pounde one ounce 6 Drachmes and 32. graines: three pottels and odde measure.

Amphora 47. pounde seauen ounces and an halfe and 48. graines which wanteth not full fiue ounces of 6. gallons, after our English measures.

Metretes hath 97. pounde two ounces three Drachmes 16. graines or twelue gallons & a pinte. &c. that is, three gallons and a pint. &c. aboue our kilderkin of beere.

¶ Hauing thus proceéded in ertent & comparison of the Grecian measures with ours, let vs do the like with those of the Romaines and then our taske is performed.

The Romaine spoonful is exactly 3. Drachmes english.

The Cyathus twelue Drachmes, that is, one ounce and an halfe.

Acetabulum two ounces & 2. Drachmes.

Quartarius foure ounces, and 4. Drachmes English.

Hemina nine ounces or three quarters of a pinte.

Sextarius one pinte and an halfe.

Congius three quartes or 72. ounces.

Vrna three gallons or 24. pounde.

Amphora 6. gallons or 48. pounde.

Culeus 120. gallons, which is two hoggesheades of our auncient measure, sauing 8. gallons: or three barrelles and a kilderkin, sauing that there are 6. gallons ouer measure, whereby our account exceédeth that of the Romaines.

And thus much briefly of liquid measures, wherein yf I haue béene more long & tedious then thou peraduenture diddest looke for at the first, yet the benefite gotten thereby shall, I hope, counteruaile the trauaile in reading of the same. And as I haue dispatched my handes in this sorte of the liquide, now it resteth that I doe the lyke with the drie measures, & then shall that little Treatize haue an ende, whereof I spake before & might otherwyse haue perished hereafter (for me) yf it had not béene inserted here vpon this necessarie occasion.

Of the drie measures of Englande, and their comparison with others. Cap. 25.

AS before we sée in the moyst, so doe all our drie measures fetch their originall from the sponefull. &c. vntill they come at the gallon: beyonde the which wée haue the Pecke or farthendeale of a bushell (for that is our Englishe worde for a fourth part) of two gallons.

Halfe bushell of foure gallons.

Bushell of eyght gallons, or 64. pounde, Troye.

Strike of two Bushelles or 128. pounde or 16. gallons.

Come rasor or cornocke of foure bushels or 256. pounde or 32. gallons.

Quarter or seame of 8. Bushelles or 512. pounde or 64. gallons.

Way, or 6. quarters of 5 7 0 2. pounde or 384. gallons as by the rule of proportion is easie to be founde.

By these measures also we measure our Pulkard séede, Rape séede, Carot rootes, salt, and fruite, notwithstanding that the filling of the Bushell be diuers, sith in Corne, salte, and séedes we strike with a rule, but in Apples & Rootes we poure them on by heapes. This is furthermore to be considered, that although one wheate or barly be heauyer then an other, as the soyle is wette or drie, Barly cõmonly then Otes, Rye then barly, wheate then Rye. &c. also in liquide wares, Oyle compared with wine, and both wyth hony, yet ỹ measure framed after the aforesayde weightes doth meate them all indifferently so that the quantitie of the standarde and not the qualitie of ware measured, is alwayes to be loked on. In déede it is founde by experience that a lyke measure of wyne Oyle and hony being weighed togither, the Oyle shalbe lighter by a ninth part then the wine, wine, and the hony heauyer then the Wine almost by a thirde. Certes there is nothing that cõmeth nérer the weight of wine then the pureſt water, and yet one Wine is heauyer then an other as waters also are, of which the moſt groſſe is euer more ẏ weightieſt. And theſe thinges haue not béene vnknowne in tymes paſt also vnto the Grecians: for weyghing they? Culeus of Dyle, it peyſed but 1333. pound, 4 oũces, whereas that of Wine came vnto 1481. li. fiue ounces ſixe Dzachmes and foure Silquas. But of hony vnto 2222. pounde, two ounces, 5. Dzachmes, one Scriptula. &c. whereof this maye ſuffice for an admonition to the reader. Nowe let vs ſée thoſe of the Grecians for my former purpoſe, whoſe

Cyathus hath tenne ſpoonfulles, or an ounce and one Dzachme.

Oxybaphon 15. ſpoonfulles or two ounces and two Dzachmes.

Cotyle foure Oxybapha or nine ounces.

Sextarius 2. Cotylas or 18. ounces.

Chenix. 3 Cotylas or 27. ounces, ſo called bycauſe that quantitie ſuffiſed to finde a man breade for an whole daye.

Medimnus or Metretes: 48. Chenices, or 108. pounde.

¶ In lyke ſort in Rurall meaſures theſe

Myſtrum hath 2. ſpoonfulles and an halfe.

Cyathus 4. Myſtra, or ſixe ſpoonfulles.

Oxybaphon 4. Myſtra 2. ounces 2. Dzachmes.

Cotyle foure Oxybapha, nyne ounces.

Chenicx 3. Cotylas 27. ounces.

Semiduodecima Medymni 2. Chenicas 4. pounde 6. ounces.

Semiſextarius 9. pounde.

Sextarius 18. pounde.

Tertiarius 16. Chenicas 36. pounde.

Semimedymnũ 24. Chenicas or 54. pound.

Medymnus 28. Chenicas or 108. pound and theſe of the Grékes.

Now ſhall thoſe of the Romaines followe in ſuch order as in ſueth.

Cloclearium a ſpoonefull 3. Dzachmes and one Scriptula.

Cyathus 4. ſpoonefuls one ounce ẏ an halfe, one Dzachme one Scriptula.

Acetabulum a Cyathus ẏ an halfe 2. ounces and foure Dzachmes.

Hemina or Cotula foure Acetabula or tenne ounces.

Sextarius two Heminas or 20. ounces.

Semodius eyght Sextarios 13. pounde foure ounces.

Modius 16. Sextarios 26. pounde 8. ounces.

Theſe afore ſayde meaſures compared alſo with our Engliſh haue ſuch proportion.

Cyathus as afore ſayde, one ounce ẏ eight graines, Engliſhe.

Cotyle, 6. ounces 48. graines Engliſh.

Chenix one pounde 6. ounces, one Dzachme 64. graines Engliſh.

Medymnus 72. pounde, 10. ounces, 32. grains Engliſh.

Their Rurall meaſures conferred with ours.

Chenix a quarte.

Semiduodecima a Pottle ẏ 4. Dzachm.

Semiſextarius, a gallon and an ounce.

Sextarius, two gallons and two ounces.

Tertiari⁹, foure gallons ẏ foure ounces.

Semimedimnus 6. gallons ẏ halfe a pint.

Medymnus eractly 13. gallons.

Whereby we ſée that their lyquide meaſure is ſomewhat greater then the dzye by two ounces and thzée Dzachmes. Nowe it reſteth ẏ I do the like wõ the weightes of the Romaine dzy meaſures, after which I will gyue out the weightes of Uenice as Auguſtinus Pantheus in his de rebus Voarchadumicis and other doe ſet them downe.

Cyathus one ounce and an halfe.

Semodius, 12. pounde Troy, that is, a gallon and an halfe.

Modius 24. pound, that is, thzée gallons,

And more I remember not at this preſent of their dzye meaſure.

I might here adde other meaſures of the Hebzues alſo. But I find ſuch variety in thẽ as maketh me rather to omit then publiſhe them in this treatiſe. And fyrſt of all they? Chor, which ſignifieth an heape of graine, ẏ is not onely the iuſt loade of a Camell, but alſo conteineth 30. Modios as Epiphanius doth ſet downe, notwithſtanding that Bude⁹ hath 41. Medimnos. The Lethec alſo (wherof Oſee ſpeaketh, ſaying, Mercede conduxi mihi Lethec hordei. &c.) is al one with the Gomor or halfe Cor, and called Lethec of lifting vp, becauſe a yong man might eaſely lift it vp to laye it vpon his aſſe. Their Batos of Dyle, with Epiphanius hath, 50. Sextarios, with Budee 27. The Modius of ẏ Iues, 22. Sextarios in the firſt, but in the treatiſe of this later, only 16. In lyke ſorte there is difference in the Cab or fourth part of the Modius. Also in ẏ Manſis, or Medimnus, which after Epiphanis hath 10. Modios, ẏ Salanien or Conſtantinuan 5. Modios and that of Paphos and Sicilia, onely $4\frac{1}{4}$ all which diſcordances I am not able to reconcile, eſpecially being things of ſuch antiquitie, and therfore I giue vppe to ſpeake any longer of them. Furthermore in turning ouer ſuch old bookes as came vn-

to my handes I finde also this note insuyng 6. which Charette hath 4. graines.

Peny 8 Carettes.

Euery graine of Batement a Peny in Gold, but after Fraunce, Venice, and some other places, they haue but fiue Carettes in the peny, and 4. graines in the Carette, which odes groweth by the difference of weightes, for beyonde the sea they haue 24. pence in the ounce, which is 4. pence more in value, then the ounce English, after the olde account of pence. By these Carettes pearles and stones are valued and solde, but not gold, which hath neuertheless the name of Carettes in his Pois, but after an other proportion.

Of Weightes of Venice, also Augustinus Pantheus, saith thus.

Eximo is the 156. parte of a graine.
A graine conteineth 156. Eximos.
Charattus or Siliqua 4 graines.
Quartus 36. Carattes, or the olde guilden,
Ounce 4. quartes. 144. Carattes.
Marca or Bes 8. ounces or 1152. Carattes.
Marchus 16. ounces, or 2304. Carattes.
Rubus 20. Marcas.
Posta 40. Marchas, whereof let this suffice, & for the setting forth of the iust proportion of weights and measures, I hope that which is already spoken shall be ynough.

THE HISTORIE of Englande.

WHAT manner of people did first inhabite this our coũtrey which hath most generally & of longest continuaunce bene knowne among all nations by ẏ name of Britaine, as yet it is not certainly knowne: neither can it be decided from whence the first inhabitantes thereof came, by reason of such diuersitie in iudgements as haue risen amongst the learned in this behalfe. But sith the originall in maner of all nations is doubtful, and euen the same for the more parte fabulous (that alwayes excepted which we fynde in the holy scriptures) I wilbe not any man to leane to that whiche shall be here set downe, as to an infallible truth, sith I do but only shewe other mennes coniectures, grounded neuertheles vppon likely reasons (concernyng that matter wherof there is now left but little other certaintie, or rather none at all. To fetche therfore the matter from the furthest, and so to stretch it forward, it semeth by the report of Dominicus Marius Niger, ẏ in the beginning whẽ God framed the worlde and diuided the waters aparte from the earth, this Ile was then a parcel of the continent, & ioyned without any separation of sea to the mayne laude. But this opinion as al other the lyke vncertaynties, I leaue to be decided of the learned: Howbeit for the first inhabitation of this Ile with people, I haue thought good to set down in part what may be gathered out of such writers as haue touched that mater, & may seem to giue some light vnto the knowledge therof.

First therfore Iohn Bale our countreyman, who in his tyme greatly trauayled in the searche of suche antiquities, dothe probably coniecture, that this lande was inhabited and replenished with people long before the floud at that tyme in the which the generation of mankinde (as Moyses writeth) began to multiplie vpon the vniuersall face of the earth: and therefore it followeth, that as well this land was inhabited with people long before the dayes of Noe, as any the other countreys and partes of the worlde beside.

But when they had once forsake the ordinances appointed them by God, and betaken them to new ways inuented of themselues, such lewdenesse of lyfe ensued euery where, as brought vpon them the great deluge & vniuersall floud, in the whiche perished as well the inhabitants of these quarters as the residue of the race of mankinde generally dispersed in euery other part of the whole world, sauing only Noe & his familie, who by the prouidence and pleasure of almightie God, was preserued from the rage of those waters, to reconstitute and repaire the newe generation of manne vpon the earth.

Noe.

After the floud (as Annius of Viterbo recordeth) & reason also enforceth, Noe was the only Monark of al the world, and as the same Annius gathereth by the accounte of Moyses in the. 100. yeare after the floud, Noe deuided the earth among his three sons: assigning to the possession of his eldest sonne, all that portion of lande, which nowe is knowne by the name of ASIA, and to his second sonne Cham, he appointed all that part of the world which now is called Affrica. Unto his thirde sonne Japhet, was allotted all Europe, with all the Iles thereto belongyng, wherin among other was conteined this our Ile of Britayn, with the other yles therto belonging.

In commẽte. super. 4. lib. Beros. de antiquit. li. 2.

Iaphet.

This Japhet third son of Noe, who is of some called Japetus, and of other, Atlas Maurus (bycause hee departed this life in Mauritania) was the first as Bodinus affyrmeth by the authoritie and cõsent of the Hebrue Greke & latin writers) that peopled the coũtreys of Europe, which afterward he deuided among his sonnes: of the which Tubal (as Tarapha affirmeth) obteined the kingdom of Spain. Gomer had dominion ouer the Italians, and as Berosus and diuers other authors agree, Samothes was the founder of the kingdom of Celtica, which cõteined in it as Bale witnesseth) a great parte of Europe, but specially those coũtreys, which now are knowne by ẏ names of Gallia & Britannia.

Iohannes Bodinus ad fac. hist. cogn.

Franciscus Tarapha.

Britayn inhabited shortly after the floud.

Thus was this Ilande inhabited and peopled within. 200. yeres after the floud by the children of Japhet the sonne of Noe: and this is not only proued by Annius, writing vpō Berosus, but also confirmed by Moyses in the scripture, where he writeth, that of the offspring of Japhet, the yles of the Gentils (wherof Britayn is one) were sorted into regions in the tyme of Phaleg, the son of Hiber, who was born at the tyme of the diuision of languages. Hereupon Theophilus hath these wordes: Cū priscis temporibus pauci forēt homines, in Arabia & Chaldæa post linguarum diuisionem aucti & multiplicati paulatim sunt: hinc quidam abierunt versus Orientem, quidam concessere ad partes maioris continentis, alij porrò profecti sunt ad Septentrionem sedes quæsituri, nec prius desierunt terrā vbiq; occupare, quā etiā Britānos in Arctois climatibus acceſſerīt. &c. englished thus. VVhen at the first there were not many men in Arabia & Chaldea, it came to passe, that after the deuision of tongs, they began somwhat bētter to increase & multiplie, by which occasion some of them went toward the east, & some toward the parties of the great mayn land: Diuers went also northwards to seeke them dwellyng places, neyther stayed they to repleniſhe the earth as they went, til they came vnto the yles of Britain, lying vnder the north pole. &c. Hitherto Theophilus.

Theophilus episcop. Antiochi. ad Antol. lib. 2. The vvordes of Theophilus a doctor of the churche, vvho liued An. Chri. 160.

These things considered, Gildas the Britō had great reason to think that this countrey had bin inhabited from the beginning: and Polydore Vergil was with no lesse cōsideration hereby inforced to cōfesse that the Ile of Britayne had receiued inhabitauntes forthwith after the floud.

Samothes.

Gen. 2. De migr. gen.

Samothes ỳ 6. begotte Son of Japhet called by Moyses Melech, by others Dis, receyued for his portion, (according to the reporte of Wolfgangus Lazius) all the countrey lying betwene the riuer of Rheyn & the Pyrenian mountayns, where hee founded the kingdome of Celtica ouer his people called Celtæ. Which name Bale affirmeth to haue bin indifferent to the inhabitants both of the countrey of Gallia, and the Ile of Britain, and that he planted colonies of mē (brought forth of the east parts) in either of them, first in the mayne land, & after in the Iland. He is reported by Berosus to haue excelled al men of that age in lerning and knowledge: and also is thought by Bale to haue imparted the same among his people, namely the vnderstanding of the sundry courses of the starres, the order of inferiour things, with many other matters incident to the morall and politike gouernement of mans life: & to haue deliuered the same in the Phenician letters: out of whiche the Grekes (according to the opinion of Archilochus) deuised & deriued the greke characters, in somuche that Xenophon & Iosephus do constantly report (although Diogenes Laertius be against it) that both the Grekes and other nations receyued their letters and lerning first from these countreys.

Cent. 1. Anti. lib. 1. Bale script. Brit. cent. 1. Cæsar cōmen. lib. 8.

Of this king and his lerning, arose a sect of Philosophers, saith Annius, first in Britain, & after in Gallia, the whiche of his name were called Samothei. They, as Aristotle & Secion write, were passing skilful both in the law of god & man: and for that cause exceedingly giuen to religion, especially the inhabitants of this yle of Britain, in so much that the whole nation did not only take the name of thē, but the yland it selfe, as Bale & doctor Cay agree, came to be called Samothea, which was the first peculiar name that euer it had, and by the which it was especially known: before the arriuall of Albion.

Magus.

MAgus ỳ son of Samothes, after ỳ death of his father was the second king of Celtica, by whō (as Berosus writeth) there were manye townes builded among the Celtes, which by the witnesse of Annius, dyd beare the addition of their founder Magus: of which townes diuers are to be found in Ptolomie: and Antoninus a painful surueyor of the world & sercher of cities, maketh mencion of. 4. of them here in Britain, Sitomagus, Neomagus, Niomagus, and Nouiomagus. Neomagus, sir Thomas Eliot writeth to haue stode where the citie of Chester nowe standeth: & Niomagus George Lilly placeth where the towne of Buckinghā is now remaining: beside this, both Bale so highly comend ỳ forsaid Magus, for his lerning renoumed ouer al the world, ỳ he wold haue ỳ Persiās & other nations of the south & west partes, to deriue the name of their diuines called Magi from him. In deede Ranisius Textor & sir John Prise affirme, ỳ in the days of Plinie, the Britons were so expert in arte Magike, ỳ they might be thought to haue firste deliuered the same to the Persians. What the name of Magus importeth, & of what profession ỳ Magi were, Tulli declareth at large, and Mantuan in brief, after this maner:

Lib. ỳ Annius comment. per eund. Geogr. De diui. De fast.

Ille penes Persas Magus est qui sidera norit,
Qui sciat herbarum vires cultumq; deorum,
Persepoli facit ista Magos prudentia triplex.
The Persians terme him Magus, that the course of starres doth knowe,
The power of herbes and worthip due to god that man doth owe.
By threefolde knowledge, thus the name of Magus then doth growe.

Sarron.

Sarron.

ant.

SArron the third king of ỳ Celtes, succeeded hys father Magus in Gouernemente of the countrie of Gallia, and the Isle Samothea, wherein (as Doctour Caius writeth) he foũded certain publike places for them that profelled learning, whiche (Berolus affirmeth) to be done to the intente to reftrayne the wilfull outrage of men, being as then but rawe and voyde of all ciuilitie. Also it is thought by Annius, that he was the firste author of those kinde of Philosophers, which were called Sarronides, of whom Diodorus Siculus writeth in this sort: There are (sayth he) among the Celtes certain diuines & philosophers, whom they call Sarronides, hauing them of all other in greatest estimation: For it is the maner among them, not without a Philosopher to make anye sacrifice: for they are of beleefe, that sacrifices ought only to be made by suche as are skilfull in the diuine misteries, as of those who are nerest vnto God, by whose intercession they thinke all good thiugs are to be required of God, and whose aduise they vse and followe, as well in warre as in peace.

Druis.

DRuis, whõ Seneca calleth Dyrus, being the son of Sarron, was after his father eſtablyſhed the fourthe king of Celtica, indifferently reignyng as well ouer the Celtes as Brytons, or rather (as the inhabitantes of this Isle were then called) Samothians.

This Prince is cõmended by Berosus to bee so plentifullye endued with wisedome and lerning, that Annius taketh him to be the vndoubted authour of the beginning and name of the famous secte of Philosophers called Druides, whome Cesar and all other auncient Greeke and Latine writers doe affirme to haue had their beginning in Brytayne, and to haue bin brought from thence into Gallia, in so muche that when there arose any doubt in that countrey touching any point of their discipline, they did repaire to be resolued therin into Brytayne, where, especially in the Ile of Angleſey, as Humfrey Lhuyd witnesseth, they made their principal aboade.

Touching their vsages many things are written by Aristotle, Sccion, Plinie, Laertius, Bodinus, and others: which I will gather in brief, and set downe as followeth. Anti. lib. 5. Annius super eundem. De bello Gallico. lib. 9.

They had (as Cesar sayth) the charge of cõmon and priuate sacrifices, ỳ discussing of pointes of religion, the bringing vp of youth, the determining of matters in variance, with full power to interdite so manye from the sacrifice of their goddes, and the company of men, as disobeyed their awarde. De bello Gallico. lib. 6.

Polidore affirmeth, how they taught ỳ mens soules coulde not dye, but departed from one bodye to an other, and that to the intente to make men valiant and dreadleſſe of death. Hist. an. li. 1.

Tullie writeth, that partely by tokens, and partely by surmises, they wold foretell of things to come. And by report of Hector Boetius, some of them were not ignorant of the immortalitie of the one and euerlasting God. De diui. li. 1. Hist. Scoti lib. 2.

All these things they had written in the greke toung, in so much that Wolfg. Lazius vpon report of Marcellinus declareth howe the Greeke letters were first brought to Athenes by Timagines from the Druides, and hereupon it cõmeth also to passe, the Britiſh toung to this daye hath in it remaynyng some smacke of the Greke. De migr. gen. lib. 2. Marcellinus.

Among other abuses of the Druides, they had (according to Diodorus) one custome to kill men, and by the falling, bleeding, and dismembring of them to diuine of things to come: for the whiche and other wicked practises, their secte was first condemned for abhominable (as some haue written,) and dissolued in Gallia (as Iuentinus witnesseth) by Tyberius and Claudius the Emperours: and lastly abolished heere in Britayne, by report of Caius when the gospel of Christ by the preaching of Fugatius and Damianus was receyued among the Britons, vnder Lucius king of Brytayne, about the yeare of our saniour. 179. Anna. Boiorum lib. 22. De ant. Cant. cient.

Bardus.

BArdus ỳ son of Dyrus, succeeded his father in the kingdome of Celtica, & was the firſt K. ouer the Celtes and Samothians, amongſt whome he was highly renoumed (as appeareth by Berosus for inuention of Ditties and muſike, wherein Annius of Viterbo writeth, that hee trayned his people: and of suche as excelled in this knowledge he made an order of philosophicall Poets or Bardes, Berosus ant. lib. 5. Annius in commen. super eundem.

ralds, calling them by his own name Bardi. And it ſhuld ſeeme by doctor Caius and maſter Bale, that Cæſar founde ſome of them here at his arriuall in this Iſle, and reported that they had alſo their firſt beginning in the ſame.

The profeſſion and vſages of theſe Bardi, by Nonnius, Strabo, Diodorus, Stephanus, Bale and ſir John Priſe, are in effecte reported after this ſort. They did vſe to record the noble exploites of the auncient capitaines, and to drawe the pedigrees & genealogies of ſuche as were liuing. They woulde frame pleaſaunt ditties and ſongs, learne the ſame by hart, and ſing them to inſtruments at ſolemne feaſtes and aſſemblies of noble men and gentlemen: and were therfore hadde in ſo high eſtimation, that if two hoſtes had bin redy raunged to ioyne in battayle, and that any of thē had fortuned to enter among them, both the hoſtes as wel the enimie as the frends would haue holden their handes giuen eare vnto them, and ceaſſed from fight, vntill theſe Bardes had bene departed out of the battayle. Of the Bardes the Poet Lucan writeth theſe verſes.

Becauſe the names of theſe Poets were neyther diſcrepant from the ciuilitie of the Romans, nor repugnant to the religion of the Chriſtians, they of all the other ſectes before ſpecified, were ſuffred only to continue vnabroliſhed in all ages, in ſomuch that there flouriſhed of them among the Britains, according to Bale, before the birth of Chriſte, Plinidius and Dronins: after Chriſt (as Priſe recounteth) Saleſine, & the two Merlins, Melkin Elaſkirion and others: and of late dayes among the Welchmen, Dauid Dic, Iollo Gough, Dauid ap William, with an infinite number more: and in Wales there are ſundrye of them, as Caius reporteth, remayning vnto this day, where they are in their language called (as Leland writeth) Barthes. Alſo by the witnes of Humfrey Lhuyd, there is an Iland neer vnto Wales, called Inſula Bardorum, and Bardſey, wherof the one name in Latine, and the other in Saxon or olde Engliſh, ſignifieth the Iſlande of the Bardes or Barthes.

Bale.

After Bardus, the Celtes (as Bale ſayth) loathing the ſtraite ordinances of their auncient kings, and betaking themſelues to pleaſure and idelneſſe, were in ſhort tyme, and with ſmall labour brought vnder the ſubiection of the Giaunt Albion, the ſonne of Neptune, who altering the ſtate of things here in this yland, ſtraited ẏ name of Celtica and the Celtes within the bounds of Gallia, from whence they came firſt to inhabite this land vnder the conduct of Samothes, as before ye haue heard, accordingly as Annius hath gathered out of Berolus ẏ Chaldean, who therin agreeth alſo with the Scripture, the ſaying of Theophilus the Doctor, and the generall conſente of all writers, whiche fully agree, that the firſte inhabitantes of this Iſle came out of the parties of Gallia, although ſome of them diſagree of the tyme and maner of their comming, Sir Brian Tuke thinking it to be meant of the arriuall of Brute, when he came out of thoſe countreys into this Ile. Cæſar and Tacitus ſeeme to be of opinion, that thoſe Celtes which firſt inhabited here, came ouer to view ẏ coūtry for trade of merchandiſe. Bodinus wold haue them to come in (a gods name) from Lāguedoc, and ſo to name this land Albion, of a citie in Lāguedoc named Alby. Beda and likewiſe Polidore, who foloweth him affirme that they came from the coaſts of Armorica, whiche is nowe called little Britayn.

Annius. Theophi. Sir Brian Tuke. Cæſar. Tacitus. Bodinus. Beda. Polyd.

But as the authorities alore recited, are ſufficient to proue the tyme, ſo that this Iland was firſt inhabited by the Celtes, the olde poſſeſſours of Gallia, not only the neerneſſe of the regions, but alſo the congruence of the languages, two great argumentes of originals, do fully confirme the ſame. Bodinus writeth vpon report, that the Britiſhe and Celtike language was all one: but whether that be true or not, I am not able to affirme, becauſe the Celtike toung is long ſithence growne wholly out of vſe. But yet ſome ſuche Celtike words as remayn in the writings of old authors may be perceiued to agree with ẏ Welch tong, being the incorrupted ſpeech of the auncient Brytons. In deed Pauſanias the Greeke, maketh mention how the Celtes in their language called a horſe marc: and by ẏ name do the Welch men call a horſe vnto this daye: and the worde trimarc in Pauſanias, ſignifyeth in the Celtike toung, three horſes.

Bodinus. Pauſan.

Thus it appeareth by authentic of writers, by ſituation of place, and by affinitie of language, that this yland was firſt found and inhabited by the Celtes, that their name from Samothes to Albion continued heere the ſpace of. 310. yeres or therabouts. And finally it is likely, that aſwel the progenie as the ſpeeche of them is partly remaining in thys Iſle among the inhabitantes, and ſpecially the Britiſhe, euen vnto this daye.

Iohn Bale

But nowe to our purpoſe of Albion his comming into this Iſle.

Albion.

Albion.

NEptunus called by Moyſes (as ſome take it) Nepthuim, the ſixte ſonne of Olyzis, after the account of Annius, and the brother of Hercules, had appoynted to hym, of hys father (as Diodozus wzyteth) the gouernement of the Ocean ſea: wherefoze he furniſhed himſelf of ſundzy light ſhips foz ẏ moze redie paſſage by water, whych in the end grew to the nũber of a ful nauie: & ſo by continual exercyſe he became ſo ſkilful, and therwith ſo mightie vpon the waters, as Higinus and Plinonius doe wzite, that he was not onely called the king, but alſo eſteemed the god of the ſeas. He had to wife a Lady called Amphitrita, who was alſo honored as goddeſſe of the ſeas, and on hir he begate ſundzy children: And as Bale repozteth, he made euery one of them king of an Iland. And in the Ile of Bzitayne he landed his fourth ſon called Albyon the Giant, who brought the ſame vnder his ſubiection. And herevpon it reſteth, that Iohn Textor and Polydore Virgile made mention that light ſhippes were firſt inuented in the Bzitiſhe ſeas, and that the ſame were couered round with the hyde of beaſts, foz defending them from the ſurges and wawes of the water.

This Albion being put by his father in poſſeſſion of this Ile of Bzitayne, within ſhozte tyme ſubdued the Samothians, the firſte inhabitauntes therof, without fynding any great reſiſtance, foz that as befoze ye haue heard, they had giuen ouer the practiſe of all warlyke and other paynfull exercyſes, and thzough vſe of effeminate pleaſures wherevnto they hadde giuen themſelues ouer, they were become nowe vnapt to withſtande the fozce of their enimies: and ſo by the teſtimonie of Nicholaus Perottus, Rigmanus Philelfus, Ariſtotle, & Humfrey Lhuyd with diuers other, both fozraine and home wzyters, this Iland was firſt called by the name of Albion, hauing at one tyme bothe the name and inhabitauntes chaunged from the line of Japhet vnto the accurſed race of Cham.

This Albion (that thus chaunged the name of this Ile) and his companie, are called Gyants, which ſignifieth none other thã a tall kind of men, of that vncozrupte ſtature and highneſſe naturally incident to the firſt age (whiche Berſus alſo ſeemeth to allow, where he wzyteth, that Noe was one of the Gyantes: and were not ſo called only of their monſtrous greatneſſe, as the common people thinke (although in deede they exceeded the vſuall ſtature of men nowe in theſe dayes, (but alſo foz ẏ they toke their name of the ſoyle where they were bozn: foz Gigantes ſignifieth the ſons of the earth: the Aborigines (oz as Ceſar calleth them Indigine) that is, bozne and bzed out of the earth where they inhabited. What gigantes ſignifyeth.

Thus ſome thinke, but verily although that their opinion is not to be allowed in any condition, which maynteyne that there ſhould be any Aborigines, oz other kynde of men than thoſe of Adams lyne, yet that there haue bin menne of farre greater ſtature than are nowe to be founde, is ſufficiently pzoued by the huge bones of thoſe that haue bin founde in our tyme, oz lately befoze: whereof here to make further relation, it ſhall not neede, ſith in the deſcription of Bzitain herevnto annexed, ye ſhall fynde it ſufficiently declared. Againſt the opinion of Aborigines.

But nowe to our purpoſe. As Albion held Bzitayn in ſubiection, ſo his brother Bergion kepte Irelande and the Otkeneys vnder his rule and dominion: and hearing that their couſin Hercules Libicus hauing finiſhed his Conqueſtes in Spayn, ment to paſſe thzough Gallia into Italye, againſt their brother Leſtrigo, that oppreſſed Italy, vnder ſubiection of him and other of his brethzen: the ſons alſo of Neptune, as well Albion as Bergion, aſſembling their powers togither, paſſed ouer into Gallia, to ſtoppe the paſſage of Hercules, whoſe intention was to vanquiſhe and deſtroy thoſe tyzantes the ſonnes of Neptune and their complices that kepte dyuerſe countreys and regions vnder the paynefull yoke of their heauie thzaldome. Bale. Bergion brother to Albion. Hercules Lybicus.

The cauſe that moued Hercules thus to purſue vpon thoſe tyzantes nowe reignyng thus in the wozld, was foz that not long befoze the greateſt part of them had conſpired togither, & ſlayne his father Olyzis, notwithſtanding that they were nephues to the ſame Olyzis, as ſonnes to his brother Neptune, and not contented with his ſlaughter, they deuided hys carcaſſe alſo among them, ſo that eche of them got a peece in token of reioycing at their murderous atchieued enterpriſe. The cauſe vvhy Hercules purſued his couſins.

Foz this cauſe Hercules whome Moyſes calleth Laabin, proclaymeth warres againſt them all in reuẽge of his fathers death: & firſt he killeth Typhon and Buſyzis in Egypt, then Antæus in Mauritania, the Gerions in Spayne, whiche enterpriſe atchieued, he led his army towards Italy, and by the waye paſſeth thzough a part of Gallia, where Albion and Bergion hauing biſſted theyr powers togither, were ready to receyue him with batayle: and ſo here to the mouth of the riuer called Rhoſne, in latin Rhodanus, they met and fought. At the firſt there was a right terrible and cruell conflicte betwixte them: And albeit that Hercules hadde the greateſt number of menne, yet was it verye doubtfull a greate Pomp. Mela.

whyle to whether parte the glorye of that dayes worke would bend: wherupon when the victorie beganne outrighte to turne vnto Albion, and to his brother Bergion, Hercules perceyuing the daunger and likelyhode of bitter loſſe of that battayle, ſpecially for that his men had waſted their weapons, he cauſed thoſe that ſtood ſtil, and were not otherwyſe occupied, to ſtoupe down, and to gather vp ſtones, wherof in that place there was great plentie, whyche by his commaundemente they beſtowed ſo freely vpon theyr enimies, that in the ende hee obteyned the victorie, and dyd not only put his aduerſaries to flighte, but alſo ſlew Albion there in the fielde, together with his brother Bergion, and the moſte parte of all theyr whole armie.

Hercules diſcomfyteth his enimyes.

Albion is ſlayn

This was the ende of Albion, and his brother Bergion, by the valiant prowes of Hercules, who as one appointed by the prouidence of GOD to ſubdue the cruell and vnmercifull tyrants, ſpent his tyme to the benefite of mankynde, deliuering the oppreſſed from the heauie yoke of myſerable thraldome, in euery place where he came.

And by the order of this battayle wee maye learne whereof the Poets hadde their inuention, when they fayne in their writings, that Jupiter holpe his ſonne Hercules, by throwyng downe ſtones from heauen in this battayle agaynſt Albion and Bergion.

The occaſion of the fable of Iupiters helping his ſonne Hercules.

Moreouer, fro hēceforth was this Iſle of Britayn called Albion, as (before we haue ſayde) after the name of the ſayde Albion, bicauſe he was eſtabliſhed chief ruler and kyng thereof bothe by his grandfather Olyzis, and his father Neptune that cunning ſaylour, reigning therein (as Bale ſayth) by the ſpace of .xliij. yeares, till finally he was ſlayne, in manner afore remembred, by his vncle Hercules Lybicus.

Howe this Iſle vvas called Albion, of the giaunt Albion.

Bale.

After that Hercules had thus vanquiſhed and deſtroyed his enimies, hee paſſed to and fro thorough Gallia, ſuppreſſing the tyrantes in euerye part where he came, and reſtoring the people vnto a reaſonable kynde of libertie, vnder lawfull gouernours: and as we fynde, he buylded the citie of Alexia in Burgongne nowe called Alize.

Moreouer, by Lilius Giraldus in the lyfe of Hercules it is auouched, that the ſame Hercules came ouer hither into Britayne. And this dothe Giraldus write by warraunt of ſuche Brytons (as ſayth he) haue ſo written themſelues, which thing peraduenture he hath redde in Gildas the auncient Bryton poet: Whiche booke he confeſſeth in the .v. Dialogue of his hiſtories of Poets that he hath ſeen. The ſame thing alſo is confirmed by the name of an head of land in Britayn called Promontorium Herculis, as in Ptolomie ye may reade, whiche is thought to take name of his arriual at that place. Thus much for Albion and Hercules.

But nowe where as it is not denyed of anye, that this Ile was called auncientlye by the name of Albion: yet there be dyuers opinyons how it came by that name: for many doe not allow of this hiſtorie of Albion the Giaunte. But for ſo muche as it appertayneth rather to the deſcription than to the Hyſtorie of this Iſle, to rippe vp and lay forth the ſecrete myſteries of ſuch matters: and bicauſe I think that this opinion which is heere auouched howe it toke that name of the forſayd Albion, ſonne to Neptune, may be confirmed with as good authoritie, as ſome of the other, I here paſſe ouer the reſte, and thus proceede with the hiſtorie.

Dyuers opinyons vvhy the Ile vvas call Albion.

See more hereof in the deſcription.

When Albion chiefe Capitayn of the Gyants was ſlayn, the reſidue that remayned at home in the Iſle, continued without any rule or reſtraint of lawe, in ſo muche that they fell to ſuch a diſſolute order of lyfe, that they ſeemed little or nothing to differ from brute beaſtes: a thoſe are they which our auncient Chronicles call the Giants, who were ſo named, as well of the huge proportion of their ſtature (ſithens as before is ſayd, that age brought forth far greater men than are now liuing) as alſo for that they were the firſte, or at the leaſt the furtheſt in remembrance of any that had inhabited this countrey. For this word Giginer, or rather Gegines, from whence our word giant (as ſome take it) is deriued, is a greek word, and ſignifieth borne or bred of or in the earth: for our forefathers, ſpecially the Gentiles, being ignorant of the true beginning of mankind, were perſwaded, that the firſt inhabitaunts of any cōtrey were bred out of the earth, and therfore when they could go no higher, reckening the diſcentes of their predeceſſours, they wold name him Terræ filius, the ſonne of the earth: and ſo the Giants which the Poets fain to haue ſought to make battayle againſt heauen, are called the ſonnes of the earth: and the firſt inhabitantes generally of euery countrey, wer of the Grekes called Gigines, or Gegines, and of the Latines Aborigines, and Indiginæ, that is, people borne of the earth from the beginning, and cōming from no other countrey, but bred within the ſame.

Terræ filius vvhat it ſignifyeth.

Aborigines. Indiginæ.

And theſe Giaunts and firſt inhabitauntes of thys Iſle, continued in their beaſtly kinde of lyfe vnto the arriuall of the Ladies, whiche ſome of our chronicles ignorantly write to be the daughters of Diocleſian the king of Aſſiria, whereas in dede they haue bene deceiued in taking the worde Danaus to bee ſhort written for Diocleſianus: and by the ſame meanes haue dyuers wordes and names bene miſtaken bothe in our Chronicles and in diuerſe other auncient written workes. But this is a fauite that learned men ſhoulde not ſo muche trouble themſelues about, conſi-conſidering the ſame hath bin alreadie founde by ſundry authors long ſithence, as Hugh the Italiane, John Harding, and John Rouſe of Warwicke, and others, ſpecially by the healpe of Dauid Pencair, a Britiſhe hiſtorician, who recite the Hiſtorie vnder the name of Danaus and his daughters: and bycauſe we would not any man to thinke, that the hiſtorie of theſe daughters of Danaus is onely of purpoſe deuiſed, & brought in place of Dioclesian, to excuſe the imperfection of our writers, whereas there was eyther no ſuch hiſtorie, or at the leaſt no ſuch women that arriued in this Ile, the authoritie of Nennius a Briton writer may be auouched, who wrote aboue ix. C. yeares paſt, and maketh mencion of the arriuall of ſuche ladies.

The myſtak of the name Diocleſian Danaus.

To bee ſhorte, the Hiſtorie is thus: Belus the ſonne of Epaphus, (or as ſome writers haue) of Neptune and Libyes, whom Iſis after the death of Apis maried,) hadde iſſue two ſonnes: the firſt Danaus, called alſo Armeus, and Egyptus called alſo Rameſes, and theſe two were kings among the Egyptians. Danaus the elder of the two, hauyng in his rule the vpper region of Egypt, had by ſundry wiues .50. daughters, whiche his brother Aegyptus gaping for the dominion of the whole, did inſtantly deſire, that his ſons being alſo. 50. in number, might matche with thoſe fifty ladies.

But Danaus hauing knowledge by ſome prophecie or oracle, that a ſonne in law of his ſhoulde be his death, refuſed ſo to beſtowe his daughters.

Herevpon grew warre betwixt the brethre, in the end wherof, Danaus being the weaker, was inforced to flee his countrey, wherupon he prepared a naule, imbarqued himſelfe & his daughters, and with them paſſed ouer into Greece, where he found meanes to diſpoſſeſſe Gelenor (ſonne to Stenelas king of Argos,) of his rightfull inheritance, driuing him oute of his countreye, and reigned in his place by the aſſiſtance of the Argiues themſelues, that had conceyued an hatred towardes Gelenor, and a great likyng towardes Danaus, who in very deede did ſo farre excell the kings that had reigned there before hym, that the Greekes in remembraunce of hym, were after called Danai.

But his brother Aegyptus, taking greate diſdayne for that hee and his ſonnes were in ſuche ſorte deſpiſed of Danaus, ſente his ſons with a greate armie to make warre on theyr Uncle, giuing them in charge not to returne tyll they had eyther ſlayne Danaus, or obteyned his daughters in mariage.

The yong Gentlemen accordyng to theyr fathers commaundemente, beeing arriued in Greece, made ſuch warre agaynſte Danaus, that in the ende he was conſtrayned to gyue vnto thoſe his fifty nephues his .50. daughters, to ioyn with them in mariage, & ſo accordingly maried they were: but as the prouerb ſayth. In truſt appeared treacherie: for the firſt night of the mariage, Danaus deliuered to eche of his daughters a ſworde, chargyng them that when their huſbands after their banquets and paſtimes were once brought into a ſound ſleepe, eche of them ſhould ſlea hir huſband, menacing them with death vnleſſe they fulfilled his commaundement. They all therfore obey the will of their father, Hypermneſtra onely excepted, with whom preuayled more the loue of kinred and wedlock, than the feare of hir fathers diſpleaſure: for ſhee alone ſpared the lyfe of hir huſbande Lynceus, wakening him out of his ſleepe, and warning hym to departe and flee into Egypt to his father. He therfore hauing all the wicked practiſe reuealed to hym by his wyfe, followed hir aduiſe, and ſo eſcaped.

But when Danaus perceiued howe all his daughters had accompliſhed his cõmaundemẽt ſauing onely Hypermneſtra, he cauſed hir to be brought forth into iudgemẽt for diſobeying him in a matter wherin both the ſafetie & loſſe of his life reſted: but ſhe was acquit by the Argiues, and diſcharged: howbeit hir father kept hir in priſon, and ſeeking to fynde oute other huſbandes for his other daughters that hadde obeyed his pleaſure in ſleaing their firſte huſbandes, long it was ere he coulde fynde any to matche with them: for the heynous offence committed in the ſlaughter of their late huſbandes, was yet too freſhe in memorie, and their bloud not wiped out of mynde. Pauſanias.

But yet neuertheleſſe to bring his purpoſe the better to paſſe, he made proclamation that his daughters ſhould demaunde no ioynters, and euery futer ſhuld take his choyce without reſpect to the age of the ladie, or abilitie of him that came to make his choyce, but ſo as fyrſte come, beſte ſerued, according to their owne phantaſies and likings. But when this policie alſo fayled, and would not ſerue his turne, he deuiſed a game of running, ordeining therwith, that who ſoeuer got the beſt price ſhould haue the firſt choyce among all the ſiſters, and he that got the ſecond, ſhuld chooſe next to the fyrſt, and ſo forth eche one after an other, accordyng to the tryall of theyr ſwyftenеſſe of foote.

How muche this practiſe auayled, I knowe not: but certain it is, diuers of them were beſtowed either by this meanes, or by ſome other: for we finde that Autonomes was maried to Architeles Chryſantas, or (as Pauſanias hath) Scea was matched with Arehandrus, Inemome with Neptunus Equeſtris, on whome he begate Nauplius.

Higinus. But nowe to returne vnto Lynceus, whome his wyfe Hipermneſtra preſerued, (as before ye haue herd) after he was once got out of the reach and daunger of his father in law king Danaus, he gaue knowledge thereof to his wyfe, in rayſing a fyre on heyghte beacon wyſe, accordingly as ſhee hadde requeſted him to doe at hys departure from hir: and this was at a place which afterwardes toke name of him, and was called Lyncea.

Pauſanias. Upon his returne into Egypt, he gaue his father to vnderſtande the whole circumſtaunce of the trecherous crueltie vſed by his vncle and hys daughters in the murder of his brethren, and how hardly he himſelfe hadde eſcaped death out of hys vncles handes. Wherupon at tyme conuenient he was furniſhed forth with men and ſhippes by his father, for the ſpeedie reuenge of that heynous vnnaturall and moſte diſloyall murder, in which enterpriſe he ſped him forth with ſuch diligence, that in ſhorte tyme he found meanes to diſpatch hys vncle Danaus, ſet his wyfe Hypermneſtra at libertie, and brought the whole kingdome of the Argiues vnder his ſubiection.

This don, he cauſed the daughters of Danaus (ſo many as remayned within the limittes of his dominion) to be ſent for, whome he thought not worthie to lyue, becauſe of the cruell murther which they had committed on his brethren: but yet for that they were his wiues ſiſters, he would not put them to death, but commaunded them to be thruſt into a ſhippe, without maiſter, mate or mariner, & ſo to be turned into the mayn ocean ſea, and to take and abyde ſuch fortune as ſhould chance vnto them, thinking the worſt that might befall on them, coulde bee no worſſe than they had deſerued.

Hardyng. Iohn Rous out of Dauid Pencair. These Ladies thus imbarqued and left to the mercie of the raging ſeas, at length by hap were brought to ẏ coaſts of this yle then called Albiõ, where they tok land, & in ſeeking to prouide thẽſelues of victuals by purſute of wylde beaſts, met with no other inhabitantes than the rude and ſauage giauntes, of whome before we haue made mencion, which our hiſtoricians for their beaſtly kynde of lyfe, doe call Deuilles: And with theſe monſters theſe ladies finding none other to ſatiſfye the motions of their ſenſuall luſte, ioyned in the act of generation, and ingendred a race of people in proportion nothing differing from their fathers that begote them, nor in conditions from their mothers that bare them.

But now peraduenture ye will thinke that I haue forgotten my ſelfe in reherſing this hiſtorie of the Ladies arriuall here, becauſe I make no mencion of Albina, whiche ſhold be the eldeſt of the ſiſters, of whome this lande ſhoulde alſo take the name of Albion.

To this we anſwer, that as the name of their father hathe bene miſtaken, ſo lykewyſe hath the whole courſe of the hiſtorie in this behalfe: for although we ſhall admit that to be true whiche is reherſed (in maner as before ye haue heard) of the arriuall heere of thoſe ladies, yet certain it is that none of them bare the name of Albina, from whom this land might be called Albion. For further aſſurãce wherof, if any mã be deſirous to knowe all their names, we haue thoughte good here to reherſe thẽ as they be founde in Higinus, Pauſanias, & others. 1. Idea. 2. Philomela. 3. Higinus. The names of the daughters of Danaus.

These were the names of thoſe Ladies, the daughters of Danaus: howebeeit, whiche they were that ſhoulde arriue in this Iſle, we can not ſay. But it ſuffiſeth to vnderſtande, that none of them hight Albina, ſo that whether the hiſtorie of their landing heere ſhoulde be true or not, it is all one, for the matter concerning the name of this Iſle, which vndoubtedly was called Albion, eyther of Albion the giaunt (as before I haue ſayd) or by ſome other occaſion.

See more in the Diſcripſ.

And thus much for the Ladies, whoſe ſtrange aduenture of their arriual here, as it may ſeme to manie, and with good cauſe incredible, ſo without further auouching it for a truthe, I leaue it to the conſideration of the reader, to thinke therof as reſon ſhal moue him, ſith I ſee not how either in this, or in other things of ſuche antiquitie we can haue any ſufficient warrant otherwyſe than by lykely coniectures. Whiehe as in this hiſtorie of the ladies they are not moſt probable, yet haue we ſhewed the likelyeſt, ẏ (as we think) may be demed to agree with thoſe authors ẏ haue writ of their comming into this yle. But as for an aſſured proofe that this Iſle was inhabited with people before the commyng of Brute, I truſte it may ſuffiſe whiche before is recited out of Annio de Viterbo, Theophilus, Gildas, and other, although muche more might be ſayd: As of the com-commyng hyther of Olyxis, as wel as into the other parties of ỳ woꝛld: And likewyſe of Ulyſſes his being here, who in perfoꝛming ſome vow whiche he eyther then did make, oꝛ befoꝛe hadde made, erected an Altar in that parte of Scotland which was auncientlye called Calidonia, as Julius Solinus Polihiſtoꝛ in playne woꝛdes doth recoꝛde.

So that vpon theſe conſiderations I haue no doubt to deliuer vnto the Reader, the opinion of thoſe that thinke this lande to haue bin inhabited befoꝛe the arriuall here of Bꝛute, truſting it may be taken in good parte, ſith wee haue but ſhewed the coniectures of others, till time that ſome ſufficient learned man ſhall take vpon him to deſcipher the doubts of all theſe matters.

BRVTE.

HItherto haue wee ſpoken of them that inhabited this land befoꝛe the commyng of Bꝛute, although ſome will needs haue it, that he was the firſte which inhabited ỳ ſame with his people, deſcended of the Troyãs, ſome few Giaunts onely excepted whome hee vtterly deſtroyed, and lefte not one of them alyue thꝛough the whole Iſle. But as wee ſhall not doubte of Bꝛutes hyther comming, ſo maye wee aſſuredly thinke, that he found the Iſle peopled either with the generation of thoſe, whiche Albion the Giaunt had placed here, oꝛ ſome other kynde of people, whom he did ſubdue, and ſo reigned as well ouer them, as ouer thoſe whiche he bꝛought with him.

This Bꝛute (as the authoꝛ of the Booke (which Geffrey of Monmouth tranſlated) doth affirme, was the ſonne of Siluius, the ſonne of Aſcanius that was ſonne of Eneas the Troian, begotten of his wyfe Creuſa, and boꝛne in Troye, befoꝛe the Citie was deſtroyed.

But as other doe take it, the Authoꝛ of that booke (whatſoeuer he was) and ſuch other as folowe him, are deceyued only in this poynt, myſtaking the matter in that Poſthumus the ſonne of Eneas (begot of his wyfe Lauinia, and boꝛne after his fathers deceaſſe in Italy) was called Aſcanius, who had iſſue a ſonne named Julius, the whiche (as theſe other doe coniecture) was the father of Bꝛute, that noble chiefetain and aduenturous leader of thoſe people, which being deſcended (foꝛ the moꝛe parte in the fourth generation) from thoſe Troians that eſcaped with lyfe, when that royall Citie was deſtroyed by the Grekes, got poſſeſſion of this woꝛthie and moſt famous Iſle.

To this opinion Giouan Villani, a Flozentine in his vniuerſal hiſtoꝛie ſpeaking of Eneas and his offꝛying kings in Italy, ſeemeth to agree, where he hathe theſe woꝛds: Siluius the ſonne of Eneas by his wife Lauinia fell in loue with a neece of his mother the ſame Lauinia, and by hir had a ſonne, of whom ſhe dyed in trauayle, and therfoꝛe he was called Bꝛutus, who after as he grewe in ſome ſtature, and huntyng in a foꝛeſt ſlew his father at vnwares, and thereꝛvpon foꝛ fear of his gꝛãdfather Siluius Poſthumus he fled the countrey, and with a retinue of ſuche as followed him, paſſyng thꝛoughe diuers ſeas, at lengthe hee arriued in the Iſle of Bꝛitayne.

But nowe wheras by reaſon of the vncertaynty in the Roman authoꝛs themſelues, touching the lyne of Eneas, ſome foꝛein wꝛiters haue either with ſlender argumente, oꝛ elſe verie arrogantly without any grounded reſon ſhewed, taken vpon them to denye that there was any ſuch Italyan Bꝛutus, lineally cõming from Eneas the Troian, of whom the race of the Bꝛitiſh nation that poſſeſſed this Iſle ſhould pꝛoceede: yet bycauſe the argumente of the one ſoꝛte of thoſe that ſo wꝛite, is found inſufficient to the lerned, and the arrogancie of the other being void of reaſon, is ſmally to be regarded: and ſeing that neither the one noꝛ the other of theſe our aduerſaries can as yet fynd out any other, either by parents, tyme, place oꝛ name, that ſhoulde in ſuche wyſe conquer, ſubdue and gouerne this noble Iſle, but only our Bꝛutus oꝛ Bꝛytus. Foꝛ this letter (y) hath had of auncient tyme bothe thoſe ſoundes, as of V, and of I.

And ſith alſo we haue on oure ſyde, as many oꝛ rather moꝛe, and of as good credite (if we ſhall ſpeake generally,) beyng likewyſe foꝛreyne wꝛyters, which affirme and vndoubtedly auouch the regall ſtate of the foꝛeſayde Bꝛutus, as the ſole ruler, monarche and gouernour thereof: Seyng Theuet, Bodinus, and other.

I ſay, the caſe ſtandeth in ſuch termes, I doubt not but myne opinion wil be deemed allowable, if herein I folow the receyued opinion of moſt writers, and eſteemed the lykelyeſt ſundry ways to the carefull ſerchers and ſkilfull examiners of the antiquities of this triumphant Iland. Truſting ẏ this poynt with ſundry other concerning the hiſtorie of this our great Britayn, either vntruly or imperfectly recorded, or vtterly in maner vnknowne, ſhall in due tyme be brought to a neerer perfection and more apparant euidencie of trouth by ſome diſcrete and experte Gentleman, being of the auncient Britiſhe nobilitie lyneally deſcended, as alſo very ſtudious of ſo worthy veritics.

Concerning therfore our Brute, whether his father Julius was ſonne to Aſcanius, the ſonne of Aeneas by his wyfe Creuſa, or ſonne to Poſthumus, called alſo Aſcanius, and ſonne to Aeneas by his wyfe Lauinia, wee will not further ſtande. But this we kynde, that when he came to the age of .xv. yeares, ſo that he was now able to ride abrode with his father into the foreſts and chaſes, he fortuned eyther by miſhap, or by gods prouidence, to ſtrike his father with an arrowe, in ſhoting at a deere, of whiche wounde he alſo dyed. His grandfather (whether the ſame was Poſthumus, or his elder brother) hearing of this greate miſaduenture that had chaunced to his ſonne Syluius, liued not long after, but deceaſſed of very griefe and ſorrow (as is to be ſuppoſed) which he conceyued therof. And the young gentleman immediatly after he had ſlayn his father (in maner before alledged) was baniſhed hys countrey, and thereuppon got him into Grecia, where traueling in ẏ coũtrey, he lighted by chãce among ſome of the Troyan offſpring, and aſſociating himſelfe with them, grewe by meanes of the lignage (wherof he was deſcended) in proces of tyme, into greate reputation among them: chiefly by reaſon there were yet dyuers of the Troiane race, and that of greate authoritie in that countrey. For Pirrhus the ſonne of Achilles, hauing no iſſue by his wyfe Hermione, maried Andromache, late wyfe vnto Hector: and by hir had three ſonnes, Moloſſus, Pielus, and Pergamus, that in their time grew to be of great power in thoſe places and countreys, and ſo their offſpring likewiſe: Whereby Brute or Brytus wanted no frendſhip. For euen at his firſte comming thither, diuers of the Troyans that were remayning in ſeruitude, being deſirous of libertie, by heapes reſorted vnto hym. And amongeſt other, Aſſaracus was one, whom Brute entertayned, receyuing at his handes the poſſeſſion of ſundry fortes & places of defence, before that the king of thoſe parties could haue vnderſtanding or knowledge of any ſuch thing. Herewith alſo ſuche as were redie to make the aduenture with him, repaired to him on eche ſide, whereuppon he firſte placed garniſons in thoſe townes whiche had bene thus deliuered vnto him, and afterwardes with Aſſaracus and the reſidue of the multitude, he withdrewe into the mountaynes neere adioyning. And thus being made ſtrong wyth ſuche aſſiſtance, vpon conſultation hadde wyth them that were of moſte authoritie about hym, wrote vnto the Kyng of that countreye called Pandraſus, in fourme as followeth.

Pauſanias.

The Letter of Brute to Pandraſus, as I fynd it ſette downe in Galfride Monunetenſis.

BRute leader of the remnant of the Troyane people, to Pandraſus king of the Grekes, ſendeth greeting: Bicauſe it hath bin thought a thing vnworthie, that the people diſcended of the noble linage of Dardanus, to be otherwiſe delte with than the honoure of their Nobilitie doth dothe require: They haue withdrawne themſelues within the cloſe couerte of the woddes: For they haue choſen rather (after the manner of wylde beaſtes) to lyue on fleſhe and herbes in libertie, than furniſhed with all the riches in the worlde to continue vnder the yoake of ſeruyle thraldome. But if thys theyr doyng offende thy mightye highneſſe, they are not to bee blamed, but rather in this behalfe to bee pardoned, ſith euery captiue priſoner is deſirous to bee reſtored vnto hys former eſtate and dignitie. You therefore pitying their caſe, vouchſafe to graunte them their abridged lybertie, and ſuffer them to remayne in quiet within theſe woddes whiche they haue gotte into their poſſeſſion: If not ſo, yet gyue them lycence to departe forthe of thys Countreye into ſome other partyes.

The ſight of theſe letters and requeſt in them cõteyned made Pandraſus at the firſt ſomewhat amazed, Howbeit aduiſing further of the matter, and conſideryng their ſmall number, he made no greate accompt of them, but determined out of hande to ſuppreſſe them by force, before they ſhoulde growe to a greater multitude.

Pandraſus prepareth an army to ſuppreſſe the Troian offſpring.

And to bring his intention the better to paſſe, he leuyed hys power, and made towardes them. But as he paſſed by a towne called Sparatinũ, Sparatinum. marching towardes the woods within the which he thought to haue founde his enimyes, he was ſodenly aſſailed by Brute, who with three thouſande men was come forth of the woodes, and fiercely ſetting vpon his enimies, made greate ſlaughter of them, ſo that they were vtterly diſcomfited, and ſoughte by flyghte to ſaue themſelues in paſſing a ryuer there at hande called Akalon.

Brute with his men following faſt vpon the aduerſaries, cauſed them to plunge into the water at aduenture, ſo that manye of them were drowned. Antigonus yet the brother of kyng Pandraſus didde what hee coulde to ſtaye the Grecians from fleeing, called them back agayn, and getting ſome of them togither, placed them in order, and began a newe fielde: but it nothing auayled, for the Troyans preaſing vpon hym, toke him priſoner, ſlewe and ſcattered his companie (and ceaſſed not tyll they had rid the fields of all their aduerſaries.

This don, Brute entring ẏ towne, furniſhed it with fiue hundred able ſouldiours, and afterwardes went backe to the reſidue of his people that were incamped in the woddes, where he was receyued with vnſpeakeable ioye for this proſperous atchieued enterpriſe. But although this euil ſucceſſe at the firſt beginning, ſore troubled Pandraſus, as well for the loſſe of the field, as for the taking of his brother, yet was he rather kyndeled in deſyre to ſeeke reuenge, than otherwyſe diſcouraged. And therfore aſſemblyng his people agayne togyther that were ſcattered here and there, he came the nexte day before the towne of Sparatinum, wherein he thoughte to haue founde Brute encloſed togyther with the priſoners, and therfore he ſhewed his whole endeuer by harde ſiege and fierce aſſaultes to force them within to yelde.

To conclude, ſo long he did cõtinue the ſiege, till victuals began to ware ſcant within, ſo that there was no way but to yelde, if preſent ſuccour came not to remoue the ſiege: wherupon they ſignifyed their neceſſitie vnto Brute, who for that he had not power ſufficient to fight with the enimies in open field, he ment to giue thẽ a camiſado in the nyght ſeaſon, & ſo ordered his buſineſſe, that enforcing a priſoner named Anacletus, whiche he had taken in the laſt battayle, to ſerue his turne, by conſtrayning him to take an othe whiche he durſte not for conſcience ſake breake) he found meanes to encounter with his enimies vpon the aduauntage, that he did not only ouerthrowe theyr wholepower, but alſo toke Pandraſus pryſoner, wherby all the trouble was ended: and ſhortly after a perfect peace concluded, vpon theſe conditions folowyng.

Pandraſus take priſoner.

The conditions of the agreement betwixte Brute and Pandraſus.

Fyrſt that Pandraſus ſhuld giue his daughter named Innogen vnto Brute in mariage, with a competent ſumme of golde and ſiluer for hir dower.

Secondely, to furniſhe hym and his people with a nauie of ſhips, and to ſtore the ſame with victuals and all other things neceſſarie.

Thyrdly, that Brute with his people ſhoulde haue licence to departe the countrey, to ſeeke aduentures whether ſo euer it ſhould pleaſe them to direct their courſe, without let, impeachement or trouble to bee offered any wayes forthe by the Grecians.

To all theſe conditions, bycauſe they touched not the prerogatiue of his kingdom) Pandraſus did willingly agree, & lykewyſe performe, ſo that all things being once put in a redyneſſe, and the wynde ſeruyng their purpoſe, Brute with hys wyfe Innugen and his people imbarqued, and plucking vp ſayles departed from the coaſtes of Grecia: and after two dayes and a nyghtes ſaylyng, they arriued at Leogitia, (in ſome olde written bookes of the Brytiſhe hyſtorie, noted downe Lergetia) an Iland, where they conſulted with an Oracle. Brute himſelf kneeling before the Idole, and holding in his right hande a boll prepared for ſacrifice ful of wyne, and the bloud of a whyte hynde, ſpake in this maner as here folowyth:

Diua potens nemorum, terror ſyluestribus apri,
Cui licet anfractus ire per aethereos
Infernaſq́ domos, terreſtria iura reſoluc,
Et dic quas terras nos habitare velis:
Dic certam ſedem qua te venerabor in æuum,
Qua tibi virgineis templa dicabo choris.

These verſes as Ponticus Virunnius and others alſo doe gueſſe, were written by Gildas Cambrius in his booke intitled Cambricdos, and may thus be engliſhed.

Thou goddeſſe that doeſt rule the wooddes and forreſts greene,
And chaſeſt fomyng boares, that flee thyne awfull ſight,
Thou that mayeſt paſſe aloft in ayrie skyes ſo sheene,
And walk eke vnder erth in places void of light,
Diſcouer earthly ſtates, direct our courſe aright,
And ſhewe where wee ſhall dwell, accordyng to thy will,
In ſeates of ſure abode, where temples we maye dight,
For virgins that ſhal ſounde thy laude with voices ſhrill.

After this prayer and obſeruances done according to the Pagane rite and cuſtom, Brute abiding for anſwere, fell a ſleepe: in tyme of which ſleepe appeared to hym the fayde goddeſſe, vttering an aunſwere, as in theſe Verſes folowyng is expreſſed.

Brute, ſub occaſum Solis trans Gallica regna, Inſula in Oceano eſt, vndiq́ clauſa mari,
Inſula in oceano eſt, habitata gigantibus olim,
Nunc deſerta quidem, gentibus apta tuis:
Hanc pete, namq́ tibi ſedes erit illa perennis,
Hic fiet natis altera Troia tuis:
Hic de prole tua reges naſcentur & ipſis,
Totus terra ſubditus orbis erit.

Whiche are thus Engliſhed.

Brute farre by weaſt beyonde the Gallike lande is founde,

An yle whiche with the Ocean ſeas encloſed is a boute, VVhere Giants dwelt ſometyme, but now is deſarte grounde, Moſt meet where thou mayſt plant thy ſelf with all thy route:
Make thitherwardes with ſpeede, for there thou ſhalt fynde out
An euer during ſeate, and Troy ſhall riſe anewe
Vnto thy race, of whome ſhall kings bee borne no doubt,
That with their mightie power, the worlde ſhall whole ſubdue.

After that he was awakened out of his ſleepe and had called his dreame to remembrãce, he firſt doubted whether it were a very dreame or a true viſion, the goddeſſe hauyng ſpoken to hym with lyuely voyce. Whereupon callyng ſuche of hys companie vnto hym as he thoughte requiſite in ſuche a caſe, hee declared vnto them the whole matter with the circumſtaunces, whereat they greatly reioycing, cauſed mightie bonfyres to be made, in the whiche they caſte wyne, milke, and other licours, with dyuers gummes and ſpyces of moſte ſwete ſmell and odour, as in the Pagan religion was accuſtomed: whiche obſeruaunces and ceremonies being once perfourmed & brought to ende, they returned ſtreighte wayes to their ſhippes, and as ſoone as the wynde ſerued, they paſſed forewarde on their iourney with great ioye and gladneſſe, as men put in comforte to fynde out the wiſhed ſeates for their firme and ſure habitations. From hence therfore they caſt about, and making weſtwarde, they firſt arriue in Africa, and after keeping on their courſe, they paſſed the ſtraites of Gibralterra, and coaſting alongſt the ſhore on the right hande, they founde another companye that were lykewyſe deſcended of the Troiane progenie, on the coaſts nere where the Pyrenine hilles ſhote downe to the ſea, whereof the ſame ſea by good reaſon was named in thoſe dayes Mare Pyrenæum, although hitherto by fault of Writers and copiers of the Britiſhe hiſtorie receiued, in this place Mare Tyrhenũ was ſlightly put downe in ſtede of Pyrenæum.

I knowe right well that ſome will condemne me of lacke of vnderſtanding the names whiche the later writers Greekes or Latiniſtes haue giuen vnto our known ſeas: for ỹ we reade not in any autentike author, that thoſe ſeas next and againſt the Pyrenine mountaynes, haue bin called Mare Pyrenæum. But verily the courſe of the hiſtorie doth moue me to thinke aſſuredly, that the author of Geffrey Monmouthes booke, ment in that place the ſeas neere to the coaſt, whereunto the Pyrenine hilles do ioyn. For what reaſon is it, that after the Troians were paſſed the pyllers of Hercules, that ſtande on eyther ſides the ſtraite of Marrocke or Gibralterra (whether you liſt to name the place) ſhoulde returne ſo great a courſe backe agayne, and fall vpon the coaſtes of Tuſcane (from the whiche he purpoſely was fledde) which lay nothing weſtward, whither they bent their whole courſe.

I haue ſhewed my reaſon, grounded vpon the opinion of ſome that are known to be learned, & no leſſe ſtudious in ſearch of ſuch matters of antiquitie, whoſe iudgementes I can not but reuerence, and therfore I am the bolder to ſet it down as I haue hearde it, and alſo by other allowed. To proceede then with the hiſtorie.

The offſpring of thoſe Troianes with whom Brute and his companie thus did meete, were a remnãt of thoſe that came away with Antenore. Their capitayne hight Corineus, a man of great modeſtie and appreued wiſedome, and therto of incomparable ſtrength and boldneſſe. After they vnderſtoode of one an others eſtates, and howe they were deſcended from one countrey and progenie, they vnited themſelues together, greately reioycing that they were ſo fortunately mette. And after this, hoyſſyng vp their ſayles, they directed their courſe forward ſtil, till they arriued within the mouth of the riuer of Loyre, whiche Brute and Corineus ioyne their companies together.

They arriue on the coaſtes of Gallia, nowe called Fraunce.

deuideth Aquitayn from Gaule Celtique, where they toke lande within the dominion of a king, called Goffarius, and ſurnamed Pictus, by reaſon that he was deſcẽded of the people called Agathyrſes, that otherwiſe were named alſo Pictes, for ſo muche as they vſed to paynte their faces and bodies, in ſuche wiſe as the richer a man was amongſt them, the more coſte he beſtowed of paynting himſelfe: and commonly the heare of their head was redde.

Goffarius ſurnamed Pictus. Les annales d'Aquitain

The countrey of Poictou (as ſome hold) where the ſayde Goffarius reigned, toke name of thys people: and likewiſe a parte of this our Iſle of Britayn nowe conteyned within Scotland, in ancient time was called Pightland, as elſewhere both in this hiſtorie of England, & alſo of Scotland, lande, it may further appeare.

But nowe to our purpoſe. When Goffarius the king of Poictou was aduertiſed of the landing of theſe ſtraungers within his countrey, he ſent firſt certain of his people to vnderſtād what they ment by their comming a lande within his dominion, withoute licence or leaue of him obteyned.

Goffarius ſendeth vnto Brutus.

They that were thus ſente, by chaunce came where Corineus with two hundred of the companie were come from the ſhippes into a foreſte neare to the ſea ſyde, to kil ſome venilon for their ſuſtenaunce: and being reproued with ſome diſdaynfull ſpeache of thoſe Poictouins, hee ſhaped them a rounde aunſwere: inſomuch that one of them whoſe name was Imbert, let driue an arrow at Corineus: but hee auoyding the danger therof, ſhotte agayn at Imbert, in reuenge of that iniurie offered, and claue hys head in ſunder.

Corineus aunſwereth the meſſengers.

Imbert.

Imbert is ſlayn by Corineus.

The reſte of the Poictouins fledde therupon, and broughte worde to Goffarius what hadde happened: whoe immediatelye wyth a myghtie armie, made forwarde to encounter with the Troians, and comming to ioyne with them in battaile, after a ſharp and ſore conflict, in the ende Brute with his armie obteyned a triumphant victorie, ſpecially thorough the noble prowes of Corineus.

Goffarius is diſcomfited.

Goffarius ſeeketh ayde againſt Brute.

Goffarius eſcaping from the fielde, fled into the inner partes of Gallia, making ſuite for aſſiſtaunce vnto ſuche kings as in thoſe dayes reigned in diuers prouinces of that lande, who promyſed to ayde hym wyth all their forces, and to expell oute of the coaſtes of Aquitayne, ſuche ſtraungers as without his licence were thus entred the countrey.

But Brute in the meane tyme paſſed forewarde, and with fire and ſworde, made hauock in places where he came: and gathering great ſpoyles, fraughte his ſhips with plentie of riches. At lenght he came to the place, where afterwards he buylt a Citie named Turonium, that is Tours.

Brute ſpoyleth the countrey.

Turonius or Tours buylt by Brute.

Here Goffarius with ſuche Gaules as were aſſembled in his ayd, gaue batayl agayn vnto the Troyans that were encamped to abyde his cōming. Where after that they had fought a long tyme with ſingular manhoode on bothe parties: finally the Troyans oppreſſed with multitude of their aduerſaries, being thirtie tymes as manye more as the Troyans) were conſtrained to retyre into their campe, within the which the Gaules kepte them as beſieged, lodging rounde about them, and purpoſing by famine to compell them to yelde themſelues vnto their mercie.

Goffarius reneweth his forces, fighteth eftſoones with Brute.

But Corineus taking counſell with Brute, deuiſed to departe in the darke of the night forth of the campe, and to lodge himſelfe wyth three thouſand choſen ſouldiours ſecretly in a woodde, and there to remayne in couert tyll in the morning that Brute ſhoulde come forth and giue a charge vppon the enimies, wherewith Corineus ſhould breake forth and aſſayle the Gaules on the backes.

This policie was putte in practiſe, and toke ſuch effect as the deuyſers themſelues wiſhed: for the Gaules being ſharply aſſailed on the front by Brute and his companie, wer now by the ſodain comming of Corineus, who ſet vpon them behinde on their backes, brought into ſuch a feare, that incontinently they toke them to flighte, whome the Troyans egerly purſued, making no ſmall ſlaughter of them as they might ouertake them. In this battaile Brute loſt many of his men, and amongſt other, one of his nephues named Turinus, after he had ſhewed marueilous proofe of his great manhoode. Of hym (as ſome haue written) the foreſayd citie of Tours toke the name, and was called Turonium, becauſe the layd Turinus was there buried: Although Andrew Theuet affirmeth the contrarie, and maynteyneth, that one Taurus the nephewe of Hanniball was the firste that closed it about with a pale of woodde (as the maner in those days was of fencing their townes) in the yeare of the woorld 3374. and before the birth of our Saviour. 197. But yet by Theuets leaue, Brute and his companie myghte fyrst buylde the same towne: and Taurus peraduenture might after fence it about with a pale, at that supposed time whē his vncle Hanibal came forth of Spayn, to passe through Gallia into Italy. But to speake what I thinke, I beleeue Theuet is as little able to proue his Taurus to be the first that enclosed it, as other are to proue, that it toke the name of Turinus his burgall there.

But now to our matter concerning Brute, who after he had obteined so famous a victorie, albeit there was good cause for him to reioyce, yet it sore troubled him to consider that his numbers daily decayed, and his enimies still encreased, and grew stronger: wherupon resting doubtfull what to doe, whether to proceede agaynste the Gaulles, or to returne to his shippes, and to seke the yle, that was appointed to him by oracle, at length he chose the surest way and best (as he toke it, and as it proued:) for whylest yet the more parte of his armie was leste alyue, and that the fame of the victorie remayned on his side, hee drewe to his nauie, and lading his shippes, with exceeding greate store of riches whiche his people had got abrode in the countrey: he toke the seas, agayne: And after a few dayes sayling, they landed at the hauen whiche is now called Totnesse, the yeare of the worlde. 2850. after the destruction of Troy. 66. after the deliuerāce of the Israelites, from the Captiuitie of Babylon. 397. almost ended, in the. 18. yeare of the reigne of Tyneas king of Babylon. 13. of Melanthus king of Athenes, before the buylding of Rome. 368. whiche was before the natiuitie of our saviour Christ 1116. almost ended, and before the reigne of Alexander the great. 782.

This computation haue I set down according to the Chronologie of William Harison not yet published, whose accompte (as he hath gathered it) I haue followed for the more parte, as well in the historie of Scotland, as here in this historie of England, especially til I come vnto the time that the Saxons settled themselues here: the rather bycause I am perswaded ẏ he hath bin verie diligent in serching out the true computation of yeres, in reforming the same according to ẏ best authorities, as I truste to the learned reader it may appeare. And if there be any errour therein, I doubt not but some suche learned Gentleman as hath spent some studie about the searche of the first peopling of this land, will for the benefite of his countrey in tyme conueniente reforme that which is amisse, and publishe to the worlde that whiche may better satisfie the learned, and cleere all doubtes, as well in the accompt of the time of Brutes comming hither, as in all other circumstances of the whole Brytishe historie.

But nowe to proceede. When soeuer Brute entred this lande, immediatly after his arriuall (as writers doe recorde) he searched the countrey from side to side, and euen from the one ende to the other, finding it in moste places right fertile and plentuous of woodde and grasse, and full of pleasant springs and faire ryuers.

But as he thus trauayled to discouer the state and commodities of the lande, he was encountred by diuers strong & mightie Giauntes, whom he destroyed and slewe, or rather subdued them, with all suche other people, as her founde in the Ilande, whiche were more in number vndoubtedly than by report of some authors, it shoulde appete there were. Among these Giants (as Geffrey of Monmouthe writeth,) there was one of passing strengthe and greate estimation, named Gogmagog, with whome Brute caused Corineus to wrastell, at a place beside Douer, where Brute encountred by the Giauntes.

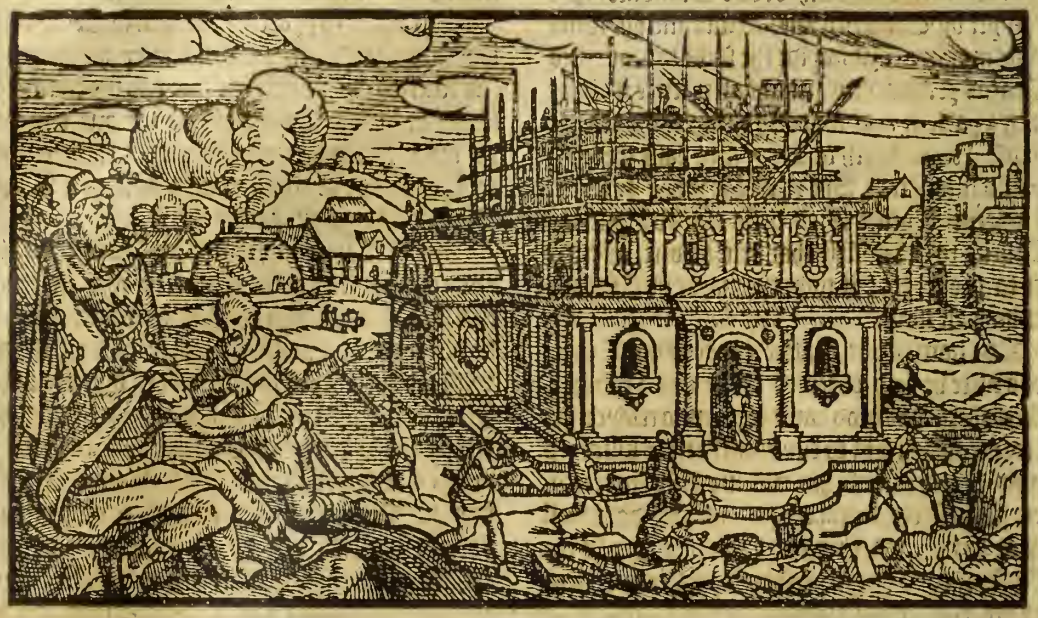
Corineus vvrestleth vvith Gogmagog.

it chaunced, that the Giaunt brake a ribbe in the syde of Corineus, whyle they stroue to clasp, and the one to ouerthrowe the other: wherewith Corineus being sore chafed and stirred to wrath, he so doubled his force that he got the vpper hand of the Gyaunt, and caste him downe headlong from one of the rockes there, not farre from Douer, and so dispatched hym: by reason whereof, the place was named long after, the fall or leape of Gogmagog, but afterwards it was called the fall of Douer.



Gogmagog is slayne.

Cornvvall giuē to Corineus.

For this valiant deede and other the lyke seruice firste and laste atchieued, Brute gaue vnto Corineus the whole countrey of Cornwall.

To be briefe: After that Brute had destroyed suche as stode agaynste him, and brought suche people people vnder his ſubiection, as he found in the Ile, and ſearched the land from the one end to the other: He was deſirous to build a citie, ẏ the ſame might be the regal ſeat of his empire or kingdom. Wherupon he choſe forth a plot of ground, lying on the north ſyde of the riuer of Thames, which by good conſideration ſeemed to be moſt pleaſant & conuenient for any great multitude of inhabitants, aſwel for holſomneſſe of aire, goodneſſe of ſoyle, plentie of woodes, & commoditie of the riuer, ſeruing as wel to bring in as to carrie forth all kindes of merchandiſe, and things neceſſarie for gayne ſore and vſe of them that there ſhuld inhabit.

The citie of Trinouants after called Lodon, buylded. See more hereof in the deſcription.

Here therfore, he began to build and lay the foundation of a citie, in the tenth, or (as other thinke) in the ſeconde yeare after his arriuall, which he nameth (ſaith Gal. Mon.) Troy nouant, or as Hum. Lhuyd ſayth, Troynewith, that is new Troy, in remembrance of that noble citie of Troy, from whēce he and his people were for the more part deſcended.

When Brutus had buylded this citie, and brought the Iland fully vnder his ſubiection, he then by the aduiſe of his nobles, commaunded this Ile whiche before hyght Albion, to bee called Britayne, and the inhabitauntes Britons after his name, for a perpetuall memorie that he was the firſt bringer of them into the lande. In this meane whyle alſo he had by his wyfe .iij. ſonnes, of which the firſte was named Locrinus, or Locrine, the ſeconde Cambris or Camber, and the third Albanactus or Albanact. And when the tyme of his death drewe neere, To the firſt he betoke the gouernment of that part of the lande which is nowe knowne by the name of England: ſo that the ſame was long after called Loegria, or Logiers, of the ſayd Locrinus.

Brute had three ſonnes.

Loegria.

To the ſeconde he appoynted the countrey of Wales, the whyche of hym was firſt named Cambria, deuided from Loegria, by the riuer of Seuerne.

Cambria.

To his thirde ſonne Albanacte, hee deliuered all the North parte of the Ile, afterwardes called Albania, after the name of the ſaid Albanacte: which portion of the ſaid Ile lieth beyond the Humber northward.

Thus whē Brutus had deuided the Ile of Britain (as before is mēcioned) into .3. parts, & had gouerned ẏ ſame by the ſpace of .xv. yeres, he died in ẏ. 24. yere after his arriual, as Harriſon noteth it, and was buryed at Troynouant or London: although the place of his ſaid burial there, be now grown out of memorie.

In the dayes this our Sa Saule and muell gouer Iſraell.

Locrinus, the ſecond ruler of Britayne.

LOcrinus, or Locrine, the firſt begottē ſonne of Brute begā to reigne ouer ẏ coūtrey called Logiers in the yere of ẏ worlde 3874. and held to his part the countrey that ſtretched frō ẏ ſouthe ſea vnto the riuer of Humber, as is afore remembred.

Gal. Mon. Mat. VVeſt. Fa. oue of de Fo.

Whyle thys Locrinus gouerned Logiers, his brother Albanact ruled in Albania, as is ſayde, and there was finally ſlayne in a battaile by a King of the Hunnes or Scythians, called Humber, which inuaded that part of Britain, & got poſſeſſiō therof, til Locrinus with his brother Cāber, in reuēge of their other brothers brothers death, and for the recouery of the kingdome, gathered their powers togither, and comming againſt the ſaid King of the Hunes, by the valiaunce of their people they diſcomfited hym in battell, and chaſed him ſo egrely, that he himſelfe and a greate number of his men were drowned in the Gulfe that then parted Loegria and Albania, which after toke name of ỹ layd king, & was called Humber, and ſo continueth vnto this day.

Moreouer, in this battell againſt the Hunes were three yong Damoſels taken of excellente beauty, ſpecially one of them, whoſe name was Eſtrild, daughter to a certayne king of Scithia. With this Eſtrild king Locrine fel ſo far in loue, notwithſtãding a former contract made betwixt him & the Lady Guendoloena, daughter to Corineus Duke of Cornewall, ỹ he meant yet with all ſpeede to marrie the ſame Eſtrild. But beyng earneſtly called vpon, and in manner forced therto by Corineus, hee chaunged his purpoſe, and married Guendoloena, keeping neuertheleſſe the foreſayde Eſtrild to paramor ſtill after a ſecrete ſort, during ỹ life of Corineus his father in lawe. But after ỹ Corineus was departed this world, Locrine forſoke Guendoloena, and maried Eſtrild. Guendoloena therfore being caſt off by hir huſband, gote hir into Cornewall to hir friendes and kinrede, and there procured them to make warre againſt the ſayde Locrine hir huſbande, in the whiche warres hee was ſlaine and a battayle foughte neere to the riuer of Sture, after he hadde raigned (as writers affirme) twenty yeeres, and buried by his father in the Citie of Troynouant, leauing behinde him a yong ſonne (begotten of his wife Guendoloena) named Madan, as yet vnmeete to gouerne.

Guendoloena or Guendoleyn the wife of Locrinus, & daughter of Corineus Duke of Cornewall, for ſo muche as hir ſonne Madan was not of yeeres ſufficient to gouerne, was by common conſent of the Britons made ruler of the Iſle, in the yeere of the world. 2894. and ſo hauing ỹ adminiſtration in hir handes, ſhe did right diſcretly vſe hir ſelfe therein, to the comforte of all hir ſubiects, till hir ſonne Madan came to lawfull age: and then ſhe gaue ouer the rule and dominion to him, after ſhee had gouerned the ſpace of fiftene yeeres.

Madan the third Ruler.

MAdan the ſonne of Locrine, and Guindoline entred into ỹ gouernement of Britaine in the. 2909. of the world. There is little left in writing of his doings, ſauing that he vſed greate tyranny amongſt his Britons: and therefore after he had ruled this land the tearme of. 40. yeres, he was deuoured of wilde beaſtes, as he was abroad in hũting. He left behind him two ſonnes, Mempricius, and Manlius. Hee builded as is reported Madan Caiſtre, now Dancaſtre, which retayneth ſtill the later parte of hys name.

Mempricius the fourth Ruler.

Mempritius.

MEmpricius, the eldeſt ſonne of Madan, began to raigne ouer the Britaynes in the yere of the world. 2949. hee continued not long in peace. For his brother Manlius vpon an ambitious minde prouoked the Britaynes to rebell againſt him, ſo that fore and deadly warre continued long betweene thẽ. But finally, vnder colour of a treatie, Manlius was ſlaine by his brother Mempricius, ſo that then he liued in more tranquilitie and reſt. Howbeit, being deliuered thus from trouble of warres, he fell into ſlouth, and ſo into vnlawfull luſt of lecherie, and thereby into the hatred of his people, by forcing of their wiues and daughters. And finally became ſo beaſtly, that he forſoke his lawfull wife and all his concubines, and fell into the abhominable ſinne of Sodomy. And thus from one vice he fell into another, till he became odible to God and man, and at length, going on hunting, was loſt of his people, and deſtroyed of wilde beaſtes, when he had raigned twentie yeares, leauing behinde him a noble yong ſonne named Ebranke, begotten of his lawfull wife.

Ebranke the fifth Ruler.

Ebrãck

EBranke the ſon of Mempricius, began to rule ouer the Britaynes in ỹ yere of the Worlde 2969. He had as writers doe of hym record, one & twẽty wiues, on whome he begote. xx. ſonnes and thirtie daughters, of the whiche the eldeſt hight Gualeſ, or Gualea. Theſe daughters he ſent to Alba Siluius, which was the eleuenth king of Italy, or the ſixth King of the Latines, to the end they might be married to his noble men of the bloud of Troians, becauſe the Sabines refuſed to ioyne their daughters with them in marriage. Furthermore, he was the firſt Prince of his lande that euer inuaded Fraunce after Brute, and is commended as author and originall builder of many Cities, both in his owne kingdome, and elſe where. Hys ſonnes alſo vnder the conduct of Aſſaracus, one of their eldeſt brethren, returning out of Italy, after they had conducted their ſiſters thither, inuaded Germany, being firſt moleſted by the people of that countrey in their rage, and by the helpe of the ſayd Alba, ſubdued a great part of that countrey, and there planted themſelues. Our hiſtories ſay, that Ebrancus their father married them in their returne, and ayded them in their conqueſts, and that he builded the Citie of Caerbrank, now called Yorke, about the 14. yeare of his raigne. He builded alſo in Albania now called Scotland, the Caſtel of Maydens, afterward called Edenburgh of Aidan one of their kings. The Citie of Alclud was builded likewiſe by hym as ſome write) now decayed. After which cities thus builded, he ſayled ouer into Gallia, now called Frãce with a great army, and ſubduing the Gaules as is aforeſayde, he returned home with great riches and triumph. And when he had guided the lande of Britayne in noble wiſe by the ſpace of fortie yeares, he died, and was buried at Yorke.

Ebranck had xxi wiues. Thirty daughters ſent into Italy.

Brute Greeneſhielde the .6. Ruler.

Brute Greneſhielde.

BRute Greeneſhielde, the ſonne of Ebrank, was made gouernor of this lande in the yeere of ẏ worlde .3009. Aſa raigning in Juda, and Baaſa in Iſraell. Thys Prince bare alwayes in the field a greene ſhielde, whereof he toke hys ſurname, and of him ſome forraine authors affirme, ẏ he made an attempte to bring the whole Realme of Fraunce vnder his ſubiection, which he performed, becauſe his father ſuſteined ſome diſhonor and loſſe in his laſt voyage into that countrey. Howbeit they ſay, ẏ whẽ he came into Henaud, Brinchild a Prince of ẏ quarter gaue him alſo a greate ouerthrowe, and compelled him to retire home agayne into hys countrey. This I borrow out of William Harriſon, who in his chronologie toucheth the ſame at large, concluding in the end, that the ſaid paſſage of this Prince into France is very likely to be true, and that he named a parcell of Armorica lying on the South, and in manner vpon the very loyne after his owne name, and alſo a Citie which he builded there Britayne. For (ſayth he) it ſhould ſeeme by Strabo. lib. 4. that there was a noble Citie of that name long before his time in the ſayde countrey, whereof Plinie alſo ſpeaketh lib. 4. cap. 7. albeit that he aſcribe it vnto France after a diſordred maner. More I finde not of this aforeſaid Brute, ſauing that he ruled the lande a certaine time, his father yet liuing, and after hys deceaſe the tearme of twelue yeeres, and then dyed, and was buried at Caerbranke nowe called Yorke.

Iacobus Leſ.

Strabo lib. 4.

Leill the ſeuenth Ruler.

Leil

LEil the ſon of Brute Greeneſhielde, began to raigne in the yeere of the worlde .3021. the ſame time that Aſa was raigning in Juda, and Ambri in Iſrael. He built the Citie nowe called Carlile, which then after hys owne name was called Caerleil, that is, Leil his Citie, or the Citie of Leil. He repayred alſo (as Henry Bradſhawe hathe, the Citie of Caerleon now called Cheſter, which as by the ſame Bradſhaw it appeareth, was built before Brutus entring into this lande by a Giaunte named Leon Gauer. But what authoritie he hadde to auouche this, it may be doubted, for Ranulfe Higde in his worke entituled Policronicon, ſaith in playne wordes, that it is vnknowen who was the firſte founder of Cheſter, but that it toke the name of ẏ ſoiourning there of ſome Romayne Legions, by whom alſo it is not vnlike that it might be firſte built by P. Oſtorius Scapula, who as we find, after he had ſubdued Caratacus king of ẏ Ordouices ẏ inhabited ẏ countreys now called Lancaſhire, Cheſhire, & Salupſhire, built in thoſe partes, & among ẏ Silures, certain places of defence, for the better herbourgh of his men of warre, & keeping down of ſuche Britaynes as were ſtill ready to moue rebellion. But now to ẏ purpoſe concerning K. Leil. We find it recorded ẏ he was in ẏ beginning of his raigne very vpright, & deſirous to ſee iuſtice executed, & aboue all things loued peace & quietneſſe, but as yeres encreaſed with him, ſo his vertues began to diminiſh, in ſo much, that abãdoning ẏ care for the body of ẏ common welth, he ſuffered his own body to welter in all vice and voluptuouſneſſe, & ſo procuring the hatred of hys ſubiectes, cauſed malice and diſcorde to ryſe amõgſt them, which during his life, he was neuer able to appeaſe. But leauing them ſo at variãce, departed this life, and was buried at Carleil which as ye haue heard he had builded, whyle hee liued.

Lud Hurdibras the eight Ruler.

RUd or Ludhurdibras the ſonne of Leil began to gouerne in the yeare of the worlde .3046. In the beginning of his raigne, hee ſoughte to appeaſe the debate that was reyſed in hys fathers dayes, and bring the Realme to hir former quietneſſe, and after that hee hadde brought brought it to good ende, he builded the towne of Kaerkyn now called Canterbury: alſo the towne of Caergueint nowe cleped Wincheſter, & Mont Paladour now called Shaftesbury. About the building of which towne of Shaftesbury, Aquila a Prophet of the Brittiſh nation wrote his prophecies, of which ſome fragments remayne yet to be ſeene, tranſlated into the Latine by ſome auntient writers. When this Lud had raigned .xxix. yeeres he dyed, and lefte a ſonne behinde him named Baldud.

Baldud the.9.Ruler.

BAldud the ſonne of Lud Hudibras, begā to rule ouer the Britaynes in the yere of the world.3085. This man was well ſeene in ỹ ſciences of Aſtronomy, and Nigromancy, by which (as the common reporte ſaith) he made the whote bathes in the Citie of Caerbran now called Bath. But William of Malmeſbery is of a contrary opinion, affirming that Julius Ceſar made thoſe bathes, or rather repayred them when he was here in Englande: which is not like to be true: for Julius Ceſar, as by good coniecture we haue to thinke, neuer came ſo farre within the land that way forthe. Both of theſe bathes more ſhall be ſayd in the deſcription. But to proceede. This Baldud toke ſuche pleaſure in artificiall practiſes and magike, that he taught this arte throughout all his Realme. And to ſhew his cunning in other poynts, vpon a preſumptuous pleaſure which he had therein, he toke vpon him to flie in the ayre, but he fell vpon the temple of Apollo, which ſtode in the Citie of Troynouant, and there was torne in peeces after he had ruled the Britaynes by the ſpace of .xx. yeeres.

Leir the.10.Ruler.

LEir the ſon of Baldud, was admitted Ruler ouer the Britaynes, in the yeere of the world. 3105. at what time Joas raigned as yet in Juda. This Leir was a Prince of right noble demeanor, gouerning his land and ſubiects in great wealth.

Hee made the towne of Caerleir nowe called Leiceſter, which ſtandeth vpon ỹ Riuer of Soze.

It is writtē that he had by his wife three daughters without other iſſue, whoſe names were Gonozilla, Regan, and Cordilla, whiche daughters he greatly loued, but ſpecially the yongeſt Cordeilla farre aboue the two elder. When this Leir therefore was come to great yeeres, and beganne to ware vnweldy through age, he thought to vnderſtand the affections of his daughters towards him, and preferre hir whome hee beſt loued, to the ſucceſſion ouer the kingdome: therefore hee firſte aſked Gonozilla the eldeſt, howe well ſhee loued him: the which calling hir Gods to record, proteſted, that ſhe loued him more than hir owne life, which by right and reaſon ſhoulde be moſt deere vnto hir. With whiche anſwer the father beeyng well pleaſed, turned to the ſecond, and demanded of hir how well ſhe loued him: whiche anſwered (confirming hir ſayings with greate othes) that ſhe loued him more than tong could expreſſe, and farre aboue all other creatures of the world. Thē called he his yongeſt daughter Cordeilla before him, and aſked of hir what accompt ſhe made of him: vnto whome ſhe made this anſwer as followeth: Knowing the great loue and fatherly zeale that towards me you haue always borne, (for the whiche I may not anſwere you otherwiſe than I thinke, and as my cōſcience leadeth me) I proteſt vnto you, that I haue loued you euer, and ſhall continually while I liue, loue you as my naturall father, and if you woulde more vnderſtand of the loue that I beare you, aſſertayn your ſelfe, that ſo much as you haue, ſo muche you are worth, and ſo much I loue you, and no more.

Gal.Mon.

A trial of loue.

The anſwere of the yongeſt daughter.

The father being nothing content with this anſwere, married his two eldeſt daughters, the one vnto the Duke of Cornewale named Henninus, and the other vnto the Duke of Albania, called Maglanus: and betwixt them after his death, hee willed and ordeyned that his land ſhould be deuided, and the one halfe thereof immediately ſhould be aſſigned to them in hande: but for the thirde daughter Cordeilla, he reſerued nothing.

The two eldeſt daughters are maried.

The Realme is promiſed to his two daughters.

Yet it fortuned, that one of the Princes of Gallia (which now is called France) whoſe name was Aganippus, hearing of the beautie, womanhode, and good conditions of the ſayd Cordeilla, deſired to haue hir in marriage, and ſente ouer to hir father, requiring that he myghte haue hir to wife: to whome aunſwere was made, that hee mighte haue hys daughter, but for any dower hee coulde haue none, for all was promiſed and aſſured to hir other ſiſters already.

Aganippus notwithſtanding this aunſwere of denyall to receyue any thyng by way of dower with Cordeilla, toke hir to wife, only moued thereto (I ſaye) for reſpecte of hir perſon and amiable vertues. Thys Aganippus was one of the twelue Kyngs that ruled Gallia in thoſe dayes, as in the Brittiſh hiſtorie it is recorded. But to proceede, after that Leir was fallen into age, the two Dukes that had married his two eldeſt daughters, thinking long ere the gouernemente of the land did come to their handes, aroſe againſt him in armour, & reft from him the gouernance of the land, vpō conditions to be cōtinued for tearme of life: by ẏ whiche he was put to his portion, that is, to liue after a rate aſſigned to him for the maintenance of his eſtate, whyche in proces of time was diminiſhed as well by Magbanus, as by Henninus. But the greateſt griefe that Leir toke, was to ſee the vnkindneſſe of his daughters, which ſeemed to thinke that all was too much which their father hadde, the ſame being neuer ſo little: in ſo muche, that going from ẏ one to ẏ other, he was brought to that miſerie, that vnneth would they allow him one ſeruaunt to waite vpon him. In the end ſuch was the vnkindneſſe, or (as I may ſaye) the vnnaturalneſſe which he founde in his two daughters, notwithſtanding their faire & pleaſante wordes vttered in time paſt, that being conſtreyned of neceſſitie, he fled ẏ land, & ſayled into Gallia, there to ſeke ſome comfort of his yōgeſt daughter Cordeilla whom before time he hated. The Lady Cordeill hearing ẏ he was arriued in poze eſtate, ſhe firſt ſēt to him priuily a certayne ſumme of money to apparrell himſelfe withal, & to reteyne a certayn number of ſeruants that mighte attende vpon him in honorable wiſe, as apperteyned to the eſtate whiche he had borne: and then ſo accompanyed, ſhe appointed him to come to ẏ Court, which he did, & was ſo ioyfully, honorably, and louingly receiued, both by his ſon in law Aganippus, & alſo by his daughter Cordeilla, that his hart was greatly comforted: For he was no leſſe honored, than if he hadde bin king of ẏ whole countrey himſelfe. Alſo after ẏ he had enformed his ſon in law & his daughter in what ſort he had bin vſed by his other daughters, Aganippus cauſed a mightie army to be put in a readineſſe, & likewiſe a greate nauie of Ships to bee rigged, to paſſe ouer into Britayne with Leir his father in law, to ſee him againe reſtored to his kingdome. It was accorded, that Cordeilla ſhould alſo goe with him to take poſſeſſion of ẏ land, ẏ whyche he promiſed to leaue vnto hir, as hir rightfull inheritour after his deceſſe, notwithſtanding any former graunte made to hir ſiſters or to their huſbāds in any manner of wiſe. Herevpō, whē this army & nauie of Ships wer ready, Leir & his daughter Cordeilla w̄ hir huſbād toke ẏ ſea, & arriuing in Britaine, fought w̄ their enimies, and diſcomfited them in battaile, in ẏ whiche Maglanus & Henninus were ſlaine: and then was Leir reſtored to his kingdome, which he ruled after this by the ſpace of two yeeres, and then died, fortie yeres after he firſt began to raigne. His body was buried at Leyceſter in a vault vnder ẏ channel of the Riuer of Soze beneath the towne. Ma. vvr

Cordeilla Queene.

Corde la.

COrdeilla ẏ yōgeſt daughter of Leir, was admitted for Q. & ſupreme gouernoure of Britayne, in the yeere of ẏ World. 355. before the building of Rome. 54. Uzias then raigning in Juda, & Jeroboā ouer Iſraell. This Cordeilla after hir fathers deceaſe ruled the lād of Britayne right worthily during the ſpace of fiue yeres, in which meane time hir huſband died, and then about ẏ end of thoſe fiue yeres, hir two Nephewes Margan and Cunedagius ſonnes to hir aforeſaide ſiſters, diſdeigning to be vnder the gouernement of a woman, leuied warre againſt hir, and deſtroyed a great part of the land, and finally toke hir priſoner, and leyd hir faſt in ward, wherwith ſhee toke ſuche griefe, beeing a woman of a manly courage, and deſpayring to recouer libertie, there ſhe ſlew hirſelfe whē ſhe had raigned as before is mencioned the tearme of fiue yeeres.

Cunedag and Margan contende for the gouernement.

Cunedag Margan

CUnedagius & Marganus Nephews to Cordeilla, hauing recouered the land out of hir hands, deuided the ſame betwixt them, that is to wit, the countrey ouer & beyonde Humber fell to Margan as it ſtretcheth euen to Catneſſe, & the other part lying South, and

and by west, was assigned to Cunidagius. This partition chanced in the yeere of the Woꝛld 3170. before the building of Rome. 47. Uzia as yet raigning in Juda, & Jeroboam in Israel. Afterwards, these two cousins, Cunedag and Margã, had not raigned thus past a two yeares, but thorough some seditious persons, Margan was perswaded to reise warre against Cunedag, telling him in his eare, howe it was a shame for him being come of the elder sister, not to haue the rule of the whole Ile in his hande. Herebpon, ouercome with pride, ambition, & couetousnesse, he reised an army, & entring into ẏ land of Cunedag, he brẽned & destroyed ẏ coũtrey before him in miserable maner. Cunedag in all hast to resist his aduersarie, assembled also al ẏ power he could make, & comming with the same against Margan, gaue him battell, in the which he slew a great nũber of Margãs people, and put ẏ residue to flight, and furthermoꝛe pursued him from countrey to coũtrey, till hee came into Cambria, nowe called Wales, where ẏ said Margan gaue him eftsones a new battell: but beeing too weake in number of men, he was there ouercome & slaine in ẏ field, by reason wherof, ẏ countrey toke name of him, being there slaine, and so is called to this day Glau Margã, which is to meane in our English tong, Margans land. This was the end of that Margan, after hee had raigned with his brother two yeres, oꝛ thereabouts.

After the death of Margan, Cunedagius the son of Hẽnius & Ragay (middlemost daughter of Leir, before mentioned) became Ruler of all the whole lãd of Britayne, in ẏ yere of ẏ Woꝛld 3172. before the building of Rome. 45. Uzia still raigning in Juda, and Jeroboam in Israell. He gouerned this Ile wel & honoꝛably foꝛ the tearme of. xxxiij. yeeres: And then dying, his body was buried at Troynouant oꝛ Londõ. Moꝛeouer, our writers do repoꝛte, that hee builded also three tẽples, one to Mars at Perth in Scotland, another to Mercury at Bangoꝛ, and the thirde to Apollo in Coꝛnewall.

Ryuall the. 13. Ruler.

Ryuallon, the son of Cunedeg, began to raign ouer ẏ Britaines, in the yere of the woꝛld 3202. before the building of Rome. 15. Joathan as then beeing King of Juda, and Phacea king of Israel. This Ryuall gouerned the lande in greate wealth and pꝛosperitie. In his time it raigned bloud by the space of three dayes togither. After which raigne ensued such an exceeding nũber and multitude of flies, so noysome and contagious, that muche people died by reason thereof. When he had raigned. 46. yeeres he died, & was buried at Caerbranke nowe called Yoꝛke. In ẏ time of this Ryuals raigne, was the Citie of Rome builded, after the accoꝛdance of most parte of writers. This Gurgustius in ẏ Chꝛonicle of England, is called Eoꝛbodian the sonne of Reignald, he raigned. 37. yeeres: then departing this life, was buried at Caerbranke (nowe called Yoꝛke) by hys father.

Syſillius the. 15. Ruler.

Sysillius, oꝛ after some writers Siluius, the bꝛother of Gurgustius, was chosen to haue the gouernance of Britayne, in the yeere of the woꝛlde. 3287. and after the building of Rome. 71. Manasses still raigning in Juda. This Sisillius in the English Chꝛonicle is named Sezil. He raigned 41. yeeres, and then died, and was buried at Carbadon, nowe called Bath.

Syſillius

Iago the. 16. Ruler.

Iago oꝛ Lago, ẏ cousin of Gurgustius, as next inheritoꝛ to Sisillius, toke vpon hym the gouernemente of Britayne, in the yeere of the woꝛld. 3336. and after ẏ building of Rome. 120. in whose time the Citie of Jerusalem was take by Nabuchodonoꝛ, and the King of Juda, Mathania, otherwise called Zedechias, being slaine. This Iago oꝛ Lago dyed without issue, when hee had raigned eyght and twentie yeeres, and was buried at Yoꝛke.

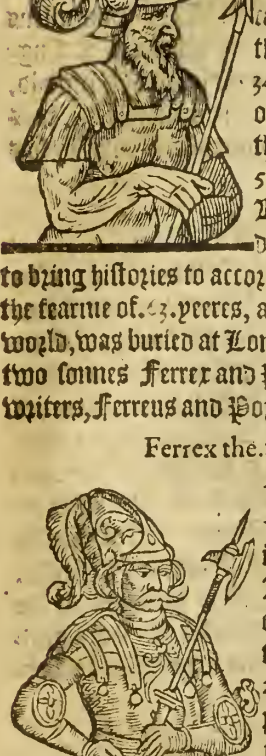
Kinimak the 17. Ruler.

Kinimak.

KInimacus or Kinmarus ẏ ſon of Sicilius as ſome write, or rather ẏ brother of Iago began to gouerne ẏ lād of Britayne, in the yere of the World. 3364. and after the buildyng of Rome. 148. the Jewes as then being in ẏ third yeere of their captiuitie of Babilon. This Kinimachus departed this life, after hee hadde raigned. 54. yeeres, and was buried at Yorke.

Gorbodug the 18. Ruler.



Gorbodug.

GOrbodug the ſonne of Kinimacus begā his raigne ouer the Britaynes, in the yeere after the creation of the world 3418. from the buildyng of ẏ Citie of Rome. 202. the Jewes beeing in the 58. of their captiuitie at Babilon. This Gorbodug by moſt likelyhoode, to bring hiſtories to accord, ſhould raigne aboute the ſearme of. 43. yeeres, and then departing thys world, was buried at London, leauing after hym two ſonnes Ferrex and Porrex, or after ſome writers, Ferreus and Porreus.

Ferrex the. 19. Ruler.

Forrex and Porrex.

FErrex with Porrex his brother, began ioyntly to rule ouer the Britaynes, in the yeere of the World. 3476. after ẏ building of Rome 260. at whiche tyme, the people of Rome forſoke their Citie in theyr Rebellious mode. Theſe two breethren continued for a time in good friendſhip and amitie, till at length, through couetouſneſſe, and deſire of greater dominion, prouoked by flatterers, they fell at variance and diſcord, whereby Ferrex was cōſtreyned to flee into Gallia, and there purchaſed ayde of a great Duke, called Gunhardus or Suardus, and ſo returned into Britayne, thynkyng to preuayle and obteine the dominion of ẏ whole Iland. But his brother Porrex was ready to receyue him with battell after he was landed, in the which battell Ferrex was ſlayne, with the more parte of his people. The Engliſh Chronicle ſayeth, that Porrex was he that fledde into France, and at his returne, was ſlayne, and that Ferrex ſuruiued. But Geffrey of Monmouth, and Policronicon are of a contrary opinion. Mathewe Weſtmonaſteri. writeth, that Porrex deuiſing wayes to kill Ferrex, atchieued his purpoſe and ſlew him. But whether of them ſo euer ſuruiued, the mother of them was ſo highly offended for the deathe of him that was ſlayne, whome ſhee moſt entierly loued, that ſetting aparte al motherly affection, ſhe found meanes to enter the chamber of him that ſuruiued, in the night ſeaſon, and as hee ſlept, ſhe with help of hir maidens ſlew him, and cut him into ſmall peeces, as the writers doe affirme. Suche was the ende of theſe two brethren after they had raigned by the ſpace of foure or fiue yeeres.

After this folowed a troubleous ſeaſon, full of cruell warre, & ſeditious diſcord, whereby in the ende, and for the ſpace of fiftie yeres, the gouernemente of the Iſlande was deuided betwixt fiue Kings or rulers, till Dunwallon of Cornewall ouercame them all. Thus the line of Brute after the affirmance of moſt writers, toke an ende: for after the death of the two forſayde brethren, no rightful inheritor was left aliue to ſucceede them in the Kingdome. The names of theſe fiue Kings are found in certaine olde pedigrees: and although the ſame be muche corrupted in dyuers copies, yet theſe are the moſt agreeableſt.

But of theſe fiue Kings or Dukes, the Engliſh Chronicle alloweth Cloton king of Cornewale for moſt rightfull heire. There appeareth not any time certayne by report of auncient Authors, howe long this variaunce continued amongſt the Britaynes: but as ſome late writers haue geſſed, it ſhould continue for the ſpace of. 51. yeeres, coniecturing ſo much by that which is recorded in Policron: who ſayth, how it did continue euen till the beginning of the raigne of Mulmutius Dunwallo, who began to gouerne from the time that Brute firſt entred Britayne, about the ſpace of ſeuen hundred and three yeeres. Mulmutius the first crowned King of Britayne.

TO proceede therefore to the aforesayde Authors, Mulmucius Dunuallo, or as other haue Dunuallo Mulmucius, the sonne of Cloten, (as testifyeth the English chronicle,) also Geffrey of Monmouth, gote the vpper hand of ye other Dukes or rulers: And after his fathers decesse began his raigne ouer the whole Monarchie of Britayne in ye yeere of the world. 3529. after ye building of Rome. 314. and after the deliuerance of the Israelites out of captiuitie. 97. and about the. 26. yere of Darius Artaxerres Longimanus, the fifth King of the Persias. This Mulmutius Donuallo is named in the English Chronicle Donebant, and proued a right worthy Prince. He builded within ye Citie of London then called Troynouant a Temple, and named it the Temple of peace: the which (as some holde opinion,) I wote not vpon what ground, was ye same which now is called Blackwel halle, where the market for bying and selling of clothes is kept.

He also made many good lawes, the whyche were long after vsed, called Mulmutius lawes, turned out of the Brittish speech into the Latine by Gildas Priscus, and long time after trãslated out of Latine into Englishe by Alfrede Kyng of England, and mingled in his estatutes.

Moreouer, this Mulmutius gaue priuileges to Temples, to ploughes, to Cities, and to high wayes leading to the same, so that whosoeuer fled to them, should be in safegard from bodily harme, and from thence he might depart into what coũtrey he would, without indemnitie of his person. Some authors write, that hee began to make the foure great high wayes of Britayne, the whyche were finished by his sonne Belinus, as after shall be declared.

The Chronicle of Englãd affirmeth, that this Mulmutius whom ye olde booke nameth Molle, builded ye two townes Malmesbery, & the Vies.

After he had established his land, & set his Britons in good & conuenient order, he ordeyned him by ye aduice of his Lords a Crowne of golde, and caused himselfe with great solẽnitie to be Crowned, according to the custome of the Pagan lawes then in vse: and bycause he was the first that bare Crowne heere in Britayne, after the opinion of some writers, he is named the first King of Britayne, and al the other before rehearsed are named Rulers, Dukes, or Gouernors.

Amongst other of his ordinances, he appoynted weightes and measures, with the which men should buy & sell. And further he deuised sore and streight orders for the punishing of theft. Finally, after he had guided the land by the space of foure yeeres, he died, and was buried in the foresayde Temple of peace which he had erected within the citie of Troynouant nowe called London, as before ye haue heard. Appoynting in his life tyme, that his kingdome should be deuided betwixt his two sonnes, Brennus, & Belinus (as some men do coniecture.)

Belinus and Brennus, the sonnes of Mulmutius.

BRennus and Belinus began to raigne ioyntly as Kings in Britaine, in ye yeere of the World. 3574. after the building of ye Citie of Rome. 355. and after the deliuerance of the Israelites out of captiuitie. 142. which was about ye seuenth yere of Artaxerres surnamed Mnemon, the seuẽth K. of the Persians. Belinus held vnder his gouernance Loegria, Wales, & Cornewale: and Brennus all those countreys ouer and beyonde Humber. And with this partition were they contented by the tearme of sixe or seuen yeres, after whyche tyme expired, Brennus coueting to haue more than his portiõ came to, first thought to purchase himselfe ayd in forreine parties, and therefore by the prouocation & counsel of yong vnquiet heads, sailed ouer into Norway, and there married the daughter of Elsing or Elsing, as then Duke or Ruler of that country. Belin offended with his brother, that he shoulde thus withoute his aduice marrie with a stranger, now in his absence sealed al his lands, townes and fortresses into his owne hands, placing garrisons of men of warre where he thought conuenient.

Guithdachus landed in the North.

Beline being then in that countrie, prouidyng for defence againſte his brother, vpon knowledge had of the King of Denmarkes arriuall, cauſed him to be ſtayed. Shortly after, Brenne hauyng recouered and gote togither the moſt parte of hys Shippes, that were diſperſed by the diſcomfiture, and thẽ newly rigged and furniſhed of al thinges neceſſary, ſente worde to his brother Beline, both to reſtore to him his wife wrongfully rauiſhed by Guithdacus, and alſo his lands iniuriouſly by him ſeaſed into his poſſeſſion. Theſe requeſtes being playnely and ſhortly denyed, Brenne made no long delay, but ſpeedily made towards Albania, and landing with his army in a part thereof, encountred with his brother Beline neere vnto a wood named as then Calater, where after cruell fight, and mortall battell betwixt them, at lẽgth the victory abode with the Britons, and the diſcomfiture light ſo on the Norwegians, that the moſt of them were ſlayne, and left dead vpon the groũd. Hereby Brenne being forced to flee, made ſhift, and gote ouer into Gallia, where after hee had ſued to this Prince and that, at lẽgth he was wel receiued of one Seguinus or Seginus Duke of the people called then Allobroges, as Galfrid of Monmoth ſaith, or rather Armorica, whyche now is called Britaine, as Policronicon, and the Engliſhe hiſtorie printed by Caxton, more truely may ſeme to affirme. But Belyne hauing got the vpper hand of his enimies, aſſembling hys counſell at Caerbranke, now called Yorke, toke aduice what he ſhould do with the King of Dẽmarke: where it was ordeyned, that he ſhould bee ſet at libertie, with condition and vnder couenãt, to acknowledge himſelfe by doing homage, to holde his lande of the King of Britaine, and to pay him a yeerely tribute. Theſe couenauntes therefore beeing agreed vnto, and hoſtages taken for aſſurance, he was ſet at libertie, and ſo returned into his countrey. The tribute that he couenãted to pay, was a thouſand pound, as ẏ Engliſh Chronicle ſaith.

Seguinus or Seginus Duke of the Allobroges, nowe the Delphinate or Sauoy.

The Danes tributarie to the Britons.

When Beline had thus expelled his brother, and was alone poſſeſſed of all the land of Britaine, he firſte confirmed the lawes made by hys father: and for ſo much as the foure wayes begun by his father were not brought to perfection, hee therefore cauſed workmen to be called forth and aſſembled, whom he ſet in hand to paue the ſayde wayes with ſtone, for the better paſſage and eaſe of all that ſhould trauell through the countreyes from place to place, as occaſiõ ſhuld require. The firſt of theſe foure wayes is named Foſſe, & ſtretcheth from the South into the North, beginning at ẏ corner of Totneſſe in Cornwaile, & ſo paſſing forth by Deuonſhire, and Somerſetſhire, by Tutbery, on Cotteſwold, & then forwarde beſide Couentrie vnto Leiceſter, & from thence by wilde playnes toward Newarke, & endeth at the Citie of Lincoln. The ſecond way was named Watling ſtreete, the which ſtretcheth ouerthwart the Foſſe, out of the Southeaſt into the Northeaſt, beginning at Douer, and paſſing by the middle of Kent ouer Thames beſide London, by Weſt of Weſtminſter as ſome haue thought, & ſo forth by S. Albanes, & by ẏ Weſt ſide of Dunſtable, Stratford, Toueſter, and Wedon by ſouth of Lilleborne, by Atherſton, Gilberts hill, that nowe is called the Wreken, and ſo forth by Seuerne, paſſing beſide Worceſter, vnto Stratton to the middle of Wales, and ſo vnto a place called Cardigan, at the Iriſh ſea.

The thirde waye was named Ermingſtreete, the which ſtretched out of the weſt northweſt, vnto the eaſt ſoutheaſt, and begynneth at Menenia, the which is in Saint Dauids lande in weſt Wales, and ſo vnto Southampton.

The fourth and laſt way hight Hikenelſtreete, which leadeth by Worceſter, Winchcomb, Birmingham, Lichfield, Darby, Cheſterfielde, and by Yorke, and ſo forth vnto Tinmouth.

And after he had cauſed theſe wayes to be wel and ſufficiently reyſed and made, hee confirmed vnto them all ſuche priuileges as were graunted by his father.

In this meane tyme that Belin was thus occupied about the neceſſarie affayres of his realm and kingdome, his brother Brenne that was fled into Gallia onely with. xij. perſons, becauſe hee was a goodly Gentleman, and ſeemed to vnderſtande what apperteyned to honour, grew ſhortly into fauor with Seginus the Duke afore mentioned, and declaring vnto him his aduerſitie, and the whole circumſtaunce of his miſhap, at length was ſo highly cheriſhed of the ſayde Seginus, deliting in ſuch worthie qualities as he ſaw in him dayly appearing, that he gaue to him his daughter in maryage, with condition, that if he dyed without iſſue Male, then ſhoulde he inherite his eſtate and Dukedome: and if it happened him to leaue any heyre Male behinde him, then ſhoulde he yet helpe him to recouer his lande and dominion in Brytaine, bereft frō him by his brother.

These conditions well and ſurely vppon the Dukes part by the aſſent of the Nobles of his lande concluded, ratified, and aſſured, the ſayde Duke within the ſpace of one yeare after dyed. And then after a certaine time it beeing knowne that the Duches was not with childe, all the Lords of that Countrey did homage vnto Brennus, receyuing him as their Lorde and ſupreme gouernour, vpon whome he likewiſe for his part in recompence of their curteſie, beſtowed a great portion of his treaſure.

Shortly after alſo, with their aſſent he gathered an army, and with the ſame eſtſoones came ouer into Brytayne, to make new warre vpon his brother Belyne. Of whoſe landing when Belin was informed, he aſſembled his people and made himſelfe readie to meete him, but as they were at poynt to haue ioyned battell, by the interceſſiō of their mother that came betwixt them, and demeaned hirſelfe in all motherly order, and moſte loning maner towardes them both, they fell to an agreement, and were made friendes or euer they parted aſunder.

After this they repayred to London, and there taking aduice togyther with their Peeres and Counſellors, for the good order and quieting of the lande, at lengthy they accorded to paſſe wyth both their armies into Gallia to ſubdue that whole Countrey, and ſo following this determination, they toke ſhipping and ſayled ouer into Gallia, where beginning the warre with fire and ſword, they wrought ſuch mayſteries, that within a ſhort time (as ſayth Geffrey of Monmouth) they conquered a great part of Gallia, Italy, and Germanie, and brought it to their ſubiection. In the ende they toke Rome by this occaſion (as writers report, if theſe be the ſame that had the leading of thoſe Galli, which in this ſeaſon did ſo much hurt in Italy and other parts of the world.

They inuade Gallia and Italie.

After they had paſſed the mountaynes, & were entred into Tuſkaine, they beſieged the Citie of Cluſium, the Citizens whereof beeing in greate daunger, ſent to Rome for ayde agaynſt theyr enimies. Whereupon the Romaines conſidering with themſelues, that although they were not in any league of ſocietie with the Cluſians, yet if they were ouercome, the daūger of the next brunt were like to be theirs: with all ſpeed they ſent ambaſſadours to intreate betwixte the parties for ſome peace to be had.

Now Chiuſi.

Ambaſſadors ſent from Rome.

They that were ſent, required the Captaynes of the Gaulles in name of the Senate and Citizens of Rome, not to moleſt the friendes of the Romaines: Whereunto anſwere was made by Brennus, that for his part he could be content to haue peace, if it were ſo that the Cluſians would be agreeable that the Gaulles might haue part of theyr Countrey, which they held being more than they did alreadie well occupie, for otherwiſe (ſayd he) there could be no peace graunted.

Brennus anſwere.

The Romaine Ambaſſadors being offended with theſe wordes, demaunded what the Gaules had to do in Tuſkain. By reaſon of which and other the like ouerthwart wordes, the parties began to kindle in diſpleaſure ſo farre, ẏ their cōmunication brake of, and ſo they from treating fell againe to trie the matter by dynt of ſworde.

The treatie of peace breaketh off.

The Romaine Ambaſſadors alſo to ſhewe of what prowes the Romaines were, contrarie to the law of Nations, ẏ forbiddeth ſuch as come in Ambaſſade about any treatie of peace, to take either one part or other, took weapon in hand & ioyned themſelues with the Cluſians, wherewith the Gaulles were ſo muche diſpleaſed, that incontinently with one voyce, they requyred to haue the ſiege rayſed from Cluſium, that they might go to Rome. But Brennus thought good firſt to ſend Meſſengers thither, to require the deliuerie of ſuch as had broken the lawe, that punishment might be done on them accordingly as they had deserued. This was done, and knowledge brought againe, that the Ambassadors were not onely not punished, but also chosen to be Tribunes for the next yeare.

The Gaulles then became in such a rage (because they saw there was nothing to be looked for at the handes of the Romaines, but warre, ininrious wrongs, and deceytfull traynes) that they turned all their force against them, marching streight towards Rome, and by the way destroying all that stode before them. The Gaules make towards Rome.

The Romaines aduertised thereof, assembled themselues togither to the number of .xl. M. and encountring with Beline and Brenne, neare to the riuer Allia, about .xj. miles on this side Rome, were slaine and quite discomfited. The Romaines encountring with the Gaules are ouerthrowne.

The Galles could vneth beleeue that they had got the victorie with so small resistence: but whē they perceyued that the Romaines were wholy ouerthrowne, and that the field was clerely rid of them, they got togither the spoyle, and made towards Rome it selfe, where such feare and terror was stryken into the hearts of the people, that all men were in dispayre to defende the Citie: and therefore the Senate with all the warrelike youth of the Citizens got them into the Capitoll, which they furnished with vitayles and all things necessarie for the maintenance of the same against a long siege. The honourable fathers and all the multitude of other people not apt for warres, remayned still in the Citie, as it were to perish with their Countrey, if happe so befell.

The Romains in despayre withdraw into the Capitoll.

The Gaules enter into Rome.

In the meane time came the Gaulles to the Citie, and entring by the gate Collina, they passe forth the right way vnto the Market place, marueyling to see the houses of the power sort to bee shut against them, and those of the ryther to remaine wide open, wherefore being doubtfull of some deceytfull traynes, they were not ouer rashe to enter the same, but after they had espied the ancient fathers sit in theyr Chayres apparelled in theyr riche Robes, as if they had beene in the Senate, they reuerenced them as Gods, so honorable was their port, grauenesse in countnaunce, and shew of apparell.

The reuerend aspect of the Senators.

Marcus Papyrius.

In the meane time it chaunced, that Marcus Papyrius stroke one of the Gaulles on the heade with his staffe, because he presumed to stroke his beard: with whiche iniurie the Gaulle being prouoked, slue Papyrius (as he sate) with his sworde, and therewith the slaughter being begun with one, all the residue of those auncient fatherly men as they sat in theyr Chayres were slaine and cruelly murthered.

After this all the people founde in the Citie without respect or difference at al, were put to the sworde, and the houses sacked. And thus was Rome taken by the two brethren, Beline, and Brenne, 365. yeares after the first building therof. Rome sacked. 365

After this, the Gaulles attempted in the night season to haue entred the Capitoll: and in deede ordered their enterprise so secretely, that they had atchieued their purpose, if a sort of Ganders had not with their crie and noyse disclosed them, in wakening the Romaines that were asleepe: and so by that meanes were the Gaulles beaten backe and repulsed. The Capitoll defended.

The Romaines being thus put to their extreme shift, deuised among themselues howe to reuoke Furius Camillus from exile, whome not long before they had vniustly banished out of the Citie. In the ende they did not onely sende for him home, but also created him Dictator, committing into his handes (so long as his office lasted) an absolute power ouer all men, both of life and death. Camillus reuoked out of exile.

Camillus forgetful of the iniurie done to him, and mindful of his dutie towards his Countrey, and and lamenting the ſtate thereof, without delay gathereth ſuche an armie as the preſent time permitted.

In the meane time thoſe that kept the Capitoll (being almoſt famiſhed for lacke of vitayles) compounded with Brenne and Beline, that for the ſumme of a thouſand pounde weight in gold, the Romaines ſhould redeeme theyr liberties: and the ſayd Brenne and Beline to depart with their armie out of the Citie and all the territories of Rome. But at the deliuerie of the money, and by a certaine kinde of happe, the Romaines name was preſerued at that time from ſuche diſhonour and ignominie as was likely to haue inſued. For ſome of the couetous ſort of the Gaulles, not cõtented with the iuſt weight of the golde, did caſt their ſwordes alſo into the Ballance where the weightes lay, thereby to haue ouer weight: wherupon the Romains refuſed to make payment after that weight.

And thus whileſt they were in altercation about this matter, the one importunate to haue, the other not willing to graunt, the time paſſed, till in the meane ſeaſon Camillus commeth in amongeſt them with his power, commaunding that the gold ſhould be had away, and affyrming that without conſent of the Dictator, no compoſition or agreement might bee concluded by the meaner Magiſtrate. He giueth a ſigne to the Gaulles to prepare themſelues to battaile, whereunto they lightly agreed, and togither they went. The battaile being once begon, the Gaulles that loked earſt for golde, and not for battaile, were eaſily ouercome, ſuch as ſtode to the brunt were ſlaine, and the reſt by flight conſtrayned to depart the Citie.

Polybius wryteth, that the Gaulles were turned from the ſiege of the Citie, through warres which chaunced amongeſt their owne people at home, and therefore they concluded a peace wyth the Romaines, and leauing them in libertie returned home againe.

But howſoeuer the matter paſſed, thus muche haue we ſtept from our purpoſe, to ſhewe ſomewhat of that noble and moſt famous Captayne Brennus, the which as not onely our Hyſtories, but alſo as Giouan Villani the Florentine doth report, was a Brytain, and brother to Beline (as before is mentioned) although I know that many other writers are not of that mind, affyrming him to be a Gaul, and likewiſe that after this preſent time of the taking of Rome by this Brennus 110. yeares, or there aboutes, there was another Brennus a Gaull alſo by Nation (ſay they) vnder whoſe conduct an other armie of the Gaulles inuaded Greeia, whiche Brennus had a brother that hight Belgius, although Humfrey Lhuyd, and ſir Johan Price doe flatly denie the ſame, by reaſon of ſome diſcordance in writers, and namely in the computation of the yeares ſet downe by thẽ that haue recorded the doings of thoſe times, whereof the erroꝛ is growen. Howbeit I doubt not but that the truth of this matter ſhall be more fully ſifted out in time by the learned and ſtudious of ſuch antiquities.

But now to our purpoſe. This is alſo to bee noted, ẏ where our Hiſtoriers make mention, that Beline was abrode with Brennus in the moſte part of his victories, both in Gallia, Germany, & Italy, Titus Liuius ſpeaketh but only of Brennus: wherevpon ſome write, that after the two brethren were by their mothers intreatance made friendes, Brennus onely went ouer into Gallia, and there through proufe of his worthie prowes, attayned to ſuch eſtimation amongeſt the people called Galli Senones, that he was choſen to be their generall Captaine at theyr going ouer the mountaynes into Italie. But whether Beline went ouer with his brother, and finally returned backe againe leauing Brennus behinde him, as ſome write, or that he went not at all, but remayned ſtill at home whileſt his brother was abrode, wee can affyrme no certaintie. Tit. Liu. Polidor. Matthew

The truth is, that the moſte part of all oure writers make report of many worthie deedes accompliſhed by Beline, in repayring of Cities decayed, and erecting of other newe buyldings, to the adorning and beautifying of his Realme and kingdome.

And amongeſt other workes which were by him erected, he buylded a Citie in the ſouth parte of Wales, neare to the place where the riuer Vſke falleth into Seuerne, faſt by Glaumorgan, which citie hight Cairlleon, or Cairllegion ar Wiſke. Polichr. Gal. M. Cairlleon ar Wiske buylt by Belin.

This Cairllegion was the principall Citie in tyme paſt of all Demetia, nowe called Southwales. Many notable monumentes are remayning there till this day, teſtifying the great magnificence and royall buyldings of that Citie in olde tyme.

There were in the ſame Citie alſo ſithe the time of Chriſt three Churches, one of Saint Julius the Martyr, an other of Saint Aron, and the third was the mother Church of all Demetia, and the chiefe Sea: but after the ſame ſea was tranſlated vnto Menenia, (that is to ſay) Saint Dauid in Weſt wales.

In this Cairlleon was Amphibulus borne that taught and inſtructed Saint Alben.

Alſo this Beline buylded an hauen, with a gate ouer the ſame, within the Citie of Troynouant, or London, in the ſummet whereof afterwards was ſet a veſſell of Braſſe, in the whiche were put the aſhes of his bodie, which bodie after his deceaſſe was burnt, as the maner of burying in thoſe dayes did require. Fabian.

This

Iohn Leyland. This gate was long after called Bellinus gate, and at length by corruption of language Bellings gate.

He buylded also a Castell Eastwarde from this gate (as some haue written) whiche was long tyme after likewyse called Bellyns Castell, and is the same whiche nowe wee call the Tower of London.

The tower of London built by Beline.

Thus Beline studying dayly to beautifie this lande with goodly buyldings and famous workes, at lengthy departed this lyfe, after he had raigned with his brother and alone, the space of.xxvj. yeare.

Gurguint.

Gurguint.

GUrguyntus ẏ son of Beline, began to raigne ouer the Brytayns, in the yeare of the Worlde, 1596. after the building of Rome. 380. after ẏ deliuerãce of the Israelites oute of captiuitie. 164. complete, which was aboute the. xxxiij. yeare of Artaxerxes Mnenon, surnamed Magnus, the. vij. king of the Persians.

This Gurguint, in the English Chronicle is named Cozinbyatus, and by Math. Westmon. he is surnamed Barbiruc, the which bycause the trybute graunted by Guythdag King of Denmarke in perpetuitie vnto the Kings of Brytaine was denyed, hee sayled with a mightie nauie and armie of men into Denmarke, where hee made suche warre with fyre and swoorde, that the King of Denmarke with the assent of hys Barons was constrayned to graunt estsones to continue the payment of the aforesayde trybute.

Barbiruc Ma. West. Gal. M.

Gurguint cõstrayned the Danes by force to pay their tribute.

After hee had thus atchieued hys desyre in Denmarke, as he returned back toward Brytain againe, he encountred with a Naule of.xxx. shippes beside the Iles of Orkeney.

These Shippes were fraught with men and women, and had to theyr Captayne one called Bartholoin or Partholin. The which beeyng brought to the presence of King Gurguint, declared that hee with hys people were banished oute of Spayne, and were named Balences or Basclenses, and had sayled long on the Sea, to the ende to synde some Prince that woulde assigne to them a place of habitation, vnto whom they would become subiects, and hold of him as of theyr soueraigne gouernour.

Therefore hee besought the King to consider theyr estate, and of his greate benignitie, to appoynte some voyde quarter where they might inhabite.

The King with the aduice of hys Barons, graunted to them the Ile of Irelande, whiche as then (by report of some Authours) lay wast and without habitation.

But it shoulde appeare by other writers, that it was inhabyted long before those dayes, by the people called Hiberuenses, of Hiberus theyr Captayne that brought them also out of Spaine.

Polichron

After that Gurguintus was returned into hys Countrey, hee ordeyned that the lawes made by his auncestours, shoulde be duely kept and obserued.

And thus administring iustice to hys subiectes for the tearme of.xix. yeares, he finally departed this lyfe, and was buried at London, or as some haue, at Cairleon.

In hys dayes was the Towne of Cambridge with the Uniuersitie fyrst founded by Cantaber, brother to the aforesayde Bartholoin (according to some writers) as after shall appeare.

Caims.

Guintolinus.

Guintolinus

GUyntolinus, or Guintellius ẏ sonne of Gurguintus, was admitted king of Brytayne, in the yeare of the worlde. 3614 after the buylding of the citie of Rome. 399. and seconde yeare of the. 106. Olympiade.

This Guintoline was a prudent Prince, graue in counsell, and sober in behauiour. He had also a wife named Martia, a woman of passing beautie, and wisedome incomparable, as by hir prudent gouernment and equall administration of iustice after hir husbandes decease, during hir sonnes minoritie, it most manifestly appeared.

It is thought that in an happy time this Guintoline came to the gouernance of this kingdome, being shaken and brought out of order with ciuill dissentions, to the ende he might reduce it to the former estate, which he earnestly accomplished: for hauing once got the place, hee studyed with great diligence to reforme of newe, and to adorne with iustice, lawes, and good orders, the Brytish common wealth, by other Kings not so framed as stoode with the quietnesse thereof. But afore all things hee vtterly removed and appeased suche ciuyll discorde, as seemed yet to remaine after the maner of a remnant of thoſe ſeditious factions and partakings, which had ſo long time raigned in this lande. But as he was buſie in hande herewith, death toke him out of this life, after he had raigned. xxbij. yeares, and then was he buried at London.

Sicilius.

SIcilius the ſonne of Guintoline, being not paſt ſeuen yeres of age when his father dyed, was admitted king, in the yeare. 3650. after the buylding of Rome. 430. and after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites out of captiuitie. 218. and in the firſt after the death of Alexander.

By reaſon that Sicilius was not of age ſufficient of himſelfe to guide the kingdome of the Bzytaynes, his mother that worthie Ladie called Martia, had the gouernance both of his realm and perſon committed to hir charge.

She was a woman expert and ſkilful in diuerſe ſciences, but chiefely beeing admitted to the gouernance of the realme, ſhe ſtudied to preſerue the common wealth in good quiet and wholſome order, and therefore deuiſed & eſtabliſhed profitable & conueniente lawes the which after were called Martian lawes, of hir name that fyrſt made them.

Theſe lawes, as thoſe that were thought good and neceſſarie for the preſeruation of the common wealth, Alfred, or Alured, that was long after king of England, tranſlated alſo out of the Bzytiſhe tongue, into the Engliſh Saxon ſpeeche, and then were they called after that tranſlation Marchenelaghe, that is to meane, the lawes of Martia.

To conclude, this worthie woman guided the lande during the minozitie of hir ſonne right politiquely, and highly to hir perpetuall renowme and commendation. And when hir ſonne came to lawfull age, ſhe deliuered vp the gouernaunce into his handes.

How long he raigned wryters varie, ſome auouche but ſeuen yeares, though other affyrme xb. whiche agreeth not ſo well with the accozde of other Hyſtozies and tymes. He was buried at London.

Kimarus.

KImarus the ſonne of Sicilius, began to raign ouer the Bzytaynes, in the yeare of the worlde 3657. and after the buylding of Rome. 442. and in the firſt yeare of the. 117. Olympiade.

This Kimarus being a wild yong man, and giuen to follow his luſtes and pleaſure, was ſlain by ſome that were his enimies, as he was abzode in hunting, when hee had raigned ſcarcely three yeares.

Elanius.

ELanius ỹ ſon of Kimarus, or as other haue, his brother, began to rule the Bzytaines in the yere after the creation of ỹ worlde. 3661. after the building of Rome. 445. after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites. 229. and in the fourth yere of the Seleuciens, after which account the bookes of Machabees doe recken, which beganne in the xiiij. after the death of Alexander. Elanius Mat. VVeſt.

This Elanius in the Engliſhe Chronicle is named alſo Haran, by Mat. VVeſtm. Danius, and by an olde Chronicle which Fabian muche followed, Elanius: and Kimarus ſhoulde ſeeme to be one perſon: but other holde the contrarie, and ſay that he raigned fully. biij. yeares.

Morinde.

MOrindus the Baſtard ſonne of Elanius, was admitted king of Bzytayne, in the yeare of the worlde 3667. after the buylding of Rome. 451. after the deliueraunce of the Iſraelites. 236. and in the tenth yeare of Caſſander K. of Macedonia, which hauing diſpatched Olympias the mother of Alexander the great, and gotten Roxanes with Alexanders ſonne into his handes, vſurped the kingdome of the Macedonians, and helde it. xb. yeares. Morind.

This Morindus in the Engliſhe Chronicle is called Morwith, and was a man of worthie fame in chiualrie and Martial doings, but ſo cruell withall, that his vnmercifull nature could vneth be ſatisfied with the torments of them that had offended him, although oftentymes with his own handes he cruelly put them to torture and execution. He was alſo beautifull and comely of perſonage, liberall and bountrous, and of a merueilous ſtrength.

In his dayes, a certaine king of the people called Moziani, with a great army landed in Mozthumberlande, and beganne to make cruell warre vpon the inhabitantes. But Morind aduertiſed hereof, aſſembled his Bzytaines, came againſt the enimies, and in battaile put them to flight, and chaſing them to theyr ſhippes, toke a great number G. Mon.

ber of them priſoners, whom to the ſatiſfying of his cruell nature he cauſed to be ſlaine euen in his preſence. Some of them were headed, ſome ſtrangled, ſome panched, and ſome he cauſed to be ſlain quicke.

The like may be thought of thoſe Murreys or Moraians of whom. H. B. ſpeaketh. Fabian.

Theſe people who Gal. Mon. nameth Morriani, I take to bee eyther thoſe that inhabited about Terrouane and Calice called Morini, or ſome other people of the Gaulles or Germaines, and not as ſome eſteeme them, Moraianes, or Merhenners, whiche were not knowne to the world (as Humfrey Lhuid hath verie well noted) tyll about the dayes of the Emperour Mauritius, which miſcõſtruction of names hath brought the Britiſhe Hyſtorie further out of credite than reaſon requyreth, if the circumſtaunces be duely conſidered.

But now to ende with Morindus. At length this bloudie Prince heard of a Monſter that was come a lande out of the Iriſh ſea, with the which when he woulde needes fight, he was of the ſame deuoured, after he had raigned the terme of. viij. yeares, leauing behinde him fiue ſonnes, Gorbomannus, Archigallo, Elidurus, Vigenius, or Nigenius, and Peredurus.

Gorbonian.

Gorbomen, or Gorbonian.

Gorbonianus ỳ firſt ſonne of Morindus, ſucceeded hys father in the Kingdome of Britayne, in the yeare of the world. 3676. after the buylding of Rome. 46. and fourth yeare of the. 121. Olympiade.

A righteous and religious Prince.

This Gorbonianus in the Engliſhe Chronicle is named Granbodian, and was a righteous Prince in his gouernment, and very deuout (according to ſuch deuotion as he had) towardes the aduaunceing of the religion of his Gods: and therupon he repayred all the olde Temples throughe his kingdome, and erected ſome of newe.

He buylded alſo the townes of Cambridge, and Grantham (as Carton writeth) and was beloued both of the rich and poore, for he honored the rich, and relieued the poore in time of their neceſſities.

In his time alſo was more plentie of al things neceſſarie for the wealthfull ſtate of man, than had beene before in any of his predeceſſors dayes.

He dyed without iſſue, after hee had raigned (by the accorde of moſt writers) about the terme of ten yeares.

There be that write, that this Gorbonian built the townes of Cairgrant, now called Cãbridge, and alſo Grantham, but ſome thinke that thoſe which haue ſo written are deceyued, in miſtaking the name, for that Cãbridge was at the firſt called Granta: and by that meanes it might bee that Gorbonian built onely Grantham, and not Cãbrige, namely, bicauſe other write how that Cãbridge (as before is ſaid) was built in the dayes of Gurgũtius the ſonne of Beline, by one Cantaber a Spaniard, brother to Partholoin, which Partholoin by the aduice of the ſame Gurgũtius, got ſeates for himſelfe and his companie in Ireland, (as before ye haue heard.) Cambridge by whom was built.

The ſayd Cantaber alſo obteyning licence of Gurguntius, buylded a town vpon the ſide of the ryuer called Canta, which he cloſed with walles, and fortified with a ſtrong tower or Caſtell, and after procuring Philoſophers to come hither from Athens (where in his youth he had bene a ſtudent) he placed them there, and ſo euen then was that place furniſhed (as they ſay) with learned men, and ſuch as were redie to inſtruct others in knowledge of letters & Philoſophicall doctrine. But by whõ or in what time ſoeuer it was built, certaine it is that there was a Citie or towne walled in that place before the cõming of the Saxons, called by the Britaynes Cairgraunt, and by the Saxons Grantcheſter.

This towne fell ſo in ruyne by the inuaſion of the Saxons, that at length it was in maner left deſolate, and at this day remayneth as a village. But neare thereunto vnder the Saxon kings, an other towne was buylt, now called Cambridge, where by the fauor of K. Sigebert & Felix a Burgunian, that was Biſhop of Dunwich, a ſchole was erected, as in place cõuenient it ſhal appeare.

Archigallo.

Archigallo

Archigallo, the ſeconde ſonne of Morindus, & brother vnto Gorbonianus, was admitted King of Britayn, in the yeare. 3686. after the buylding of the citie of Rome. 470. after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites out of captiuitie. 355. and in the firſt yeare of Soſthenes king of Macedonia.

He is giuen nouriſhed ſention.

This Archigallo (in the Engliſh Chronicle called Artogaill,) followed not the ſteppes of hys brother, but giuing himſelfe to diſſention & ſtrife, ymagined cauſes againſt his Nobles, that hee might diſplace them, & ſet ſuch in their rowmthes as were men of baſe byrth and of euill cõditions.

Alſo

Alſo he ſought by vnlawfull meanes to bereaue his wealthie ſubiects of their goods and riches, ſo to enrich himſelfe and impouerith his people. For the which his inordinate doings, his Nobles conſpired againſt him, and finally depriued him of all his honor & kingly dignitie, after he had raigned about the ſpace of one yeare.

Elidure.

ELidurus ỹ third ſonne of Morindus, & brother to Archigallo, was by one aſſente of the Brytaynes choſen to raigne ouer them in hys brothers ſtead, after the creation of the worlde. 3687. and after the buylding of the Citie of Rome. 471. after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites, and in the firſt yeare of Oſthenes king of Macedonia.

This Elidurus in the Engliſh Chronicle named Hilder, or Elodor, proued a moſt righteous Prince, and doubting leaſt he ſhould do otherwiſe than became him, if hee did not take care for his brother Archigallos eſtate. A man might wonder what diligence he ſhewed in trauelyng with the Nobles of the Realme to haue his brother reſtored to the Crowne againe.

And as it chaunced one day (being abrode on hunting in the Wood called Calater) neare vnto Yorke, he found his brother Archigallo wandring there in the thickeſt of that wildernelſe, whom in moſt louing maner he ſecretly conueyed home to his houſe, being as then in the Citie of Aloud, otherwiſe called Acliud.

Shortly after he feyned himſelfe ſicke, and in al haſt ſent Meſſengers about to aſſemble his barons, who being come at the day appoynted, hee called them one after another into his priuie chãber, & there hãdled thẽ in ſuch effectuous ſort with wiſe and diſcrete wordes, that hee got their good willes to further him to their powers for the reducing of the kingdome eftſoones into the handes of his brother Archigallo.

And after this he aſſembled a counſel at Yorke, where he ſo vſed the matter with the commons, that in concluſion, when the ſayd Elidurus had gouerned the land well and honourably the ſpace of three yeres, he reſigned wholy his Crowne and kingly title vnto his ſaid brother Archigallo, who was receyued of the Brytaynes againe as King, by mediation of his brother in maner as afore is ſayde. A rare example of brotherly loue, if a man ſhall reuolue in his mind what an inordinate deſire remayneth amongeſt mortall men to atteyne to the ſupreme ſouraintie of ruling, and to keepe the ſame when they once haue it in poſſeſſion. For this greate good will and brotherly loue by hym ſhewed thus towards his brother, he was ſurnamed the godly or vertuous.

WHen Archigallo was thus reſtored to the kingdome, and hauing learned by due correction that he muſt turne the leafe, and take out a new leſſon, by chãging his former trade of liuing into better, if he would raigne in ſurtie: he became a new man, bring himſelfe vprightly in the adminiſtration of iuſtice, & behauing himſelfe ſo worthily in all his doings, both towards the Nobles and commons of his realme, that he was both beloued and dread of all his ſubiects. And ſo continuing the whole terme of his life, finally departed this worlde now after he had raigned this ſecond time the ſpace of tenne yeares, and was buryed at Yorke.

ELidurus brother to this Archigallo, was then Mat. VVeſt.
again admitted king by conſent of al the Britaynes. 3700. of the worlde. But his two yonger brethren, Vigenius and Peredurus, enuying the happie ſtate of this worthie Prince, ſo highly for his vertue and good gouernaunce eſteemed of the Brytaynes, of a grounded malice conſpired againſt him, and aſſembling an armie, leuied war againſt him, and in a pight field toke him priſoner, and put him in the Tower of London, there to be kept ſafely as a priſoner, after he had raigned now this laſt time the ſpace of one yeare.

Brother againſt brother.

Elidure committed to priſon.

Vigenius and Peredurus.

VIgenius & Peridurus, Vigenius and Peredurus. ỹ yõgeſt ſonns of Morindus, and brethren to Elidurus, beganne to raign iointly as kings of Brytayne, in the yeare of the worlde. 3701. after the buylding of Rome. 485. after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites. 266. complete, and in the xij. yere of Antigonus Gonatas, the ſonne of Demetrius king of the Macedonians.

These two brethren in the Engliſh Chronicle are named Higanius, and Petitur, the which (as teſtifieth, Gal. Mon.) deuided the realme betwixt them, ſo that all the lande from Humber weſtward, fell to Vigenius, or Higanius, the other part beyõd Hũber northward Peridure held. But other affirm, ỹ Peredurus only raigned & held his brother Elidurus in priſon by his owne conſent, forſomuch as he was not willing to gouerne.

Brytayne deuided into two realmes.

But

But Gal. Mon. sayth, that Vigenius dyed after he had raigned .vij. yeares, and then Peridurus sealed all the land into his owne rule, and gouerned it with such sobrietie and wisedome, that he was praysed aboue all his brethren, so that Elidurus was quite forgotten of the Brytaynes. But other write, that he was a verie tyrant, and bled himselfe right cruelly towardes the Lordes of his lande, wherevpon they rebelled and slue him. But whether by violent hand, or by naturall sickneſſe, he finally departed this life, after the consent of most writers, when hee had raigned viij. yeares, leauing no issue behinde him to succeede in the gouernaunce of the kingdome. Hee buylded the towne of Pykering, where his bodie was buried.

Elidurus the thirde time.

ELidurus then as sone as his brother Peridurus was dead, for as muche as hee was nexte heyre to the crowne, was deliuered out of prysen, and now the thirde tyme admitted king of Brytayne, who bled himselfe (as before) very orderly in ministring to all persons right and iustice all the dayes of his life, and lastly beeing growne to great age dyed, when he had raigned nowe thys thirde tyme, (after most concordance of writers) the tearme of foure yeares: and was buryed at Carleill.

He is buried at Carleil.

HEre is to be noted, that euen from the beginning of the Brytish kings, whiche raigned here in this lande, there is great diuersitie amongst writers, both touching the names, and also the tymes of theyr raignes, specially till they come to the death of the last mentioned king Elidurus. Insomuch that Polydor Vergile in his Hystorie of England, finding a manifest error (as he taketh it) in those writers whom he followeth touching the account, from the comming of Brute, vnto the sacking of Rome by Brennus, whome our hystories affyrme to be the brother of Beline, that to fill vp the number whiche is wanting in the reckening of the yeares of those Kings which raigned after Brute, tyll the dayes of the same Brenne and Beline, he thought good to chaunge the order, least one error should follow an other, and so of one error making many, he hath placed those kings whiche after other writers shoulde seeme to followe Brenne and Beline, betwixte Dunuallo and Mulmutius, father to the sayde Beline and Brenne, and those fiue kings whiche strouе for the gouernment after the decease of the two brethren, Ferrex, and Porrex, putting Guintoline to succeede after the fiue kings or rulers, and after Guintoline his wife Martia during the minoritie of hir sonne, then hir sayde sonne named Sicilius. After him these whose names follow in order, Chintarius, Danius, Mozuidius, Coybonianus, Archigallo, who beeing deposed, Elidurus was made king, and so continued till he restored the gouernment (as ye haue heard) to Archigallo againe, and after his death Elidurus was eftsones admitted, and within a while againe deposed by Vigenius & Peridurus, & after theyr decеasses, the thirde time restored. Then after his decease, followed successiuely Reginus, Morganus, Ennanus, Idouallo, Rimo, Gerruntius, Catellus, Coillus, Porrex the second of that name, Cherinus, Fulgetius, Eldalus, Androgeus, Urianus, and Eliud, after whom should follow Dunallo Molmutius, as in his proper place, if the order of things done, and the course of tyme should be obserued, as Polidore gathereth by the account of yeares attributed to those kings that raigned before and after Dunuallo, according to those Authours whom (as I sayde) he followeth, if they will that Brennus which led the Gaules to Rome, be the same that was sonne to the sayd Dunuallo Molmutius, and brother to Beline.

Polidor.

But sithe other haue in better order brought out a perfite agreement in the account of yeares and succession of those kings, which raigned and gouerned here in this lande before the sacking of Rome, and also another suche as it is after the same, and before the Romaines had anye perfite knowledge thereof, we haue thought good to follow them therein, leauing to euery man his libertie to iudge as his knowledge shall serue him in a thing so doubtfull and vncertaine, by reason of variaunce amongest the auncient writers in that behalfe.

The diuersitie of wryters in the account of yeares.

And euen as there is great difference in writers since Gurguntius, till the death of Elidurus, so is there as great or rather greater after his decease, specially till king Lud attayned the kingdome. But as may be gathered by that whiche Fabian and other whom he followeth doe write, there passed aboue .185. yeares, betwixt the laste yere of Elidurus, and the beginning of king Lud his raigne, in the which time there raigned .xxxij. or .xxxiij. kings, as some writers haue mẽtioned, whose names (as Gal. Mon. hath recorded) are these: Regny the sonne of Gorbolyan or Gorbonian, a worthie Prince, both iustly and mercifully gouerned his people. Then Margan the sonne of Archigallo a noble Prince likewise, and guiding his subiects in good quiet. Emerian brother to the same Margan, but farre vnlike to him in maners, so that he was deposed in the first yere of his raigne. Pdwallo sonne to Vigenius. Rimo the sonne of Peridurus. Gerruntius the sonne of Elidurus. Then Catell that was buried at Winchester. Coill that was buried at Notingham. Porrex a vertuous and most gentle prince. Cherinus a Drunkerd. Then Fulginius, Eldad, and Androgius: these three were sonnes to Cherinus, and raigned successiuely one after another.

Fabian

After

After them a ſonne of Androgeus. Then Eliud, Dedaicus, Clotinius, Gurguntius, Merianus, Bledius, Cop, Owen, Sicilius, Blegabredus an excellēt Muſitiā. After him his brother Archemail. Then Eldol, Red, Rodieck, Samuil, Peniſel, Pir, Capoir. And after him his ſon Eligweill an vpright dealing prince, & a good iuſticiarie. After whō ſucceeded his ſonne Hely, which raigned. lx. yeres, as the forſaid Gal. Mon. writeth, where other affyrme that he raigned. xl. yeares, & ſome againe ſay that he raigned but. vij. moneths.

Such diuerſitie is there in writers touching the raignes of theſe kings, and not only for the nūber of yeres which they ſhuld cōtinue in their raignes but alſo in their names: ſo that to ſhew the diuerſitie of all the writers, were but to ſmall purpoſe, ſith the doings of the ſame kings were not great by report made thereof by any approued author. But this maye ſuffice to aduertiſe you, that by conferring the yeres attributed to the other kings which raigned before them ſith the comming of Brute, who ſhoulde enter this lande (as by the beſt writers it is gathered) about the yeare before the building of Rome, 367. which was in the yere after the creation of the world. 2850. (as is ſayde) with their time there remaineth. 182. yeares to bee dealt amongſt theſe. xj. xiij. kings, which raigned betwixt the ſaid Elidure and Lud, which Lud alſo began his raigne after the building of the citie of Rome (as writers affyrme) about. 679. yeres, & in ẏ yere of the world 3895. as William Harriſō hath ſet it downe in the exquiſite Chronologie whiche he hath gathered frō the creation of Adam, wherin he ſheweth a large diſcourſe of moſte things worthy remembrance, don ſince the world began, as may appeare hereafter, if euer it come to light, and the hugenes therof & coſt to be beſtowed therupon, do not hinder the printing of the ſame.

Polidore Vergil changing (as I haue ſhewed) the order of ſucceſſion in the Britiſhe Kings, in bringing diuerſe of thoſe kings which after other writers followed Beline and Brenne, to preceed them ſo ſucceſſiuely after Beline & Brenne, he reherſeth thoſe that by his cōiecture did by likelihood ſucceed, as thus. After the deceaſſe of Beline, his ſon Gurguntius, being the ſecond of that name ſucceeded in gouernment of the land, & then theſe in order as they followe: Merianus, Bladanus, Capeus, Dolnus, Silius, Bledgabredus, Archemalus, Eldolus, Rodianus, Redargius, Samulius, Peniſellus, Pyrrhus, Capozus, Dinellus, & Hely, who had iſſue, Lud, Caſſibellane, & Meurius. But to leaue the diuerſitie of writers to the iudgement of the readers in ſuch vncertaynties where an vndoubted truth may hardly be auouched, & more hardly approued, we wil not further ſtand vpon theſe doubts, but proceed with the hyſtorie. Mary this is not to be forgotte, ẏ of ẏ forſaid Hely ẏ laſt of the ſaid. xxriij. kings, the Ile of Ely toke the name, becauſe that he moſt cōmonly did there inhabite, building in the ſame a goodly palace, & making great reparations of the ſluyſes, ditches & cawſies about that Ile, for cōueiance away of the water, ẏ els would ſore haue endomaged the countrey. There be that haue mainteined that this Ile ſhould rather take name of the great abundance of Eeles that are found in thoſe waters and fennes wherwith this Ile is enuironed. But Humfrey Lhuid holdeth, that it toke name of this Britiſh worde Helig, whiche ſignifieth Willowes, wherewith thoſe fennes abound.

Lud.

Lud.

After ẏ deceaſe of the ſame Hely, his eldeſt ſon Lud begā his raign, in the yeare after the creation of the worlde 3895. after the buylding of the Citie of Rome 679. before the comming of Chriſt. 72. and before the Romaines entred Britaine. xix. yeares.

This Lud proued a right worthie prince, amending the lawes of the realme that were defectiue, aboliſhing euill cuſtomes and maners vſed amongſt his people, and repairing old Cities and townes which were decayed: but ſpecially he delyted moſt to beautifie & enlarge with buildings the Citie of Troynouant, which he cōpaſſed with a ſtrong wall made of lime and ſtone, in the beſt maner fortified with diuerſe fayre towers: and in the weſt part of the ſame wall he erected a ſtrong gate, which he commaunded to be cleped after his name, Luds gate, and ſo vnto this day it is called Ludgate, the, s, only drowned in ẏ pronunciatiō of the word. In the ſame citie alſo he ſoiorned for the more part, by reaſon whereof the inhabitants encreaſed and many habitations were buylded to receyue them, & he himſelfe cauſed buildings to be made betwixt London ſtone & Ludgate, & buylded for himſelf not farre from the ſayd gate a faire palace, which is the Biſh. of Londons palace, beſide Paules, at this day (as ſome think) yet Harriſ. ſuppoſeth it to haue bin Bainards caſtel, wher the black friers now ſtandeth. He alſo builded a faire Temple nere to his ſaid palace, which temple (as ſome take it) was after turned to a church, and at this day cleped Paules. By reaſon that K. Lud ſo much eſteemed ẏ citie before al other of his realme, enlarging it ſo greatly as he did, and cōtinually in maner remained there, the name was chāged, ſo ẏ it was called Cairlud, ẏ is to ſay, Luds towne: & after by corruptiō of ſpeech it was named Lōdon.

Beside the princely doings of this Lud touching the aduancement of the cõmon wealth by studies apertayning to the time of peace, hee was also strong and valiant in armes, in subduing his enimies. He was also bounteous and liberall both in giftes and in keeping a plentifull house, so that he was greatly beloued of all the Brytaynes. Finally, when he had thus raigned with great honor for the space of .xj. yeres, he died, and was buried nere Ludgate, leauing after him two sonnes, Androgeus and Theomancius or Tenancius.

Cassibellane.

Cassibellaen.

3908

CAssibellane the brother of Lud was admitted king of Brytaine, in the yeare of the worlde, 3908. after the buylding of Rome, 691. & before the comming of Christ. 58. complete. For sith the two sonnes of Lud were not of age able to gouerne, the rule of the land was committed to Cassibellane: but yet (as some haue written) he was not created king, but rather appointed ruler and protector of the land, during the nonage of his nephewes.

Gal. Mon. Mat. West. Fabian.

Gal. Mon.

Now after he was admitted (by whatsoeuer order) to the administration of the cõmon welth, he became so noble a prince and so bounteous, that his name spred far & nere, and by his vpright dealing in seeing iustice executed he grew in such estimation, that the Brytayns made small accoũt of his nephews, in comparison of the fauour whiche they bare towards him. But Cassibellane hauing respect to his honor, least it might be thought that his nephewes were expulsed by him out of their rightfull possessions, brought them vp very honorably, assigning to Androgeus, London & Kent, and to Theomantius the country of Cornewale.

Mat. West.

And thus farre out of the Britishe hystories, by the which it may be gathered, that the yeares assigned to these kings that raigned before Cassibelane, amount to the summe of. 1058. But whether these gouernors (whose names we haue recited) were kings or rather rulers of the cõmon wealth, either else tyrants & vsurpers of the gouernment by force, it is vncertain: for not one ancient writer of any approued authoritie maketh any remembrance of the, & by that which Iulius Cesar writeth, it may & doth appere, that diuerse cities in his dayes were gouerned of their selues, as hereafter it shall more plainly appeare. Neither doth he make mention of those townes which the Britishe hystorie affirmeth to be built by the same kings.

Polidor.

In deede both hee and other latine writers speake of diuerse people that inhabited diuers portions of this land, as of the Brigantes, Trinobantes, Iceni, Silures, and such other like, but in what selfe partes most of the sayde people did certenly inhabit, it is hard to auouch a certain truth.

But what John Leyland thinketh hereof, being one in our time that curiously serched out old antiquities, you shall after heare as occasion serueth: and likewise the opinions of other, as of Hector Boetius, who couting to haue all such valiaunt actes as were atchieued by the Brytains to be ascribed to his countrymẽ the Scots, draweth both the Silures, & Brigantes with other of the Britains so farre norward, that he maketh them inhabitãts of the Scottish countries. And what particular names soeuer they had, yet were they all Scots with him, & knowne by that generall name (as he would perswade vs to beleue,) saying that they entred into Britain out of Ireland. xx. yeres before the incarnation of our sauiour. But how generall soeuer the name of Scots then was, sure it is, that no speciall mention of thẽ is made by any writer, till about. 300. yeares after the birth of our sauiour. And yet the Romains which ruled this land, & had so much ado with the people therof, make mention of diuers other people, nothing so famous as Boetius would make his Scottish men cũ then to be. But to leaue to the Scots the antiquitie of their briginal beginning, as they and other must doe vnto vs our discent from Brute & the other Troians, sith ỳ contrary doth not plainly appeare, vnlesse we shal lean vnto presũptions: now are we come to the time in the which what actes were atchieued, there remaineth more certaine record, and therfore may we the more boldly proceede in this our hystorie.

Hector & his fault.

More from hence forth ar reth in hystorie.

Iulius

In this season ỳ Cassibellane had the supreme gouernmẽt here in Britain. Caius Julius Cesar being appointed by the Senate of Rome to conquer Gallia, was for ỳ purpose created Consull, & sent with a mightie army into ỳ country, where after he had brought the Galles vnto some staye, he determined to assay ỳ winning of Britain, the which as yet the Romains knew not otherwyse thã by report. The chiefest cause that moued him to take in hand that enterprise was, for that he did vnderstande, that there dayly came great succors out of that Ile to those Gaules that were enimies vnto the Romains. And although the season of ỳ yere to make warre was farspent (for sommer was almost at an end) yet he thought it would be to good purpose, if he might but passe ouer thither, & learne what maner of people dwelt inhabited there, and discouer the places, hauens & entries apperteyning to that Ile. Herevpon calling togither such Marchauntes as he knewe to haue had traffique thyther with some trade of Marchandize, he diligently enquyred of them the state of the Ile:

Caesar lo Gal.

Brytayns knowne Roma

Caesar Gal. lib.

Causes warre.

Caesar pose.

but he could not be throughly ſatiſfied in anye of thoſe things that he coueted to know. Therefore thinking it good to vnderſtand all things by view that might appertaine to the vſe of that warre which he purpoſed to follow: before he attempted the ſame, he ſent one Caius Voluſenus with a galley or light Pineſſe to ſurney the coaſtes of the Ile, commaũding him after diligent ſearch made to returne with ſpeede to him againe. He himſelf alſo draweth downwardes towards Bullenoys, from whẽce the ſhorteſt cut lieth to paſſe ouer into Brytaine,

In which part of Gallia there was in thoſe days an hauen called Itium Portus, (which ſome take to be Calice) & ſo the word importeth, an harbourgh as then able to receiue a great nũber of ſhips. Vnto this hauen therefore Ceſar cauſed all the ſhips he coulde get out of the next borders and parties, and thoſe ſpecially whiche hee had prouided and put in a readineſſe the laſt yeare, for the warres (againſt them of Vannes in Armorica, now called Brytayne in Fraunce) to be brought thither, there to lie till they ſhould heare further.

In the meane time (his indeuor being knowne, and by Merchants reported in Brytain) all thoſe that were able to beare armor were commaunded and appoynted to repayre to the ſea ſide, that they might be readie to defend their countrey in time of ſo great daunger of inuaſion. Ceſar in his Commentaries agreeth not with our hyſtoriographers: for he writeth that immediatly vpon knowledge had that he woulde inuade Brytaine, there came to him Ambaſſadors frõ diuerſe cities of the Ile to offer themſelues to be ſubiects to the Romains, and to deliuer hoſtages. Whõ after he had exhorted to continue in their good minde, he ſent thẽ home again, & with thẽ one Comius, gouernor of Artois, cõmaunding him to repair vnto as many cities in Brytayn as he might, & to exhort thẽ to ſubmit themſelues to the Romains. He maketh no mention of Caſſibellane till the ſecond iourney ẏ he made into the Ile, at what time the ſaid Caſſibelan was choſen (as ye ſhal heare) to be the generall captain of the Britayns, & to haue the whole adminiſtratiõ of the warr for defence of the cõtry. But he nameth him not to be a king, how be it in the Britiſh hyſtorie it is conteyned, that Ceſar required tribute of Caſſibelan, & that he anſwered howe he had not learned as yet to liue in ſeruage, but to defend the libertie of his country, & that with weapõ in hand (if need were) as he ſhuld wel perceiue, if (blinded through couetouſneſſe) he ſhould aduenture to ſeke to diſquiet the Britains.

Thus here aſwel as in other places, there is diuerſitie in authors: & to the end you ſhould not be ignorant therof, we haue thought good now and then to touch the ſame, that you may in reading take the more pleaſure, when ye ſhal marke ſome things worthie of credite, and ſomethings again ſo vnlikelyas may rather ſeme to moue laughter, than to paſſe for matter worthie of credite.

Voluſenus returneth.

But to the purpoſe. Caius Voluſenus within fiue days after his departure from Ceſar, returned again vnto him with his galley, & declared what he had ſeene touching the view which he had taken of the coaſtes of Brytaine.

Cæſar with two legions of ſouldiers paſſeth ouer into Brytayne.

Ceſar then hauing got togither ſo many ſayle as hee thought ſufficient for the tranſporting of two legions of ſouldiers, after he had ordred his buſineſſe as he thought expedient, and gotten a conuenient winde for his purpoſe, he embarqued himſelfe and his people, and departed from Calice in the night about the thirde watch (which is about three or foure of the clocke after midnight) giuing order that the horſemen ſhould take ſhip at an other place. viij. myles aboue Calis, and follow him. But when they ſomewhat ſlacked the time, about tenne of the clocke the next day, hauing the winde at will, he touched on the coaſt of Brytayne, where he might beholde all the ſhore ſet and couered with men of warre. For the Brytaynes hearing that Ceſar ment verye ſhortly to come againſt them, were aſſembled in armour to reſiſt him: and now being aduertiſed of his approche to the lande, they prepared themſelues to withſtande him. Ceſar perceyuing this, determined to ſtay till the other ſhips were come, and ſo he lay at ancre till about. xj. of the clocke, and then calleth a counſell of the Marſhals and chiefe captaines, vnto whome he declared both what he had learned of Voluſenus, and alſo further what he would haue done, willing them that all things might be ordred as the reaſon of warre requyred. And bycauſe he perceyued that this place where he firſt caſt ancre, was not meete for the landing of his people, bith (from the height of the cliffes that cloſed on eche ſide the narrow creek into the which he had thruſt) the Brytaynes might annoy hys people with their bowes and darts, before they could ſet foote on land, hauing now the wind and tyde with him, he diſanked from thence, & drewe alongeſt the coaſt vnder the downes, the ſpace of bij. or. biij. myles: and there finding the ſhore more flat and plaine, he approched neare to the land, determining to come to the ſhore.

The Brytaines ready to defend their countrey.

Cæſar calleth a counſell.

This was about Dale.

The Brytaynes perceyuing Ceſars intent, with all ſpeede cauſed their horſmen and charets or wagons which Ceſar calleth Eſſede (out of the which in thoſe dayes they vſed to fight) to marche forth toward the place whither they ſaw ẏ Ceſar drew, and after followed with their maine army. Wherefore Ceſar being thus preuented, enforced yet to lande wyth hys people, although hee ſawe that hee ſhoulde haue muche a doe: for as the Brytaynes were in readyneſſe to reſyſte hym: ſo hys greate and huge Shyppes couldе not come neare the ſhoꝛe, but were foꝛced to keepe the deepe, ſo that the Romaine Souldiers were put to a verie hard ſhift, foꝛ they muſt both leape foꝛth of their ſhippes, and peſtred with their heauy armour and weapons fight in the water wyth their enimies, who knowing the flats and ſhelues ſtood either vpõ the dꝛie ground, oꝛ elſe but a little way in the ſhallow places of the water, and being not otherwiſe encombꝛed either with armour oꝛ weapon, but ſo as they might beſtir thẽſelues at wil, they layd load vpon the Romains with their arrowes and dartes, and foꝛced their hoꝛſes (being thereto enꝛyed to enter the water the moꝛe eaſily, ſo to annoy and diſtreſſe the Romaines, who wanting experience in ſuche kinde of fight, were not wel able to helpe themſelues, noꝛ to kepe oꝛder as they vſed to doe on lande: wherefoꝛe they fought nothing ſo luſtily as they were wont to doe, which Ceaſar perceyuing, commaunded the Gallyes to depart from the great ſhippes, and to rowe harde to the ſhoꝛe, that being placed ouer agaynſt the open ſydes of the Bꝛytaynes, they might with theyꝛ ſhotte of Arrowes, Darts, and Slings, remoue the Bꝛytaynes, and cauſe them to withdꝛaw further off from the water ſide.

The Brytaynes aſtonied.

This thing being put in execution (accoꝛding to his commaundement, the Bꝛytaynes were not a little aſtonyed at the ſtraunge ſight of thoſe Gallies, foꝛ that they were dꝛyuen with Oares, which earſt they had not ſeene, and ſhꝛewdly were they galled alſo with the artillerie which the Romaines diſcharged vpon them, ſo that they began to ſhꝛinke and retyꝛe ſomewhat backe. Herewith one that bare the enſigne of the legion ſurnamed Decima, wherin the Eagle was figured, as in that which was the chiefe enſigne of the legion, when he ſawe his fellowes nothing eagre to make foꝛward, firſt beſeeching the goddes that his enterpꝛiſe might turne to the weale, pꝛofite, and honour of the legion, he ſpake with a lowd voyce theſe woꝛdes to his felowes that were about him: Leape foꝛth now you woꝛthie ſouldiers (ſayth he) if you wil not betray your enſigne to the enimies. Foꝛ ſurely I will acquite my ſelfe accoꝛding to my dutie both towardes the common welth, and my generall: and therewith leaping foꝛth into the water, he marched with his enſigne ſtreight vpon the enimies.

The valiant courage of an enſigne bearer

The Romaines doubting to loſe their enſigne, which ſhould haue turned them to high repꝛoche, leapt out of their ſhips ſo faſt as they might, and followed their ſtandard, ſo that there enſued a ſoꝛe scencounter: and that thing that troubled moſte the Romaines, was bycauſe they could not keepe their oꝛder, neyther finde any ſure foting, noꝛ yet follow euery man his owne Enſigne, but to put themſelues vnder that enſigne whiche hee fyꝛſt met with after their firſt comming foꝛth of the Shippe.

The Bꝛytaynes that were acquainted with the ſhelfes and ſhallow places of the water, when they ſaw the Romaines thus diſoꝛderly to come foꝛth of their ſhips, they ranne vpon them with their hoꝛſes and fiercely aſſayled them, and nowe and then a greate multitude of the Bꝛytaynes woulde compaſſe in, and enclooſe ſome one company of them: and other alſo from the moſt open places of the ſhoꝛe beſtowed great plentie of darts vpon the whole number of the Romaines, and ſo troubled them paſſing foꝛe: wherevpon Ceſar perceyuing the maner of this fight, cauſed his mẽ of warre to enter into Boates and other ſmall veſſels, which he commaunded to go to ſuch places where moſt need appeared. And thus relieuing them that fought, with new ſuccours, at length the Romaines got to lande, and then aſſembling togither, they aſſayled the Bꝛytaynes of new, and ſo at length did put them all to flight. But the Romaines could not folow the Bꝛytaynes farre, bycauſe they wanted their hoꝛſmen, which were yet behind, and thꝛough ſlacking time coulde not come to lande. And this one thing ſeemed onely to diſappoint the luckie foꝛtune ẏ was accuſtomed to followe Ceſar in all his other enterpꝛiſes.

The Bꝛytains after this flight were no ſoner got togither, but that with all ſpeed they ſent Imbaſſadoꝛs vnto Ceſar to treat with him of peace, offering to deliuer hoſtages, and further to ſtande vnto that oꝛder that Ceſar ſhould take with them in any reaſonable ſoꝛt. With theſe Imbaſſadoꝛs came alſo Comius, whõ Ceſar (as ye haue heard) had ſent befoꝛe into Bꝛytaine, whom notwithſtanding that he was an Imbaſſadoꝛ, and ſent from Ceſar with commiſſion and inſtructions ſufficiently furniſhed, yet had they ſtayd him as a priſoner. But now after the battaile was ended, they ſet him at libertie, & ſent him back with their Ambaſſadors, who excuſed the matter, laying the blame on the people of the Countrey, which had impriſoned him through lacke of vnderſtanding what appertayned to the law of armes and nations in that behalfe.

Ceſar found great fault with their miſdemeanor, not onely for impriſoning his Ambaſſador, but alſo for that contrary to their promiſes made by ſuch as they had ſent to him into Gallia to deliuer hoſtages, in lieu thereof, they had receyued him with warre: yet in the ende he ſayd he would pardon them, and not ſeeke any further reuenge of their follies. And herewith required of them hoſtages, of which, part were deliuered out of hand, and promiſe made that the reſidue ſhould likewiſe be ſent after, craning ſome reſpite for performance of the ſame, becauſe they were to be fetched farre off within the Countrey.

Peace being thus eſtabliſhed after the. iiij. day of the Romaines arriuall in Bryteyne, the. xviij. ſhippes which (as ye haue heard) were appoynted to conuey the horſmen ouer, loſed from the further hauen with a ſoft winde. The whiche when they approched ſo neare the ſhore of Bryteyn, that the Romains which were in Ceſars camp might ſee them, ſodainly there aroſe ſo great a tempeſt, that none of them was able to keepe his courſe, ſo that they were not onely driuen in ſunder (ſome being caried againe into Gallia, and ſome weſtward but alſo the other ſhippes that lay at ancre, and had brought ouer the armie, were ſo pitifully beaten, toſſed and ſhaken, that a great number of them did not onely loſe their tackle, but alſo were caried by force of winde into the high ſea, the reſt being likewiſe ſo filled with water, ẏ they were in danger by ſinking to periſh & to be quite loſt. For the Mone in the ſame night was at the full, and therefore cauſed a ſpring tide, which furthered the force of the tempeſt, to the greater perill of thoſe ſhips and gallies that lay at an ancre. There was no way for the Romains to help ẏ matter: wherfore a great number of thoſe ſhips were ſo bruiſed, rent, and weatherbeaten, that without new reparation they would ſerue to no vſe of ſailing. This was a great diſcõfort to the Romaines that had brought ouer no prouiſion to liue by in ẏ winter ſeaſon, nor ſaw any hope how they ſhould repaſſe againe into Gallia. In the meane time the Bryteiſh princes that were in the Romaine army, perceyuing how greatly this miſhap had diſcouraged the Romains, & againe by the ſmal circuit of their campe, geſſed that they coulde be no great number, and that lacke of vitayles ſore oppreſſed them, they priuily ſtale away one after another out of the campe, purpoſing to aſſemble their powers againe & to foreſtall the Romains from vitayles, and ſo to driue the matter off till winter: which if they might do (vanquiſhing theſe or cloſing them from returning) they truſted that none of the Romains from thenceforth would attempt ſeruices to come come into Bryteyn. Ceſar miſtruſting their dealings, becauſe they ſtayd to deliuer the reſidue of their hoſtages, commaunded vitails to be brought out of ẏ parties adioyning, & not hauing other ſtuffe to repaire his ſhips, he cauſed. xij. of thoſe that were vtterly paſt recouerie by the hurts receyued through violence of the tẽpeſt, to be broken, wherwith the other (in which ſome recouerie was perceyued) might be repayred.

In the meane time, whileſt theſe things were a doing, it chaunced that as one of the Romaine legions named the. vij. was ſent forth to fetche in corne out of the countrey adioyning (as their cuſtome was) no warre at that time being ſuſpected, or once looked for, when part of the people remayned abrode in the field, and part repayred to the camp: thoſe that warded before the campe, aduertiſed Ceſar, that there appeared a duſt greater than was accuſtomed from that quarter, into the which the legion was gone to fetch in corne. Ceſar iudging therof what the matter might meane, commaunded thoſe bandes that warded, to goe with him that way forth, and appoynted other two bands to come into their rowmthes, and the reſidue of his people to get them to armor, and to follow quickly after him. He was not gone any great way from the campe, when hee might ſee where his people were ouermatched by ẏ enimies, and had much ado to beare out the brunt: for the legion being thronged togither, the Bryteynes pelted them ſore with arrowes & darts on eche ſide: for ſithence there was no forrage left in any part of the cuntry about, but only in this place, ẏ Bryteins iudged that the Romains would come thither for it: therfore hauing lodged thẽſelues with the woods in ambuſhes the night before, on ẏ morow after when they ſaw the Romains diſperſed here & there, and buſie to cut downe the corne) they ſet vpon them on the ſodein, & ſleaing ſome few of them, brought the reſidue out of order, cõpaſſing thẽ about with their horſmen and charets, ſo that they were in greate diſtreſſe. The maner of fight with theſe charets was ſuch, that in ẏ beginning of a battaile they would ride aboute the ſides and ſkirts of the enimies hoſt, & beſtow their darts as they ſat in thoſe charets, ſo that oftentimes with the braying of the horſes, & craking noiſe of ẏ charet wheeles they diſorderd their enimies, and after that they had wound themſelues in amongſt the troupes of horſmẽ, they would leap out of the charets, & fight a foot, & in the mean time theſe ẏ guided the charets would withdraw thẽſelues out of the battail, placing thẽſelues ſo, that if their people were ouermatched with the multitude of enimies they might eaſily withdraw to their charets, and mount vpon the ſame againe, by meanes whereof they are as readie to remoue as the horſemen, & as ſtedfaſt to ſtand in the battaile as the footmen, and ſo to ſupplie both dueties in one. And thoſe Charetmen by exercile and cuſtome were ſo cunning in their feat, that although their horſes were put to run and gallop, yet could they ſtay them & hold them backe at their pleaſures, and turne and wind them to and fro in a moment, notwithſtanding that the place were very ſteepe and daungerous: and againe they would run vp and downe very nimbly vpon the coppes, & ſtand vpō ẏ beam and conuey thẽſelues quickly again into ẏ charet.

Ceſar thus finding his people in great diſtreſſe and readie to be deſtroyed, came in good time, and deliuered thẽ out of that daunger: for ẏ Brytains vpon his approch with new ſuccors, gaue ouer to aſſaile their enimies any further, & the Romaines were deliuered out of the feare wherein they ſtode before his comming.

Furthermore, Ceſar cõſidering the time ſerued not to aſſaile his enimies kept his ground, & ſhortly after brought backe his legions into the camp. Whileſt theſe things were thus a doing, & all the Romains being occupied, ẏ reſt that were abrode in the fields got them away. After this there followed a ſore ſeaſon of raine and foule weather, which kept the Romains within their campe, and ſtayed the Brytains frõ offring battel. But in the meane time they ſent into all parts of the coũtrey meſſengers abrode to giue knowledge of the ſmal number of the Romaines, & what hope there was both of great ſpoyle to be gotten, and occaſion to deliuer thẽſelues from further daunger for euer, if they might once expell the Romaines out of their campe. Herevpon a great multitude both of horſemen and footemen of the Britains were ſpeedily got togither, & approched the Romain camp. Ceſar although he ſaw that the ſame would come to paſſe which had chanced before, that if the enimies were put to the repulſe, they would eaſily eſcape ẏ danger with ſwiftneſſe of foot, yet hauing now vp him .xxx. horſemen (which Comius of Arras had brought ouer with him, whẽ he was ſent frõ Ceſar as an Ambaſſador vnto the Brytains) he placed his legions in order of battail before his camp, and ſo cõming to ioyne with the Brytains, they were not able to ſuſteyn the violent impreſſion of the armed men, and ſo fled. The Romains purſued them ſo farre as they were able to ouertake any of them, and ſo ſlaing many of them, & burning vp their houſes all about, came backe againe to their campe.

Immediately whereupon, euen the ſame day they ſent Ambaſſadors to Ceſar, to ſue for peace, who gladly accepting their offer, commaunded them to ſend ouer into Gallia, after he ſhoulde be returned thither, hoſtages in nũbre double to thoſe that were agreed vpon at the firſt.

After that theſe things were thus ordred, Ceſar becauſe that the Moneth of September was wel neare halfe ſpent, and that Winter haſted on (a ſeaſon not meete for his weake bruyſed ſhippes to breake the Seas in) determined not to ſtay anye longer, but hauing winde and weather for his purpoſe, got himſelfe a backe with his people, and returned into Gallia.

Thus writeth Ceſar touching his firſt iourney made into Brytaine. But the Britiſh hyſtorie (which Polidore calleth the new hyſtorie) declareth, that Ceſar in a pight field was vanquiſhed at the firſt encounter, and ſo withdrew backe into Fraunce. Ceſar Gallia

Beda alſo writeth thus: that Ceſar cõming into the countrey of Gallia, where the people then called Morini inhabited (whiche are at this day the ſame that inhabite the Dioces of Terwine) from whence lyeth the ſhorteſt paſſage ouer into Brytain, now called England, got togither .lxx. ſayle of great ſhippes and row Gallies, with the which he paſſed ouer into Brytayne, and there at the firſt being wearied with ſharpe and ſore fight,

and

and after taken with a grieuous tempeſt, loſt the more part of his nauie, with no ſmall number of his ſouldiers, and almoſt all his horſemen. And therewith being returned into Gallia, placed his ſouldiers in ſtedes to ſoiourne there for the winter ſeaſon. Thus hath Bede.

The Britiſh hyſtorie moreouer maketh mention of three vnder kings that ayded Caſſibellane in this firſt battail fought wᵗʰ Ceſar, as Cridiorus, alias, Ederus, K. of Albania, nowe called Scotland: Guitethus king of Venedocia, that is north Wales: & Britael king of Demetia, at this day called ſouth Wales.

The ſame hyſtorie maketh alſo mention of one Belinus that was general of Caſſibelanes army, and likewiſe of Menius brother to Caſſibelane, which in the fight happened to get Ceſars ſword faſtned in his ſhield by a blow which Ceſar ſtroke at him. Androgeus alſo, and Tenaneius, were at the battail in ayde of Caſſibelane. But Mennius died within .xb. dayes after the battail of the hurt receiued at Ceſars hand, although after he was ſo hurt, he ſlue Labienus one of ỹ Rom. Tribunes: all which may well be true, ſith Ceſar either maketh the beſt of things for his owne honor, or elſe coueting to write but Commentaries, maketh no accoũt to declare the needles circũſtances, or any more of the matter, than ỹ chief points of his dealing. Again the Scottiſh hyſtoriographers write, that when it was firſt known to the Brytaynes, that Ceſar would inuade them, there came from Caſſibelane king of Brytaynes an Ambaſſade vnto Ederus king of Scottes, the which in the name of king Caſſibelane, requyred ayde againſt the common enimies the Romaines, which requeſt was graunted, and ten .M. Scots ſent to the ayde of Caſſibellane.

At their comming to London, they were moſt ioyfully receiued of Caſſibellane, who at the ſame tyme had knowledge that the Romaines were come a land, and had beatẽ ſuch Brytayns backe as were appoynted to reſiſt their landing. Wherupon Caſſibellane with all his whole puiſſaunce nightily augmented, not onely with the ſuccors of the Scottes, but alſo of the Picts (which in that common cauſe had ſent alſo of their people to ayd the Brytaynes) ſet forwarde towardes the place where he vnderſtode the enimies to be.

At their firſt approch togither, Caſſibellane ſent forth his horſmen and charets called Eſſedæ, by the which he thought to diſorder the array of the enimies. Twice they encountered togither with doubtfull victorie. At length they ioyned puiſſance againſt puiſſance, and fought a right ſore and cruell battayle, till finally at the ſodaine comming of the Welchmen, and Cornithmen, ſo huge noyſe was rayſed by the ſounde of Belles hanging at their trappers and Charets, that the Romaynes aſtonyed therewith, were more eaſily put to flight.

The Brytaynes, Scots, and Picts following in the chaſe without order or aray, ſo that by reaſon the Romains kept themſelues cloſe togither, the Brytayns, Scots, & Picts did vneth ſo much harm to the enimies as they themſelues receyued. But yet they followed on ſtil vpon the Romains till it was darke night. Ceſar after he had perceyued them once withdrawne, did what he could to aſſemble his companies togither, minding the next morning to ſeeke his reuenge of the former days diſaduãtage. But forſomuch as knowledge was giuẽ him ỹ his ſhips by reaſon of a ſore tẽpeſt were beatẽ & rent, ỹ many of thẽ wer paſt ſeruice, he doubted leaſt ſuch newes would encourage his enimies, & bring his people into diſpair. Wherfore he determined not to fight til time more cõueniẽt, ſending all his wounded folks vnto ỹ ſhips, which he cõmaunded to be newly rigged and trimmed.

After this, keeping his army for a time within the place where he was encamped without iſſuing forth, he ſhortly drew to the ſea ſide, where his ſhippes lay at ankre, and there within a ſtrong place fortified for the purpoſe he lodged his hoſt, & finally without hope to atchieue any other exploit auaileable for that time, he toke the ſea with ſuch ſhippes as were apt for ſailing, and ſo repaſſed into Gallia, leauing behind him all the ſpoyle and baggage, for want of veſſelles, and leyſure to conuey it ouer.

Thus haue the Scottes in their Chronicles framed the matter, more to the confuſion of the Romaine hyſtories, than according to the report of our Britiſh and Engliſh writers: and therfore we haue thought good to ſhew it here, that the diuerſitie of writers and their affections maye the better appeare.

Of this ſodein departing alſo, or rather flying of Julius Ceſar out of Britain, Lucanus ỹ poet maketh mẽtion: reciting the ſaying of Pompeius in an oratiõ made by him vnto his ſoldiers, wherin he reprochfully and diſdainfully reproued the doings of Ceſar in Britaine, ſaying:

Territa quæſitis oſtendit terga Britannis.

That is in Engliſh.

He turnde his backe and fled away, from the Brytaynes whom he ſought.

But now to turne to the ſequele of the matter, as Ceſar himſelfe reporteth. After his comming into Gallia, there were but two Cities of al Britaine that ſent ouer their hoſtages according to their couenant, which gaue occaſion to Ceſar to pike a new quarell againſt them, which if it had wanted, he would yet I doubt not haue founde ſome other: for his full meaning was to make a more full conqueſt of that Ile. Therfore purpoſing to paſſe againe thither, as he that had a great deſire to bring the Brytaynes vnder the obedience of the Romain eſtate, he cauſed a great number of ſhippes to be prouided in the winter ſeaſon & put in a redineſſe, ſo that againſt the next ſpring there were found to be readie rigged fiue hundred ſhips, beſide. xxviij. Gallies. Herevpon hauing taken order for the gouernance of Gallia in his abſence, about the beginning of the Spring he came to the hauen of Calice, whither (according to order by him preſcribed) all his ſhips were come, except. xl. which by tempeſt were driuen backe, and coulde not as yet come to him.

Dion Caſſius.

Cæſar de bello Gallico.

After he had ſtayed at Calice (as wel for a conuenient winde, as for other incidentes) certaine dayes, at length when the weather ſo chaunged that it ſerued his purpoſe, he toke the ſea, hauing with him fiue legions of ſouldiers, and about two thouſand horſmen, departed out of Calice hauen about the ſun ſetting with a ſoft ſouth weſt wind, directing his courſe forward: about midnight the wind fell, and ſo by a calme, he was caried alõgſt with the tide, ſo that in the morning whẽ the day appeared, he might beholde Britaine vpon his left hand. The folowing the ſtreame as the courſe of the tide changed, he forced with Oares to fetch the ſhore vpon that part of the coaſt, which he had diſcouered and tried the laſt yeare to bee the beſt landing place for the armie. The diligence of the ſouldiers was ſhewed here to be great, who with cõtinual toile droue forth the heauy ſhips, to keepe courſe with the gallies, and ſo at length they landed in Britayn about noone on the next day, finding not one to reſiſt his comming a ſhore: for as he learned by certain priſoners which were taken after his comming to lande, the Britaines being aſſembled in purpoſe to haue reſiſted him, through feare ſtriken into their heartes, at the diſcouering of ſuch an huge number of ſhips, they forſoke the ſhore, and got them vnto the Mountaines.

There were in deed of veſſels one & other, what with vitailers, and thoſe which priuate men had prouided and furniſhed forth for their owne vſe, being ioyned to the ordinarie number, at the leaſt viij.C. ſayle, which appearing in ſight all at one time, made a wonderfull muſter, & right terrible in the eyes of the Brytaynes.

But to proceed: Ceſar being got to land, encamped his army in a place conuenient: and after learning by the priſoners, in to what parte the enimies were withdrawne, hee appointed one Quintus Atrius to remaine vpon the ſafegard of the naue, with ten companies or cohorts of footmen, and three hundred horſmen: and anon after in dright marched forth himſelfe with the reſidue of his people towards the Brytaynes, and hauing made. xij. miles of way, hee got ſight of his enimies hoſt, the which ſending downe their horſmẽ and charets vnto the riuer ſide, ſkirmiſhed with the Romaines, meaning to beat them backe from the higher ground: but being aſſayled of the Romaine horſemen, they were repulſed, and toke the woodes for their refuge, wherein they had got a place very ſtrong, both by nature & helpe of hand, which (as was to be thought) had beene fortified before, in time of ſome ciuill warre amongſt thẽ: for all the entries were cloſed with trees whiche had bene cut down for that purpoſe. Howbeit the ſouldiers of the. xij. legion caſting a trench before them, found meanes to put backe the Brytaynes from their defences, and ſo entring vppon them, droue them out of the woods.

But Ceſar would not ſuffer the Romanes to follow the Brytaynes, becauſe that the nature of the countrey was not knowne vnto them: and againe the day was farre ſpent, ſo that hee woulde haue the reſidue thereof beſtowed in fortefying his campe.

The next day, as he had ſent forth ſuch as ſhould ſhould haue purſued the Britans, worde came to him from Quintus Atrius, that his nauie by rigour of a ſore and hideous tempeſt, was greeuouſly moleſted, and throwen vpon the ſhore, ſo that the cables and tagle being broken and deſtroyed with force of the vnmercifull rage of wind, the maſters and Mariners were not able to help the matter. Ceſar calling backe thoſe whiche he had ſent forth, returneth to his Shippes, and finding them in ſuche ſtate as he had heard, toke order for the repairing of thoſe that were not vtterly deſtroyed, and cauſed them ſo to be drawen vp to the land, that with a trench he might ſo compaſſe in a plot of ground, that might ſerue both for defence of his Shippes, and alſo for the incāping of thoſe men of warre, which he ſhuld leaue to attend vpon the ſauegard of the ſame. And bycauſe there were at the leaſt a fortie Ships loſt by violence of this tēpeſt, ſo as there was no hope of recouerie in them, he ſawe yet howe the reſt with great labour and coſt might bee repaired: wherefore he chooſe forth wrightes among the Legions, ſent for other into Gallia, and wrote ouer to ſuch as he had left there in charge with the gouernāce of the country, to prouide ſo many Ships as they could, and to ſend them ouer vnto him. He ſpente a tenne dayes about the repairing thus of his nauy, and in fortifying of ẏ camp for defence thereof, which done, he left thoſe within it which were appoynted there before, and then returneth towards his enimies. At his comming backe to the place where hee had before encamped, hee founde them there ready to reſiſt him, hauing their numbers hugely encreaſed: for the Britaynes hearing that he was returned with ſuch a mightie number of Shippes, aſſembled out of all partes of the land, and had by generall conſent appoynted the whole rule and order of all things touching the warre, vnto Caſſiuellaune, or Caſſibelane, whoſe dominion was deuided from the Cities ſytuate neere to the Sea coaſt, by the riuer of Thames, 80. miles diſtant from the ſea coaſt. This Caſſibellaune before time had bin at continual warre with other rulers, and Cities of the land: but now the Britons moued with the comming of ẏ Romaynes, chooſe hym to be chiefe gouernor of all their army, permitting the order and rule of all things touching the defence of their countrey againſt the Romanes, only to him. Their horſemen and Charrets ſkirmiſhed by the way with the Romaynes, but ſo as they were put backe oftentimes into the woodes and hilles adioining: yet the Britaynes ſlewe diuers of the Romaines as they followed any thing egrely in the purſute.

Alſo within a while after, as the Romaynes were buſie in fortifying their camp, ẏ Britaynes ſodaynely iſſued out of the woodes, and fiercely aſſayled thoſe that warded before the camp, vnto whoſe ayde, Ceſar ſent two of the chiefeſt cohortes of two legions, the whiche being placed but a little diſtance one from another, when the Romanes began to be diſcouraged with this kynd of fight, the Britayns therwith burſt through their enimies, and came backe from thence in ſafetie. That daye Quintus Laberius Durus a Tribune was ſlayne. At length, Ceſar ſendyng ſundry other cohortes to the ſuccoure of his people that were in fighte, and ſhewdly handled as it appeared, the Britaynes in the ende were put backe.

In all this manner of ſkirmiſhing and fyghte which chanced before the camp, euen in the ſighte and viewe of all men, it was perceyued that the Romaynes, by reaſon of their heauie armour (being not able eyther to followe the Britaynes as they retired, or ſo bold, as to depart from their enſignes, except they woulde runne into daunger of caſting themſelues away) were nothing meete to mateh with ſuch kind of enimies: and as for their horſemen, they fought likewiſe in great hazarde, bycauſe the Britaynes would oftentimes of purpoſe retire, & when they had trained the Romane horſemen a little from their legions of footemen, they would leape out of their charrets and encoūter with them a foote. And ſo the battell of horſemen was daungerous, and like in all poyntes whether they purſued or retired. This alſo was the manner of the Britaynes: they fought not cloſe togither, but in ſunder, and deuided into cōpanies one ſeparated from another by a good diſtance, & had their troupes ſtanding in places conuenient, to ẏ which they might retire, & ſo releeue one another with ſending newe freſh men to ſupply the roomthes of them that were hurt or weary. The next day after they had thus fought before ẏ camp of the Romanes, they ſhewed themſelues aloft on ẏ hilles, & began to ſkirmiſhe with the Romane horſemen, but not ſo hotely as they had done the day before. But about none, when Ceſar had ſent forth three legions of footemē and all his horſemen vnder the leading of his Lieutenant Caius Trebonius to fetch in fourrage, they ſodainely brake out on euery ſide, & ſet vpon the fourragers. The Romanes ſo farre forth as they might, not breaking their array, nor going from their enſignes or guidōs gaue ẏ charge on them, & fiercely repulſed them, ſo ẏ the horſemen hauing ẏ legions of footemen at their backes, followed the Britons ſo long as they might haue the ſaid Legions in ſight ready to ſuccour thē if neede were: by reaſon whereof, they ſlew a great number of ẏ Britons, not giuing them leaſure to recouer thēſelues, nor to ſtay, that they might haue tyme to get out of their charrets. After this chaſe and diſcomfiture, all ſuch as were come from other parties to the ayde of their fellowes departed home,

The manner of the Britons in the warres.

Caius Trebonius.

Dion Caſſius ſaith, that the Britaynes vanquiſhed the Romayne footemen at this time, but were put to the worſt by the horſemen.

and after ẏ day the Britons aduentured to fight againſt Ceſar with their maine power, but withdrawing beyond the riuer of Thames, determined to ſtop the enimies from paſſing the ſame, if by any meanes they might: and where as there was but one fourde by ẏ which they might come ouer, Caſſiuellane cauſed the ſame to be ſet ful of ſharp ſtakes, not onely in the middeſt of the water, but alſo at the comming fourthe on that ſyde where he was lodged with his army in good order, ready to defende the paſſage. Ceſar learning by relation of priſoners which he toke, what the Britaynes intended to do, marched forth to ẏ riuer ſide, where the fourde was, by the whiche hys army might paſſe the ſame afoote though very hardly. At his cõming thither, hee might perceiue howe the Britaynes were ready on ẏ further ſide to impeach his paſſage, & how that the banke at ẏ comming fourthe of the water was pighte full of ſharp ſtakes, and ſo likewiſe was the chanell of ẏ Riuer ſet with ſtakes which were couered with ẏ water. Theſe things yet ſtayed not Ceſar, who appoynting his horſemen to paſſe on before, cõmanded the footemen to follow. The ſouldiers entring ẏ water, waded through with ſuch ſpede & violence, (nothing appearing of thẽ aboue water but their heads) that ẏ Britaynes were conſtreyned to giue place, being not able to ſuſteyne ẏ brunt of ẏ Romane horſemen. & the legions of their footemen, & ſo abandoning ẏ place toke thẽ to flight. Caſſiuelane not minding to trie ẏ matter any more by battell, ſente away ẏ moſt parte of his people, but yet kept with him about a foure thouſand charretmen or wagoners, and ſtil watched what way ẏ Romanes toke, coaſting them euer as they marched, and kepte ſomewhat aſide within ẏ couert of woods, and other comberſome places. And out of thoſe quarters through ẏ whiche he vnderſtood ẏ Romanes would paſſe, he gathered both mẽ & cattel into ẏ woods & thicke forreſts, leauing nothing of valew abrode in ẏ chãpayne countrey. And whẽ ẏ Romane horſemen did come abrode into ẏ countrey to ſeeke booties, he ſent out his charrets vnto the knowen ways & paſſages to ſkirmiſh with the ſame horſemen, ſo much to the diſaduãtage of the Romanes, ẏ they durſt not ſtraye far frõ their maine army. Neither would Ceſar permit thẽ leaſt they might haue bin vtterly diſtreſſed by ẏ Britaynes) to depart further thã ẏ maine battels of ẏ footemẽ kept pace vẽ thẽ, by reaſon whereof ẏ countrey was not endamaged by fire & ſpoyle, but onely where the army marched. In ẏ mean time, the Trinouantes which ſome take to be the middeſex & Eſſex mẽ, whoſe Citie was ẏ beſt ſtored of al other in thoſe parties, & thought to be the ſame ẏ now is called Londõ, ſent Imbaſſadors vnto Ceſar, offering to ſubmit thẽſelues vnto him, & to obey his ordinances, and further beſought him to defend Mãdubratius frõ ẏ iniurie of Caſſiuellaune, which Mandubratius had fled vnto Ceſar into France, after ẏ Caſſibelane had ſlain his father named Imanuentius, ẏ was chiefe Lord & K. of the Trinobantes, & ſo now by their Imbaſſadors, ẏ ſame Trinobantes requeſted Ceſar, not only to receiue Mandubratius into his protection, but alſo to ſend him vnto them, that he might take the gouernmẽt & rule of their Citie into his hands. Ceſar cõmanded thẽ to deliuer vnto him. 40. hoſtages, & grayne for his army, & therewith ſent Mandubratius vnto them. The Trinouantes accõpliſhed his commaundements wt al ſpeede, ſending both ẏ appoynted nũber of hoſtages, and alſo graine for the army. And being thus defended & preſerued from iniurie of ẏ ſouldiers, ẏ people called Cenimagni, Segontiaci, Ancalites, Bibroci, and Caſſi, ſubmitted thẽſelues vnto Ceſar, by whom he vnderſtode that ẏ towne of Caſſibellane was not far from ẏ place wher he was then encamped fenſed with woodes & mariſhes, into ẏ whiche a great number of people wt their Cattell and other ſubſtãce was withdrawen. The Britaines in thoſe dayes (as Ceſar writeth) called ẏ a towne or hold which they had fortified wt any thick cõberſome wood, with trẽch & rampire, into ẏ which they fled to get thẽſelues for ẏ auoyding of inuaſion. Ceſar with his legions of ſouldiers therefore marcheth thither, & finding the place very ſtrong both by nature & helpe of hand, aſſaulteth it on two parts. The Britains defending their ſtrength a while, at lẽgth not able longer to endure the impreſſion of ẏ Romaynes, fled out on ẏ contrary ſide of ẏ towne wher the enimies were not. Within this place a great nũber of Cattel was found, & many of ẏ Britaynes take by ẏ Romanes ẏ followed them in chaſe, & many alſo ſlaine. Whileſt theſe things paſſed on this ſort in thoſe parties, Caſſibellaune ſent meſſengers into Kent vnto four kings (whiche ruled ẏ ſide of the lãd in thoſe dayes) Cingetorix, Carſilius, Taximagulus, & Segonax, cõmaunding thẽ, that aſſembling togither their whole puiſſãce, they ſhould aſſaile ẏ camp of ẏ Romaines by the Sea ſide wher certain bãds lay (as ye haue heard) for ſafegard of ẏ nauie. They according to his apointmẽt came ſodainly thither, & by ẏ Romains that ſailed forth vpon them were charply fought with, & loſt diuers of their men ẏ were ſlaine, and taken. and amõgſt the priſoners that ẏ Romains toke, Cingetorix was one. When Caſſibellaune heard theſe newes, being ſore troubled for theſe loſſes thus chanting one in the neck of an other, but namely moſt diſcouraged, for that diuers Cities had yelded vnto the Romanes: hee ſendeth Imbaſſadors by meane of Comius of Arras vnto Ceſar, offering to ſubmit himſelfe. Ceſar meaning to winter in Gallia, and therefore becauſe ſommer drewe towardes an ende, willyng to diſpatch in Britayne, commanded that hoſtages ſhould ſhould be deliuered, and appoynted what tribute the Britaynes ſhould yeerely ſend vnto the Romaynes. He alſo forbade and commaunded Caſſibellaune that he ſhould not in any wiſe trouble or endomage Mandubratius or the Londoners. After this, when he had receyued the hoſtages, he bringeth his army to the Sea, and there findeth his Shippes well repayred, decked, and in good point: therefore he commandeth that they ſhould be had downe to the ſea. And bycauſe hee hadde a great number of priſoners, and diuers of his ſhips were loſt by the tempeſt, he appoynted to tranſport his army ouer into Gallia at two conuoyes, whiche was done with good ſucceſſe about the middeſt of September, though the Shippes returning for the reſidue of the army, after the firſte conuoy, were driuē ſo with force of weather, that a great number of them could not come to lande at the place appoynted: ſo that Ceſar was conſtreyned to fraught thoſe that he could get, with a greater burden, and ſo departed from the coaſt of Britayne, and ſafely landed with the remnaunte of his people in Gallia with as good ſpeede as he cold haue deſired. He thought not good to leaue any of his people behinde him, knowing that if he ſhould ſo doe, they were in daunger to be caſt away. And ſo bycauſe he could not well remayne there all the winter ſeaſon for doubt of Rebellion in Gallia, he was contented to take vp, and returne thither, ſith he had done ſufficiently for the time, leaſt in coueting the more, hee mighte haue come in perili to loſe that whiche hee had already obteyned.

Thus according to that which Ceſar himſelfe and other autentike authors haue written, was Britayne made tributorie to the Romaynes by the Conduit of the ſame Ceſar. But our hiſtories farre differ from this, affirming, that Ceſar comming the ſecōd time, was by the Britaynes with valiancie, and martial prowes beaten, & repulſed, as he was at the firſt, and ſpecially by meanes ỳ Caſſiuclaune had pight in the Thames greate pyles of trees pyked with yron, through whych, his ſhippes being entred the riuer, were periſhed & loſt. And after his comming a land, he was banquiſhed in battell, & conſtreyned to flee into Gallia with thoſe ſhippes that remayned. For ioy of this ſeconde victory (ſaith Galfrid) Caſſibellane made a great feaſt at London, & ther did ſacrifice to the Gods. At which feaſt there fel variance betwixt two yong Gentlemen, the one named Herilda, nephew to Caſſibellan, & the other Euelyn, or Eweline, being of aliance to Androgeus Erle of Londō. They fell at diſcord about wraſtling, & after multiplying of wordes, they came to dealing of blowes, by meane whereof partes wer taken, ſo that there enſewed a ſore fray, in the whiche, diuers were wounded and hurt, and amōgſt other Herilda the kings Nephew was ſlayne by ỳ hands of Eweline. The K. ſore diſpleaſed herwith, meant to puniſh Eweline according to the order of his lawes, ſo that he was ſummoned to appeare in due forme to make anſwere to ỳ murder: but Eweline by the comforte of Androgeus diſobeyed the commonāce, and departed ỳ Court with Androgeus, in contempt of the king and his lawes. The K. to be reuenged vpon Androgeus, gathered a power, & began to make war on him. Androgeus perceiuing himſelfe not able to withſtand the Kings puiſſance, ſente letters to Julius Ceſar, exhorting him to returne into Britayne, & declaring the whole matter concerning ỳ variance betwixt him and the king, promiſing to ayd the Romaynes in all that he might. Julius Ceſar ioyfull of this meſſage, prepareth his naule, & with all ſpeede with a mightie hoſt embarqued in the ſame, commeth toward Britayne: but ere he would land, doubting ſome treaſon in Androgeus, he receyueth from him in hoſtage his ſonne named Scena, and thirty other of the beſt & moſt noble perſonages of all his dominion. After thys he landed, & ioyning with Androgeus, came into a valley neere to Canterbury, & there encamped. Shortly after commeth Caſſibellane with al his power of Britaynes, and giueth battell to ỳ Romanes. But after that the Britaynes had long

fought and knightly borne thẽſelues in that battell, Androgius came with his people on a wing, and ſo ſharply aſſayled them, that the Britaynes were conſtreyned to forſake the field, & toke thẽſelues to flight. The which flight ſo diſcomforted them, that finally they all fled, & gaue place to the Romanes, the which purſued and ſlew thẽ without mercy, ſo that Caſſibellane with the reſidue of his people withdrewe to a place of ſuretie, but beeing enuironed about with the puiſſance of the Romaynes, & of Androgeus, who had with him ſeuen thouſande men there in the ayd of the Romans, Caſſibellanin the end was enforced to fal to a cõpoſition, in couenaunting to pay an yerely tribute of three thouſand. ℔. Then when Ceſar had ordred his buſineſſe as he thought conuenient, he returned, & with him went Androgeus, fearing ẏ diſpleaſure of Caſſibellane. The reuerend father Bede writing of this mater, hath thus: After that Ceſar being returned into Gallia, had placed his ſouldiers abroade in the countrey to ſoiorne for ẏ winter ſeaſon, he cauſed Ships to be made ready, to the number of fiue C. with the which repaſſing again into Britaine, whileſt he marcheth forthe with a mighty army againſt ẏ enimies, his ſhips that lay at ancre being takẽ with a fore tempeſt, were either beaten one againſt another, or els caſt vpon the flats & ſands, and ſo broken, ſo that fortie of them were vtterly periſhed, and the reſidue with great difficultie were repaired. The horſemen of the Romaines at the firſt encounter were put to the worſe, & Labienus the Tribune ſlain. In the ſeconde conflict hee vanquiſhed the Britaines not without greate daunger of his people. After this, hee marcheth to the riuer of Thames which as thẽ was paſſable by fourde, only in one place and not elſe, as the reporte goeth. On the further banke of that riuer, Caſſibellane was encamped with an huge multitude of enimies, and had pight & ſet the banke, & almoſt all the fourde vnder the water, ful of ſharp ſtakes, the tokens of which vnto this day are to be ſeene, and it ſemeth to the beholders that euery of theſe ſtakes are as bigge as a mãs thigh, ſticking faſt in ẏ bottome of the riuer cloſed with leade. The whiche beeing perceyued of the Romaines, & auoyded, the Britaynes not able to ſuſteyne the violent impreſſion of the Romain legions, hid thẽſelues in ẏ woods, out of the which, by often iſſues, they greeuouſly & many times aſſailed the Romanes, & did them great domage. In the mean time, the ſtrong Citie of Trinouant with hir Duke Androgius deliuering fortie hoſtages, yelded vnto Ceſar, whoſe exãple many other Cities following, allyed thẽſelues with the Romains, by whoſe information Ceſar with fore fight toke at length the towne of Caſſibelan, ſituate betwixt two mariſhes, fenſed alſo with the couerte of woods, & hauing within it great plentie of all things. After this Ceſar returned into Fraunce, and beſtowed his armie in places to ſoiorne there for the winter ſeaſon.

So hath Campion, but Galfrid. Monu. hath fiue thouſande.

Thus muche hath Bede. The Scottiſh writers reporte, that the Britons after the Romaines were the firſte time repulſed (as before yee haue heard,) refuſed to receyue the ayde of the Scottiſhmen the ſecond time, & ſo were vanquiſhed, as in the Scottiſh hiſtories ye maye ſee more at length expreſſed. Thus much touching the warre which Julius Ceſar made againſt the Britons, in bringing them vnder tribute to the Romains. But heere is to be noted, that Ceſar did not vanquiſh al the Britons: for he came not amongſt the Northren men, only diſcouering & ſubduing ẏ part which lyeth towards the French ſeas: ſo that ſith other of the Romain Emperors did moſt earneſtly trauaile to bring the Britons vnder their ſubiection (whiche were euer redy to rebell ſo many ſundry tymes) Ceſar might ſeme rather to haue ſhewed Britain to the Romãs, thã to haue deliuered vnto them the poſſeſſion of the ſame. This ſubiection to the whiche he brought this Ile (what maner of one ſo euer it was) chanced about ẏ yere of the worlde. 3913. after ẏ building of Rome. 698. before the birth of our ſauior 53. the 1. and ſecond yere of the. 181. Olympiade, after the cõming of Brute. 1060. before the conqueſt made by Willia̅ duke of Normandie. 1120. and. 1629. yeres before this preſent yere of our lord 1576 as Harriſon hath ſet downe.

Cornelius Tacitus. In vit. Agr. Dion Caſſ.

After that Julius Ceſar had thus made the Britayns tributaries to ẏ Romaines, & was returned into Gallia, Caſſibelan reigned. 7. yeres, & was vanquiſhed in the ninth or tenth yere after he begã firſt to raigne, ſo ẏ he raigned in ẏ whole about. 15. or as ſome haue. 17. yeres, & then dyed, leauing no iſſue behinde him. There hath bin an old Chronicle (as Fabiã recordeth) which he ſaw & followeth much in his booke, wherein it is conteyned, that this Caſſibellane was not brother to Lud, but eldeſt ſon to him: for otherwiſe as maye be thought (ſaith he) Ceſar hauing the vpper hand would haue diſplaced him from the gouernemẽt, & ſet vp Androgeus the right heire to the crowne, as ſonne to the ſayd Lud. But what ſoeuer ours Chronicles or the Britiſh hiſtories report of this matter, it ſhoulde appeare by that whiche Ceſar writeth (as partly ye haue heard) that Britaine in thoſe days was not gouerned by one ſole prince, but by diuers, and that diuers cities were eſtates of themſelues, ſo that the lande was deuided into ſundry gouernments, muche after the forme and manner as Germany and Italy are in our time, where ſome Cities are gouerned by one onely Prince, ſome by the nobilitie, and ſome by the people. And whereas diuers of the rulers in thoſe dayes heere in thys lande were called Kings, thoſe had moze large ſeigniouries than the other, as Caſſibellane, who was therfoze called a king. And though we do admit this to be true, yet may it bee that in the beginning after that Brute entred the land, there was ozdeyned by him a Monarchie, as befoze is mentioned, which might cõtinue in his poſteritie many yeeres after, and yet at length befoze the comming of Ceſar, through emill diſſention, might happily be broken, and deuided into partes, and ſo remayned not only in ẏ time of this Caſſibellane, but alſo lõg after, whileſt they lined as tributaries to the Romanes, till finally they were ſubdued by the Saxons. In whiche meane time, through the diſcoꝛde, negligence, oꝛ rather vnaduiſed raſhneſſe of writers, hard it is to iudge what may be affirmed and receyued in their writings foꝛ a troth, namely concerning the ſucceſſion of the Kings that are ſayd to haue raigned betwixte the dayes of Caſſibellane, and the comming of the Saxons. The Romayne writers, (namely Tacitus) repoꝛt, that the Britaynes in times paſt were vnder the rule of Kings, and after being made tributaries, were drawen ſo by Princes into ſundry factions, that to defend and keepe off a cõmon ieoperdy, ſcarcely would two oꝛ three Cities agree togither, and take weapon in hande with one accoꝛde, ſo that whileſt they fought by partes, the whole was ouercome.

And after this ſoꝛte they ſaye that Brytayne was brought into the foꝛme of a prouince by the Romanes, from whome gouernours vnder the name of Legates and procurates were ſente that had the rule of it. But yet the ſame authoꝛs make mention of certayne kings (as hereafter ſhall appeare) the whiche, whileſt the Romaine Emperours had the moſt part of the earth in ſubiection, raigned in Britayne. The ſame witneſſeth Gildas ſaying: Britayne hathe Kings, but they are Tyrants: Judges it hathe, but the ſame are wicked, oftentimes ſpoyling and toꝛmenting the innocent people. And Ceſar (as ye haue heard) ſpeaketh of foure Kings that ruled in Kent, and therabouts. Coꝛnelius Tacitus maketh mention of Pꝛaſutagus, and Cogidunus, that were Kyngs in Britayne: and Iuuenall ſpeaketh of Aruiragus: and all the late writers of Lucius. Hereby it appeareth, that whether one oꝛ moe, yet Kings there were in Britayne, bearing rule vnder ẏ Romayne Emperours. On the other parte, the common opinion of our Chꝛonicle writers is, that ẏ chiefe gouernement remained euer with the Britaynes, and that the Romayne Senate receyuing an yeerely tribute, ſent certayne times (ex officio) their Emperours and Lieutenants into this Ile, to repꝛeſſe the rebellious tumultes therin begonne, oꝛ to beate backe the inuaſion of the enimies that went about to inuade it. And thus woulde thoſe writers inferre, that the Britaynes euer obeyed their King, till at length they were put beſide the gouernement by the Saxons. But where as in the common hiſtoꝛie of Englande, the ſucceſſion of Kings ought to be kepte, ſo ofte as it chanceth in the ſame, that there is not anye founde to fyll the place, then one while the Romane Emperours are placed in their ſteades, and another while their lieutenants, and are ſayde to be created Kings of the Britaines, as though the Emperours were inferiours vnto the Kings of Britaine, and that the Romane Lieutenants at their appoyntments, and not by pꝛeſcripte of the Senate oꝛ Emperours adminiſtred ẏ Pꝛouince. But this may ſuffice here to aduertiſe you of the contrarietie in writers, & now we will goe foꝛth in following our hiſtoꝛies, as we haue done heretofoꝛe, ſauing that where the Romaine hiſtoꝛies write of things done here by Emperors oꝛ their Lieutenants, it ſhall be ſhewed as reaſon requireth, ſith there is a great appearence of troth oftẽtimes in the ſame, as thoſe that be authoꝛiſed and allowed in the opinion of the learned.

Theomantius.

After ẏ deth of Caſſibelan, Theomãtius oꝛ Tenãtius the põgeſt ſonne of Lud, was made K. of Britayne in the yeere of the Woꝛld. 3921. after the building of Rome 702. and befoze the comming of Chꝛiſt. 45. He is named alſo in one of the Engliſhe Chꝛonicles Coꝛmace: but in the ſame Chꝛonicle it is conteyned, that not hee, but his bꝛother Andꝛogius was King, where Geffrey of Monmouth & other teſtifie, that Andꝛogus abãdoned the land clerely, and continued ſtill at Rome, bycauſe he knew the Britaynes hated him foꝛ the treaſon he hadde committed, in aiding Julius Ceſar againſt Caſſibellane. Theomantius ruled the land in good quiet, and paied the tribute to the Romanes whiche Caſſibellane had graunted, and finally departed this life after he had raigned. 22. yeares, & was buried at London.

brought vp at Rome, and there made Knight by Augustus Cesar, vnder whome hee serued in the warres, and was in suche fauour with him, that he was at libertie to pay his tribute or not.

Little other mention is made of his doyngs, except that during his raigne, the Sauiour of the world, our Lord Jesus Christ, the only sonne of God, was borne of a Virgin about the. 23. yeare of the reygne of this Kymbalyne, and in the. 42. of the Emperour Octauius Augustus, that is to witte, in the yeare of the Worlde. 3966. in the seconde yeare of the. 194. Touching the continuance of ỳ yeares of Kymbelines raigne, is some discordaunce amongst writers, but the best approued affirme, that he raigned. xxv. yeeres, and then dyed, and was buried at London, leauing behind hym two sonnes, Guiderius and Aruiragus.

Christ our Sauiour is borne

But heere is to be noted, that although our histories do affirme, that as well this Kymbeline, as also his father Theomantius, liued in quiet with the Romans, and continually to them payed the tributes which the Britons had couenanted with Julius Cesar to pay. Yet wee finde in the Romane writers, that after Julius Cesars death, when Augustus had taken vppon him the rule of the Empire, the Britaynes refused to pay that tribute: whereat as Cornelius Tacitus reporteth, Augustus, being otherwise occupied, was contented to winke, howbeit, through earnest calling vpon to recouer his right by such as were desirous to see the vttermost of the Britishe kingdome, at length, to witte, in the tenth yeere after the death of Julius Cesar, whiche was about the thirtenth yeere of the sayd Theomantius, Augustus made prouision to passe with an army ouer into Britayne, and was come forward vpon his iourney into Gallia Celtica: or as wee may say, into these hither partes of Fraunce.

But here receiuing aduertisements that ỳ Pannonians which inhabited the countrey now called Hungarie, and the Dalmatians whome now we call Slauons had rebelled, he thoughte it best first to subdue those Rebelles neere home, rather than to seeke newe countreys, and leaue suche in hazard whereof he had presente possession, and so turning his power against the Pannonians and Dalmatians, he left off for a time the warres of Britaine, whereby the lande remayned without feare of any inuasion to be made by ỳ Romains, till the yere after the building of the citie of Rome 725. and about the. 19. yere of king Theomantius raigne, ỳ Augustus with an army departed once gayne from Rome to passe ouer into Britayne, there to make warre, but after his commyng into Gallia, when the Britaynes sent to him certaine Ambassadors to treate with him of peace, he staied there to settle the state of things among the Gualles, for that they were not in very good order, & hauing finished there, he wēt into Spayne, and so his iourney into Britayne was put off til the next yeere, that is, the. 726. after the buildyng of Rome, which fell before the birth of our Sauiour. 25. about whiche time Augustus eftsoones meante the third time to haue made a voyage into Britayne, bycause they could not agree vppon couenaunts: But as the Pannonians and Dalmatians hadde afore time stayed him, when as before is sayde, hee meante to haue gone againste the Britaynes: so euen nowe the Sedatians, (a people inhabiting betwixt Italy, and Swetzerland,) the Cantabrians and Asturians by suche rebellious sturres as they reysed, withdrewe him from his purposed iourney. But whether this cōtrouersie which appeareth to fal forth betwixt the Britaynes and Augustus, was occasioned by Kymbeline or some other Prince of the Britaynes, I haue not to auouch: for that by our writers it is reported, that Kymbelyne being brought vp in Rome, and made Knighte in the Court of Augustus, euer shewed himselfe a friend to the Romanes, and chiefly was loth to breake with them, because the youth of the Britayne nation shoulde not bee depriued of the benefite to bee trayned and broughte vp among the Romaynes, whereby they mighte learne both to behaue themselues lyke ciuill men, and to attayne to the knowledge of feates of warre. But whether for this respect, or for that it pleased the Almightie God so to dispose the myndes of men at that present, not only the Britaynes, but in maner all other nations were contented to be obedient to the Romayne Empire. That thys was true in the Britaynes, it is euidente ynough by Straboes wordes, whiche are in effect as followeth. At this present (sayth he) certayne princes of Britayne, procuring by Ambassadors and dutifull demeanors the amitie of the Emperoure Augustus, haue offered in the Capitoll vnto the Goddes presentes or giftes, and haue ordeyned the whole Ile in a maner to be appertenant, proper and familiar to the Romaynes. They are burdened with fore customes whiche they pay for wares, eyther to be sent forth into Gallia, or brought from thence, whiche are commonly iuorie vessels, sheares, ouches, or carering, and other conceptes made of ambre, and glasses, and suche like manner of merchandise: so that nowe there is no neede of any army or garrison of menne of warre to keepe the Ile, for there needeth not past one legion of fotemen, or some wing of horsemen, to gather vp and receyue the tribute: for the charges are rated according to the quantitie of the tributes: for otherwise, it shoulde be needefull to abate the customes, if the tributes were also reysed: and if any violence shoulde be vsed, it were daungerous least they mighte be prouoked to rebellion. Thus farre Strabo.

Guiderius.

Guiderius the firste son of Kymbaline (of whome Harrison sayeth nothing,) beganne his raigne in the seuentenih yere after the incarnatiō of Christ. This Guiderius being a man of stout courage, gaue occasiō of breach of peace betwixt the Britaynes and Romaynes, denying to pay the tribute, and procuring the people to newe insurrections, the whyche by one meane or other made open rebellion, as Gildas hath. Whereupon, the Emperour Caligula (as some thinke,) toke occasion to leauie a power, and as one vtterly misliking the negligence (as he called it) of Augustus & Tiberius his predecessors, he meant not only to reduce the Iland vnto the former subiection, but also to search out the vttermost boundes thereof, to the behoofe of himselfe, and of the Romayne Monarchie.

Guiderius.

From henceforth yee shall finde the yere of the Lord in the margente.

Caligula.

Greate prouision therefore was made by the sayde Caligula to perfourme that noble enterprise, and this was in the fourth yeare of hys raigne. The lyke preparation was made on the other side by Guiderius, to resist the forayne enemies, so that hauing all things in a readinesse, he ceassed not dayly to looke for the comming of the Emperour, whome hee meante to receyue with harde entertaynemente if hee durst aduenture to set towarde Britayne. But see the sequeale: the Romayne army beeyng thus in a readinesse, departeth from Rome in the. 79. yeare after the buyloing of the Citie, and marching forthe,

at length commeth to the Belgique ſhore, from whence they might loke ouer, and beholde the cliffes and coaſt of Britaine, whiche Caligula & his men ſtood gasing vpō with great admiratiō & wonder. Furthermore he cauſed them to ſtand in battel array vpon the coaſt, where he heard, howe the Britaynes were in a redineſſe to withſtande his entrāce: but he entring into his galley, as nothing diſcouraged wᵗ theſe newes, rowed a ſlight ſhot or two from the ſhore, and forthwith returned, & then going vp into an high place like a pulpet, framed & ſet vp there for the nonce, he gaue ẏ token to fight vnto his ſouldiers by ſound of trūpet, and therewith was each man charged to gather cockle ſhels vpō the ſhore, which he called the ſpoyle of the Ocean, and cauſed them to be layde vp vntill a time cōueniente. With the atchieuing of this exployt (as hauing none other wherewith to beautifie his triumph) he ſeemed greatly exalted, thinking that now he had ſubdued the whole Ocean, and therefore highly rewarded his ſouldiers for their paynes ſuſteyned in that collection of cockle ſhelles, as if they had done him ſome notable peece of ſeruice. He alſo carried of the ſame ſhelles with him to Rome, to the ende he myghte there boaſt of his voyage, and bragge how well he had ſped: and required therefore very earneſtly to haue a triumph decreede vnto him for the accompliſhment of this enterpriſe. But whē he ſaw the Senate grudge at the free and liberall graunting of a grace in that behalfe, and perceiued how they refuſed to attribute deuine honors vnto him, in recompence of ſo fooliſh an enterpriſe, it wanted little that he had not ſlayne them euery one. From thence therefore he wente vp into a throne or royall ſeate, and calling therewith the commō people about him, he tolde them a long tale what aduentures had chanced to him in his conqueſt of the Ocean, and when hee perceyued them to ſhoute and crie, as if they had conſented that hee ſhould haue bin a God for this his greate trauell and valiant prowes, he to increaſe their clamour, cauſed great quantities of golde and ſiluer to bee ſcattered amongſt them, in the gathering whereof, many were preſſed to deathe, and diuers alſo ſlayne with ẏ inuenomed caltrops of iron, which he did caſt out with the ſayd money, of purpoſe to doe miſchiefe, the ſame caltrops beeing in forme ſmall and ſharp, ſo that by reaſon of the preaſſe of people, muche hurte was done by them ere they were perceyued. And this was the ende of the ridiculous voyage of Caligula attempted againſt the Britaynes.

The ſpoyle of the Ocean.

Suetonius. But after the death of this Caligula, the Emperoure Claudius (as Suetonius hath,) moued warre againſt the Britaynes, becauſe of a ſturre and Rebellion reyſed in that lande, for that ſuche fugitiues as were fled from thence, were not againe reſtored when requeſt was made for the ſame.

Dion Caſſius writeth, how one Bericus, being expelled out of Britayne, perſwaded ẏ Emperoure Claudius to take the warre in hande at this time againſt the Britaynes, ſo that one Aulus Plautius a Senator, and as then Prætor, was appoynted to take the army that ſoiourned in Fraunce then called Gallia, and to paſſe ouer with the ſame into Britayne. The Souldyers hearing of thys voyage, were loth to goe with him, as men not willing to make warre in another worlde: and therefore delayed tyme, till at length one Narciſſus was ſente from Claudius (as it were) to appeaſe ẏ ſouldiers, & procure thē to ſet forward. But whē this Narciſſus wēt vp into the tribunal throne of Plautius, to declare ẏ cauſe of his comming, ẏ Souldiers taking great indignation therewith cried, O Saturnalia, as if they ſhould haue celebrated their feaſt day ſo called. When the ſeruants apparrelled in their maiſters robes, repreſented the roumth of their maiſters, and were ſerued by them, as if they hadde bin their ſeruants, and thus at length conſtreyned through very ſhame, they agreed to followe Plautius. Herevpon being embarqued, he deuided his nauie into three partes, in the ende, that if they were kept off from arriuing in one place, yet they might take land in another. The Shippes ſuffered ſome impeachment in their paſſage by a contrary winde that droue them backe againe: but yet the Marriners and men of warre taking good courages vnto them, the rather becauſe there was ſeene a fyery leame to ſhote out of the Eaſt towardes the Weſt, which way their courſe lay, made forwarde againe with their Shippes, and landed without finding anye reſiſtaunce. For the Britaynes loked not for their comming: wherefore, when they hearde howe their enimies were a lande, they gote them into the Woddes and marſſes, truſting that by lingering of tyme

the Romaynes would be conſtreyned to departe, as it had chanced in time paſt to Julius Ceſar aforeſayd.

Plautius therefore had muche adoe to fynde them out, but after hee had found them, firſte hee banquiſhed Cataratacus, and after Togodumnus the ſonnes of Cynobellinus: for theyr father was dead not very long before. Theſe therefore fleeing their wayes, Plautius receyued parte of the people called Bodumni (which were ſubiects vnto them that were called Catuellani) into the obeyſance of the Romaynes: and ſo leauing there a garriſon of Souldiers, he paſſed further till hee came to a riuer whiche coulde not well be paſſed without a bridge: wherevppon the Britaynes toke ſmall regard to defend ẏ paſſage, as though they had bin ſure inough. But Plautius appointed a certaine number of Germaynes whyche he had there with him (being vſed to ſwimme ouer riuers, although neuer ſo ſwift) to get ouer, whiche they did, ſleaing & wounding the Britaynes Horſes whiche were faſtned to their waggens or Charrets, ſo that the Britaynes were not able to doe anye peece of their accuſtomed ſeruice with the ſame.

Herewith alſo was Flauius Veſpaſianus (that afterwards was Emperour) with his brother Sabinus ſent ouer that riuer, which beeyng gote to the further ſide, ſlewe a greate number of the enimies. The reſidue of the Britaynes fled, but the nexte daye proffered newe battell, in the which they alſo fought ſo ſtoutly, that the victory depended long in doubtfull ballance, till C. Sidius Geta being almoſt at poynt to be taken, did ſo handle the matter, that the Britaynes finally were put to flight: for the whiche his valiant doings, triumphante honors were beſtowed vpon him although he was no Conſul.

The Britaynes after this Battell, withdrew to the Riuer of Thames, nere to the place where it falleth into the Sea, and knowing the ſhallowes and firme places thereof, eaſily paſſed ouer to the further ſide, whome the Romanes following through lacke of knowledge in the nature of the places, they fel into ẏ mareſſe grounds, and ſo came to loſe many of their men, namely of the Germaynes, which were the firſt that paſſed ouer the Riuer to follow the Britaines, partly by a bridge whiche lay within the countrey ouer the ſayde Riuer, and partly by ſwimming, and other ſuch ſhift as they preſently made. The Britaynes hauing loſt one of theyr Rulers, that is to witte, Togodumnus, of whome yee haue hearde before, were nothing diſcouraged, but rather the more egrely ſet on reuenge. Plautius perceyuing their fiercenes, went no further, but ſtayed and placed garriſons in ſtedes, where neede required, to keepe thoſe places whiche hee had gotten, and with al ſpeede ſent aduertiſemẽt vnto Claudius, accordingly to that he habde in commaundement, if any vrgent neceſſitie ſhould ſo moue him. Claudius therefore hauing all things before hand in a readineſſe, ſtreightwayes vpon the receyuing of the aduertiſement, departed from Rome, and came by water vnto Oſtia, and from thence vnto Maſſilia, & ſo through Fraunce, ſped his iourneys till hee came to ẏ ſide of the Occean ſea, and then embarquing hymſelfe with his people, paſſed ouer into Britaine, & came to his army which abode his cõming neere to ẏ Thames ſide, where being ioined, they paſſed the Riuer agayne, fought with the Britaines in a pight fielde, and getting the victory, toke the towne of Camalodunum, whiche was the chiefeſt Citie appertayning vnto Cynobelinus. Hee reduced alſo many other people into his ſubiection, ſome by force, and ſome by ſurrender, wherof he was called oftentimes by the name of Emperour, which was againſt the ordinance of ẏ Romanes: for it was not lawfull to any to take ẏ name vppon him, oftner than once in any one voyage.

Moreouer, Claudius toke from the Britaynes their armor and weapons, and committed the gouernement of them vnto Plautius, cõmaunding him to endeuor himſelfe to ſubdue the reſidue.

Thus hauing brought vnder a parte of Britayne, and hauing made his abode therein not paſt a firteene dayes, he departed, and came backe agayne to Rome with victory in ẏ ſixth moneth after his ſetting forth from thence, gyuing after his returne, to his ſon, the ſurname of Britannicus. Dion Caſſius. Suetonius.

This warre he finiſhed, in manner as before is ſayd, in the fourth yeare of his raigne, why che fell in the yeare of the worlde. 4011. and after the birth of our Sauioure. 44. after the building of Rome. 79.

There be that write, how Claudius ſubdued and added to the Romaine Empire, the Iſles of Orkney, ſituate in the Northy Ocean beyonde Britayne, which might well be brought to paſſe eyther by Plautius, or ſome other his Lieutenant: for Plautius indeede for his noble prowes and valiant actes atchieued in Britayne, afterwards triumphed. Titus the ſonne of Veſpaſian alſo wanne no ſmall prayſe for deliuering hys father out of daunger in his time, being beſette with a company of Britaynes, whiche the ſayde Titus bare downe and put to flight with greate ſlaughter. Beda following ỳ authoritie of Suetonius, writeth briefly of this matter, and ſayth, that Claudius paſſing ouer into this Iſle, to the whiche neyther before Julius Ceſar, nor after him any ſtraunger durſt come, within few days receyued the moſt part of the countrey into hys ſubiection without battell or bloudſhed.

Gildas alſo writing of this reuolting of the Britaynes, ſayth thus, when information thereof was gyuen to the Senate, and that hall was made with a ſpeedy army to reuenge the ſame, there was no warlike nauie prepared in the Sea to fyghte valiantly for defence of the countrey, no ſquare battell, no right wing, nor any other prouiſion appoynted on the ſhore to bee ſeene, but the backes of the Britaynes in ſtead of a ſhielde are ſhewed to the perſecuters, and their neckes ready to bee cutte off with the ſworde through colde feare running through their bones, whiche ſtretched forth their handes to be bound like womanly creatures, ſo that a common Prouerbe followed thereof, whiche was commonly vſed and ſpoken, that the Britaynes were neyther valiant in warre, nor faythfull in peace: and ſo the Romaynes ſleaing many of the Rebelles, reſeruing ſome, and bringing them to bondage, that the lande ſhoulde not lye altogither vntilled and deſert, returned into Italy out of that lande which was voyde of wine and oile, leauing ſome of their men there for gouernors to chaſtiſe the people, not ſo muche with an army of men, as with ſcourge and whippe, and if the matter ſo required, to apply the naked ſworde vnto theyr ſydes: ſo that it might be accompted Rome and not Britayne. And what coigne eyther of braſſe, ſiluer, or golde there was, the ſame to be ſtamped with the Image of the Emperoure. Thus farre Gildas.

In the Britiſh hiſtorie we finde other report as thus, that Claudius at his comming a lande at Porcheſter, beſieged that towne, to the reſkew whereof came Guinderius, and giuing battell to the Romaynes, put them to the worſe, till at length, one Hamo, beeyng on the Romaynes ſyde, chaunged hys ſhielde and armoure, apparellyng hymſelfe lyke to a Britayne, and ſo entring into the thickeſt preaſſe of the Britiſhe hoſt, came at length to the place where the King was, and there ſlewe him. But Aruiragus perceyuing this miſchiefe, to the ende the Brytaines ſhoulde not be diſcouraged therewith, he cauſed himſelfe to be adorned with the Kings coate armour, and other abiliments, and ſo as Kyng continued the fight with ſuch manhood, that the Romaynes were put to flighte. Claudius fleeing backe to hys Shippes, and Hamo to the nexte Woodde, whome Aruiragus purſued, and at length droue hym vnto the Sea ſyde, and there ſlewe hym ere hee coulde take

the

Hamo to the nerte woodes, whome Aruiragus purſued, and at length, droue him vnto the Sea ſide, and there ſlewe hym ere hee coulde take the hauen which was there at hand, ſo that the ſame hauen toke name of hym, and was called long tyme after Hamons hauen, and at length by corruption of ſpeeche, it was called Hampton, and ſo continueth vnto thys day commonly called Southampton.

Thus haue you heard howe Guyderius or Guinderius (whether you will) came to his ende, which chanced (as ſome write) in the. 28. yeare of his raigne.

Aruiragus.

ARuiragus ỹ yõgeſt ſon of Kimbelyne, & brother to Guinderius, becauſe the ſame Guinderius lefte no iſſue to ſucceede him, was admitted Kyng of Britayne in the yere of oure Lord. 45. or rather. 46.

This Aruiragus, otherwiſe called by the Britaynes Meuricus or Mabus, of Tacitus Praſutagus, is alſo named Armager in ỹ Engliſhe Chronicle, by whiche Chronicle (as it appeareth) he bare hymſelfe ryght manfully againſt Claudius and his Romaynes in the warre whyche they made agaynſte hym: in ſo muche, that when Claudius hadde renued his force and wonne Pozcheſter, and after came to beſiege Wincheſter, (in the whiche Aruiragus as then was encloſed,) Aruiragus aſſembling his power, was ready to come forth and giue Claudius battell: wherevppon, Claudius doubting the ſequele of the thing, ſente meſſengers vnto Aruiragus to treate of concord, and ſo by compoſition, the matter was taken vp, with condition, that Claudius ſhoulde gyue his daughter Geniſſa in marriage vnto Aruiragus, and Aruiragus ſhuld acknowledge to holde hys Kingdome of the Romaynes.

Some write that Claudius in fauour of the ballant prowes which he ſaw and found in Aruiragus, honored not only hym with the marriage of hys daughter the ſayd Geniſſa, but alſo to the ende to make the Towne more famous where this marriage was ſolemnized, hee therefore called it Glaudioceſtria, after his name, the whiche in the Britiſhe tong was called before that daye Caerleon, and after Glouernia, of a Duke that ruled in Demetia, that heyght Gluup, but now it is called Glowceſter.

Other there be that write, how Claudius being vanquiſhed in battell by Aruiragus, was compelled by the ſayde Aruiragus to giue vnto him his ſayde daughter to wife, with condition as before is mentioned: and that then Aruiragus was crowned King of Britayne But Sueto- Suetonius.
nius may ſeme to repugne this part of the Britiſh hiſtory, the whyche in the life of Claudius witneſſeth, that he had by three wiues only three daughters, that is to ſay, Claudia, Antonia, and Octauia: and further, that reputing Claudia not to be his, cauſed hir to be caſt downe at the dore of his wife Herculanilla, whome he had forſaken by way of diuorcement. And that hee beſtowed his daughter Antonia firſt on Cn. Pompeius Magnus, and after on Fauſtus Silla, right noble yong men: and Octauia, he matched with Nero his wiues ſonne, whereby it ſhoulde appeare, that this ſuppoſed marriage betwixte Aruiragus and the daughter of Claudius, is but a fayned tale.

And heere to ſpeake my fancy alſo what I thynke of this Aruirogus, and other the Kyngs whome Galfrid and ſuch as haue followed hym do regiſter in order, to ſucceede one after another: I will not denie but ſuche perſons there were, and the ſame happily bearing very great rule in the lande, but that they reigned as abſolute kings ouer the whole, or that they ſucceeded one after another in manner as is auouched by the ſame writers, it ſeemeth moſt vnlyke to bee true: for rather it may bee geſſed by that whyche as well Gildas as the olde approued Romayne writers haue written, that diuers of theſe Kyngs lyued about one time, or in tymes greatly differing from thoſe tymes, whyche in oure writers wee finde noted: as for enſample, Iuuenall maketh thys Aruiragus of whome we nowe entreate, to raigne about Domitians tyme. For my parte therefore, ſith this order of the Britiſhe Kingly ſucceſſion in thys place is more eaſie to be flatly denyed and vtterly reproued, than eyther wiſely defended, or truly amended, I will referre the reforming thereof, vnto thoſe that haue perhappes ſeene more than I haue, or more deepely conſidered the thyng, to trie out an vndoubted truth: and in the meane tyme, I haue thoughte good, both to ſhewe what I fynde in oure hyſtories, and likewiſe in the forrayne writers, to the which we thynke namely in thys behalfe, whyleſt the Romaynes gouerned there, we may eaſily gyue moſt credit: doe wee otherwiſe neuer ſo muche contente ourſelues with other vayne and fonde conceytes.

To proceede yet with the Hiſtory as wee fynde it by our writers ſet forth: It is reported, that after the ſolemnization of thys marriage, whyche was done with all honor that myghte bee deuiſed, Claudius ſente certayne legions of Souldyers forth to goe into Irelande to Legions of Souldiers ſent into Irelande.

ſubdue that countrey, and returned himſelfe to Rome.

After his departure, Aruiragus rode about to viewe the ſtate of hys Realme, repayring Cities and Townes decayed by the warre of the Romaynes, and ſawe hys people gouerned with ſuche iuſtice and good order, that hee was both dreadde, and greatly beloued: ſo that in tract of tyme, hee grewe very welthie, and by reaſon thereof, fell into pride, ſo that he denyed his ſubiection to the Romaynes. Wherevpon Claudius appoynted Veſpaſian with an army to goe as Lieutenant into Bryttayne, the whiche iourney was to him the beginning of his aduancemente to that honor, whiche after to him moſt luckily ſucceeded. But if wee ſhall credite our Britayne writers, he gayned not muche at Aruiragus handes, for where he woulde haue landed at Sandwich or Richbourrow, Aruiragus was ready to reſiſt hym, ſo as he durſt not once enter the hauen: for Aruiragus had there ſuche a puiſſaunte number of armed menne, that the Romaynes were afrayde to approche the lande.

Veſpatian therefore withdrewe from thence, and coaſting Weſtwarde, landed at Totnes, and comming to Exeter, beſieged that Citie: but about the ſeuenth day after he hadde planted hys ſiege, came Aruiragus, and gaue him battell, in the which both the Armies ſuſteyned greate loſſe of men, and neyther parte got any aduantage of the other. On the morrowe after, the Queene Geniſſa made them friendes, and ſo the warres ceaſſed.

But ſeeing that (as before I haue ſayde) the troth of this hiſtorie may be greatly miſtruſted, yee ſhall heare what the Romayne writers ſay of Veſpaſianus being here in Bryttayne, beſide that whiche wee haue already recited out of Dion in the lyfe of Guiderius.

In the dayes of the Emperoure Claudius, through fauour of Narciſſus (one that myghte do all with Claudius) the ſayde Veſpaſian was ſente as Coronell or Lieutenaunt of a legion of Souldiers into Germany, and beeyng remoued from thence into Bryttayne, hee fought thirtie ſeuerall tymes with the enimies, and brought vnto the Romayne obeyſance, two moſt mightie nations, and aboue twentie Townes, togither with the Ile of Wight, and theſe exployctes hee atchieued, partly vnder the conduct of Aulus Plautius that was Ruler of Bryttayne for the Emperour Claudius, and partly vnder the ſame Emperour himſelfe. For as it is euident by writers of good credite, hee came firſt ouer into Bryttayne with the ſayd Aulus Plautius, and vnder him ſerued right valiantly, as before in place wee haue partly touched. By Tacitus it appeareth, that he was called to be partener in the gouernment of things in Bryttayne with Claudius, and had ſuch ſucceſſe, as it appeared to what eſtate of honor hee was predeſtinate, hauing conquered nations, and taken Kings priſoners. But nowe to make an ende with Aruiragus: At length whē hee perceyued that hys force was too weake to preuayle agaynſte the Romayne Empire, and that hee ſhoulde ſtriue but in vayne to ſhake the yoke of ſubiection from the neckes of the Bryttaynes, hee made a ſtiall peace with them nowe in hys olde age, and ſo continued in quiete the reſidue of hys raigne, whyche hee laſtly ended by deathe, after hee hadde gouerned the lande by the ſpace of thirtie yeeres, or but eyght and twentie, as ſome other doe imagine. He dyed in the yeere of grace. 73. as one Authoure affirmeth, and was buried at Glouceſter.

In the dayes of this Aruiragus, about the yeare yeare of Christ. 52. Joseph of Aramathia (whych buried the body of our Sauioure, beeing sente by Philippe the Apostle (as John Bale, followyng the authoritie of Gildas and other Britishe writers reciteth.) After that the Christians were dispersed out of Gallia, came into Britayne with diuers other godly Christian men, and preaching the Gospell there amongst the Britaynes, and instructing thē in the faith and lawes of Christ, conuerted many to the true belicke, and baptised them in the wholesome water of regeneration, and there continued all the residue of his lyfe, obteyning of the King a plotte of grounde where to inhabite, not past a foure miles from Welles, and there with his fellowes began to lay the first foundation of that true and perfect Religion, in which place (or neere thereunto) was afterward erected the Abbey of Glastenbury.

Nicephorus writeth in his second Booke and fourth Chapter, that one Simon Zelotes came likewise into Britayne. And Theodoretus in his 9. Booke de Curandis Græcorū affectibus sheweth, that Paule being released of his secōd imprisonment, and suffered to departe from Rome, preached the Gospell to the Britaynes and to other nations in the West.

The same thing in manner doth Sophronius the Patriarke of Jerusalem witnesse. Tertullian also may bee a witnesse of the auncientie of the fayth receyued heere in Britayne, where hee writing of these times sayeth: Those places of ỹ Britaines to the whiche the Romaynes coulde not approche, were subiect vnto Christ, as were also the countreys of Sarmatia, Dacia, Germania, Scithia, and others.

Thus it may appeare, that ỹ Christian religion was planted here in this lande shortly after Christs time, although it certaynely appeare not who were the firste that preached the Gospell to the Britaynes, nor whether they were Grekes or Latines.

Cornelius Tacitus writeth, that the Romayne Emperoures in this season gouerned this land by Lieutenantes and Threasorers, the which were called by the name of Legates and Procurators, thereby to keepe the inhabitantes the better in order. Treasorers or recyuers.

And Aulus Plautius a noble man of Rome of the order of Consuls, was sente hither as the first Legate or Lieutenant (in maner as before ye haue heard) and after him Ostorius Scapula, the whiche Scapula at his comming, founde the Ile in trouble, the enimies hauing made inuasiō into the countrey of those that were frends to the Romaynes, the more presumptuously, for that they thought, a new Lieutenaunt with an army to him vnaquaynted and commen ouer nowe in the beginning of Winter, woulde not be hable to march forth against them. But Ostorius vnderstanding, that by the firste successe and chance of warre, feare or hope is bredde and augmented, hasteth forwarde to encounter with them, and such as he findeth abroade in the countrey he sleath downe right on euery side, and pursueth such as fledde, to the ende they shoulde not come togither againe: and for that a displeasant and a doubtfull peace was not like to bring quietnesse eyther to him or to his army, hee toke from such as he suspected, theyr armour. And after this, hee goeth about to defende the ryuers of Auon and Seuerne, with placing his souldiers in campes fortified neere to the same. But the Oxfordshire menne and other of those parties would not suffer hym to accomplish his purpose in any quiet sort, being a puissant kynd of people, & not hitherto weakened by warres: for they willingly at the firste had ioyned in amitie with the Romaines. The Countreys adioyning also beeing induced by their procurements, came to thē, and so they chose forth a plotte of grounde, fensed with a mightie ditche, vnto the whiche there was no way to enter but one, and the same very narrowe, so as the horsemen could not haue any easie passage to breake in vpon them. Ostorius, although he hadde no legioneste Souldiers, but certayne bandes of aydes, marcheth forthe towards the place within the which the Britaines were lodged, and assaulting them in the same, breaketh through into their camp, wher the Britaynes being impeached with their owne inclosiers whiche they had reysed for defense of the place, knowing how for their rebellion, they were like to finde smal mercy at the Romaynes hāds, when they sawe now no way to escape, layde about them manfully, and shewed greate proofe of their valiant stomackes.

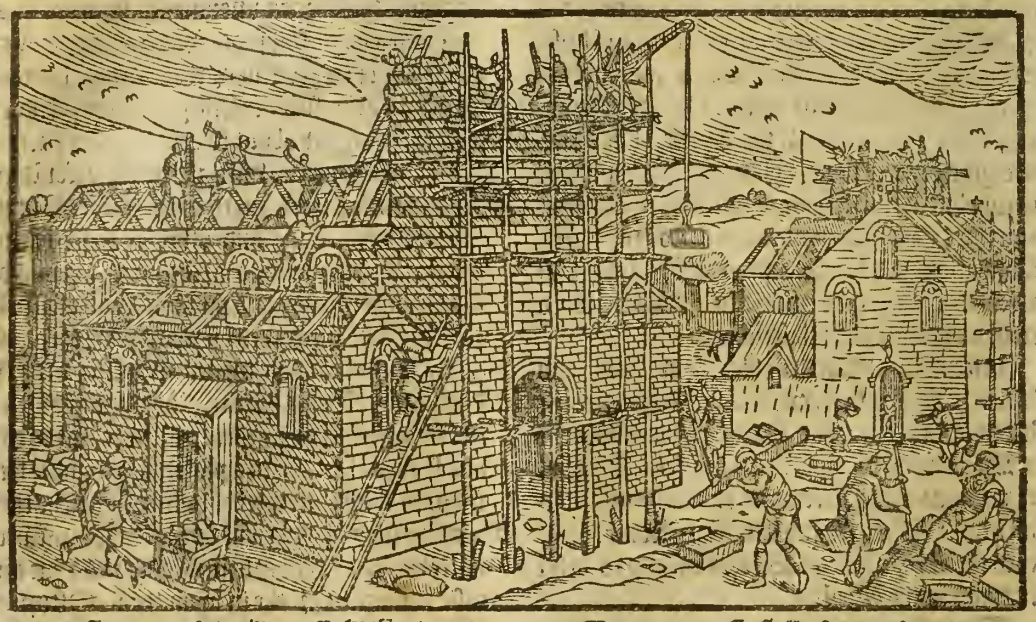
Cor. Tacitus lib. 12.

Cornelius Tacit. lib. 12.

In this battell, the sonne of the Lieutenante M. Ostorius deserued the prise and commendation of preseruing a Citizen out of the enimies hands. Which was a certayne Crowne, to be set on his head called ciuica corona.

But nowe with this ſlaughter of the Oxeforoſhire menne, dyuers of the Britaynes that ſtoode doubtfull what way to take, eyther to reſt in quiet, or to moue warres, were contented to bee reformable vnto a reaſonable order of peace, and ſo Oſtorius leadeth hys armye againſte the people called Cangi, that inhabited that parte of Wales that nowe is called Denbighſhire, whiche countrey hee ſpoyled on euery ſide, no enemie once daring to encounter him: and if any of them aduentured priuily to ſet vpon thoſe whiche they founde behinde, or on the outſides of his army, they were cut ſhortere they could eſcape out of daunger. Whereupon, hee marched ſtraighte to their campe, and giuing them battell, vanquiſheth them. And vſing the victory as reaſon moued him, he leadeth his army againſte thoſe that inhabited the inner partes of Wales, ſpoyling the countrey on euery ſide.

Cangi.



And thus ſharply purſuing the Rebells, he approched neere to the Sea ſide, whiche lyeth ouer againſt Ireland.

Whileſt this Romane Captayne is thus occupied, hee was called backe by the Rebellion of the Yorkeſhire men, whome forthwith vppon his comming vnto them, he appeaſed, puniſhyng the firſt authors of that tumult with death.

In the meane tyme, the people called Silures, beeyng a very fierce kynde of menne, and right valiante, prepare to make warre againſte the Romaynes, for they might not bee bowed neyther with roughneſſe, nor yet with any curteous handling, ſo that they were to be tamed by an army of legionary ſouldiers to be brought among them. Cor. Tacitus lib. 12.

Therefore to reſtrayne the furious rage of thoſe people and their neighbours, Oſtorius peopled a Towne neere to their borders, called Camulodunũ with certayne bandes of olde Souldiers, there to inhabite with theyr Wiues, and children, according to ſuch manner as was vſed in like caſes of placing naturall Romaynes in any Towne or Citie, for the more ſuretie and defence of the ſame.

Here alſo was a temple builded in the honor of Claudius the Emperour, where were two Images erected, one of the Goddeſſe Victoria, and an other of Claudius himſelfe. But nowe there reſteth a great doubt among writers, where thys Citie or Towne called Camulodunum dyd ſtand of ſome and not without good grounde of probable coniectures, gathered vpon the aduiſed conſideration of the circumſtances of that whych in olde authors is found written of this place, it is thought to be Colcheſter. But verily by thys place of Tacitus it may ſeeme rather to be ſome other towne, ſituate more Weſtward than Colcheſter, ſith a colonie of Romaine Souldiers were planted there to bee at hande, for the repreſſing of the vnquiet Silures, whiche by conſent of moſt writers inhabited in Southwales, or neere the Welch Marches.

Camulodunũ Colcheſter.

Silures where they inhabited

There was a Caſtell of great fame in tymes paſt that hight Cameletum, or in Britiſhe Caermalet, whiche ſtoode in the Marches of Sommerſetſhire: but ſith there is none that hathe ſo written before thys tyme, I will not ſaye that happily ſome error hathe growen by miſtakyng the name of Camalodunum, for this Camaletum by ſuch as haue copyed forthe the Booke of Cornelius Tacitus, and yet ſo it myght be done by ſuche as found it ſhort, or vnperfectly written, namely, by ſuche ſtraungers or other, to whome onely the name of Camulodunum was onely knowne, and Camaletum peraduenture neuer ſeene nor heard of. As for enſample, an Engliſhman that hath heard of Waterforde in Ireland, and not of Werforde, might in taking forthe a copie copie of ſome writing eaſily committe a faulte in noting the one for the other.

We fynde in Ptolomei Camudolon to bee a Citie belonging to the Trinobantes, and he maketh mention alſo of Camulodunum, but Humfrey Lhuyde thinketh that hee meaneth all one Citie.

Notwithſtanding, Polidore Vergill is of a contrary opinion, ſuppoſing the one to be Colcheſter indeede, and the other that is Camelodunum to be Duncaſter or Pontfret. Leland eſteeming it to be certaynely Colcheſter, taketh the Iceni alſo to be the Northfolke men. But howe ſo euer we ſhall take thys place of Tacitus, it is euidente ynough that Camulodunum ſtoode not farre from the Thaynes. And therefore to ſeeke it with Hector Boetius in Scotlande, or with Polidore Vergill ſo farre as Doncaſter or Pontfret, it may bee thought a playne error: but to leaue each man to his owne iudgemente in a matter ſo doubtfull (as to many it ſeemeth to be) we will proceede with the hiſtorie, touching the warres betwixte the Romaynes and the Sylurians, againſte whome (truſting not only vppon theyr owne manhode, but alſo vppon the hygh prowes and valiantie of Caractacus) Oſorius ſet forwarde. Caractacus excelled in fame aboue all other the Princes of Britaine, aduanced thereto by many doubtfull aduentures and many proſperous exployte whiche in his tyme he hadde atchieued: but as hee was in policie and aduauntage of place better prouided than the Romaines: ſo in power of Souldiers hee was ouermatched. And therefore he remoued the warre into the partes of that countrey where the Ordouices inhabited, whiche are thoughte to haue dwelled in the bordures of Shropſhire, Cheſhire, and Lancaſhire, the which people togither with other that miſliked of the Romayne gouernemente, he toyned in one, and choſe forthe a plotte of grounde moſt for his aduantage, determining there to trie the vttermoſt hazarde of Mars his iudgemente.

The place whyche he thus choſe was ſuch, as the entries, the backwayes, and the whole ſituation thereof made for the Britaynes aduauntage, and cleane contrarye to the Romaynes, enclofed amongſt high hilles, and if there were any eaſie paſſage to enter it vppon any ſyde, the ſame was ſhutte vp with mightie huge ſtones in manner of a rampire, and afore it there ranne a riuer without any certayne fourde to paſſe ouer it.

This place is ſuppoſed of ſome to lye in the confynes of Shropſhire aloft vppon the toppe of an hygh hyll there, enuironed with a triple rampire and ditch of great depth, hauing three entries into it, not directly one againſte an other, but aſlope.

It is alſo (ſaye they) compaſſed aboute with two Riuers, to witte, on the lefte hand with the Riuer called Clun, and on the ryght with an other Riuer called Teude. In three fydes there of, the clime is very ſteepe and headlong, and no way eaſie to come vnto it, but onely one.

Caratacke hauyng thus fortified hymſelfe within thys place, and broughte his army into it: hee to encourage hys people, exhorted them to ſhewe theyr manhode, affirmyng that to bee the daye, and that army to bee the ſame wherein ſhoulde appeare the beginnyng eyther of libertie, then to bee recouered, or elſe of perpetuall bondage for euer to be ſubieyned.

He rehearſed alſo ſpecially by name thoſe their elders, whiche hadde reſiſted Julius Ceſar, by whoſe high valiantie they lyued free from the bloudy thraldome and tributes of the Romayns, and enioyed theyr Wiues and children ſafe and vndefiled. And thus diſcourſing of many thyngs with them, in ſuch hope of aſſured victory, that they began to reyſe theyr cries, eache one for himſelfe declaring, that he was bound by the dutie he ought to the Gods of his countrey, not to ſhrinke for feare of any woundes or hurtes that might chaunce vnto them by the enimies weapon.

Thys cheerefulneſſe of the Britaynes, greatly aſtonied the Romayne Lieutenant. The hideous courſe alſo of the Riuer before his face, the fortificatiõs and craggie height of the hilles, all ſet full of enimies ready to beate him backe, putte him in greate feare: for nothyng he ſawe afore him, but that whiche ſeemed dreadfull to thoſe that ſhould aſſayle. But the Souldiers yet ſeemed to be very deſirous of battayle, requeſting him to bring them to it, proteſting that nothyng was able to reſiſt the force of noble prowes. Herewith the Captaynes and Tribunes diſcourſing the like, pricked forwarde the earneſt willes whiche theyr Souldiers had to fighte.

Oſorius perceyuing ſuche courage and readie willes in the menne of warre, as well Souldiers as Captaynes, hee beganne to beſturre himſelfe, and left nothing vndone that myghte ſerue to ſet forwarde theyr earneſt deſire to battell.

And hauing aduiſedly conſidered whiche wayes were harde, and impoſſible to bee entred vpon, and whyche places were moſt eaſie for hys people to finde paſſage by, he leadeth them forth, beeing moſt earneſtly beaute to cope with theyr enymies. Cornelius Tacitus. Annal. lib. 12.

Hee paſſed the water without anye greate difficultie, but comming to the rampyre, he loſt many of his people, ſo lõg as the fight was cõtinued nued with ſhotte and caſting of dartes: but after that the Romaynes couering them ſelues with theyr targets, came once cloſe togither, and approched vnder ẏ Rampire, they remoued away ẏ ſtones which ẏ Britaynes had roughly couched togither, and ſo they came to ioyne with them at handblowes. The Britaynes being vnarmed, and not able to abide the force of the armed men, withdrew to ẏ top of the hilles, but as well theyr enimies that were light armed as the other with heauie armoure followed and brake in among them, ſo as the Britaynes coulde not turne them any way forth to eſcape, for the light armed mẽ with ſhot a farre off, and the heauie armed with weapons at hand, ſought to make ſlaughter and wracke of them on eache ſide, ſo that this was a right dolefull day vnto the Britaynes.

The wife and daughter of Caratake were taken priſoners, and his breethren alſo yeelded thẽſelues. He himſelfe eſcaped, and committing hys perſon vnto the aſſurance and truſt of Cartemãdua Queene of the Brigantes, was by hir delyuered into the hands of the Romaynes.

This was a nine yeres after ẏ warres in Britayne firſte began. His name being brought forth of the Iſles, was already ſpredde ouer the prouinces adioyning, and began nowe to growe famous through Italy. Men therefore were deſirous to ſee what manner of man he was that had ſo many yeeres ſet at naught the puiſſante force of the Empire. For in Rome the name of Caratacus was much ſpoken of. And the Emperoure whileſt hee goeth about to preferre his owne honor, aduanceth the glory of him alſo that was vanquiſhed. For the people were called forthe as vnto ſome great notable ſight or ſpectable. The Pretorian bandes ſtode in order of battell armed in the field that lay before their lodgings, through which fielde Caratake ſhould come. Then paſſed forth the trayne of his friends and ſeruantes, and ſuche armour, riches, Iewels, and other thynges as had bin gote in thoſe warres, were borne forwarde, and openly ſhewed, that all men myghte behold the ſame.

Cornelius Tac. lib. 12. Caratakes name renowmed.

After theſe followed his breethren, Wife, and daughters: and laſt of all came Caratacus himſelfe, whoſe countenaunce was nothing lyke to theirs that went afore him, for whereas they fearing puniſhment for their Rebellion with wailefull countenence craued mercy, hee neyther by countenaunce nor wordes ſhewed any token of a diſcouraged minde, but beeyng preſented before the Emperour Claudius ſitting in his Tribunall ſeate, he began his tale in this wiſe. If there hadde bin in mee ſo muche moderation in tyme of proſperitie, as there was nobilitie of birth, and puiſſance, I hadde come to this Citie rather as a friende than as a Captayne. Neyther ſhould I haue thought diſdeyne, beeyng borne of moſt noble parentes, and ruling ouer many people, to haue accepted peace by way of ioyning with you in league. My preſente ſtate as it is to mee reprochfull, ſo to you it is honorable. I hadde at commaundemente Horſes, men, armour, and great riches, what maruell is it if I was loth to forgoe the ſame? For if you ſhall loke to gouerne all men, it muſt needes followe that all meune muſt become your ſlaues. If I hadde at the firſte yeelded my ſelfe, neyther my power nor youre glory hadde bin ſet forth to the world, and vpon myne execution I ſhoulde ſtraight haue bin forgotten. But if you nowe graunte me life, I ſhall be a witneſſe for euer of youre mercifull clemencie.

The Emperour with theſe wordes being pacified, graunted life both to Caratake and alſo to his wife and brethren, who being loſed from their bandes, went alſo to the place where the Empres Agrippina ſate (not farre of) in a Chayre of eſtate, whome they reuerenced with the lyke prayſe and thankes as they had done before to the Emperour.

After this, the Senate was called togither, who diſcourſed of many things touching thys honourable victorie atchieued by the taking of Caratake, eſteeming the ſame no leſſe glorious, than whē P. Scipio ſhewed in triumph Siphax king of the Numidians, or L. Paulus the Macedonian king Perces, or other Romain captaynes any ſuch king whom they had banquiſhed.

Herebpon it was euen determined, that Oſtorius ſhoulde enter the Citie of Rome wyth tryumphe lyke a Conquerour, for ſuche proſperous ſucceſſe as hytherto had followed hym: but afterwardes hys proceedings were not ſo luckie, eyther for that after Caratake was remoued out of the way, the Romaines as though the warre had beene finiſhed, looked negligently to themſelues, eyther elſe for that the Brytayns taking compaſſion of the miſerable ſtate of Caratake, being ſo worthie a Prince, through fortunes froward aſpect caſt into miſerie, were more earneſtly ſet to reuenge hys quarell. And herebpon they cōpaſſe about the maiſter of the campe, and thoſe legionarie bandes of ſouldiers, which were left amongſt the Silures to fortifie there a place for the armie to lodge in: and if ſuccour had not come out of the next townes and caſtels, the Romains had bene deſtroyed by ſiege. The head Captaine yet, and .viij. Centurions, and euery one elſe of the cōpanies being moſt forward, were ſlaine.

And ſhortly after, they ſet bpon the Romaine forragers, and put them to flight, and alſo ſuche companies of horſemen as were appoynted to garde them. Herebpon Oſtorius ſetteth forth certaine bands of light horſmen, but neither could he ſtay the flight by that meanes, til finally the legions entred the battail, by whoſe force they were ſtayd, and at length the Romaines obteyned the better: but the Brytayns eſcaped by flight without great loſſe, by reaſon the day was ſpent.

After this many bickerings chaunced betwixt the Brytains & Romains, and oftentymes they wrought theyr feates more like to the trade of them that vſe to robbe by the high wayes, than of thoſe that make open warre, catching their enimies at ſome aduauntage in woods and bogs, as hap or force miniſtred occaſion bpon malice conceyued, or in hope of pray, ſomtimes by cōmaundement, and ſometimes without eyther cōmaundement or knowledge of captain or officer.

At one time the Brytains ſurpriſed two bands of footmen that were with the Romains in ayde, and ſente forth to forrey abroade vnaduiſedly, through couetouſneſſe of the Captaines. Thys feat was atchieued by the Silures alſo, the which in beſtowing priſoners and part of the ſpoyle vnto other of their neighbours, procured them likewiſe to rebel againſt the Romains, & to take part with them. The Silures were the more earneſtly ſet againſt the Romains, by occaſion of wordes which the Emperor Claudius had vttred in their diſfauor, as thus: that euē as the Sicanibres were deſtroyed and remoued into Gallia, ſo likewiſe muſt the Silures be dealt with, and the whole nation of them extinguiſhed.

Theſe wordes being blowne abroade, and knowne ouer all, cauſed the Silures to conceyue a wonderfull hatred againſt the Romaynes, ſo that they were fully bent, eyther to retayne theyr libertie, or to die in defence thereof bpon the enimies ſwordes.

In the meane tyme Oſtorius Scapula departed this life, a right noble warriour, and one who by little and little enſuing the ſteps of Aulus Plautius his predeceſſor, did what hee coulde to bring the Ile into the forme of a prouince, which in part he accompliſhed.

There be ſome led by coniecture grounded vpon good aduiſed conſiderations, that ſuppoſe this Oſtorius Scapula beganne to build the Citie of Cheſter after the ouerthrow of Caractacus, for in thoſe parties he fortified ſundry holdes, and placed a number of olde ſouldiers either there in that ſelf place, or in ſome other neare therevnto by way of a colonie. And forſomuch (ſay they) as we read of none other of any name thereaboutes, it is to bee thought that he plãted the ſame in Cheſter, where his ſucceſſors did afterwardes vſe to harborow their legions for the winter ſeaſon, and in time of reſt from iourneyes, which they haue to make againſt their common enimies. In deede it is a common opinion among the people there vnto this day, that the Romains built thoſe vaultes or tauernes (which in that citie are vnder ẏ grounde) with ſome part of the caſtell. And verily as Ranulf Higeden ſayth, a man that ſhall view & well conſider thoſe buildings, he may think the ſame to be the worke of Romains rather than of any other people. That the Romain legions did make their abode there, no man ſene in antiquities can doubt thereof, for the auncient name Caer leon ar dour deuy, that is, the Citie of Legions vpon the water of Dee, prouetb it ſufficiently ynough.

Ra. Higeden alias Ceſtrenſis.

But now to returne vnto Oſtorius Scapula, we finde in Cornelius Tacitus, that during the time of the ſame Scapula his being lieutenant in this Ile, there were certaine Cities giuen vnto one Cogidune a king of the Brytains, who continued faythfull to the Romaines vnto the dayes of the remembrance of men liuing in the time of the ſayd Cor. Tacit who liued and wrote in the Emperor Domitianus time. And this was done after an olde receyued cuſtome of the people of Rome, to haue both ſubiects & kings vnder their rule and dominion as witneſſeth the ſame Tac.)

Cor. Tacit.

Cogidune a King Brytaine.

A. Didius Lieutenant.

After the deceaſſe of Oſtorius Scapula, to ſupplye his rowmeth was ſent one A. Didius: but ere hee coulde come thinges were brought oute of order, and the Brytaynes had vanquiſhed the legion of the whiche Manlius Valens had the conduct: and this victorie was ſet forth by the Brytaynes to the vttermoſt, that with the bruite thereof they might ſtrike a feare into the Lieutenants heart, nowe vpon his firſt comming ouer. And he himſelfe reported it by letters to the Emperor after ẏ largeſt maner, to the end that if he appeaſed the matter, he might winne the more prayſe, or if hee were put to the worſt, and ſhoulde not preuaile, that then his excuſe might ſeeme the more reaſonable and worthie of pardon. The Silurians were they that had atchieued this victory, and kept a foule ſturre ouer all the countryes aboute them, till by the comming of Didius againſte them, they they were dryuen backe and repulſed.

But herewyth beganne trouble to be rayſed in another part: for after that Caratake was taken, the chiefeſt and moſt ſkilfull Captain which the Brytaynes had, was one Venuſius, a ruler of the people named Iugantes, a man that remayned a long tyme faythfull to the Romains, and by theyr power was defended from his enimies, who hauing maryed with Cartimanda Queene of the Brygantes or Yorkeſhire men. This Cartimãda (as ye haue heard) had deliuered Caratake into the Romains hands, therby miniſtring matter for the Emperour Claudius to triumph, by whiche pleaſure ſhewed to the Romains, ſhee increaſed through theyr friendſhip in power and wealth, whereof followed riotous luſt to ſatiſfie hir wanton appetite, ſo as ſhe falling at ſquare with hir huſbande, maryed Velloca-tus, one of his Eſquiers, to whom ſhe gaue hir kingdome, and ſo diſhonoured hir ſelfe. Herevpon enſued cruell warre, inſomuche that in the ende Venuſius became enimie alſo to the Romaines. But firſt they tugged togither betwixt themſelues, and the Queene by a craftie pollicie founde meanes to catch the brother and couſins of Venutius, but hir enimies nothing therwith diſcouraged, but kindled the more in wrath againſt hir, ceaſſed not to goe forwarde with theyr purpoſe. Many of the Brigantes diſdeyning to be ſubiect vnto a womans rule ẏ had ſo reiected hir huſbãd, reuolted vnto Venutius: but yet ẏ Queenes ſenſual luſt mixed with crueltie, mainteyned the adulterer. Venutius therfore calling to him ſuch aid as he could get, & ſtrẽgthned now by the reuolting of the Brigantes, brought Cartimanda to ſuch a narrow point, ẏ ſhe was in great danger to fal into the hands of hir enimies: which the Romaines forſeeing, vpon ſute made, ſent certaine bands of horſmen & footmen to help hir. They had diuerſe encoũters with the enimies at the firſt, with doutfull ſucceſſe: but at length they preuayled, & ſo deliuered the Queene out of peril, but the kingdome remained to Venutius: againſt whõ ẏ Romains were conſtrayned ſtill to mainteyne the warre.

Venutius keepeth kingdom diſpite of Romains

About the ſame time the legion alſo which Ceſius Nalcica led, got the vpper hand of thoſe Britains againſt whom he was ſent. For Did. being aged, & by victories paſt ynough renowmed, thought it ſufficient for him to make war by his captains, ſo to ſtay and keepe off the enimie.

Certain caſtels and holdes in deed he cauſed to be built & fortified further within ẏ cũtry thã had beene

bene afore attempted by any of his predeceſſors, and ſo thereby were the confines of the Romains in this Ile ſomwhat inlarged.

Thus haue ye heard with what ſucceſſe the Brytaynes mainteyned warre in defence of their libertie agaynſt the Romaines, whyleſt Claudius ruled the Empire (according to the report of the Romain Writers.)

But here muſt you note, that Hector Boetius following the authoritie of one Veremond a Spaniard, alſo of Cornelius Hibernicus, and Campbell remouith the Silures, Brygantes, and Monantes, ſo farre northward that he maketh the inhabitants of thoſe Countreys which the Scottes haue now in poſſeſſion, and were euen then inhabited (as he affyrmeth) partly by the Scottes, and partly by the Pictes: as in the Scottiſh Hyſtorie ye may ſee more at large, ſo that what notable feate ſoeuer was atchiued by the olde Britains againſt the Romains, the ſame by him is aſcribed vnto Scottes and Pictes, throughout his whole Hyſtorie, whereas (in verie truth) for ſomuch as may bee gathered by coniecture and preſumption of that whiche is left in writing by auncient Authours, the Brygantes inhabited Yorkſhyre, the Silures Wales & the Marches, and the Mouātes in the countrey of Cumberland.

But forſomuch as he hath diligently gathered in what maner the warres were mainteyned by thoſe people agaynſt the Romains, and what valiant exployts were taken in hande, and furniſhed through their ſtoutneſſe and valiantie, ye may there reade the ſame, and iudge at your pleaſure what people they were whome hee ſo muche prayſeth, aduertiſing you hereof by the way, that as we haue before expreſſed, none of the Romain writers mencioneth anye thing of the Scottes, nor once nameth them, tyll the Romaine Empyre beganne to decaye aboute the tyme of the Emperour Conſtantius, the father of Conſtantine the great, ſo that if they had beene in thys Ile then ſo famous both in peace and warre, as they are reported by the ſame Boetius, marueyle might it ſeeme, that the Romaine writers woulde ſo paſſe them ouer with ſilence.

After the death of Claudius the Emperour of Rome, Claudius Domitianus Nero ſucceeded him in gouernment of the Empyre. In the viij. yeare of whoſe raigne, which was after the incarnation. 57. the Romaines receyued a great ouerthrow in Brytain, where neither the lieutenāt A. Didius Gallus (whō in this place Cornelius Tacitus calleth Auitus) coulde during the tyme of his rule do no more but holde that which was alreadie gotten beſide the building of certain Caſtelles (as before ye haue heard:) neyther hys ſucceſſor Veranius, beating and forreying the Wods, could atchiene any further enterpryce, for he was by death preuēted, ſo as he could not proceed forward with his purpoſe touching ỳ warres which hee had ment to haue followed, whoſe laſt wordes (in his teſtament expreſſed) detected him of manifeſt ambition: for adding many things by way of flatterie to content Neroes minde, he wiſhed to haue lined but two yeres longer, in which ſpace he might haue ſubdued prouinces vnto hys dominion, meaning thereby the whole Ile of Brytaine.

Paulus Suetonius lieutenāt.

BVT nowe when thys great loſſe chāced to the Romains, Paulinius Suetonius did gouerne here as lieutenāt, a mā moſt plentifully furniſhed with all giftes of fortune and vertue, and therewith a right ſkilfull warriour.

Angleſey inuaded.

This Suetonius therefore wiſhing to tame ſuch of the Brytains as kept out, prepareth to aſſaile the Ile of Angleſey, a country full of Inhabitants, and a place of refuge for al outlawes and rebels. He builded certaine Brygantines with flat kiles to ſerue for the ebbes & ſhallowe ſhelues here & there, lying vncertainly in the ſtraits which he had to paſſe. The footmen ferried ouer in thoſe veſſels, the horſmen following by the fourds & ſwimming when they came into the deepe, got likewiſe to the ſhore, where ſtood in order of battel an huge number of armed men mixt together, redy to beate back the Romains, & to ſtay the frō comming to land. Amongſt the men, a nūber of women were alſo running vp and down, as they had bin out of their wits in garments like to wild rogues, with their heare hanging downe about their ſhoulders, and bearing firebrands in their handes.

A ſtrange maner of women.

There was alſo a company of their prieſts, or philoſophers called Druides, who with ſtretched forth handes towards heauen, thundred out curſings againſt the Romains in moſt bitter wiſe.

The Druides.

The ſoldiers were ſo amazed with the ſtrāgeneſſe of this ſight, that (as men benummed of their limmes and ſenſes) they ſuffred themſelues to be wounded and ſlain like ſenſeleſſe creatures, til by the calling vpon of their generall, each one encouraging other in no wiſe to feare a ſort of mad diſtract women, they preaſſed forward vnder theyr enſignes, bearing downe ſuche as ſtoode in theyr way, & with their owne fire ſmouldred and burnt them to aſhes.

To conclude, the Romain lieutenāt got poſſeſſiō of the whole Ile, wherin he placed gariſons of mē of war to kepe the people there in ſubiectiō.

Angleſey won by the Romains.

He

Woods cut downe.

He alſo cauſed their woods to be cut downe, that were conſecrated to theyr Goddes, within the which they were accuſtomed to ſacrifice ſuche as they toke priſoners, and by the view of theyr intrayles, in diſmembring them, to learne of theyr Goddes ſome Oracles and ſuch other things as ſhould come to paſſe.

But now in the meane tyme, whileſt Paulinus was abrode about this enterpriſe, the Brytains began to conferre togither of their great and importable miſeries, of their grieuous ſtate of ſeruitude, of their iniuries and wrongs, whiche they dayly ſuſteyned: how that by ſuffrance they profited nothing, but ſtill were oppreſſed with more heauy burdens: eche cuntrie in times paſt had only one king to rule them: now had they two, the lieutenant by his captains and ſouldiers, ſpilling their blouds, and the Procurator or receyuer (as we may call him) bereauing them of their goods and ſubſtance. The concord or diſcord betwixt thoſe that were appoynted to rule ouer them, was all alike hurtful vnto the ſubiects, the lieutenaunt oppreſſing them by his captains & men of warre, and the procurator or receyuer by force & reprochfull demeanor, polling them by inſupportable exactions. There was nothing free from the couetous extortion & filthie concupiſcence of thoſe inſaciable perſons, for in theſe dayes (ſay they) the greateſt ſpoiler is the valianteſt man, & moſt commonly our houſes are robbed & rãſacked by a ſort of cowardly raſkals that haue no knowledge of any warlike feates at all. Our children are taken from vs, we are forced to go to the muſters, & are ſet forth to ſerue in forraine parties, as thoſe that are ignorant which way to ſpend our liues in the quarell of our owne countrey. What a number of ſoldiers haue bene tranſported ouer from hence to ſerue in other landes, if a iuſt account were taken therof? The Germaines by manhood haue caſt (ſayd they) from their ſhoulders the heauy yoke of bondage, and are not defended as we are with the main Ocean ſea, but onely with a riuer. Where the Brytaines haue their countrey, their wiues & patents, as iuſt cauſes of warre to fight for: the Romains haue none at all, but a couetous deſire to gayne by rapine, and to ſatiſfie their exceſſiue luſtes. They might eaſily be compelled to depart the cuntry, as Julius Ceſar was, if the Brytains would ſhew ſome proofe of the noble prowes that was euidently found in their worthie auncеſters; and not to ſhrinke or quaile in courage for the miſaduenture that ſhould happily chance by fighting one battaile or two. Greateſt force and conſtancie alwayes remayneth with thoſe that ſeeke to deliuer themſelues from miſerie. Now appeared if that the Goddes had taken ſome pitie of the poore Brytayns, who by their diuine power did withhold the chief captain of the Romaines with his army, as it were baniſhed in an other Iſlande. Let vs (ſayd they) take the opportunitie of time and good occaſion offred, and forthwith proceede in our buſineſſe: for leſſe daunger it is manfully to aduenture, and to goe forwarde with our purpoſe, than to be bewrayed and taken in theſe oure conſultations.

Occaſion not to be neglected.

Thus hauing taken aduice togither, and wholy miſlyking their preſent ſtate, they determined to take weapon in hande and ſo by force, to ſeeke for reformation.

They were verily occaſioned thereto through many euil partes practiſed by ẏ Romains greatly to their griefes and diſpleaſures. For whereas Praſutagus (ſuppoſed by Hector Boetius to bee Aruiragus K. of the people called Iceni) had made the Emperor and two of his owne daughters his heyres, ſuppoſing by that meane to haue his kingdome & family preſerued frõ al iniury: it happened quite contrarie to that his expectation. For his kingdom was ſpoyled by the Romain captaines, his wife named Uoadicia beaten by the ſouldiers, his daughters rauiſhed, the Peeres of the realme bereft of their goods, and the kings friends made and reputed as bond ſlaues.

Voadicia Bunduica.

There was alſo an other great cauſe that ſtyred the Brytains to this rebellion, which was the cõfiſcating of their goods: for where as Claudius himſelfe had pardoned the chiefeſt perſons of the forfeytures, Decianus Catus the Procurator of that Ile, mainteyned that the ſame ought to be renued againe.

Dion Caſſ.

To this an other griefe was added, that where Seneca had lent to the nobilitie of ẏ Ile foure. C. Seſtertium, ech hũdred being. 500000. lb. ſterling, or there about, vpon great intereſt, he required the whole ſumme togither by great rigor & violence, although he forced them at the firſt to take thys money to vſurie.

Vſurie.

Alſo ſuch old ſouldiers as were placed by way of a colonie, to inhabite the towne of Camulodunum, expelled many of the Brytains out of their houſes, droue them out of theyr poſſeſſions and landes, and accounted the Brytaynes as ſlaues and as though they had beene their captiue priſoners or bondmen. Beſide this, the temple there which was built in honor of Claudius as an aulter of eternal rule & gouernment, was ſerued with prieſts, the which vnder color of religiõ did ſpoile, conſume and deuour the goods of all men.

Moreouer ſuch ſtrange ſightes and wonders as chanced about the ſame time, pricked the Britains the rather forwarde. For the Image of the Goddeſſe Victoria in the temple at Camulodunũ, ſlipping downe, turned hir backe (as who ſhoulde ſay) ſhee gaue place (as vanquiſhed) to the enimyes.

Alſo in the Hall where the Courtes of Juſtice

ſtice were kept, there was a marueylous greate noyſe hearde, with muche laughing and a ſturre in the Theatre, with great weeping and lamentable howling, at ſuche tyme as it was certenly knowne that there was no creature there to make any ſuch noyſe.

The Sea at a Spring Tyde appeared of a bloudie colour; and when the Tyde was gone backe, there were ſeene on the Sandes the ſhapes and figures of mens bodies.

Women alſo, as rauiſhed of theyr wittes, and beeing as it were in a furye, prophecied that deſtruction was at hande, ſo that the Brytaynes were put greatly in hope, and the Romaines in feare.

But thoſe things, whether they chaunced by the crafte of man, or illuſion of the Diuell, or whether they proceeded of ſome naturall cauſe, the which the common ſort of people oftentymes taketh ſuperſtitiouſly, in place of vnkouth maruails ſignifying things to followe, we woulde let paſſe leaſt wee might bee thought to offende religion, (the which teaching all things to bee done by the prouidence of God, deſpiſeth the vaine foreſhewings of happes to come) if the order of an hyſtory (ſayth Polidore Vergill) woulde ſo permit, the whiche requyreth all things to bee wrytten in maner as they fall forth and come to paſſe.

But the Brytaynes were chiefely moued to Rebellion by the iuſte complaynte of Boadicia, declaryng howe vnſeemely ſhee had beene vſed and intreated at the handes of the Romaines: and bycauſe that ſhee was moſte earneſtlye bent to ſeeke reuenge of theyr iniuryes, and hated the Romaine name moſte of all other, they chooſe hir to bee Captayne (for they in rule and gouernment made no difference then of ſexe, whether they committed the ſame to man or woman) and ſo by a generall conſpiracie, the more parte of the people hauing alſo allured the Eſſex men vnto Rebellion, roſe and aſſembled themſelues togyther to make warres agaynſt the Romaines.

The auncient Brytaines admitted as well women as me to publike gouernment.

There were of them a hundred and twentie thouſande gotte togither in one armie vnder the leading of the ſayde Boadicia, or Bunduica (as ſome name hir.)

She therefore to encourage hir people agaynſt the enimyes, mounted vp into an high place rayſed vp of turfe and ſoddes made for the nones, out of the which ſhe made a long and verie pithie Oration.

Hir mightie tall perſonage, comely ſhape, ſeuere countenance, and ſharpe voyce, with hir long and yealow treſſes of heare reaching downe to hir thighes, hir braue and gorgeous apparell alſo cauſed the people to haue hir in greate reuerence. She ware a Chaine of golde, greate, and verye maſſie, and was clad in a loſe kyrtle of ſundrie colours, and aloft therevppon ſhee had a thicke Iriſh mantell: hereto in hir hand (as hir cuſtome was) ſhe bare a ſpeare, to ſhew hirſelfe the more dreadfull. Hir wordes therefore ſet forth with ſuch a Maieſtie of preſence, greatly encouraged the Brytaynes, ſhe vttering the ſame in maner as followeth.

I Doe ſuppoſe (my louers and friendes) that there is no man here but doth well vnderſtande howe much libertie and freedome is to bee preferred before thraldome and bondage. But if there haue bene any of you ſo deceyued with the Romaine perſwaſions, that that ye did not for a time ſee a differenee betweene them, and iudge whether of both is moſt to be deſired. Nowe I hope that hauing tried what it is to be vnder both, ye wil with me reforme your iudgement, and by the harmes alreadie taken, acknowledge your ouerſight, & forſake your former error. Againe in that a number of you haue raſhly preferred an external ſouereintie before the cuſtomes and lawes of your own coũtry, you do at this time (I doubt not) perfitly vnderſtande how much free powertie is to be preferred before great riches, wherevnto ſeruitude is annexed, & much wealth in reſpect of captiuitie vnder forraine magiſtrates, whereupon ſlauerie attendeth. For what thing (I beſeech you) can there be ſo vile & grieuous vnto the nature of man, that hath not happened vnto vs, ſithence the time that the Romains haue bin acquainted with this Iland? are we not all in maner bereued of our riches and poſſeſſions? Doe not we (beſide other things that we giue, and the land that we till for their onely profite) pay them all kindes of tribute, yea for our owne carkaſſes? how much better is it to be once aloft and fortunate in deed, than vnder the forged and falſe title of libertie, continually to to pay for our redemption & freedome? how much is it more cõmẽdable to loſe our liues in defence of our coũtry, than to cary about not ſomuch as our heads toll free, but dayly oppreſſed & laden with innumerable exactions? But to what ende do I remẽber & ſpeake of theſe things, ſince they wil not ſuffer by death to become free? For what and how much we pay for thẽ that are dead, ther is not one here but he doth well vnderſtande. Among other nations, ſuch as are brought into ſeruitude, are alwayes by death diſcharged of their bondage: onely to the Romains, the dead doe ſtill liue, & all to encreaſe their commoditie and gain. If any of vs be without mony (as I know not wel how & which way we ſhould come by any) then are we left naked, and ſpoyled of that which remayneth in our houſes, & we our ſelues left as mẽ deſolate & dead. How ſhal we looke for better dealing at their hãds hereafter, that in the beginning deale ſo vncurteouſly with vs: ſince there is no man that taketh ſo much as a wilde beaſt, but at the firſt hee will cheriſh it, and with ſome gentleneſſe win it to familiaritie. But we our ſelues (to ſay the truth) are authors of our own miſchief, which ſuffred thẽ at the firſt to ſet foot within our Iland, and did not by & by driue them backe as we did Ceſar, or ſlue them with our ſwordes when they were yet farre of, & that the aduenturing hither was dangerous, as we did ſomtime to Auguſtus & Caligula. We therefore that inhabite the Iland, which for the quantitie thereof may well be called a maine, although it be enuironed about with the Deũ ſea, deuiding vs from other nations, ſo that we ſeeme to liue vpon an other earth, and vnder a ſeuerall heauen. We, euen we (I ſay) whoſe name hath bene long kept hid from the wiſeſt of them, all are nowe contemned and trode vnder foote, of them who ſtudie nothing elſe but how to become lords, and haue the rule of other men. Wherefore (my welbeloued Citizens, friendes, and kinſfolke) for I thinke we are all of kinne, ſince we were borne and dwell in this Ile, and haue one name common to vs all: let vs now, euen now, I ſay) becauſe we haue not done it heretofore, and whileſt the remembrance of our auncient libertie remayneth, ſticke togither, & performe that thing which doth apertaine to valiant and hardie courages, to the ende we may enioy, not onely the name of libertie, but alſo freedome it ſelfe, and thereby leaue our force and puiſſant actes for an example to our poſteritie: for if we which haue bin liberally and in honeſt maner brought vp, ſhould vtterly forget our priſtinate felicitie: what may we hope for in thoſe that ſhall ſucceed vs, & are like to be brought vp in miſerie and thraldome. Neither do I make rehearſall of theſe things vnto you, to the ende I woulde prouoke you to miſlike of this preſent eſtate of things (for well I knowe you abhorre it ſufficiently alreadie) neither to put you in feare of thoſe things that are likely to fall hereafter (becauſe you feare and foreſee them very well before hande) but to the ende I maye giue you heartie thankes and worthie commendations, for that of your owne accord and meanes, you determine ſo well to prouide for things neceſſarie (thereby to help both me & your ſelues with willing mindes) as men that are nothing in doubt of all the Romaine puiſſaunce. If you conſider the number of your enimies, it is not greater than yours: if you regarde their ſtrength, they are no ſtronger than you: and all this doth eaſily appeare by the Baſſinets, Habergeans, and Greaues that you bee armed withall, and alſo by the walles, ditches, and trenches that you haue made for your owne defence, to keepe off their excurſions, who rather and for verie feare to fight farre off them, to cope with vs at hande ſtrokes, as our cuſtome of the warres and Martiall diſcipline doeth require. Wherefore we do ſo far exceed them in force, that in mine opinion, our armie is more ſtrong than ſtone walles, and one of our tergats worthy al the armor that they do beare vpon them: by meanes whereof, if the victorie be ours, we ſhal ſome make them captiues: or if we loſe the field, we ſhall eaſily eſcape the daunger. Furthermore, if after the flight we ſhall indeuour to meete any where, we haue the mariſhes here beneath to hide vs in, and the hylles rounde aboute to keepe them off, ſo that by no meanes they ſhall haue their purpoſe of vs, whereas they being ouercharged with heauie armour, ſhall neither be able to follow, if wee flee, nor eſcape oute of our daunger if they bee put to flight: if they happen to breake out at anye tyme as deſirous to make a rode, they returne by and by to their appoynted places, where we may take them as byrdes alreadie in Cage. In all whiche things, as they are farre inferiour to vs, ſo moſte of all in this, that they can not endure hunger, thyrſt, colde, heate, and Sunſhine, as we can doe. In their houſes alſo and tentes, they make much accounte of theyr baked meates, wine, Oyle, and abrode of the ſhadowe, that if any of theſe do fayle them, they eyther die forthwith, or elſe in time they languiſh and conſume: Whereas to vs euery hearbe and rote is meate, euery ryuer an Oyle, all water pleaſant wine, and euery tree an houſe. Beſide this, there is no place of the lande vnknowne to vs, neither yet vnfriendly to ſuccour vs at neede, whereas to the Romaines they are for the moſte part vnknowne and altogither daungerous, if they ſhoulde ſtande in neede: we can with eaſe ſwim ouer euery Riuer both naked and clad, whiche they with their great ſhips are ſcarce able to performe. Wherefore with hope and good lucke, let vs ſet vpon them couragiouſly, and teach them to vnderſtande, that ſince they are no better than Hares and Foxes, they attempt a wrong match, when they endeuour to ſubdue the Greyhoundes and the Wolfes. With whiche wordes the Queene letteth an Hare go out of hir lappe, as it were thereby to giue Prognoſtication of hir ſucceſſe, which comming well to paſſe, all the companie ſhowted, and cryed out vpon ſuche as not long before had done ſuche violence to ſo noble a perſonage.

that

Then Bunduica calling them togither againe, proceeded forwarde with hir prayer, which ſhe made before them al, holding vp hir hands after this maner:

I giue thee thankes Adraſte, and call vpon thee thou woman of women, which raigneſt not ouer the burthen bearing Egiptians, as Nitocris, neither ouer theyr Marchauntes, as doth Semiramis, for theſe trifles we haue lerned lately of the Romaines: neyther ouer the people of Rome, as a little heretofore Meſſalina, then Agrippina, and now Nero, who is called by the name of a man, but is in deede a very woman, as doth appeare by his voyce, his harp, and his womans attire: but I call vpon thee as a Goddeſſe which gouerneſt the Brytains, that haue learned not to till the fielde, nor to be handicraftes men, but to lead their liues in the warres after the beſt maner: who alſo as they haue all other things, ſo haue they likewiſe their wiues and children common, whereby the women haue the like audacitie with the men, and no leſſe boldneſſe in the warres than they. Therefore ſithence I haue obteyned a kingdom among ſuch a mightie people, I beſeeche thee to graunt them victorie, health, and libertie, againſt theſe contentious, wicked, and inſatiable men (if they may be called men, which vſe warme bathings, delicate fare, hote Wines, ſweete oyles, ſoft beds, fine Muſicke, and ſo vnkindely luſtes) who are altogither giuen to couetouſneſſe, and crueltie, as theyr doings doe declare. Let not I beſeeche thee, the Neronian or Domitian tyrannie anye more preuaile vpon me, or (to ſay truth) vppon thee, but let them rather ſerue thee, whoſe heauie oppreſſion thou haſt borne withall a long ſeaſon, and that thou wylte ſtyll be our helper onely, O noble Ladie, I heartily beſeech thee. This oration I haue borowed of W. Harriſō.

Finally, when ſhe had made an ende, forward ſhe ſetteth againſt hir enimies, which at that time were deſtitute in deede of theyr Lieutenaunt Paulinus Suetonius, being as then in Angleſey (as before ye haue heard.)

The Romaines that were in Camalodunum ſente for ayde vnto Catus Decianus the Procurator, that is the Emperours agent, treaſurer, or receyuer, for in that Citie, although it were inhabited by Romaines, there was no great gariſon of able men. Cor. Tacit. Catus Decianus Procurator.

The Procurator therefore ſent to them ſuch ayd as he thought he might wel ſpare, which was not paſt two hundred men, and thoſe not ſufficientlye furniſhed eyther wyth weapon or armour.

The Citie was not compaſſed with any rampire or ditch for defence, ſuch as happely were priuie to the cõſpiracie, hauing put into the heads of the Romains, that no fortification needed: neither were the aged men nor women ſent away, whereby the yong able perſonages might without trouble of them the better attende to the defence of the Citie: but euen as they had beene in all ſuretie of peace, and free from ſuſpition of any warre, they were ſodainly beſet with the huge armie of the Brytaynes, and ſo all went to ſpoyle and fyre that could be foũd without the encloſure of the temple, into the which the Romaine ſouldiers (ſtriken with ſoden feare by this ſoden comming of the enimies) had thronged themſelues. Where being aſſieged by the Brytaynes, within the ſpace of two dayes the place was wonne, and they that were founde within it, ſlaine euery mothers ſonne.

After this, the Brytaynes encouraged with this victorie, went to meete with Petus Cerialis Lieutenant of the legion, ſurnamed the ninth, and boldly encountering with the ſame Legion, gaue the Romains the ouerthrow, and ſlue all the footemen, ſo that Cerialis wyth muche adoe eſcaped with his Horſemen, and got him backe to the Campe, and ſaued himſelfe within the Trenches. Catus the Procurator being put in feare with this ouerthrow, and perceyuing what hatred the Brytains bare towardes him, hauing with hys couetouſneſſe thus brought the warre vpon the heade of the Romaines, got him ouer into Gallia.

But Suetonius aduertiſed of theſe doings, came back out of Angleſey, & with a meruelous

conſtancie marched thꝛough the middeſt of hys enimyes vnto London, beeing as then not greatly peopled with Romaines, though there was a Colonie of them, but full of Merchauntes, and well prouided of vytayles: hee was in great doubt at his comming thyther, whether hee myght beſt ſtaye there as in a place moſte conuenient, oꝛ rather ſeeke ſome other moꝛe eaſie to be defended.

It length conſidering the ſmall number of hys men of warre, and remembꝛing howe Cirialis had ſpedde by hys too much raſhneſſe, hee thought better wyth the loſing of one Towne to ſaue the whole, than to put all in daunger of irrecouerable loſſe.

And therewith nothing moued at the prayer and teares of them whiche beſought him of ayde and ſuccour, hee departed, and thoſe that woulde goe with him he receyued into his armie, thoſe that taryed behinde were oppreſſed by the enimyes: and the lyke deſtruction happened to them of Verolanium, a Towne in thoſe dayes of great fame, ſituate neare to the place where the towne of Saint Albons now ſtandeth.

The Bꝛytanes leauing the Caſtels and foꝛtreſſes vnaſſaulted, followe theyꝛ gaine in ſpoyling of thoſe places which were eaſie to get, and where greate plentie of ryches was to be founde, vſing their victoꝛie with ſuche crueltie, that they ſlue (as the repoꝛt went) to the number of .lxx. thouſande Romaines, and ſuche as toke theyꝛ parte in the ſayde places by the Bꝛytaynes thus wonne and conquered. Foꝛ there was nothing wyth the Bꝛytaynes, but ſlaughter, fire, gallowes and ſuch like, ſo earneſtly were they ſet on reuenge.

80000 ſayth Dion.

They ſpared neyther age noꝛ ſexe: women of great nobilitie and woꝛthie fame, they toke and hanged vp naked, and cutting off theyꝛ Pappes, ſowed them to theyꝛ mouthes, that they might ſeeme as if they ſucked and fedde on them, and ſome of theyꝛ bodies they ſtretched oute in length, and thꝛuſt them on ſharpe ſtakes.

All thoſe things they did in great deſpite whileſt they ſacrifyced in theyꝛ Temples, and made feaſtes, namely in the Wodde conſecrated to the honour of Andates, foꝛ ſo they called the Goddeſſe of victoꝛie whom they woꝛſhipped moſt reuerently.

In the meane time there came ouer to the ayde of Suetonius, the legion ſurnamed the. xiiij. and other bandes of Souldiers and men of warre to the number of ten thouſand in the whole, whereupon chiefely (becauſe vytayles began to fayle him) he preparеth to giue battaile to his enimies, and choſeth foꝛth a plotte of ground very ſtrong wythin ſtraytes, and backed with a Wodde, ſo that the enimies coulde not aſſault his campe but on the front: yet by reaſon of their great multitude and hope of victoꝛie conceyued by their late pꝛoſperous ſucceſſe, the Bꝛytaines vnder the conduct of Queene Uoadicia aduenture to giue battaile, hauing theyꝛ women there to be witneſſes of the victoꝛie, whom they placed in charets at the vttermoſt ſide of theyꝛ fielde. Uoadicia, oꝛ Boudicia (foꝛ ſo we finde hir wꝛitten by ſome copies, and Bonduica alſo by Dion) hauing hir daughters afoꝛe hir, beeing mounted into a Charet, as ſhe paſſed by the ſouldiers of eche ſundꝛie country, told them that it was a thing accuſtomed among the Bꝛytaynes to goe to the warres vnder the leading of women, but ſhee was not nowe come foꝛth as one boꝛne of ſuche noble auncеſters as ſhee was diſcended from, to fight foꝛ hir kingdome & riches, but as one of the meaner ſoꝛt, rather to defend hir loſt libertie, and to reuenge hir ſelfe of the enimies, foꝛ their crueltie ſhewed in ſcourging hir like a vagabond, & ſhameful deflouring of hir daughters: foꝛ the licencious luſt of the Romans was ſo farre ſpꝛed & increaſed, that they ſpared neither the bodies of old noꝛ yõg, but were redy moſt ſhamefully to abuſe thẽ, hauing whipped hir naked being an aged woman, & forced hir daughters to ſatiſfie their filthie cõcupiſcence: but (ſaith ſhe) the Gods are at hand ready to take iuſt reuenge. The legion that preſumed to encounter with vs is ſlaine & beaten down. The reſidue kepe them cloſe within their holds, oꝛ elſe ſeeke wayes howe to flie out of the countrey: they ſhall not bee once able ſo much as to abide the noiſe & clamoꝛ of ſo many thouſands as we are here aſſembled, much leſſe the foꝛce of our great puiſſãce & dꝛeadfull hands. If ye therefoꝛe (ſayd ſhe) would wegh and conſider with your ſelues your huge nũbers of men of warre, & the cauſes why ye haue moued this warre, ye woulde ſurely determine either in this battel to die with honoꝛ, oꝛ elſe to vãquiſh the enimie by plaine foꝛce, foꝛ ſo (quoth ſhe) I being a woman am fully reſolued, as foꝛ you men ye may (if ye liſt) liue and be bꝛought into bondage.

Tacit. Dion C.

Neither did Suetonius ceaſe to exhoꝛt his people: foꝛ although he truſted in their manhood, yet as he had deuided his army into thꝛee battails, ſo did he make vnto ech of thẽ a ſeuꝛal oꝛation, willing thẽ not to feare the ſhꝛill & vaine menacing threats of the Bꝛitains, that ther was among thẽ moꝛe womẽ thã mẽ, they hauing no ſkill in warlike diſcipline, & hereto being naked without furniture of armoꝛ, would foꝛthwith giue place whẽ they ſhould feele the ſharp points of the Romains weapõs, & the foꝛce of thẽ by whõ they had ſo oftẽ bin put to flight. In many legions (ſayth he) the nũber is ſmall of thẽ that win the battell. Theyꝛ gloꝛie therfoꝛe ſhuld be the moꝛe, foꝛ that they being a ſmall nũber ſhould win the fame due to the whole army, if they wold (thꝛonging togither) beſtow their weapons freely, and with their ſwoꝛde and targets preaſſe foꝛwarde vpon their enimies, continuing the ſlaughter without regarde to the ſpoyle, they might aſſure themſelues when the victoꝛie was once atchieued to haue all at theyꝛ pleaſures. Such foꝛwardneſſe in the ſouldiers followed vpon this exhoꝛtation of the Generall, that eurry one prepared himſelfe ſo redily to do his dutie, and that with ſuch a ſhew of ſkill and experience, that Suetonius hauing conceyued an aſſured hope of good lucke to follow, cauſed the trumpets to ſounde to the battaile.

The onſet was giuen in the ſtraytes, greatly to the aduantage of the Romaines, being but an handfull in compariſon to their enimies.

The fight in the beginning was verie ſharpe and cruell, but in the ende the Bꝛytaynes being a let one to another (by reaſon of the narrowneſſe of the place) were not able to ſuſtain the violẽt foꝛce of the Romaines theyꝛ enimies, ſo that they were conſtrayned to giue backe, and ſo being diſoꝛdred, were put to flight, and vtterly diſcomfited.

There were ſlaine of the Bꝛytaynes that day fewe leſſe than .lxxx. thouſande, as Tacitus wꝛiteth: Foꝛ the ſtraytes beeing ſtopped with the Charets, ſtayed the flight of the Bꝛytaynes, ſo as they could not eaſily eſcape: and the Romains were ſo ſet on reuenge, that they ſpared neyther man noꝛ woman, ſo that many were ſlain in the battaile, many amongeſt the Charettes, and a great number at the woode ſide, which way they made theyꝛ flight, and many were taken pꝛyſoners.

Thoſe that eſcaped, would haue foughten a newe battail, but in the meane time Uoadicia, oꝛ Bonuica deceaſſed of a natural infirmitie, as Dion Caſſius wꝛyteth, but other ſay, that ſhee poyſoned hirſelfe, and ſo dyed, bycauſe ſhe would not come into the handes of hir enimies.

There dyed of the Romaines part in this moſt notable battaile foure .C. and about the like number were hurt and wounded.

Penius Poſthumus maiſter of the campe of the ſeconde legion, vnderſtanding the pꝛoſperous ſucceſſe of the other Romaine Captains, bycauſe he had defrauded his legion of the like glozie, and had refuſed to obey the commaundements of the Generall, cõtrarie to the vſe of warre, ſlue himſelf.

After this, all the Romain armie was bꝛought into the field to make an ende of the reſidue of the warre. And the Emperoꝛ cauſed a ſupplie to be ſent out of Germanie of two .M. of legionarie ſouldiers, and .viij. bands of aydes, with .M. hoꝛſmen, by whoſe comming the bandes of the ninth legion were ſupplied with legionarie ſoldiers, and thoſe bands and wings of hoꝛſemen were appointed to places where they might winter, and ſuche people of the Bꝛytaynes as were either enimies, oꝛ elſe ſtoode in doubt whether to bee friendes oꝛ enimies in deede, were perſecuted with fire and ſwoꝛde.

But nothing moꝛe afflicted them than famin, foꝛ whileſt euerie man gaue himſelf to the warre, and purpoſed to haue liued vpon the pꝛouiſion of the Romains and other their enimies, they applied not themſelues to tyllage, noꝛ to any huſbanding of the groũd, and long it was ere they (being a fierce kinde of people) fell to embꝛace peace, by reaſon that Julius Claſſicianus, who was ſent into Bꝛitain as ſucceſſoꝛ to Catus, fell at ſquare with Suetonius, and by his pꝛiuate grudge hyndred the pꝛoſperous ſucceſſe of publike affayꝛes, he ſticked not to wꝛite vnto Rome, that except an other were ſent to ſucceede in the rowmeth that Suetonius bare, there woulde be no ende of the warres. Herebyõ one Poliſletus, which ſomtime had bene a bond man, was ſent into Bꝛitain, as a commiſſioner, to ſuruey the ſtate of the countrey, and to make the legate and pꝛocuratoꝛ friends, & alſo to pacifie all troubles within the Ile.

Iulius Claſsicianus Procurator.

The poꝛt which Policletus bare was great, he was furniſhed with no ſmall trayne that attented vpon him, ſo that his preſence ſeemed very dreadful to the Romains. But the Britains that were not yet pacified, thought great ſcorne, to ſee ſuche honourable captaines and men of warre as the Romaines were, to ſubmit themſelues to the oꝛder of ſuch a one as had beene a bondſlaue.

Petronius Turpilianus lieutenant.

In the end in place of Suetonius, was Petronius Turpilianus (which had lately bene Conſull) appoynted to haue the gouernance of the army in Brytain, the which neither troubling the enimie, noꝛ beeing of the enimie in any wiſe troubled oꝛ prouoked, did coloꝛ ſlouthfull reſt with the honeſt name of peace and quietneſſe, & ſo late ſtill without exploying any notable enterpriſe.

Trebellius Maximus lieutenant.

After Turpilianus, Trebellius Maximus was made Lieutenaunt of Brytayne, who likewyſe wyth courteous demeanour, ſoughte to keepe the Brytaynes in reſt, rather than by foꝛce to compell thē. And nowe beganne the people of the Ile to beare with pleaſaunt faultes and flattering vices, ſo that the ciuill warres that chaunced in thoſe dayes after the death of the Emperoꝛ Nero at home, might eaſily excuſe the ſlouthfulneſſe of the Romaine Lieutenants.

Moꝛeuer there roſe diſſention amongeſt theyꝛ men of warre, which being vſed to lye abꝛoade in the fielde, coulde not agree with the ydle lyfe, ſo that Trebellius Maximus was glad to hide him ſelfe from the ſight of the Souldiers being in an vnꝛoze agaynſte him, tyll at length humbling himſelf vnto them further than became his eſtate, he gouerned by way of intreatie, oꝛ rather at their courteſie. And ſo was the cōmotion ſtayed without bloudſhed, ẏ armie as it were, hauing by couenant obteyned to liue licenciouſly, and the captayne ſuretie to liue without daunger to be murthered.

Vectius Volamus lieutenāt.

NEither Vectius Volanus that ſucceeded Maximus whyleſt the time of the ciuill warres as yet endured, dyd trouble the Brytaynes, vſing the ſame ſlackneſſe and ſlouth that the other Lieutenants had vſed beꝛoze him, and permytted the like licence to the preſumptuous Souldiers: but yet was Volanus innocent as touchyng himſelfe, and not hated foꝛ any notable crymne oꝛ vice: ſo that hee purchaſed fauoure, althoughe auctoꝛitie wanted.

But after that the Emperour Veſpaſianus had ſubdued his aduerſaries, and attayned the Imperiall gouernment, as well ouer Brytaine as ouer other partes of the woꝛlde, there were ſent hither right noble Captaynes, with diuerſe notable bandes of Souldiers, and Petilius Cerialis being appoynted Lieutenant, put the Britaynes in greate feare by inuading the Brygantes the mightyeſt Nation of all the whole Ilande: and fighting many battayles, and ſome right bloudy with thoſe people, he ſubdued a great part of the countrey at the laſt. Cor. Tac.

Iulius Frontinus lieutenant.

After hym ſucceeded as Lieutenant of Brytaine, one Julius Frontinus, who bāquyſhed and bꝛought to the Romaine ſubiection by foꝛce of armes the people called Silures, ſtryuing not onely agaynſt the valiant reſiſtaunce of the men, but alſo wyth the hardneſſe and comberſome troubles of the places.

Thus may you peꝛceyue in what ſtate this Ile ſtoode in the time that Aruiragus raigned in the ſame, as is ſuppoſed by the Hyſtoꝛyes of the olde Brytaynes, ſo that it may be thought that he gouerned rather a part of this lande, than the whole, and bare the name of a king, the Romains not hauing ſo reduced the country into the foꝛme of a pꝛouince, but that the Brytaynes bare rule in dyuerſe partes thereof, and that by the permiſſion of the Romaines, whiche neuertheleſſe had theyꝛ Lieutenauntes and Pꝛocuratours here, that bare the greateſt rule vnder the afoꝛeſayde Emperours.

Marius, otherwiſe Meurig, or Maue.

After ẏ deceaſe of Arviragus, hys ſonne Marius ſucceeded him in the eſtate, and began his raigne in the yeare of oure Loꝛde. 73. In the olde Engliſhe Marius.

Hector. us ſaith this Marius was a kiſhe Chronicle, he is kondly called Weſtmer, and was an excellent wiſe man, gouerning the Brytains in great proſperitie, honor and wealth.

In the time of this mans raigne, the people called Picts inuaded this lande. They are iudged to be deſcended of the Nation of the Scithians, neare kinſmen to the Gothes, both by Countrey and maners, a cruell kind of men and much giuen to the warres.

They are thought to haue taken theyr name, 10 bycauſe they vſed to paint their ſelues with a certain blewiſh colour, or for that they were marked with printes in theyr viſages, ſo that the more honourable he was amongſt them, the deepelyer was he marked, & the more baſe he was, the leſſe his marks appeared. Some thinke that theſe were the ſame that were called Agathirſies, and named Picts bicauſe they painted their faces & limmes ſo that by no menes ẏ painting could be waſhed off: but howſoeuer they came by ẏ name, it is euident 20 inough that they were of the Scithian nation.

This people therfore with their leader Roderike, or as ſome name him Londorike, entring the Ocean ſea after the maner of rouers, arriued on ẏ coaſts of Ireland, where they required of ẏ Scots new ſeates to inhabite in, for the Scots which (as ſome think) were alſo diſcended of ẏ Scithians, did as thē inhabit in Ireland: but doubting ẏ it ſhuld not be for their profit to receiue ſo warlike a natiō into that Ile, feyning as it were a friendlhip, and excuſing the matter, by ẏ narowneſſe of the countrey, declared vnto the Picts, that the Ile of Brytain was not farre frō thence, being a large countrey & plentiful, and not greatly inhabited: wherfore they counſelled them to go thither, promiſing vnto them all the ayde that might be.

The Picts more deſirous of ſpoyle than of rule or gouernmēt, without delay returned to the ſea, and ſailed towards Britain, where being arriued, they firſt inuaded the north parts therof, & finding there but few inhabiters, they begin to waſt and forray the country, wherof when K. Marius was aduertiſed, with al ſpeed he aſſembled his people, & made towards his enimies, & giuing to the battel, obteyned the victorie, ſo that Roderike was there ſlain in the field, & his people banquiſhed.

Roderike king of Picters ſlaine.

Vnto thoſe that eſcaped with life, Marius graunted licence that they might inhabite in the north part of Scotlande called Catneſſe, being as then a Countrey in maner deſolate wythoute habitation: wherevpon they wythdrewe thither, and ſetled themſelues in thoſe partyes. And bycauſe the Brytaynes diſdeyned to graunt vnto them theyr daughters in maryage, they ſent vnto the Scots into Irelande, requyring to haue wiues of theyr nation.

The Scottes agreed to their requeſt, with this condition, that where there wanted lawfull iſſue of the kings lynage to ſucceede in the Kingdome of the Pictes, then ſhoulde they name one of the womans lyde to bee theyr king: whiche ordinaunce was receyued and obſerued euer after amongeſt the Pictes ſo long as their kingdome endured.

And thus the Pictes next after the Romains, were the firſt of any ſtraungers that came into this lande to inhabite as moſt writers affyrme, although the Scottiſhe Chronicles auouche the Picts to be inhabiters here before the incarnation of our ſauiour. But the victorie which Marius obteyned againſt their king Roderike, chaunced in the yeare after the incarnation. 87. Polidor. Math. Weſt.

In remembraunce of which victorie, Marius cauſed a ſtone to bee erected in the ſame place where the battayle was fought, in whiche ſtone was grauen theſe wordes, Mary Victoria. The Engliſhe Chronicle ſayeth that this ſtone was ſette vppe on Stanemoore, and that the whole Countrey thereabout taking name of this Marius, as Weſtmaria, nowe cleped Weſtmerlande.

King Marius hauing thus ſubdued his enimies, and eſcaped the daunger of their dreadfull inuaſion, he gaue his minde to the good gouernment of his people, and the aduauncement of the common wealth of the realme, continuing the reſidue of his life in great tranquillitie, and finally departed this life, after he had raigned (after moſt Mat. Weſt. writers) liij or liiij. yeares. Howbeit there be that write, that hee dyed in the yeare of our Lorde 78. and ſo raigned not paſt fiue or ſixe yeares at the moſt.

He was buryed at Cairleil, leauing a ſonne behinde him called Coyll.

Thus finde we in the Britiſhe and Engliſh Hyſtories touching this Marius.

Humfrey Lhuyd ſeemeth to take this mã and his father Iuitragus to be all one perſon, whether moued therto by ſome Catologe of kings which he ſawe, or otherwiſe, I cannot affyrme: but ſpeaking of the time when the Pictes and Scots ſhould firſt come to ſettle themſelues in this land, he hath theſe words. Neither was there any writers of name, that made mention either of Scots or Pictes before Veſpaſianus time, about the yere of the incarnation. 72. At what time Meurig or Maw, or Iuuiragus raigned in Britaine. In which time our annales do report, that a certaine kind of people liuing by piracie and rouing on the ſea, came forth of Sueden, or Norway, vnder the guiding of one Rhythercus, who landed in Albania, waſting all the Countrey with robbing and ſpoyling ſo farre as Cairleil, where he was vanquiſhed in battaile, and ſlaine by Murigus, with a great part of his people. The reſidue that eſcaped by flight, fledde to their ſhippes, and ſo conueyed themſelues into the Iles of Orkney, and Scotlande, where they quietly abode a greate while after.

Thus farre haue I thought good to ſhew forth of the foreſayde Lhuyds booke, for that it ſeemeth to carie a great likelihode of truth with it, for the hyſtorie of the Picts, which vndoubtedly I think were not as yet inhabiting in Britaine, but rather firſt placing themſelues in the Iles of Orkney made inuaſion into the maine Ile of Britain afterwards, as occaſion ſeemed to be offred. In the Britiſh tong they are called Phightiaid, that is Phightians, and ſo likewiſe were they called in the Scottiſh, and in their owne tongue.

But nowe to ſhewe what chaunced in this Ile, during the time of ỹ ſayd Marius his ſuppoſed raigne, as is found in the Romain Hyſtories.

Iulius Agricola lieutenãt.

After Julius Frontinus, the Emperor Veſpaſian ſent Julius Agricola to ſucceed in the gouernment of Britain, who comming ouer about the middeſt of Sommer, founde the ſtate of warre through want of a lieutenant negligent ynough, as thoſe ỹ loking for no trouble, thought themſelues out of all daunger, where the enimies neuertheleſſe watched vpon the next occaſion to worke ſome diſpleaſure, and were readie on eche hand to moue rebellion. For the people called Ordouices, that inhabited in the countrey of Cheſſhire, Lancaſhire, & part of Shropſhire, had lately before ouerthrowne & in maner vtterly deſtroyed a wing of ſuch horſmen as ſoiourned in their parties, by reaſon whereof al ỹ prouince was brought almoſt into an aſſured hope to recouer libertie.

Cor. Tac. vit. Agric. The firſt of Agricola his gouernment.

Agricola vpon his comming ouer, though ſommer was nowe halfe paſt, and that the ſouldiers lodging here & there abrode in the countrey, were more diſpoſed to take reſt, than to ſet forward into the field againſt the enimies, determined yet to reſiſt the preſent danger: and therwith aſſembling the men of warre of the Romains, and ſuch other aydes as he might make, he inuadeth their cuntry that had done this foreſaid diſpleaſure, and ſlue downe the moſt part of all the inhabitants therof. And not thus contented, (for that he thought good to follow the ſteps of fauorable fortune, & knowing that as the beginning proued, ſo would the whole ſequele of his affayres by likelyhode come to paſſe) he purpoſed to make a ful conqueſt of the Ile of Angleſey, from the conqueſt whereof the Romain Lieutenant Paulinus was called backe by the Rebellion of other of the Britayns, as before ye haue heard.

The Ang.

But whereas he wanted ſhips for the furniſhing of his enterpriſe, his wit and policie founde a ſhift to ſupplie that defect: for chooſing forth a pyked number of ſuch Britaines as he had there with him in ayde, which knewe the fourds & ſhallow places of the ſtreames there, and withall were very ſkilfull in ſwimming (as the maner of the Countrey then was) he appoynted them to paſſe ouer on the ſodaine into the Ile, onelye with their Horſes, armour, and weapon: whiche enterpriſe they ſo ſpeedily, and with ſo good ſucceſſe atchieued, that the Inhabitantes ninch amaſed with that doing (which looked for a nauie of ſhippes to haue tranſported ouer their enimies by Sea, and therefore watched on the coaſt) beganne to thinke that nothing was able to bee defended againſt ſuche kynde of warriours that gotte ouer into the Ile after ſuche a ſorte and maner.

And therefore making ſute for peace, they deliuered the Ile into the handes of Agricola, whoſe fame by theſe victories daylye muche encreaſed, as of one that tooke pleaſure in trauayle, and attempting to atchieue daungerous enterpryſes, in ſteade whereof his predeceſſours had delighted to ſhewe the maieſties of their office by vaine braggs, ſtately portes, and ambitious pomps. For Agricola turned not the proſperous ſucceſſe of his proceedings into vanitie, but rather with neglecting his fame, encreaſed it to the vttermoſte, amongeſt them that iudged what hope was to be loked for of things by him to be atchieued, which with ſilence kept ſecret theſe his ſo worthie doings.

Moreouer, perceyuing the nature of the people in this Ile of Brytain, and ſufficiently taught by other mens example, that armour ſhould little auaile, where iniuries followed to the diſquieting of the people, hee thought beſt to take away and remoue all occaſions of warre. And firſt beginning with himſelfe and his ſouldiers, toke order for a reformation to be had in his owne houſhold; yeelding nothing to fauour, but altogither in reſpect of vertue, accounting them moſt faythfull, which therein moſt excelled, he ſought to knowe all things, but not to doe otherwiſe than reaſon moued, pardoning ſmall faultes, and ſharpely puniſhing great and heynous offences, neyther yet deliting alwaies in puniſhment, but oftētimes rather in repentance of the offender. Exactions and tributes he leſſened, qualifying the ſame by reaſonable equitie. And thus in reforming the ſtate of things, he wanne him great praiſe in time of peace, the whiche eyther by negligence or ſufferaunce of the former Lieutenauntes, was euer feared, and accounted worſe than open warre.

This was his practiſe in the winter time of his firſt yeare, but when Sommer was come, he aſſembled his armie, and leading forth the ſame, trayned his ſouldiers in all honeſt warlike diſcipline, commending the good, and reforming the bad and vnruly.

He himſelfe to giue enſample, toke vpon him all daungers that came to hande, and ſuffred not the enimies to liue in reſt, but waſted their countreys with ſodaine inuaſions. And when he had ſufficiently chaſtiſed them, and put them in feare by ſuche maner of dealing, hee ſpareth them that they might againe conceyue ſome hope of peace. By which meanes many countreys which vnto thoſe dayes had kept themſelues out of bondage, layde rancour aſide, and deliuered pledges, and further were contented to ſuffer Caſtelles to be buylded within them, and to be kept with gariſons, ſo that no part of Brytayne was free from the Romain power, but ſtode ſtyll in daunger to be brought vnder more and more.

In the winter following, Agricola toke paynes to reduce the Brytains from their rude maners and cuſtomes, vnto a more ciuill ſorte and trade of liuing, that chaunging their naturall fiercenelle and apte diſpoſition to warre, they myght through taſting pleaſures, be ſo enured therewith, that they ſhoulde deſire to liue in reſt and quietneſſe: and therefore hee exhorted them priuily, and holpe them publikely to buyld temples, common halles where pleas of law might be kept, and other houſes, commending them that were diligent in ſuch doings, and blaming them that were negligent, ſo that of neceſſitie they were dryuen to ſtriue who ſhoulde preuent eche other in ciuilitie. He alſo procured that Noble mens ſonnes ſhoulde learne the liberall ſciences, and praiſed the nature of the Brytaynes, more than the people of Gallia, by cauſe they ſtudyed to attayne to the knowledge of the Romaine eloquence. By whiche meanes the Brytaynes in ſhort tyme were brought to the vſe of good and commendable maners, and ſorted themſelues to go in comely apparell after the Romain faſhion, and by little and little they fell to accuſtom themſelues to fine fare, and dilicate pleaſures, the ready prouokers of vices, as to walke in Galleries, to waſh themſelues in bathes, to vſe banketting and ſuch like, which amongſt the vnſkilfull was called humanity or curteſie, but in very deed it might be accounted a part of thraldome and ſeruitude, namely being to exceſſiuely vſed.

The worthie practiſes of Agricola to traine the Brytaynes to ciuilitie.

In the thirde yeare of Agricola his gouernment in Brytaine, he inuaded the north partes therof (vnknowne til thoſe days of the Romains) being the ſame where the Scots now inhabit: for he waſted the countrey vnto the water of Tay, in ſuch wyſe putting the Inhabitauntes in feare, that they durſt not once ſette vpon his armie, thoughe it were ſo that the ſame was very ſore diſquyeted and vexed by tempeſt and rage of weather.

The thirde yeare.

The water of Tay.

Wherevpon finding no greate let or hynderance by the enimyes, he buylded certain Caſtels and Fortreſſes, which he placed in ſuche conuenient ſteades, that they greatly annoyed his aduerſaries, and were ſo able to be defended, that ther was none of thoſe Caſtels which he builded, either wonne by force out of the Romains hands, or giuen ouer by compoſition, for feare to be taken: ſo that the ſame being furniſhed with competent numbers of men of warre, were ſafely kept from the enimies, the whiche were dayly vexed by the often iſſues made forth by the Souldiers that lay thus in gariſon within them: ſo that where in tymes paſt the ſayde enimies woulde recouer theyr loſſes ſuſteyned in Sommer by the Winters aduauntage, nowe they were put to the worſe, and kept backe as well in the Winter as in the Sommer.

In the fourth Sommer, after that Agricola was appoynted to the rule of this lande, he went about to bring vnder ſubiection thoſe people, the which before tyme hee had by incurſions and forreyes ſore vexed and diſquieted: and there-vpon comming to the waters of Clide & Loughleuen, he buylt certaine foꝛtreſſes to defende the paſſages and entryes there, dꝛyuing the enimies beyond the ſame waters, as it had bin into a new Ilande.

The fifte yeare.

In the fifth Sommer, Agricola cauſing hys ſhippes to be bꝛought about, and appoynting thẽ to arriue on the noꝛth coaſts of Scotland, he paſſed with his army ouer the riuer of Clide, and ſubdued ſuche people as inhabited thoſe further partes of Scotland, which till thoſe daies had not bene diſcouered by the Romains.

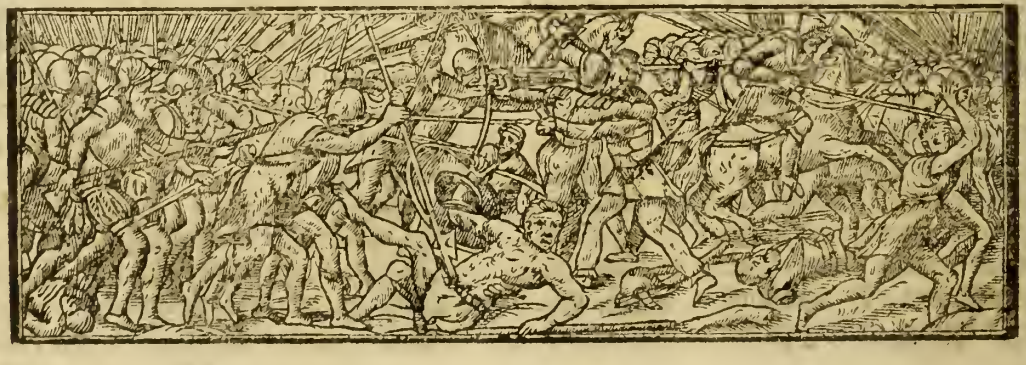
And bycauſe he thought it ſhould ſerue wel to purpoſe, foꝛ ſome conqueſt to be made of Ireland, if that part of Scotlande which boꝛdereth on the Iriſhe Seas might be kept in due obedience, hee placed gariſons of Souldiers in thoſe parties, in hope verily vpon occaſion to paſſe ouer into Irelande, and foꝛ the moꝛe eaſie aduauncement of his purpoſe therein, hee entertayned wyth honourable pꝛouiſion one of the kings of Irelande, which by ciuill diſcoꝛde was expulſed and dꝛiuen out of his countrey.

An Iriſh king expulſed out of his country.

In deede Agricola perceyued, that with one Legion of Souldiers, and a ſmall ayde of other men of warre, it ſhoulde bee an eaſie matter to conquere Irelande, and to bꝛing it vnder the Dominion of the Romaines: which enterpꝛiſe he iudged verye neceſſarie to be exployted, foꝛ better keeping of the Bꝛytaynes in obedience, if they ſhoulde ſee the iuriſdiction of the Romaines euery where extended, and the libertie of theyꝛ neighbours ſuppꝛeſſed and turned to ſubiection.

The ſixt yeare of Agricola his gouernment.

In the ſixth Sommer of Agricola hys gouernment, he pꝛoceeded in ſubduing the furthermoſte partes of Scotlande Noꝛthwardes, cauſing his Nauie to keepe courſe anenſt hym by the coaſt as hee marched foꝛth by lande, ſo that the Bꝛytaynes perceyuing howe the ſecrete Hauens and Creekes of theyꝛ Countreyes were nowe diſcouered, and that all hope of refuge was in maner cutte off from them, were in a marueylous feare.



On the other part the Romaines were ſoꝛe troubled with the rough Mountaynes, and craggie Rockes, by the whiche they were conſtrayned to paſſe beſide the daungerous ryuers, lakes, woodes, ſtraytes, and other combꝛſome wayes and paſſages.

The danger alſo of them that were in the ſhips by ſea, was not ſmall by reaſon of winds & tempeſts, and high ſpꝛing tides, which toſſed & turmoyled their veſſels right cruelly: but by the painfull diligence of them that had bene bꝛought vp & enured with continuall trauaile and hardneſſe, all thoſe diſcõmodities were ouercome to their great reioyſing, when they met and fell in talke of theyꝛ paſſed perils, foꝛ oftentimes the armie by land encamped ſo by the ſhoꝛe, that thoſe which kept the ſea came a lande to make merie in the campe, and then eche one woulde recounte to others the aduentures that had happened, as the maner is in ſemblable caſes.

Calenwood.

The Bꝛytains that inhabited in thoſe dayes about the partes of Calender wood, perceyuing in what danger they were to be vtterly ſubdued, aſſembled themſelues togither in purpoſe, to trie the foꝛtune of battell: whereof Agricola being aduertiſed, marched foꝛth with his armie deuyded in thꝛee battailes, ſo that the enimyes doubting to trie the matter in open fielde, eſpye theyꝛ time in the night, and with all theyꝛ whole puiſſaunce ſet vpon one of the Romaine Legions, whiche they knewe to be moſt feeble and weake, truſting by a camiſado to diſtreſſe the ſame: and firſt ſleaing the watche, they enter the campe, where the ſayd legion lay, and finding the ſouldiers in great diſoꝛder, betwixt ſleepe and feare, begin the fight euen within the campe.

Agricola had knowledge of their purpoſed intent, and theꝛfoꝛe with all ſpeede haſted foꝛth to come to the ſuccours of his people, ſending firſt his light Hoꝛſemen, and certaine light armed ſoꝛtemen to aſſayle the enimies on theyꝛ backes, and ſhoꝛtly after appꝛocheth with his whole puiſſance, ſo that the Romaine ſtandards beginning to appeare in ſight by the light of the daye, that then beganne to ſpꝛing, the Bꝛytaynes were ſoꝛe diſcouraged, and the Romaines renuing theyꝛ foꝛce, fiercely pꝛeaſſed vpon them, ſo that euen in the entrye of the campe, there was a ſoꝛe conflicte, tyll at length the Bꝛytaynes were putte to flight, and chaſed, ſo that if the mariſhes and woddes had not ſaued them frō the purſute of the Romains, there had bin an end made of the whole warres euen by that one dayes worke. But the Bꝛytaynes eſcaping as well as they might, & reputing the victoꝛie to haue chanced not by the valiancie of the Romain ſouldiers, but by occaſion, & the ꝓudent policie of their captaine, were nothing abaſhed with ẏ their preſent loſſe, but ꝓpared to put their youth againe into armour: and therevpon they remoued their wiues and childꝛen into ſafe places, and then aſſembling the chiefeſt gouernoꝛs togither, cōcluded a league amongſt themſelues, eche to ayde other, confyꝛming theyꝛ articles with doing of ſacrifice (as the maner in thoſe dayes was.)

The ſame ſommer, a bande of ſuch Dutch oꝛ Germaine ſouldiers as had bene leuyed in Germanie and ſent ouer into Bꝛytayn to the ayde of the Romains, attempted a great and wonderfull act in ſleaing their captaine and ſuch other of the Romain ſouldiers which were appointed to haue the trayning and leading of them, as officers and inſtructoꝛs to them in the feates of warre: & when they had committed that murther, they got into thꝛee Pineſſes, and became rouers on the coaſtes of Bꝛitaine, and encountring with diuerſe of the Bꝛytains, that were readie to defend theyꝛ countrey from ſpoyle, oftentymes they got the vpper hand of them, and now and then they were chaſed away, inſomuch ẏ in the ende they were bꝛought to ſuch extremitie foꝛ want of vitailes, that they did eate ſuch amongſt them as were the weakeſt, and after, ſuch as the lot touched, beeing indifferently caſt amongſt them: and ſo being caried about the coaſtes of Bꝛytain, and loſing theyꝛ beſſels thꝛough want of ſkill to gouerne them, they were reputed foꝛ robbers, and therevpon were apꝛehended, firſt by the Suabeners, and ſhoꝛtly after by the Friſers, the which ſolde diuerſe of them to the Romains and other, whereby the true vnderſtanding of their aduentures came certainely to light.

In the ſommer next following, Agricola with his armie came to the Mountaine of Granzeben, where he vnderſtode that his enimies were enꝛamped, to the number of .xxx. thouſand & aboue, and dayly there came to them moꝛe companie of the Bꝛytiſh youth, and ſuch aged perſons alſo as were luſtie and in ſtrength, able to welde weapon and beare armour. The eight yeare of Agricola his gouernment.

Amongſt the captains ẏ chiefeſt was one Galgacus, whō the Scottiſh chꝛonicles name Gald. Calgagus whō the Scots name Gald and will needes haue him a Scottiſh man.

This man as chiefetaine and head captaine of all the Bꝛytaynes there aſſembled, made to them a pithie oꝛation, to encouꝛage them to fight manfully, and likewiſe did Agricola to his people: which being ended, the armies on both ſides were put in oꝛder of battaile.

Agricola placed .viij. thouſande fotemen of ſtrangers which he had there in ayde with him in the midſt, appoynting thꝛee .M. hoꝛſmen to ſtand on the ſides of thē as wings. The Romain legions ſtood at their backs in ſtead of a Bulwarke.

The Bꝛytains were embattayled in ſuch oꝛder, that their foꝛe ward ſtood in the plaine groūd, and the other on the ſide of an hill, as though they had riſen on heigth one ranke aboue another.

The middeſt of the fielde was couered wyth their charets and hoꝛſemen.

Agricola doubting by ẏ huge multitude of enimies, leaſt his people ſhoulde be aſſailed not onely afront, but alſo vpon euery ſide the battails, he cauſed the rankes ſo to place themſelues, as theyꝛ battails might ſtreteh farre further in bꝛedth than otherwiſe the oꝛder of warre requyꝛed: but he toke this to be a good remedie againſt ſuch inconuenience as might haue followed, if the enimie by the narrowneſſe of the fronts of his battailes ſhould haue hemmed them in on eche ſide. Cor. Tacitus

This done, and hauing conceyned good hope of victoꝛy, he alighted on foꝛt, & putting his hoꝛſe frō him, he ſtood befoꝛe the ſtādarts as one not caring foꝛ any danger ẏ might happen. At the firſt they beſtowed their ſhot, & dartes freely on both ſides.

The Brytains aswel with constant manhood, as skilful practise, with brode swords & little rounde bucklers, auoided & beat frō them the arrowes and darts that came from their enimies, & therwithall payd thē home againe with their shot & dartes, so that the Romains were nere hand oppressed therwith, by cause they came so thick in their faces, till at length Agricola caused three cohorts of Holāders, & two of Lukeners to preasse forwarde, and ioyne with them at hand strokes, so as the matter might come to be tried with the edge of the sword which thing as to them (being enured with ẏ kind of fight,) stood greatly with their aduantage, so to the Brytaynes it was verie daungerous, that were to defende themselues with their mightie huge swordes and small bucklers.

Also by reason their swordes were brode at the endes, and poyntlesse, they auayled little to hurt the armed enimie. Wherupon when the Hollanders came to ioyne with them, they made foule worke in sleaing and wounding them in right horrible wise.

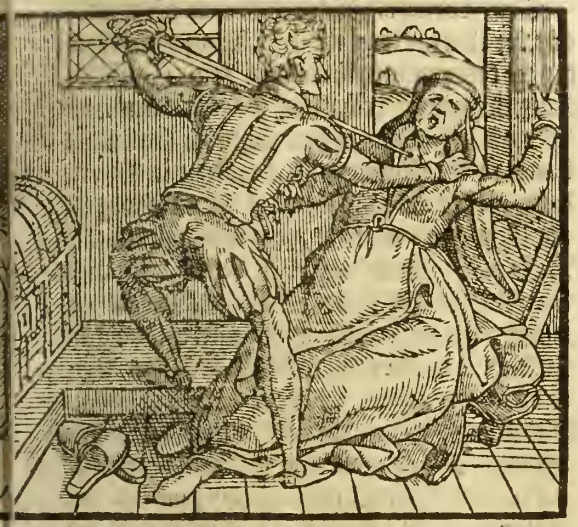
The horsmen also that made resistaunce, they pulled from their horses, and began to climbe the hill upon the Britains. The other bands desirous to match their fellowes in helping to atchieue the victorie, folowed the Hollanders, and beat downe the Britains where they might approch to them: many were ouerrun & left half dead, and some not once touched with any weapon, were likewise oppressed, such hast the Romains made to folow upon the Brytains. Whilest the British horsmē fled, their Charets ioyned themselues with theyr footmē, and resisting the battel, put the Romains in such feare, that they were at a sodain stay: but the charets being troubled with preasse of enimies, and vneuennesse of the grounde, they coulde not worke their feat to any purpose. Neither had that fight any resemblance of a battel of horsmen, whē eche one so encōbred other, ẏ they had no rowmth to stur themselues. The charets oftentimes wanting their guiders, were caried awaye with the horses, that being put in feare with the noise and stur, ran hither & thither, bearing downe one an other, and whomsoeuer else they met with.

Holanders.

The Brytains now that kept the toppe of the hilles, and had not yet fought at all, despising the small number of the Romaines, began to come downwardes & to cast about, that they might set upō the backs of their enimies, in hope so to make an end of the battell, and to win the victorie: but Agricola doubting no lesse, but that some suche thing would come to passe, had afore hande foreseene the daunger, & hauing reserued foure wings of horsemen for such sodaine chaunces, sent them forth agaynst those Brytaines, the which horsemen with full randon, charging upon thē as they rashly came forwards, quickly disordred them & put thē all to flight, and so that purposed deuise & policie of the Brytains turned to their owne hinderance. For their horsmen by their captains appoyntment trauersing ouerthwart by the fronts of them that fought, set upon that battaile of the Brytaynes which they found before them. Then in those open and plain places a grieuous & heauy fight it was to behold, how they pursued, wounded and toke their enimies: & as they were aduised of other to slea those that they had before take, to the ende they might ouertake the other, there was nothing but fleeing, taking & chasing, slaughter, spilling of blod, scattring of weapōs, grūting, & groning of mē & horses ẏ lay on the ground, gasping for breath, and readie to die. The Brytains now and then as they sawe their aduantage, namely when they approched neare to the woods, gathered thēselues togither, and set upon the Romains as they followed vnaduisedly, & further through ignorance of the places) than stood with their surtie, insomuch that if Agricola had not prouided remedie, & sent forth mightie bands of light armed men both on foote & horseback to close in the enimies, & also to beat the woods, some greater losse would haue followed through too much boldnesse of them, that too rashly pursued upon the Brytains: who when they beheld the Romains thus to follow them in whole troupes and good order of battail, they slipt away & toke them to flight, eche one seeking to saue himselfe, and kept not togither in plumpes as before they had done.

The night made an end of the chase, which the Romains had followed till they were throughly awearied.

There were slain of the Britains that day ten M. & of the Romains 340. among whom Iulus Atticus, a captain of one of the cohorts or bands of footmen was one, who being mounted on horseback, (through his own too much youthfull courage & fierce vnrulinesse of his horse) was caryed into ẏ middle throng of his enimies, & there slain.



Ten M. Brytains.

Iulus Flaius.

The night ensuing, the Romains passed with great ioy and gladnesse for the victorie atchieued. But among the Brytaines there was nothing heard but mourning and lamentation: both of men & women that were mingled togither, some busie to beare away the wounded, to binde, and dresse their hurtes, other calling for their sonnes, kinsfolks and friends that were wanting. Many of them forsoke their houses, and in their desperate moode set them on fire, and choosing forth places for their better refuge and safegarde, forthwith misliking of the same, left them and sought others: herewith diuerse of them toke counsell togither what they were best to doe, one while they were in hope, an other while they reputed, as people cast into deepe dispayre: the beholding of their wyues and children, oftentymes moued them them to attempte some newe enterpise for the preseruation of theyr countrey and liberties. And certayne it is that some of them slew their wiues and children, as moued thereto with a certayne fonde regard of pitie to ridde them out of further miserie and daunger of thraldome.

The nexte daye the certaintie of the victory more playnely was disclosed, for all was quiet about, and no noyse heard any where: the houses appeared brenning on each side, and such as were sente forthe to discouer the countrey into euery part thereof, sawe not a creature sturring, for all the people were auoyded and withdrawen a farre off.

But nowe of this battell, and other the doings of Agricola, in the Scottishe Chronicle ye may fynde more at large set forthe: for that which I haue written heere, is but to shew what in effect Cornelius Tacitus writeth of ỹ whiche Agricola dyd heere in Britayne, withoute making mencion eyther of Scottes or Pictes, onely naming them Britaynes, Hoxestians, and Caledonians, whiche inhabited in those dayes parte of this Ile which now we call Scotland.

After that Agricola hadde thus ouerthrowen hys enimies in a pight fielde at the mountayne of Granzebern, and that the countrey was quite ridde of all appearaunce of enimies: bycause the sommer of this eyght yeere of his gouernemente was nowe almost spente, he broughte hys army into the confynes of the Horestians, whyche inhabited the countreyes nowe cleped Angus and Merne, and there intended to Winter, and toke hostages of the people for assurance of theyr loyaltie and subiection.

This done, he appoynted the Admirall of the naule to sayle about the Isle, whiche accordingly to his commission in that poynte receyued, luckily accomplished his enterprise, and brought the naule about agayne into an hauen, called Trutulensis.

In this meane time, whilest Julius Agricola was thus occupyed in Britayne, both the Emperoure Vespasian, and also his brother Titus that succeeded hym, departed this life, and Domitian was elected Emperoure, the whiche hearing of suche prosperous successe as Agricola had against the Britaynes, did not so muche reioyce for the thing well done, as he enuied to consider what glory and renowme shoulde redounde to Agricola thereby, whiche hee perceyued should muche darken the glosse of hys fame, hauyng a priuate person vnder him, who in worthynesse of noble exployctes atchieued, farre excelled hys doyngs.

To fynde remedie herein therefore, he thought not good to vtter hys malice as yet whylst Agricola remayned in Britayne with an army, whych so muche fauoured him, and that with so good cause, sith by his policie and noble conduit, the same hadde obteyned so many victories, so much honor, and such plentie of spoyles and bootie. Whereuppon to dissemble hys intent, he appoynted to reuoke him forthe of Britaine, as it were to honor hym, not only with decreed tryumphes, but also with the Lieutenantshippe of Syria, which as then was voyde by the death of Atilius Rufus.

Thus Agricola being contermaunded home to Rome, delyuered his prouince vnto his successor Cneus Trebellius, appoynted thereto by the Emperour Domitianus, in good quiet and sauegarde. Cneus Trebellius alias Salustius Lucullus as some thinke.

Thus may you see in what state Britayne stoode in the dayes of King Marius, of whome yet Tacitus maketh no mention at all. Some haue written, that the City of Chester was builded by this Marius, though other as before I haue sayde, thinke rather that it was the worke of Ostorius Scapula their Legate. Fabian.

Coyllus.

COilus the Sonne of Marius was after his fathers decease made Kyng of Britayn, in the yere of our Lord. 125. Coyllus.

This Coyllus or Coyll was broughte vp in his youth amongst the Romaynes at Rome, where hee spente hys tyme not vnprofitably, 125 but applyed hymſelfe to learning and ſeruice in the warres, by reaſon whereof, hee was muche honored of the Romaynes, and he likewiſe honored and loued them, ſo that hee payed his tribute truly all the tyme of hys raigne, and therefore lyued in peace and good quiet. He was alſo a Prince of muche bountie, and very liberall, whereby hee obteyned great loue both of his nobles and commons. Some ſaye, that hee made the Towne of Colcheſter in Eſſex, but other write, that Coyll whych reigned next after Aſclepeodotus was the firſt founder of that Towne, but by other it ſhuld ſeeme to be built long before, being called Camalodunum. Finally, when thys Coyll had raigned the ſpace of. 54. yeares, hee departed this lyfe at Yorke, leauing after him a ſonne named Lucius, which ſucceeded in the Kingdome.

Lucius.

Lucius. LUcius the ſon of Coilus, whoſe ſurname (as ſayth William Harriſon) is not extant, began his raygne ouer ẏ Britaynes about the yeare of oure Lorde. 180. as Fabian following the authoritie of Peeter Pictauienſis hathe, although other writers ſeeme to diſagree in that accompt, as by the ſame Fabian in the table before his Booke partly appeareth, whereto Mathæus VVeſtmonaſterienſis affirmeth, that this Lucius was borne in the yeare of our Lord. 115. and was Crowned King in the yeare. 124. as ſucceſſor to his father Coilus, which dyed the ſame yeere, being of great age ere the ſaid Lucius was borne. William Harriſon in the ſecond part of his chronologie noteth his entraunce to be in the. 132. of the world. 916. after the buylding of Rome. 220. after the comming of Ceſar into Britayne, and. 165. after Chriſt, whoſe accomptes I followe (as before is ſayde) in this treatiſe. 165

This Lucius is highly renowmed of the writers, for that hee was the firſte King of the Britaynes that receyued the faith of Jeſus Chriſt: for being inſpired by the ſpirit of grace and truth euē from the beginning of hys raigne, he ſomewhat leaned to the fauoring of Chriſtian Religion, being moued with the manifeſt miracles whyche the Chriſtians dayly wroughte in witneſſe and proofe of their ſound and perfect doctrine: for euen from the dayes of Joſeph of Aramathia and hys fellowes, or what other godly men firſt taughte the Britaynes the Goſpell of our Sauiour, there remayned amongſt the ſame Britaynes ſome Chriſtians which ceaſſed not to teach & preache the word of God moſt ſincerely vnto them: but yet no king amongſt them openly profeſſed that Religion, till at length this Lucius perceyuyng not only ſome of the Romayne Lieutenantes in Britayne, as Trebellius and Pertinax, with other, to haue ſubmitted themſelues to that profeſſion, but alſo the Emperour himſelfe to begin to be fauorable to them that profeſſed it, hee tooke occaſiō by their good enſample to giue care more attentiuely to the Goſpell, and at length ſent vnto Eleutherius Biſhop of Rome, two learned men of the Brittiſh nation, Eluane and Meduin, requiring him to ſende ſome ſuche miniſters as might inſtruct him and his people in the true faith more plentifully, and to baptiſe them according to the rules of the Chriſtian Religion.

Herevpon were ſent from the ſayd Eleutherius two godly learned mē, ẏ one named Fugatius, and ẏother Damianus, the which baptiſed the King with all his family and people. And therewith remoued the worſhipping of Idolles and falſe Gods, and taught the right meane and way howe to worſhippe the true and immortall God. There were in thoſe dayes within the boundes of Britayne. 28. Flamynes, and three Archflamynes, which were as Biſhops & Archbiſhops, or ſuperintendentes of the Pagane or Heathen religion, in whoſe place (they being remoued) were inſtituted. 28. Biſhops and three Archbiſhops of the Chriſtian Religion. One of the which Archbiſhops held his ſee at London, another at Yorke, and the third at Caerleion, Arwiſke in Glamorgan ſhire. To the Archbiſhop of London was ſubiect Cornewall, and all the middle part of England, euen vnto Humber. To the Archbiſhop of Yorke all the North partes of Britayne from the Riuer of Humber vnto the furtheſt partes of Scotlande: and to the Archbiſhop of Caerleon was ſubiect all Wales, within whiche countrey as then were ſeuen Biſhops, where nowe there are but foure. The Riuer of Seuerne in thoſe dayes deuided Wales (then called Cambria) from the other partes of Britayne. Thus Britayne partly by the meanes of Joſeph of Aramathia (of whome ye haue heard before) and partly by the wholeſome inſtructions & doctrine of Fugatius and Damianus, was the firſt of all other regions that openly receyued the Goſpell, and continued moſt ſtedfaſtly in ỹ profeſſion, till the cruell furie of Diocletian perſecuted the ſame in ſuche ſorte, that as well in Britayne as in all other places of ỹ world, the Chriſtian religion was in manner extinguiſhed, and vtterly deſtroyed.

Ther be that affirme, how this Lucius ſhould build the Church of Saint Peter at Weſtminſter, though many attribute that acte vnto Sibert King of the Eaſt Saxons, and write, howe the place was then ouergrowen with thornes & buſhes, and thereof toke the name, and was called Thorney. They adde moreouer (as Harriſon ſayeth) howe Thomas Archbiſhop of London preached, redde, and miniſtred the Sacraments there to ſuch as made reſorte vnto him. Howbeit by the tables hanging in the reuerſry of Sainte Paules at London, and alſo a table ſometyme hanging in Saint Peters Church in Cornehill, it ſhoulde ſeeme, that the ſayd Church of Saint Peter in Cornehill was the ſame that Lucius builded. But herein (ſayth Harriſon anno mundi 4174) doth lie a ſcruple, ſure Cornell might ſome be miſtaken for Thorney, eſpecially in ſuch olde recordes, as time, age, euill handling, hath oftentimes defaced. But howſoeuer this caſe ſtandeth, troth it is, that Lucius reioycing muche in that he had brought his people to the perfect light and vnderſtanding of the true God, that they needed not to bee deceyued any longer with the craftie temptations and feigned miracles of wicked ſpirites, he aboliſhed all prophane worſhippings of falſe Gods, and conuerted ſuche Temples as had bin dedicated to their ſeruice, vnto the vſe of the Chriſtian Religiõ: and thus ſtudying only howe to aduance the glory of the immortall God, and the knowledge of his worde, without ſeeking the vayne glory of worldly triumph whiche is gote with ſlaughter and bloudſhed of many a giltleſſe perſon, hee lefte his kingdome (though not enlarged with broder dominion than hee receyued it,) yet greatly augmented and enriched with quiet reſt, good ordinances, and (that which is more to be eſteemed than all the reſt) adorned with Chriſtes religion, and perfectly inſtructed with hys moſt holy worde and doctrine. He raigned as ſome write. 21. yeares, though as other affirme but twelue yeares. Agayne, ſome teſtifie that he raigned. 77. other ſay. 54. & Harriſon. 43. Moreouer, heere is to bee noted, that if he procured the faith of Chriſt to be planted within his Realme in the time of Eleutherius the Romayne Biſhop, the ſame chanced in the dayes of the Emperour Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. And about the time that Lucius Aurelius Commodus was ioyned & made partaker of the Empire wᵗʰ his father, which was ſeuen yeres after ỹ death of Lucius Aelius Aurelius Uerus, and in the. 177. after the birth of our Sauiour Jeſus Chriſt, as by Harriſons chronologie is eaſie to bee collected. For Eleutherius beganne to gouerne the ſea of Rome in the yeare. 169. according to the opinion of ỹ moſt diligent chronographers of our time, & gouerned fifteene yeeres and thirteene dayes. And yet there are that affirme, howe Lucius dyed at Glowceſter in the yeare of our Lorde. 156. other ſay that he dyed in the yeare. 201. and other. 208. So that the troth of this hiſtorie is brought into doubt by the diſcorde of writers, concerning the time and other circumſtances, although they all agree that in this kings dayes the Chriſtian faith was firſt by publique conſent openly receyued & profeſſed in this lande, whiche as ſome affirme, ſhould chance in the twelfth yeare of his raigne, and in the yeare of our Lord. 177. Other iudge, that it came to paſſe in the eyght yeare of his regiment, and in the yeare of our Lord. 188. where other (as before is ſayd) alledge that it was in the yeare. 179. Nauclerus ſayth, that this happened about the yeare of our Lord. 156. And Henricus de Erphordia ſuppoſeth, that it was in the yeare of our Lorde. 169. and in the nineteenth yeare of the Emperour Marcus Antonius Uerus: & after other, about the ſixth yeare of the Emperoure Comodus. But to proceede: King Lucius dyed without iſſue, by reaſon whereof, after his deceſſe the Britaynes fell at variance, whiche continued about the ſpace of fiftene yeares (as Fabian thinketh,) keth) howbeit, the olde engliſhe Chronicle affirmeth, that the contention betwixte them remained .50. yeares, though Harding affirmeth but 4. yeares. And thus much of the Britaynes, and their kings Coylus and Lucius. Now it reſteth to ſpeake ſomewhat of the Romaynes whyche gouerned here in the meane while. After that Agricola was called backe to Rome, the Britaines (& namely thoſe that inhabited beyond Twede) partly being weakened of their former ſtrength, and partly in conſideration of their pledges, whiche they had deliuered to the Romaynes, remayned in peace certayne yeres.

Cn. Trebellius Lieutenãt.

IN the meane time, the Romayne Lieutenant Cn. Trebellius that ſucceded Julius Agricola, hee coulde not foreſee all things ſo preciſely, but that ẏ ſouldiers waxing vnruly by reaſon of long reſt, fell at variance amongſt themſelues, & would not in the ende obey the Lieutenante, but diſquieted the Britanes beyond meaſure. Wherfore the Britaynes perceyuing themſelues ſore oppreſſed with intollerable bondage, & that dayly the ſame increaſed, they conſpire togither, vppon hope to recouer libertie, and to defende their coũtrey by all meanes poſſible, and heerewith they take weapon in hand againſt the Romaines, and boldly aſſaile them: but this they did yet warely, and ſo, that they might flee vnto the Wooddes & bogges for refuge vpon neceſſitie, according to the manner of their countrey. Herevpon diuers ſlaughters were committed on both parties, and all the countrey was now ready to rebell: wherof, when the Emperour Adrian was aduertiſed from Trebellius the Lieutenant, with all conuenient ſpeede he paſſed ouer into Britayne, & quieted all the Ile, vſing great humanitie towardes the inhabitants, and making ſmall accompte of that part where the Scottes nowe inhabite, eyther bycauſe of the barrennelle thereof, or for that by reaſon of the nature of the coũtrey he thoughte it would be hard to be kept vnder ſubiection, hee deuiſed to deuide it from the reſidue of Britayne, and ſo cauſed a wall to be made from the mouth of Tyne vnto the water of Eſke, whyche wall conteyned in length. xxx. mile.

The wall of Adrian built. Spartianus.

After this, the Britaynes bearing a malicious hatred towardes the Romayne Souldiers, & repyning to be kepte vnder the bond of ſeruitude, eftſoones goe aboute to recouer libertie againe. Whereof aduertiſement being giuen, the Emperour Pius Antonius ſendeth ouer Lollius Vrbicus as Lieutenant into Britaine, who by ſundry battayles ſtryken, conſtreyned the Britaines to remaine in quiet, and cauſing thoſe that inhabited in the Northe partes to remoue further off from the confines of the Romaine prouince, reyſed another wall beyond that whiche the Emperour Adrian had made, as is to be ſuppoſed, for ẏ more ſuretie of the Romayne ſubiectes againſte the inuaſion of the enimies. But yet Lollius dyd not ſo make an end of the war, but that the Britaynes ſhortly after attempted of newe, eyther to reduce their ſtate into libertie, or to bring the ſame into further daunger.

Lollius Vrbicus Lieutenãt

Iulius Anoth built.

WHerevpõ Marcus Antonius that ſucceeded Pius, ſendeth Calphurnius Agricola to ſucceede Lollius in the gouernemente of Britayne, the which eaſily ouercame and ſubdued all his enimies. After this, there chanced ſome trouble in the dayes of the Emperoure Commodus the ſonne of Marcus Antonius and his ſucceſſor in the Empire: for the Britaynes ẏ dwelled Northwardes beyond Adrians wall, brake through the ſame, and ſpoyled a great part of the countrey, againſt whom the Romayne Lieutenant for that time being come forthe, gaue them battell: but both he and the Romayne Souldiers that were with him, were beaten downe and ſlayne.

Iulius Calphurnius. Of this Calphurnius Britayne may read more in Scottiſh nicle.

Dion.

With whiche newes Commodus being ſore amaſed, ſent againſt the Britaynes one Vlpius Marcellus, a man of great diligence & temperancy, but therwith rough & nothing gentle. He vſed the ſame kinde of diet that the common ſouldiers did vſe. He was a Captayne much watchfull, as one contented with very little ſleepe, & deſirous to haue his ſouldiers alſo vigilante and carefull to keepe ſure watch in the night ſeaſon. Euery euening hee would write twelue tables, ſuch as they vſed to make of ẏ linde tree, & deliuering them to one of his ſeruants, appointed him to beare them at ſeuerall houres of ẏ night to ſundry ſouldiers, whereby ſuppoſing that their Generall was ſtyll watching and not gone to bed, they might be in doubt to ſleepe. And although of nature he could wel abſteyne from ſleepe, yet to be the better able to forbeare it, he vſed a marueilous ſpare kinde of dyet: for to the end ẏ he would not fil himſelfe too much with bread, he woulde eate none but ſuche as was brought to him frõ Rome, ſo that more than neceſſitie compelled him, he could not eate, by reaſon that the ſtalneſſe toke away ẏ pleaſant taſt therof, & leſſe prouoked his appetite. He was a marueilous cõtener of money, ſo ẏ bribes might not moue him to do otherwiſe thã dutie required.

Vlpius Marcellus naunte.

Thus

Thus Marcellus being of ſuch diſpoſition, ſore afflicted the Britaynes, and put them oftentimes to greate loſſes, through fame whereof, Commodus enuying his renoune, was after in minde to haue made him away, but yet ſpared him for a further purpoſe, and ſuffered hym to departe.

After he was remoued from the gouernment of Britaynie, one Perhennis Captayne of the Emperours garde (or Pretorian Souldiers, as they were then called) bearing all the rule vnder the Emperour Commodus, appoynted certaine Gentlemen of meane calling to gouerne the army in Britaine. The Souldiers therefore in the ſame army repining to be gouerned by mennes of baſe degree, in reſpect of thoſe that had borne rule ouer them before, being honorable perſonages, as Senators, and of the conſuler dignitie, they fel at ſquare among themſelues, and about fifteene hundred of them departed towardes Rome to exhibite their complaynte againſte Perhennis: for whatſoeuer was amiſſe, the blame was ſtill layd to him. They paſſed forthe without impeachmente at all, and comming to Rome, the Emperour himſelfe came forth to underſtande what they meant by this their comming in ſuche ſorte from the place where they were appoynted to ſerue. Their aunſwer was, that they were come to informe him of the treaſon which Perhennis had deuiſed to his deſtruction, that hee might make his ſonne Emperoure. To the whiche accuſation, when Commodus too lightly gaue care, and beleeued it to be true, namely, through the ſetting on of one Cleander, who hated Perhennis, for that he withheld hym from doyng diuers vnlawfull actes, which he went about vpon a wilfull minde, (without all reaſon or modeſtie) to practiſe: The matter was ſo handled in the ende, that Perhennis was deliuered to the Souldiers, who cruelly mangled him, and preſently put him to death.

Pertinax Lieftenant of Britayne.

But nowe to the tumultes in Britayne. It was thought needeful to ſende ſome ſufficiente Captayne of authoritie thither, & therefore was one Pertinax that hadde bin Conſul and ruler ouer ſoute ſeuerall conſuler prouinces, appointed by Commodus, to goe as Lieutenat into that Ile, both for that he was thought a mā moſt meete for ſuch a charge, and alſo to ſatiſfie his credite, for that hee had bin diſcharged by Perhennis of bearing any rule, & ſent home into Liguria where hee was borne, & there appoynted to remayne.

This Pertinax comming into Britayne, pacifyed the army, but not without danger to haue bin ſlayne by a mutinie reyſed by one of the Legions: for he was ſtriken downe, and left for dead among the ſlayne carcaſſes. But he worthily reuenged himſelfe of this iniurie. At length, hauing chaſtiſed the Rebels, and brought the Ile into meetely good quiet, hee ſued and obteyned to bee diſcharged of that rowme, becauſe as he alledged, the Souldiers could not brooke him, for that hee kept them in dutifull obedience, by correcting ſuch as offended the lawes of Armes.

Clodius Albinus Lieutenāt.

Then was Clodius Albinus appoynted to haue the rule of the Romayn army in Britayne: whoſe deſtruction whē Seuerus the Emperoure ſought, Albinus eſteemed it quickly: and therefore chooſing forth a greate power of Britaynes, paſſed with the ſame ſame ouer into Fraunce to encounter with Seuerus, who was come thither towards him, ſo that neere to the Citie of Lions, they ioyned in battell & fought right ſore, in ſo much that Seuerus was at poynt to haue receyued ẏ ouerthrow by the high proweſſe and manhode of the Bꝛitaynes: but yet in the ende, Albinus loſt ẏ fielde, & was ſlayne. Then Heraclitus as Lieutenant began to gouerne Bꝛitayne (as writeth Sparcianus) being ſent thither by Seuerus for that purpoſe before. And ſuch was the ſtate of this Ile about the yere of our Lord. 195. In which ſeaſon, bycauſe that King Lucius was dead, and hadde left no iſſue to ſucceede him, the Bꝛitaynes (as before ye haue heard) were at variance amongſt themſelues, and ſo continued till the commyng of Seuerus, whom the Bꝛitiſh Chꝛonographers affirme to raigne as King in this Ile, and that by righte of ſucceſſion in bloud, as diſcended of Indꝛogeus the Bꝛitaine, which went to Rome with Julius Ceſar, as before ye haue heard.

Seuerus.

This Seuerus as then Emperoure of Rome, began to rule this Ile (as authors affirme) in ẏ yere of oure Lorde 207. & gouerned the ſame 4. yeres & odde moneths. At length, hearing that one Fulgẽtius as then a leader of the Pictes was entred into the bordures of his countrey on this ſyde Durham, he rayſed an hoſt of Bꝛitaynes & Romans, with the which he marched towards his enimies: and meeting with the ſaid Fulgentius in a place neere vnto Yorke, in the ende after ſore fighte, Seuerus was ſlayne, when he hadde ruled thys land for the ſpace almoſt of fiue yeeres as before is ſayd, and was after buried at Yorke, leauyng behinde him two ſonnes, the one named Geta, & the other Baſſianus. This Baſſianus beeyng borne of a Bꝛittiſh woman, ſucceeded his father in the gouernemente of Bꝛitayne, in the yeare of the incarnation of our Lord. 211. The Romanes would haue had Geta created King of Bꝛitaine, bearing more fauoure to him bycauſe he hadde a Romane Lady to his mother: but the Bꝛitaines moued with the like reſpect, helde with Baſſianus. And therevpon warre was rayſed betwixte the two bꝛethren, & comming to trie their quarrell by battell, Geta was ſlayne, and Baſſianus with ayde of the Bꝛitaynes, remayned victor, & ſo continued King, till at length he was ſlayne by one Carauſius a Bꝛitaine, borne but of lowe birth, howbeit right valiant in armes, and therefore well eſteemed: In ſomuch that obteynyng of the Senate of Rome the keeping of the coaſts of Bꝛitayne, that he might defend the ſame from the malice of ſtraungers as Pictes and other, he drew to him a great number of Souldiers & ſpecially of Bꝛitaines, to whome hee promiſed that if they would make him king, hee would clerely deliuer them from the oppreſſion of the Romaine ſeruitude. Wherevpon the Bꝛitaynes rebellyng againſt Baſſianus, ioined themſelues to Carauſius, who by their ſuppoꝛt, vanquiſhed and ſlewe the ſayd Baſſianus, after he had raigned ſixe, oꝛ as ſome affirme. xxx. yeares.

Thus farre out of the Engliſhe and Bꝛittiſhe writers, the whiche howe farre they vary from a likelyhood of troth, yee ſhall heare what the ẏ approwed hiſtoꝛiographers, Greekes, and Latines, writing of theſe matters, haue recoꝛded. Herodia

The Emperour Seuerus receiuing aduertiſement from the Lieutenant of Bꝛitayne that the people there moued Rebellion, and waſted the countrey with roades & foꝛrayes, ſo that it was needefull to haue the prince himſelfe to come thither with a greate power to reſiſt ẏ enimies, he of an ambitious mind reioyced not a little for thoſe newes, bycauſe hee ſawe occaſion offered to aduãce his renoume and fame with increaſe of new victoꝛies nowe in the Weſt, after ſo many triumphes purchaſed & got by him in the Eaſt and Noꝛth partes of the woꝛld. Herevpon though he was of great age, yet the deſire that he had ſtil to winne honoꝛ, cauſed him to take in hand to make a iourney into this land, and ſo being furniſhed of al things neceſſary, he ſet foꝛwards, being carried

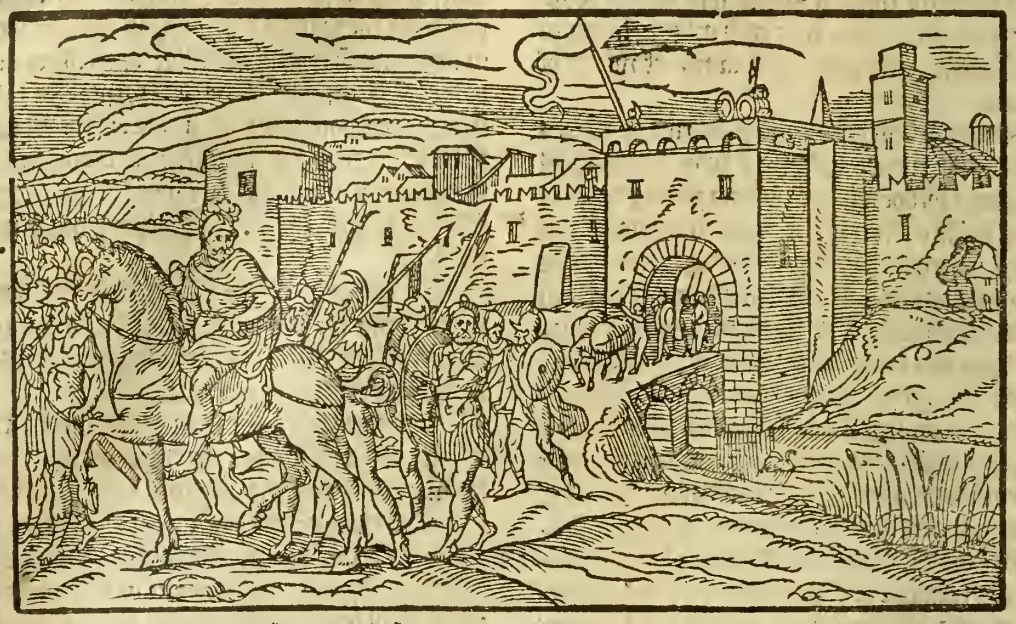
for the more part in a litter for his more eaſe: for ẏ beſide his feebleneſſe of age, he was alſo troubled with ẏ goute. He toke with him his two ſonnes, Antonius Baſſianus and Geta, vpon purpoſe as was thought, to auoyde occaſions of ſuche inconuenience as he perceyued might grow by diſcord, moued betwixte thẽ through flatterers and malicious ſycophants whiche ſoughte to ſet them at variance: whiche to bring to paſſe, he perceyued there ſhould want no meane whileſt they continued in Rome, amid ſuch pleaſures and idle paſtimes as were dayly there frequented: and therfore he cauſed them to attend him in this iourney into Britayne, that they might learne to liue ſoberly, and after the manner of warre.

Seuerus being thus on his iourney towardes Britayne, ſtayed not by the way, but with all diligence ſpedde him forthe, and paſſing the Sea very ſwiftly, entred this Ile, and aſſembled a mightie power togither, meaning to aſſayle hys enimies, and to purſue the warre againſte them to the vttermoſt. The Britaynes greatly amaſed with this ſodayne arriuall of the Emperoure, and hearing that ſuch preparation was made againſt them, ſent Imbaſſadors to him to intreat of peace, & to excuſe their rebellious doings. But Seuerus delaying time for anſwere, as he that was deſirous to atchieue ſome high enterpriſe againſt the Britaines, for the which he might deſerue ẏ ſurname of Britannicus, which he greatly coueted, ſtill was buſie to prepare all thyngs neceſſary for the warre, and namely, cauſed a great number of bridges to bee made to lay ouer the bogges and mariſhes, ſo that his ſouldiers might haue place to ſtand vppon, and not to bee encõbred for lacke of firme groũd whẽ they ſhuld cope with their enimies: for the more parte of Britaine in thoſe dayes (as Herodianus writeth) was full of fennes, and marres grounds, by reaſon of the often flowings and waſhing of the ſea tides: by the whiche marres grounds the enimies being therto accuſtomed, wold runne & ſwimme in the waters, and wade vp to the middle at their pleaſure, going for the more parte naked, ſo that they paſſed not on the mudde and myres, for they knewe not the vſe of wearing clothes, but ware hoopes of Iron about their middles and neckes, eſteeming the ſame as an ornamente and token of riches, as other barbarous people did golde.

Moreouer, they marked, or (as it were) paynted their bodies in diuers ſortes and with ſundry ſhapes and figures of beaſtes and foules, & therefore they vſed not to weare any garmentes, that ſuche paynting of their bodyes might the more appearantly be ſeene, which they eſteemed a great brauerie.

They were as the ſame Herodianus writeth, a people giuen muche to the warre, and delighted in ſlaughter and bloudſhed, vſing none other weapons or armure but a ſlender buckler, a Jaueline, and a ſworde tyed to their naked bodyes: for as for headpeece or Habergeon, they eſteemed not, bicauſe they thought the ſame ſhuld be an hinderance to them when they ſhould paſſe ouer any marres, or be driuen to ſwimme anye waters, or flee to the bogges. The furniture of the ſauage Britaynes.



Moreouer, to ſuffer hunger, colde, and trauell, they were ſo vſed and enured therwith, that they would not paſſe to lie in the bogges and myres, couered vp to the chynne, without caring for meate for the ſpace of diuers dayes togither: and in the woddes they would liue vpon rootes and barkes of trees. Alſo they vſed to prepare for theſelues a certayne kynde of meate, of the whiche if they receyued but ſo muche as amounted to the quantitie of a beane, they would thinke themſelues ſatisfyed, and feele neyther hunger nor thirſt.

The one halfe of the Ile or little Ieſſe was ſubiect vnto the Romaynes, the other were gouerned of themſelues, the people for the moſt part hauing the rule in their handes.

Seuerus therefore meaning to ſubdue the whole, and vnderſtandyng theyr nature, and the manner of their making warre, prouided him ſelfe of all things expedient for the annoyance of them and help of his own ſouldiers, and appointing his ſonne Geta to remayne in that parte of the Ile which was ſubiect to the Romaynes, he toke with him his other ſonne Antoninus, and with his army marched forthe, and entred into the confynes of the enimies, and there beganne to waſt and forrey the countrey, whereby there enſued diuers conflictes and ſkirmiſhes betwixte the Romaynes and the inhabitantes, the victory ſtill remayning with the Romaynes ſide: but the enimies eaſily eſcaped withoute any greate loſſe, vnto the woddes, Mountaynes, bogges, and ſuch other places of refuge, as they knew to be at hand, whither the Romaynes durſt not followe, nor once approche, for feare to bee entrapped and enclofed by the Britaynes that were ready to returne and aſſayle their enimies vppon euery occaſion of aduauntage that myghte bee offered.

This manner of dealing ſore troubled the Romaynes, and ſo hindred them in their proceedings, that no ſpeedy ende coulde bee made of that war: the Britaynes woulde oftentimes of purpoſe lay their Cattell, as Oxen, Kyne, Sheepe, and ſuche like, in places conueniente, to bee as a ſtale to the Romaynes, and when the Romaynes ſhoulde make to them to fetche the ſame away, being diſtant from the reſidue of the army a good ſpace, they would fall vpõ them and Dion Caſſius.

and diſtreſſe them. Beſide this, the Romaynes were muche anoyed with the vnwholeſomneſſe of the waters whiche they were forced to drinke, and if they chanced to ſtray abrode, they were snapped vp by ambuſhes which the Calidonians layde for them, and when they were ſo feeble that they could not through wante of ſtrength keepe pace with their fellowes as they marched in order of battell, they were ſlayne by their owne fellowes, leaſt they ſhould be left behinde for a pray to the enimies. Hereby there died in this iourney of the Romaine army, at the point of fiftie thouſand men: but yet woulde not Seuerus returne, till he had gone through the whole Ile, and ſo came to the vttermoſt partes of all the Countrey now called Scotland, and finally came backe agayne to the other parte of the Ile ſubiect to the Romaynes, the inhabitantes whereof, named by Dion Caſſius Meatæ: but firſt he cõſtreyned the other whome the ſame Dion nameth Caledonij, to conclude a league with him, with ſuch conditions as they were compelled to departe with no ſmall portion of the countrey, and to deliuer vnto him their armour and weapons.

In the meane time, the Emperoure Seuerus being worne with age fell ſicke, ſo that hee was conſtreyned to abide at home within that part of the Ile which obeyed ẏ Romans, and to appoint his ſon Antoninus to take charge of the army abrode. But Antoninus not regarding ẏ enimies, attempted little or nothing againſte them, but ſoughte wayes howe to winne the fauoure of the ſouldiers and men of war, that after his fathers death (for which he dayly loked) he might haue their aide & aſſiſtance to be admitted Emperoure in his place. Nowe when hee ſaw that his father bare out his ſickneſſe longer time than he would haue wiſhed, he practiſed with Phiſitions and other of his fathers ſeruaunts to diſpatche him by one meane or other.

Whileſt Antoninus thus negligẽtly loked to his charge, the Britaynes began a new Rebellion, not only thoſe ẏ were lately ioyned in league with the Emperoure, but the other alſo whiche were ſubiects to the Romane Empire. Seuerus toke ſuche diſpleaſure, that he called togither the Souldiers, and commaunded them to inuade the countrey, and to kill al ſuch as they might meete with in any place without reſpect, and that hys cruell commaundement he expreſſed in theſe verſes taken out of Homer.

Nemo manus fugiat veſtros, cædemq; cruentam, Iliad.
Nonfœtus grauida mater quem geſſit in aluo,
Horrendam effugiat cædem.

Let none eſcape your bloudy handes,
nor direſome ſlaughter flie,
No not the babe vnborne, which in the mothers wombe doth lie.

But whileſt he is thus diſquieted with ẏ Rebellion of the Britaynes, & the diſloyall practiſes of his ſon Antoninus, which to him were not vnknowen. For the wicked ſonne had by diuers attempts diſcouered his trayterous and vnnatural meanings. At lẽgth, rather through ſorrow and griefe, than by force of ſickneſſe, he waſted away, & departed this life at Yorke the third day before ẏ Nones of Februarie, after he had gouerned the Empire by the ſpace of. 17. yeeres. 8. moneths &. 3. daies. He liued. 65. yeres. 9. moneths &. 15. days: he was borne the third Ides of Aprill, by that which before is recited out of Herodyan & Dion Caſſius of ẏ maners & vſages of thoſe people, againſt whome Seuerus helde warre heere in Britayne: it may be coniectured, ẏ they were the Pictes, the whiche poſſeſſed in thoſe dayes a greate parte of Scotland, and with continual incurſiõs & roodes waſted & deſtroied ẏ borders of thoſe countreys which which were subiect to the Romains. To kepe the back therfore & to represse their inuasions Seuerus (as some write) either restored ẏ former wall made by Adrian, or else newely buylt an other ouerthwarte the yle from the east sea to the west, conteining in length. 232. miles. This wall was not made of stone, but of turfe & earth supported with stakes & pyles of wood, and defended on the back with a deepe trenche or ditche, & also fortified with diuers toures & turrets buylt and erected vpon ẏ same wall or rampire so nere together, that the soũd of trumpets being placed in the same, might be heard betwixte, and so warning giuen from one to an other vpon the fyrste descrying of the enimies.

Seuerus being departed out of this life in the yere of our lord. 211. his son Anteninus otherwise called also Bassianus, wold fayn haue vsurped ẏ whole gouernment into his own hands, attempting with bribes & large promises, to corrupt the mindes of the souldiors: but when he perceiued ẏ his purpose wold not forward as he wished in ẏ behalf, he concluded a league with the enimies, & making peace with thẽ, returned back towardes Yorke, and came to his mother & brother Geta, with whom he took order for the burial of his father. And first his body being brent (as the maner was) the ashes were put into a vessel of gold, and so conueyed to Rome by the two brethren and the empresse Julia, that was mother to Geta the yonger brother, & mother in law to the elder, Antoninus Bassianus, and by all meanes possible sought to maintayn loue & concorde betwixt the brethren, which now at the first toke vpon them to rule the empire equally togither: but the ambition of Bassianus was such, that finally vpon desire to haue the whole rule himselfe, he founde meanes to dispatche his brother Geta, breaking one day into his chãber, & slaying him cuẽ in his mothers lap, & so possessed the gouernmẽt alone, til at lẽgth he was slain at Edessa a citie in Mesopotamia by one of his own soldiors, as he was about to vntrusse his poinctes to doe the office of nature, after he had reigned the space of. vj. yeares as is aforesayde. Sextus Aurelius.

Caraũsius.

CAraũsius, a Briton of vnknowen birth, as witnesseth the Britishe histories, after he had vãquisht & slain Bassianus (as ẏ same histories make mẽtiõ, was of the Britayns made kyng and ruler ouer them, in the yeare of oure Lorde. 218. as Galfr. hath: but W. Harrison noteth it to be in an. 286. This Caraũsius either to haue the ayd and support of the Picts, as in the Britishe historie is conteined, either elſe to be at quietnes with them, being not otherwise able to resist thẽ, gaue to them the coũtreis in the south partes of Scotlande, which ioyne to England on the east marches, as Mers, Louthian, and others. Caraũsius. 218. Galfrid. Polycron. Fabian.

But here is to be noted, that the Britishe writers affirme, that these Picts ẏ were thus placed in the south parts of Scotland at this time, were brought ouer out of Scythia by Fulgentius, to ayd him against Seuerus, & that after the death of Seuerus and Fulgentius, which both died of hurtes receyued in the batayle fought betwixt thẽ at Yorke: the Picts toke part with Bassianus, & at length betrayed him in the battaile which he fought against this Caraũsius: for by corrupting them by such practises as he vsed, they turned to his side, to the ouerthrow & vtter destruction of Bassianus: for the which traiterous part they had those south countreys of Scotland giuen vnto them for their habitation. But by the Scottish writers it should appere, that those Pictes whiche ayded Fulgentius and also Caraũsius, were the same that long before had inhabited in the north parts of Britayne, nowe called Scotland. But whatsoeuer they were, trouth it it is (as the Britishe histories record) that at lẽgth one Alectus was sent from Rome by the senate with. iij. legions of souldiors to subdue Caraũsius, which he did, and slewe him in the fielde, as the same histories make mẽtion after he had reigned the space of. vij. or. viij. yeares: and in ẏ yeare of oure saluation. 293. as William Harison accompteth. Galfridus. 193.

Alectus.

ALectus in hauing vanquished and slayn Caraũsius toke vpon him the rule and gouernment of Britayn, in the yeare of our Lorde. 293. Alectus Of whom our British histories write after this maner. 293.

This Alectus whenne he had restored the lande to the subiection of the Romayns, diede the greate crueltie againſt ſuche of the Britaynes, as hadde maynteined the parte of Carauſſius, by reaſon whereof, he purchaſed muche euill will of the Britons, the which at length conſpires againſt him, and purpoſing to chaſe the Romaines altogether out of their countrey, they procured one Aſclepiodotus, whom(the Britiſh chronicles name Duke of Cornewall) to take vpon him as chiefe capitaine of that enterpriſe. Whervpon the ſame Aſclepiodotus aſſembling a great armie togither, made ſuch ſharpe warres on the Romains, that they being chaſed from place to place, at length withdrewe to the citie of London, and there held them til Aſclepiodotus came thither, and prouoked Alectus and his Romains ſo muche, that in the end they iſſued forth of the Citie, and gaue bataple to the Britons, in the whiche muche people on both partes were ſlayn, but the greateſt number dyed on the Romaines ſyde: and amongeſt other, Alectus himſelf was ſlayne. The reſidue of the Romains that were lefte alyue, retired backe into the Citie with a captayn of theirs named Liuius Gallus, and defended themſelues within the walles for a tyme right valiantly.

Thus was Alectus ſlayne of the Britons, after he had reigned (as ſome ſuppoſe) aboute the terme of ſixe yeres (or as ſome other write) three yeares. Fabian. Mat. VVeſt.

Aſclepiodotus duke of Cornewall.

Aſclepiodotus Galfr. Mon. Mat. VVeſt.

Aſclepiodotus, Duke of Cornewall, began his reign ouer the Britons in ỳ yeare of oure Lorde 232.

After he had vanquiſhed the Romaynes in bataple, as before is recited, he layd his ſiege aboute the citie of London, and finally by knightly force entred the ſame, and ſlew the forenamed Liuius Gallus neere vnto a broke, whiche in thoſe dayes ranne through the citie, and threwe him into the ſame broke: By reaſon whereof long after it was called Gallus or Wallus broke. And at this preſente the ſtreet where the ſame broke did runne, is called Walbroke. VVall

Then after that Aſclepiodotus had ouercome all his enimyes, hee helde this lande a certayne ſpace in good reſt and quiet, and miniſtred iuſtice vprightly, in rewarding the good, and puniſhing the euyll. Till at lengthe through ſlaunderous toungs of malicious perſons, diſcorde was reyſed betwixte the king and one Coyll or Coylus, that was gouernoure of Colcheſter: the occaſion wherof appeareth not by writers.

But whatſoeuer the matter was, there enſued ſuch hatred betwixt thē, that on both partes great armies were rayſed, and meetyng in the fielde, they fought a ſore and myghtie battayle, in the whiche Aſclepiodotus was ſlayn, after he had reigned .xxx. yeares. Aſclepiodotus ſlayne. Mat. hath.

Thus hath Geffrey of Monmouth, and our common Chroniclers written of Carauſſius, Alectus, and Aſclepiodotus, whyche gouerned her in Britayne. Eutro.

But Eutropius that famous writer of the Romayne hiſtories, in the Actes of Diocletian hath in effecte theſe wordes.

About the ſame tyme Carauſſius, the whiche being borne of moſte baſe offspring, atteyned to highe honour and dignitie by order of renowmed Chiualrie and ſeruice in the warres, receiued charge at Bolein, to kepe the ſeas quiet alongſt ỳ coaſts of Britain, Frāce, and Flaunders, & other countreys countreys thereaboutes, bycauſe the Frenchemen, whiche yet inhabited within the bounder of Germanye) and the Saxons ſore troubled thoſe ſeas. Carauſius taking oftentymes many of the enimies, neyther reſtored the goodes to them of the countreye from whom the enimies had bereft the ſame, nor yet ſent any parte therof to the Emperours, but kept the whole to his owne vſe. Wherupon when ſuſpition roſe, that he ſhoulde of purpoſe ſuffer the enimies to paſſe by hym, tyll they had taken ſome pryſes, that in their returne with the ſame, he myght encounter with them, and take that from them whyche they hadde gotten, (by whiche ſubtile practiſe he was thought greatly to haue enriched himſelf) Maximianus that was fellowe in gouernement of the Empire with Diocleſianus, remayning then in Gallia, and aduertiſed of theſe doinges, commaunded that Carauſius ſhoulde be ſlayn, but he hauing warning thereof rebelled, and vſurping the imperiall ornamentes and title, got poſſeſſion of Britayne, againſt whom (being a man of greate experience in all warlyke knowledge) when warres had ben attempted and folowed in vayn, at lengthe a peace was concluded with him, and ſo he enioyed the poſſeſſion of Britayn by the ſpace of. vij. yeares, and then was ſlaine by his companion Alectus, the whiche after him ruled Britayn for the ſpace of. iij. yeares, and was in the end oppreſſed by the guyle of Aſclepiodotus gouernour of the Pretorie, (or as I may call him) lord Lieutenant of ſome precinct and iuriſdiction pertayning to the Romayne empire. And ſo was Britayn recouered by the foreſaid Aſclepiodotus about. x. yeres after that Carauſius had firſt vſurped the gouernment there, and about the yere of our Lord. 300. as Polydor iudgeth, wherin he varieth muche from Fabian and others.

But to ſhew what we fynde further written of the ſubduing of Alectus, I think it not amiſſe to ſette downe what Mamertinus in his Oration written in prayſe of Maximianus doth report of this matter: After he hath reckened vp diuers noble victories by the ſayde Maximianus atchieued, & ſundry nations by his force ſubdued, he beginneth with Britayn in this wyſe.

Now then all the compaſſe of the earth being recouered through your noble prowes, not onely ſo farre as the limittes of the Romayne empire hadde before extended, but alſo the enimyes bordures being ſubdewed, when Almayne had ben ſo often vanquiſhed, and Sarmatia ſo often reſtreyned and broughte vnder, the people called Vitungi, Quadi, Carpi, ſo often put to flighte, the Gothe ſubmitting himſelfe, ỹ king of Perſia by offering giftes, ſuing for peace, one deſpiteful reproche of ſo myghtie an Empire and gouernment ouer the whole, grieued vs to the hearte, as nowe at lengthe we will not ſticke to confeſſe, and to vs it ſeemed the more intollerable, bycauſe it onely remayned to the accompliſhing of your perfecte renoume and glorie: and verily not lyke as there is but one name of Britayne, ſo was the loſſe to be eſteemed ſmall to the cõmen wealth of a lande ſo plentyfull of corne, ſo abundant with ſtore of paſtures, ſo flowing wyth vaynes of mettall, ſo gaynefull with reuenues, riſing of cuſtomes and tributes, ſo enuironned with hauens, ſo huge in circuite, the which when Ceſar, the founder of this your honourable title, being the firſt that entred into it, writte that he had founde an other worlde, ſuppoſing it to bee ſo bigge, that it was not compaſſed with the ſea, but that rather by reſemblaunce, the greate Ocean was compaſſed with it: and at that time Britayn was nothyng furniſhed with ſhippes of warre, and the Romains nowe after the warres of Carthage and Aſia, had lately bene exerciſed by ſea againſt Pyrates, and afterwardes by reaſon of the warres againſte Mithridates, were practiſed as well to fighte by ſea as lande: beſyde thys the Britiſhe nation then alone was accuſtomed but onely to the Pictes and Iriſhmen, enimies halfe naked as yet, and not vſed to weare armour, ſo that the Britons for lacke of ſkill, eaſylye gaue place to the Romayne puiſſaunce, in ſo muche that Ceſar myght by that voyage onely glorye in this, that he had ſayled and paſſed ouer the Ocean ſea. But in thys wycked rebellious robberie, firſte the nauie that in tymes paſte defended the coaſtes of Gallia was ledde awaye by the Pyrate, when he fled his wayes: and beſide this, a great number of other ſhyppes were buylt after the mould of oures, the Legion of Romayne Souldioures was wonne, and broughte to take parte with the enimie, and dyuers bandes of ſtraungers that were alſo Souldioures, were ſhutte vp in the Shippes to ſerue alſo againſt vs. The merchauntes of the parties of Gallia were aſſembled and broughte togyther to the muſters, and no ſmall numbers of barbarous nations, procured to come in ayde of the Rebelles, truſtyng to enryche themſelues by the ſpoyle of the prouinces: and all theſe were trayned in the warres by ſea, thorough the inſtruction of the firſte attemptours of this miſchieuous practiſe. And althoughe oure armyes were inuincible in force and manhode, yet were they rawe and not accuſtomed to the ſeas, ſo that the fame of a greeuous and greate trouble by warre that was towarde by this ſhamefull rebellyous robberye, was blowen and ſounded in eche mans eare, although we hoped well of the end. Vnto the enimies forces was added a long ſuffrence of theyr wicked practiſes without puniſhement whyche had puffed vp the preſumptuous boldneſſe of deſperate people, that they bragged of our flay, as if it had bin for feare of them, where the diſaduauntage whiche wee hadde by ſea, ſeemed as it were by a fatall neceſſitie to deferre our victorie: neyther dydde they beleeue that the warre was put off for a tyme by aduyſe and counſell, but rather to be omitted through deſpayre to doe any good againſt them, in ſo much that now the feare of common puniſhment being layd aſide, one of the mates ſlew the archpyrate or capitayn rouer as I may call him, hoping in reward of ſo great an exployte to obteyne the whole gouernemente into his handes. This warre then being bothe ſo neceſſarie, ſo hard to enter vpon, ſo growne in tyme to a ſtubburne ſtiffneſſe, and ſo wel prouided for of the enimies part, you noble Emperor, did ſo take it in hand, that ſo ſoon as you bent the thūdring force of your imperiall maieſtie againſt that enimie, eche mā made accompt that the enterpriſe was already atchieued: for firſt of al, to ẏ end ẏ your diuine power being abſent, the barbarous nations ſhould not attempt any new trouble (a thing chiefly to be forſene) it was prouided for aforehand by interceſſiō made vnto your maieſtie: for you your ſelfe, you I ſay mightie lord Maximian eternall emperor, vouchedſafe to aduāce the cōming of your diuine excellēcie by the neereſt way that might be, which to you was not vnknowne: you therefore ſodeynly came to the Rhine, and not with any armie of horſemen or footmen, but with the terrour of your preſence, did preſerue & defend al that frontier: for Maximian once being there vpon the riuage, counteruayled any the greateſt armies that were to bee founde. For you (moſt inuincible Emperor) furniſhing & arming diuers nauies, made the enimie ſo vncertain of his own doings and voyd of cōſel, that then at length he might perceyue that he was not defended but enclofed with the Ocean ſea. Here cōmeth it to mynde how pleaſant and eaſefull the good lucke of thoſe princes in gouerning the cōmon wealth with praiſe was, whiche ſitting ſtil in Rome had triumphs and ſurnames appointed them of ſuch nations as their captains did vanquiſhe. Fronto therefore, not the ſeconde, but matche with the firſt honour of the Romaine eloquence, when he yelded vnto the emperor Antoninus the renome of the warre brought to end in Britayn, although he ſitting at home in his palace within the citie, had cōmitted the cōduct & ſucceſſe of that war ouer vnto the ſame Fronto, it was cōfeſſed by him, ẏ the Emperor ſitting as it were at the helme of the ſhip, deſerued ẏ prayſe by giuing of perfect order to the full accōpliſhing of the enterpriſe. But you moſt inuincible Emperour, haue bin not onely the appointer forth howe all this voyage by ſea, and proſecuting the warre by lande ſhoulde be demeaned, as appertayned to you by vertue of your Imperiall rule and dignitie, but alſo you haue bene an exhorter and ſetter forward in the things themſelues, and through example of your aſſured conſtancie, the victorie was atchieued. For you taking the Sea at Sluyce, didde put an irreuocable deſire into their heartes that were readye to take ſhippe the ſame tyme in the mouth of the ryuer of Sayne, in ſo muche that when the Capitaynes of that armie were about to linger tyme, by reaſon the ſeas and ayre was troubled, they cryed to haue the ſayles hoyſed vp, and ſigne giuen to launche forth that they myght paſſe forwarde on theyr iourney, deſpiſing certayne tokens which threatned theyr wrecke, and ſo ſet forward on a raynie and tempeſtuous daye, ſayling with a croſſe-wynde, for no forewynde myghte ſerue theyr tourne. But what was hee that durſt not committe him ſelfe vnto the ſea were the ſame neuer ſo vnquiet, when you were once vnder ſayle, and ſette forwarde? One voyce and exhortation was amonge them all (as reporte hathe gone thereof) when they hearde that you were once got forth vppon the water, what doe wee doubte? what meane we to ſtaye? hee is nowe lewſed from lande, he is forwarde on his way, and peraduenture is alreadie got ouer: let vs put all thynges in proke, lette vs venture thorough anye daungers of ſea whatſoeuer, what is there that we may ſtand in fear of? we folow the emperour: neyther diddethe opinion of your good happe deceyue them: for as by reporte of themſelues, wee doe vnderſtande, at that ſelfe tyme there fell ſuche a myſte and thycke fogge vpon the Seas, that the enimyes Nauie layde at the Iſle of Wyghte, watchyng for theyr aduerſaries and lurkyng as it were in awayte, theſe your ſhippes paſſed by, and were not once perceyued, neyther did the enimie then ſtaye, although he coulde not reſiſte. But nowe as concerning that the ſame armye vnvanquiſhable fyghting vnder your enſignes and name, ſtreight wayes after it came to lande, ſet fyre on theyr ſhippes: what moued them ſo to doe, excepte the admonitions of your diuine motion? or what other reaſon perſwaded them to reſerue no furtheraunce for theyr flight if neede were, nor to feare the doubtfull chaunces of warre, nor as the Prouerbe ſayeth, to thinke the hazarde of martiall dealyngs to be common, but that by contemplation of your proſperous happe, it was verie certayne that there needed no doubte to bee caſte, for victorie to be obteined? There were no ſufficiēt forces at that preſent amōg them, no mighty puiſſant ſtrength of Romains, but they had only conſideration of your vnſpeakable fortunate succesſe commyng from the heauens aboue, for what so euer battaile doth chaunce to be offered, to make ful accompt of victorie, resteth not so muche in the assuraunce of the souldiours, as in the good lucke and felicitie of the Capitaine generall. That same ringleader of the ingratious faction, what mente he to depart frō that shore whiche he possessed? Why did he forsake bothe his nauie and the hauen? but that (moste inuincible Emperour) hee stoode in feare of your commyng, whose sayles hee beholde readie to approche towards him, howesoeuer the matter shoulde fall out, he chose rather to trye his fortune wyth your capitaynes than to abyde the present force of your maiestie: a madde man that vnderstoode not, that whether so euer he fled, the power of your diuine maiestie to be present, in all places where your countenance and banners are had in reuerence. But hee fleeing from your presence, fell into the handes of youre people, of you was he ouercome, of youre armies was he oppressed. To be short, he was brought into suche feare, and as it were still looking behynde him, for doubte of your comming after him, that as one out of his remembrance amazed what to do, he hasted forward to his death, so that he neyther sette his men in order of battayle, nor marshalled suche power as hee had about him, but onely with the olde authors of that conspiracie, & the hired bands of the barbarous nations, as one forgetful of so great preparation which he had made, ran hedlong forwards to his destruction, insomuch (noble emperor) your felicitie yeldeth this good hap to the cōmon welth, that the victorie being atchieued in the behalfe of the Romain empire, there almost died not one Romain: for as I heare, all those fields and hilles laye couered with none but only with the bodies of moste wicked enimies, the same beeing of the barbarous nations, or at the lest wise apparelled in the cōterfait shapes of barbarous garments, glistering with their long yealow heares, but nowe with gashes of wounds & blood all deformed, and lying in sundry maners, as the pangs of death occasioned by their wounds, had caused them to stretch forth or draw in their maymed limmes and mangled parts of their dying bodies. And among these, the chiefe ringleader of the theeues was founde, who had put off those robes which in his life time he had vsurped & dishonored, so as vneth was he couered wyth one piece of apparell wherby he might be knowen, so neare were his wordes true vttered at the houre of his death, whiche he saw at hand, that he would not haue it vnderstoode howe he was slayn. Thus verily (moste inuincible emperour) so greate a victorie was appointed to you by consent of the immortall gods ouer al the enemies whom you assayled, but namely the slaughter of the Frankeners & those youre souldiours also, which as before I haue sayd, Francones sine Franci. through missyng their course by reason of the myst that lay on the seas, were nowe come to the citie of London, where they slewe downe right in eche parte of the same citie, what multitude soeuer remayned of those hyred barbarous people, which escaping from the batayle, mente after they had spoyled the citie to haue got away by flight. But now being thus slain by your souldiours, the subiects of your prouince were both preserued from further daunger, and toke pleasure to beholde the slaughter of suche cruell enimies. O what a manyfolde victorie was this? worthie vndoubtedly of innumerable triumphes, by which victorie Britayne is restored to the Empire, by which victorie the nation of the Frankeners is vtterlye destroyed, and by whiche many other nations found accessaries in the cōspiracie of that wicked practise, are compelled to obedience. To conclude, the seas are purged and brought to perpetuall quietnes. Glorie you therfore, inuincible Emperor, for that you haue, as it were, gote an other worlde, and in restoring to the Romain puissaunce the glorie of conquest by sea, haue added to the Romain empire an element greater then al the compasse of the earth, that is, the mightie mayne Ocean. You haue made an ende of the warre, inuincible Emperour, that seemed as present to threaten all prouinces, and might haue spreade abroade, and burst out in flame, euen so largely, as ỳ Ocean Seas stretche, and the Mediterrane gulfes do reache: neither are we ignorant although thorough feare of you that infection did fester within the bowels of Britayn only, and proceeded no further, & what furie it would haue auanced it selfe elsewhere if it might haue bin assured of meane to haue raunged abroade so farre as it wished. For it was bounded in with no bordure of mountayne, nor ryuer, wherin garnisons appoynted, were garded and defended but euen so as the shippes although we had your martiall prowes and prosperous fortune readye to relieue vs, was still at oure elbowes to put vs in feare, so farre as eyther seas reache or wynde bloweth: for that incredible boldenesse and vnworthy good happe of a few captiues of the Frankeners in time of ỳ Emperour Probus came to our remembrance whiche Frankeners in that season, conueying away certayn vessels from the coastes of Pontus, walked both Grecia & Asia, and not without great hurt & damage arising vpon diuers partes of the ſhore of Libya, at length toke the Citye of Saragoſe in Sicile (an hauen towne in tymes paſte hyghely renowmed for victories gotten by ſea:) and after this, paſſyng thorough the ſtreytes of Gibralterra, came into the Ocean, & ſo with the fortunate ſucceſſe of their raſhe preſumptuous attempte, ſhewed how nothing is ſhut vp in ſafety from the deſperate boldneſſe of pyrates, where ſhips may come and haue acceſſe. And ſo therfore by this your victorie, not Britain alone is deliuered from bondage, but vnto all nations is ſafetie reſtored, which might by the vſe of the ſeas come to as great perils in time of warre, as to gayne of commodities in tyme of peace. Now Spayne (to let paſſe the coaſtes of Gallia) with hir ſhores almoſt in ſight is in ſuretie: now Italy, now Afrike, nowe all nations euen vnto the fennes of Meotis are voyde of perpetuall cares. Neyther therfore are they leſſe ioyful, the feare of danger being taken away, which to feele as yet, the neceſſitie had not brought thē: but they reioyce ſo muche the more for this, that both in the guiding of your good prouidence, and alſo furtheraunce of fortune, ſo great a force of rebellion by ſea men, is calmed vpon the entring into their bordures, and Britayne it ſelfe whiche had giuen harburgh to ſo long a miſchief, is euidently knowne to haue taſted of your victorie, with hir only reſtitutiō to quietneſſe. Not without good cauſe therefore immediatly, when you hir long wiſhed reuenger and deliuerer were once arriued, your Maieſtie was met with greate triumph, and the Britayns repleniſhed with all inwarde gladneſſe, came forth and offered themſelues to youre preſence, with their wyues and children, reuerencing not onely youre ſelfe (on whome they ſette their eyes, as on one deſcended downe them to from heauen) but alſo euen the ſayles and tagle of that ſhippe whiche hadde brought your diuine preſence vnto their coaſtes: and when you ſhould ſette foote on lande, they were readie to lye downe at your feete, that you might (as it were) march ouer them, ſo deſirous were they of you. Neither was it any meruaile if they ſhewed them ſelues ſo ioyfull, ſithe after their miſerable captiuitie ſo many yeres continued after ſo long abuſing of their wiues, and filthie bondage of their children, at lengthe yet were they nowe reſtored to libertie, at lengthe made Romaynes, at lengthe refreſhed with the true lighte of the Imperiall rule and gouernement: for beſide the fame of your clemencie and pitie whiche was ſet forth by the report of all nations, in your countenaunce (Ceſar) they perceiued the tokens of all vertues, in your face grauitie, in your eyes myldeneſſe, in your ruddie cheekes baſhfulnes, in your words iuſtice: All which thinges as by regarde they acknowledged, ſo with voyces of gladneſſe they ſignifyed on high. To you they bounde them ſelues by bowe, to you they bounde their children: yea and to your children they vowed all the poſteritie of their race and ofſpring. We truely (O perpetuall parentes and lordes of mankinde) require this of the immortall gods with moſt earneſt ſupplication and heartie prayer, that our children and their children, and ſuche other as ſhall come of them for euer hereafter, may be dedicate vnto you and to thoſe whome you nowe bring vp, or ſhal bring vp hereafter. For what better hap can wee wiſhe to them that ſhall ſucceede vs, than to bee enioyers of that felicitie which now we our ſelues enioy? The Romaine common wealth doth now comprehende in one coniunction of peace, al that whatſoeuer at ſundry times hath belonged to the Romaines, and that huge power whyche wyth to great a burdeyn was ſhronke downe, and riuen in ſunder, is nowe brought to ioyne agayn in the aſſured ioyntes of the imperiall gouernement. For there is no parte of the earth nor region vnder heauen, but that eyther it remayneth quiet through feare, or ſubdued by force of armes, or elſe at the leaſt wyſe bounde by clemencie. And is there any other thing elſe in other partes, whych if wyll and reaſon ſhould moue men therto, that might bee obteyned? beyond the Ocean, what is there more than Brytaine, which is ſo recouered by you, that thoſe nations which are neare adioyning to the bounds of that Ile, are obedient to your commaundementes? There is no occaſion that maye moue you to paſſe further, excepte the endes of the Ocean ſea (which nature forbiddeth) ſhoulde bee ſought for. All is yours (moſte inuincible Princes whiche are accounted worthie of you, and thereof commeth it, that you may equally prouide for euery one, ſithe you haue the whole in your hands: and therfore as heretofore (moſte excellent Emperoure) Diocleſian, by thy commaundemente Alſia dyd ſupplye the deſerte places of Thracia with inhabitauntes tranſported thyther, as afterwarde moſte excellente Emperour Maximian, by your appoyntementement, the Frankeners at length brought to a pleaſant ſubiection, and admitted to lyue vnder lawes, hath peopled and manured the vacante fieldes of the Neruians, and thoſe about the citie of Trier: And ſo nowe by youre victories (inuincible Conſtantius Ceſar) what ſoeuer did lye vacant aboute Amiens, Beauuoys, Troys, and Langres, beginneth to flouriſhe with inhabitauntes of ſundrye nations: yea and moreouer that your moſt obedient Citie of Autun, for whoſe ſake I haue a peculiar cauſe to reioyce, by meanes of thys tryumphaunt victorie in Brytayne, it hathe receyued manye and diuers Artificers, of whome thoſe rth thoſe prouinces were full, and nowe by theyr worckmanſhip the ſame Citie reiſeth vp by repairing of auncient houſes and reſtoryng of publique buyldings and temples, ſo that now it accompteth that the olde name of brotherlike incorporation to Rome, is again to hir reſtored, when ſhe hath you eftſones for hir founder. I haue ſayd (inuincible Emperor) almoſt more than I haue bin able, and not ſo muche as I ought, that I may haue moſte iuſt cauſe by your clemencies licence, both now to end, and often heereafter to ſpeake: & thus I ceaſſe.

Here haue you the ſubſtance of that whiche is written touching Britayn in that Panegerike oration aſcribed to Mamertinus, whiche he ſet forth in prayſe of the emperors Diocletian and Maximian: it is entitled only to Maximianus, whereas neuertheleſſe both the Emperours are prayſed. And lykewyſe as ye maye perceiue, Conſtantius that was father vnto the great Conſtantine, is here ſpoke of, being choſen by the two foreſayde Emperours to aſſiſte them by the name of Ceſar in rule of the Empire: of whome hereafter more ſhall be ſayde.

But now to conſider what is to bee noted forth of this part of the ſame oration: It ſhuld ſeeme that when the emperor Maximian was ſent into Gallia by appoyntemente taken betwixt him and Diocletian after he had quieted things there, he ſet his mynde forthwith to reduce Britayn vnder the obedience of the Empire, the which was at that preſent kept vnder ſubiection of ſuch priuces as mayntayned their ſtate, by the mightie forces of ſuche number of ſhips, as thei had got togither, furniſhed with al things neceſſarie, & namely of able ſeamē, as well Britons as ſtrangers, among whom the Frankeners wer as chief, a nation of Germanie, as then hyghly renoumed for their puiſſance by ſea, nere to the which they inhabited, ſo that there were no rouers comparable to them. And bycauſe none durſte ſtirre on theſe our ſeas for feare of the Britiſhe fleet that paſſed to and fro at pleaſure, to the greate anoyance of the Romayne ſubiectes inhabiting alongeſt the coaſtes of Gallia, Maximian both to recouer agayne ſo wealthy and profitable a land vnto the obeyſance of the empire, as Britayne then was, & alſo to deliuer the people of Gallia ſubiects to ỳ Romains, frō danger of being dayly ſpoyled by thoſe rouers that were mayntained here in Britayn, he prouided with all diligence ſuche numbers of ſhips as were thought requiſite for ſo great an enterpriſe, and rigging them in ſundry places, toke order for their ſetting forward to the moſt aduauntage for the eaſy atcheuing of his enterpriſe. He appointed to paſſe himſelfe frō the coaſts of Flanders, at what time other of his capitains with their fleetes from other parts, ſhould likewyſe make ſayle towards Britayn. By this meane Alectus that had vſurped the title and dignitie of king or rather emperor ouer the Britains, knew not where to take heede, but yet vnderſtanding of the nauie that was made ready in the mouth of Sayn, he ment by ỳ which may be cōiectured, to intercept that fleet as it ſhuld come forth and make ſayle forewardes: and for that purpoſe he lay with a great number of ſhips about the Ile of Wight. But whether Aſclepiodotus came ouer wᵗ that nauie which was rigged on the coaſts of Flanders, or with ſome other, I will not preſume to affirme eyther to or fro, bicauſe in deed Mamertinus maketh no expreſſe mention either of Alectus, or Aſclepiodotus: but notwithſtanding it is euident by that which is cōteined in his oration, that not Maximian, but ſome other of his capitains gouerned ỳ armie, whiche ſlewe Alectus, ſo that we may ſuppoſe that Aſclepiodotus was chiefetain ouer ſome number of ſhips directed by Maximinians appointment to paſſe ouer into this ile againſt the ſame Alectus: and ſo may this which Mamertinus writeth, agree with the truth of that whiche we fynd in Eutropius. Here is to be remēbred, ỳ after Maximianus had thus recouered Britain out of ther hands that vſurped the rule therof frō the Romans, it ſhuld ſeem ỳ not only great numbers of artificers & other people were conueyed ouer into Gallia, there to inhabite and furniſh ſuch cities as were run into decay, but alſo a power of warlike youthes was tranſported thither to defend the countrey from the inuaſion of barbarous nations. For we fynd that in the dayes of this Maximian, the Britons expulſing the Meruiās out of the citie of Mons in Henaud, held a caſtell there, whiche was called Bretaimons after them, wherevpon the citie was afterwarde called Mons, reteyning the laſt ſillable only, as in ſuch caſes it hath oftē hapned.

Eutropius.

Moreouer this is not to be forgotten, ỳ as Hunt. Alhuyd hath very wel noted in his book intitled Fragmenta hiſtoriæ Britannicæ, Mamertinus in this parcell of his panegerike oration doth make firſt mētion of the nation of Picts, of al other the ancient Roman writers: ſo that not one before his tyme, once nameth eyther Picts or Scots. But now to returne wher we left. After that Britain was thus recouered by the Romains, Diocletian & Maximiā ruling the Empire, the Ile taſted of the cruelitie, that Diocleſian exerciſed agaynſte the Chriſtians, in perſecutyng them wyth all extremityes, continually for the ſpace of ten yeeres.

Amongſt other, one Alban a citizen of Werlamcheſter, a towne now bearing his name, was the firſt that ſuffred here in Britayn, in this perſecution, being conuerted to the faith of Chriſte by the zealous chriſtian Amphibalus, whome he hadde receyued into his houſe: in ſo muche that when there came Sergeants or officers to ſeeke for the ſame Amphibalus, the aforeſayd Albane to preſerue Amphibalus out of daunger, preſented hymſelfe in the apparell of the ſayde Amphibalus, and ſo being apprehended in his ſtead, was brought before the iudge, and examined: and for that he refuſed to doe ſacrifice to the falſe goddes, he was beheaded on the toppe of an hill ouer a-

It is reported by writers, that diuers miracles were wroughte at the tyme of his death, in ſo muche that one whiche was appointed to do the execution, was conuerted, and refuſing to do that office, ſuffered alſo with him: but he that toke vpon him to doe it, reioyced nothing thereat, for his eyes fel out of his head, downe to the ground together with the head of that holy man whirhe he had then cut off. There were alſo martyred about the ſame tyme two conſtant witneſſes of Chriſt his Religion, Iaron and Julius, citizens of Caerleon arwiſk.

Moreouer a great nũber of Chriſtians which were aſſembled togither to heare the word of lyfe preached by that vertuous manne Amphibalus, were ſlayn by the wicked Pagans at Lychfield, wherof that towne toke name, as you wold ſay, The field of dead corpſes.

Gildas.

To be briefe, this perſecution was ſo greate & greuous, and therto ſo vniuerſall; that in maner the Chriſtiã religion was therby deſtroyed. The faithfull people were ſlayne, their bookes brent, & churches ouerthrown. It is recorded, that within one monethes ſpace in diuers places of the worlde there were .xvij. M. godlye menne and women put to death for profeſſing the chriſtian faith in the dayes of that tyrant Diocletian and his fellowe Maximian.

Coellus.

COellus, Earle of Colcheſter, began hys dominion ouer the Britons in the yeare of our Lord. 262. This Coellus or Coill ruled the lande for a certayne tyme, ſo as the Britons were well contented with his gouernement, and lyued the longer in reſt from inuaſion of the Romains, becauſe they were occupied in other places: but finally they findyng tyme for their purpoſe, apointed one Conſtantius to paſſe ouer into this Ile with an armie, the which Conſtantius put Coelus in ſuche dread, that immediatly vpon his arriuall Coellus ſent to him an ambaſſade and cõcluded a peace with him, couenãting to pay ỹ accuſtomed tribute, and gaue to Conſtantius his daughter in mariage called Helene, a noble Lady and a lerned. Shortly after king Coell dyed, after he had reigned (as ſome write). 27. yeares, or as other haue, but. 13. yeares. Of the regiment of thys Prince, Harriſon maketh no mention in his Chronologie.

But verily if I ſhall ſpeake what I thinke, I will not denye but aſſuredly ſuche a Prince there was: howbeit that he had a daughter named Helene, whome hee maried vnto Conſtantius the Romain lieutenant that was after Emperour, I leaue that to be decided of the learned: For if the whole courſe of the lyues, as well of the father and ſonne, Conſtantius and Conſtantine, as lykewyſe of the mother Helena bee conſiderately marked from tyme to tyme, and yeare to yeare, as out of authors both Greeke and latine, ỹ ſame may be gathered, I feare leaſt ſuch doubt may ryſe in this matter, that it wil be harder to proue Helene a Britayne, than Conſtantine to be borne in Bithynia (as Nicephorus auoucheth) but for ſomuche as I meane not to ſteppe from the courſe of oure countreye writers in ſuche poynts, where the receyued opinion maye ſeeme to warrant the credite of the hiſtorie, I wil with other admit bothe the mother and ſonne to be Britons in the whole diſcourſe of the hiſtorie following, as thoughe I hadde forgot what in this place I haue ſayd.

Lib. 7.

Con-

Constantius.

CONstantius, a Senatoure of Rome begã to reigne ouer the Britons, in ỹ yeare of oure Lorde. 289. as oure Histories reporte. Thys Cõstãtius, as before ye haue heard, hadde to wyfe Helene the daughter of the forsayd king Coyll, of whome he begat a son named Constantinus, which afterwarde was Emperour, and for his worthy doings surnamed Constantine the great. S. Ambrose folowing the common report, writeth, that this Helene was a mayde in an Inne: and some agayne write, that she was concubine to Constantius, and not his wyfe. But whatsoeuer she was, it appeareth by the writers of the Romain histories, that Constantius being the daughters sonne of one Crispus, that was brother to the Emperour Claudius, came into Britayne, and quieted the troubles that were rayled by the Britons, and there (as some write) maryed the forsayd Helen being a woman of an excellent beautie, whom yet (after) he was constrayned to forsake, & to marrie Theodora, the daughter in law of Herculeus Maximianus, by whom he hadde sixe sons, & finally was created Emperor togither with ỹ said Galerius Maximianus, at what tyme Diocletianus and his fellowe Herculeus Maximianus renounced the rule of the empire, and committed the same vnto them. The Empire was then deuided betwixte them, so that to Constantius the regiõs of Italy, Affrik, France, Spayne and Britayne were assigned, and to Galerius, Illyzium, Grecia, and all the Easte partes. But Constantine being a man voyde of ambition, was contented to leaue Italy and Affrike, supposing his charge to be great inough to haue the gouernment in his hands of France, Spayn, and Britayn (as Eutropius hath.)

But as touching his reigne ouer the Britons wee haue not to saye further than as we fynde in our owne writers recorded: but for his gouernment in the empire: it is to be considered, that first he was admitted to rule as an assistãt to Maximian vnder ỹ title of Cesar: & so from that time if you shall accompt his reigne, it may comprehend .xj. xij. or. xiij. yeares, yea more or lesse, according to the diuersitie founde in writers.

But if we shal recken his reign from the time onely that Diocletian and Maximian resigned their title to the Empire, we shall fynde that he reigned not fully. iij. yeares. For where as betweene the slaughter of Alectus, and the comming of Constantius, are accompted .8. yeeres and odde monethes, not only those .8. yeeres, but also some space of tyme before maye be ascribed vnto Constantius: for although before his comming ouer into Britayn now this last tyme (for he had bin here afore, as it well appeareth) Asclepiodotus gouerned as Legate, albeit vnder Constantius, who had a greate portion of the west parties of the empire vnder his regiment, by the title, as I haue sayd of Cesar, although he was not sayde to reigne absolutelye, till Diocletian and Maximian resigned, wherof it is not amisse to giue this briefe aduertisement, according as in William Harrisons Chronologie is sufficiently proued. But now to cõclude with the doings of Constãtius, at lẽgth he fel sick at Yorke, and there dyed about the yeare of our Lord. 306. 306.

This is not to be forgotten, that whylest hee lay on his death bed, somewhat before he departed this life, hearing that his sonne Constantine was come, & escaped from the emperours Diocletian & Maximianus, with whome he remained as a pledge, as after shall be partly touched: he receyued him with all ioye, and raising himselfe vp in his bed, in presence of his other sonnes and counsellours, with a greate number of other people and strangers that wer come to visit him, he set the crowne vpon his sonnes head, and adorned him with other imperiall roabes and garmentes, executing as it were himselfe, the office of an heralde, and withall spake these wordes vnto his sayd sonne, and to his counsellors there about him. Niceph.

Nowe is my death to me more welcome, and my departure hence more pleasant. I haue heere a large epitaphe and monumente of burial, to witte, myne owne sonne, and one whome in earth I leaue to be Emperor in my place, which by Gods good helpe shall wipe awaye the teares of the Christians, and reuenge the crueltie exercised by tyrants. This I recken to chaunce vnto me in stede of moste felicitie. After this, turning himselfe to the multitude, he commaunded them all to be of good comforte, meaning those that had not forsaken true vertue & godlinesse in Christe, which Christ he vndertooke should continue with his sonne Constantine in al enterprises, which in warres or otherwyse he should take in hande. Tripartit. historia.

That deuise also is worthie to be had in memorie, which he put in practise in his lyfe time, to vnderstand what true & sincere Christians were remaynyng in his courte: for where as he hadde bin firste a persecuter, and after was conuerted, it was a matter easy to perswade the world, that he was no earneste Christian: and so the policie whiche hee thoughte to worke, was the sooner brought to paſſe, whiche was this: He called together al his officers and ſeruants, feyning himſelfe to chooſe out ſuche as would doe ſacrifice to deuils, and that thoſe only ſhould remayne with hym, and keepe their office, and the reſte that refuſed ſo to doe, ſhoulde be thruſt out, and baniſhed the courte.

Herebpon all the Courtyers deuided themſelues into companies: and when ſome offred willingly to do ſacrifice, & other ſome boldly refuſed: the Emperoure marking their dealings, ſharply rebuked thoſe which were ſo ready to diſhonor the liuing God, accompting them as traytors to his diuine maieſtie, and not worthy to remayne within the Court gates: but thoſe that conſtantly ſtood in the profeſſion of the chriſtian fayth, he greatly commended, as men worthie to be about a prince: and withall declared, that from thenceforth they ſhould be as chiefe counſellours and defendors both of his perſon and kingdom, eſteeming more of them than of al the treaſure he had in his coffers.

To conclude, hee was a prince graue, ſober, vpright, courteous and liberall, as he which kept his mynde euer free from couetous deſire of great riches: inſomuch that when he ſhould make any great feaſt to his frendes, he was not aſhamed to borrow plate and ſyluer veſſell to ſerue his turne, and to furniſhe his cupboorde for the tyme, beyng contented for himſelfe to be ſerued in cruſes and earthen veſſell. He was wonte to haue this ſaying in his mouth, that better it was that the ſubiectes ſhould haue ſtore of money and riches, thã the Prince to keepe it cloſe in his treaſorie, where it ſerued to no vſe. By ſuche curteous dealyng the prouinces whiche were in his charge flouriſhed in greate wealth and quietneſſe. He was a right wiſe and politike Prince in the ordering of all weightie matters, & verie skilfull in the practiſe of warres, ſo that he ſtoode the Romane empire in great ſtead, and was therfore highly beloued of the Souldiours, in ſo muche that immediatly after his deceaſe, they proclaymed his ſon Conſtantine Emperour.

That the Chriſtian faithe was imbraced of the Britons in this ſeaſon, it may appeare, in that Hillarius biſhop of Poictiers writeth to his brethren in Britayne, and Conſtantine in an Epiſtle, as Theodoretus hath in his firſte boke and tenth chapiter maketh mencion of the churches in Britayne: Which alſo Sozomenus doth affirme. For the Britons after they had receyued the faithe, defended the ſame euen with the ſheading of their bloud, as Amphibalus who in this Conſtantius days being apprehended, ſuffered at Redburne nere to Werlaimcheſter, about xb. yeares after the martirdome of his hoſte S. Albane.

Conſtantine.

COnſtantine beyng the ſonne of the forenamed Conſtantius, begot of his firſte wyfe Helene, the daughter (as ſome affirme) of Coell late king of the Britons, begonne his reigne in the yeare of our Lord. 306. This worthie prince begot of a britiſhe woman, and borne of hir in Britayne (as our writers doe affirme,) and created certainely Emperour in Britayne, doubtleſſe made his native countrey partaker of his high glorie and renoume, which by his great prowes, politike wiſedome, worthie gouernemente, and other his Princely qualities meſſe abundantlye planted in his noble perſon, he purchaſed and got through the circuit of the whole earth, inſomuch that for the highe enterpriſes and noble actes by him happily broughte to paſſe and atchieued, he was ſurnamed (as before is ſayd) the great Cõſtantine.

Conſtantine. 306.

Conſtantine created Emperor in Britayne.

Whileſt this Cõſtantine remained at Rome in manner as he had bin a pledge with Galerius in his fathers life time, he beeing then but yong, ſtedde from thence, and with all poſt haſte returned to his father into Britain, killing & hewghing by the way all ſuch horſſes as were appointed to ſtande at Innes readie for ſuche as ſhould ryde in poſte, leaſt being purſued, he ſhould haue bene ouertaken, and broughte backe agayne by ſuche as myght be ſent to purſue him.

Eutropius Sextus Aurelius Victor.

At his comming into Britayne, he found his father ſore vexed with ſickneſſe, whereof ſhortly after hee dyed, and then was he by helpe of ſuch as were aboute him, encouraged to take vppon him as Emperour: And namely one Erocus, king of the Almaynes whiche had accompanied his father thither, aſſiſted him therto, ſo that being proclaymed Emperor, he toke vpon him the rule of thoſe countreys whiche his father had in gouernement, that is to ſay, Fraunce, Spayne, the Alpes, and Britayne, with other prouinces here in the weſt: and ruling the ſame with great equitie and wyſedome, hee greately wanne the fauour of the people, inſomuch that the fame of his politike gouernemente and curteous dealing being ſpread abroade, when Maxentius the tiraunt that occupied the rule of the Empire at Rome, and in Italy by wrongful vſurping and abusing the same, was growne into the hatred of the Romans and other Italians, Constantine was earnestly by them requested to come into Italy, and to helpe to subdue Maxentius, that he might reforme the state of things there. Maxentius was sonne to Herculeus Maximinianus, Constantine had married Fausta the daughter of the sayde Maximinianus. Nowe so it was, that Maximinianus immediatly after that his sonne Maxentius hadde taken the rule vpon hym, sought meanes to haue deposed hym, & to haue resumed and taken ettsoones into his owne handes the gouernement of the empire. But solliciting Diocletian to do the like, he was much reproued of him for his vnreasonable & ambicious purpose: so ỳ when he perceiued that neither Diocletian woulde be therto agreeable, nor induce the souldiours to admit him, they hauing already established his sonne, he began to deuyse wayes howe to assure the state more strongly to his sayde sonne: and hearyng that his sonne in law Constantine was mynded to come into Italy against him, he purposed to practise Constantines destruction, in somuch that it was iudged by this which followed, ỳ Herculeus Maximinus did but for a colour seme to mislyke with that whiche his son Maxentius had done, to the ende he might the sonet accomplishe his entente for the dispatching of Constantine oute of the waye. Hereupon (as it were) fleing out of Italy, he came to Constantine, who as then hauing appointed lieutenants vnder him in Britayn, remayned in France, and with all ioy and honor that might bee, receiued his father in lawe: the which being earnestly bent to compasse his purpose, made his daughter Fausta priuie therto: whiche ladie, either for feare least the concealyng therof might turne hir to displesure, either else for the entier loue whiche she bare to hir husbande) reueled hir fathers wicked purpose. Whereupon whilest Constantine goeth about to be reuenged of suche a trayterous practise, Herculeus fleeth to Mersiles, purposing there to take the sea, and so to retire to his sonne Maxentius into Italye. But ere he coulde get away from thence, he was strangled by commaundemente of his sonne in lawe Constantine, and so ended his lyfe, whiche he had spotted with many cruell actes, as well in persecutyng the professours of the Christian name, as others.

In this mean time had Maximinus adopted one Licinius to assiste hym in gouernaunce of the empire, proclayming hym Cesar. So that nowe at one selfe tyme Constantine gouerned Fraunce and the weast partes of the Empire, Maxentius helde Italy, Affrike, and Egypte: And Maximinus whyche lykewyse had ben elected Cesar, ruled the Easte partes, and Licinius Illyrium and Grecia.

But shortly after, the Emperour Constantine ioyned in league with Licinius, and gaue to him his sister in marriage, named Constantia, for more suretie of faithfull friendshyp to endure betwixt them. He sent him also against Maximinus, who gouerning in the East parte of the Empire, purposed the destruction of Constantine and all his partakers: but being vanquished by Licinius at Tarsus, he shortly after dyed, being eaten with lice. Constantine after this, was called into Italy to deliuer the Romaynes and Italians from the tyrannie of Maxentius, whiche occasion so offered, Constantine gladly accepting, passed into Italy, and after certaine victories gote against Maxentius, at length slewe him. And after this, when Maximinus was dead, whiche prepared to make warre against Licinius, that hadde married Constantia, the sister of Constantine, hee finally made warre against his brother in lawe the sayde Licinius, by reason of suche quarrels as fell out betwixt thē: In the whiche warre, Licinius was putte to the worse, and at length comming into the handes of Constantine, was put to deathe, so that Constantine by this meanes gote the whole Empire vnder his rule and subiection. Hee was a greate fauorer of the Christian Religion, in somuche that to aduance the same, hee toke order for the conuerting of the Temples dedicated in the honors of Idols, vnto the seruice of the true and Almightie God. Hee commaunded also, that none should be admitted to serue as a Souldiour in the warres, excepte hee were a Christian, nor yet to haue rule of any countrey or armie. Hee also ordeyned, the weeke before Easter, and that whiche followed, to be kept as holy, and no person to doe any bodily workes during the same. He was muche counsailed by that noble & most vertuous ladie his mother, the Empresse Helene, the whiche being a godly and deuoute woman, did what in hir laye, to moue him to the setting forth of Gods honour and encrease of the christian faith, wherein as yet he was not fully instructed. Some writers alledge, that she beeing at Jerusalem, made diligent search to finde out the place of the Sepulchre of our Lorde, and at length founde it, thoughe with muche adoe: for the infidels had stopped it vp, and couered it with a heape of filthie earth, and buylded aloft vpon the place, a chappell dedicated to Uenus, where yong women vsed to sing songes in honoure of that vnchaste Goddesse. Helene caused the same to be ouerthrowne, and the earth to be remoued, and the place clensed, so that at length the sepulchre appeared, and fast by were founde there buried in the earth .iij. crosses and the nailes, but the crosse whereupon our Sauiour was crucifyed, was was knowen by the title written vpon it, though almoſt worne out, in letters of Hebrew, greke, and Latine: the inſcription was this: Ieſus Nazarenus rex Iudæorum. It was alſo perceyued which was that Croſſe by a miracle, (as it is reported, but how truly I can not tell), that ſhuld be wrought thereby: For being layde to a ſicke woman, only with the touching therof, ſhe was healed. It was alſo layde, that a dead man was rayſed from death to lyfe, his bodie onely being touched therwith. Wherupon Conſtantine moued with theſe things, forbade that from thenceforth any ſhould be put to death on the Croſſe, to the ende that the thing which afore tyme was accompted infamous and reprochefull, myghte nowe be had in honour and reuerence.

Crosse founde by Helena.

The Empreſſe Helen hauing thus found the Croſſe, buylded a temple there, and taking wyth hir the nayles, returned with the ſame to hir ſon Conſtantine, who ſet one of them in the creſt of his helmet, an other in the brydell of his horſſe, and the thirde he caſt into the ſea, to aſſuage and pacifie the furious tempeſtes and rage therof.

Polidorus.

She alſo brought with hir a parcell of that holy Croſſe, and gaue it to hir ſonne the ſayd Conſtantine, the whiche he cauſed to be cloſed within an Image that repreſented his perſon, ſtanding vppon a piller in the market place of Conſtantine, (or as ſome late writers haue) he cauſed it to be enclоſed in a coffer of golde, adorned with ryche ſtones and Pearles, placing it in a Churche called Sеſſoriana, the which church he endued with many great giftes and precious ornamentes.

Many workes of greate zeale and vertue are remembred by writers to haue bin done by thys Conſtantine and his mother Helene, to the ſetting forth of Gods glorie, and the aduauncing of the faith of Chriſte.

The commendation of Conſtantine.

But to be briefe, he was a manne in whome many excellent vertues and good qualities bothe of mynde and bodie manifeſtly appeared, chiefly he was a prince of great knowledge and experience in warre, and therewith verie fortunate, an earneſt louer of iuſtice, and to conclude, borne to all honour.

But nowe to ſpeake ſomewhat of the ſtate of Britayne in his tyme, ye ſhall vnderſtande, that as beefore is recorded, at his going ouer into into Fraunce, after that he was proclaimed emperour, he lefte beehynde hym in Britayne certayne gouernours to rule the land, amongſt other one Maximinus a right valiãt captayne. He toke with him a great part of the youth of Britayn, & diuers of the chiefe men amongſt the Nobilitie, in whole approued manhode, loyaltie and conſtancie, he conceyued a great hope to goe through with al his enterpriſes, as with ỹ which being accompanied and compaſſed about, he paſſed ouer into Gallia, entred into Italye, and in euery place ouercame his enimies.

There be that write how that Conſtantin thus conueying ouer the ſea with him a great armye of Britons, by whoſe induſtrie obteyning victorie as he wiſhed, hee placed a greate number of ſuche as were diſcharged out of wages, and licenced to giue ouer the warre, in a parte of Gallia towardes the Weſt ſea coaſt, where theyr poſteritie remayn vnto this daye, meruailouſly encreaſed afterwardes, and ſomewhat differyng from our Britons, the Welchmen, in manners and language. *Wilhelm. Amongſt thoſe noble men which he took with him when he departed out of this lande (as oure writers do teſtifie, were. iii. vncles of his mother Helene, that is to witte, Hoelmus, Traherus, & Marius, whom he made Senators of Rome. Galfrid. Mat. W.

In the meane tyme that Conſtantine had obteyned and ruled the whole empire, Britain as it were hauing recouered libertie, in that one of hir children being her king, had got the gouernment of the whole earthe, remayned in better quiete than afore time ſhe had done: but yet in the meane ſeaſon, if we ſhall credite the Britiſhe Chronicle and Geffrey of Monmouth the interpreter thereof, There was a Britiſh lord, named Octauius or Octauian, as the olde Engliſhe Chronicle nameth hym, that was Duke of the Gewiſſes, and appoynted by Conſtantine to be ruler of the lande in his abſence, the whiche Octauius (after that Conſtantiue had recouered Rome, and Italy, and was ſo buſied in the affaires of the empire in thoſe parts, that as was thought, he could not returne backe into Britayn,) ſeyſed into his handes the whole dominion of Britayne, and held himſelfe for king. THis Octauius then beginning his reigne ouer the Britons in the yeare of our Lorde, 329. prouoked Conſtantine to ſend againſt him one of his mothers vncles, the forſayd Trahern This Trahernes, or as ſome name him Traherne, entred this lande with three Legions of ſouldiours, and in a fielde neere vnto Winchеſter, was encountred by Octauius and his Britons Galfrid. 329 Fabian. Galfrid.

tayle, Octauius was put to the worſſe, and conſtrayned to forſake the lande, fled into Norway, there to purchaſe ayde: and being redy with ſuch power as he there gathered, what of Britons and Norweygians, to returne into Britayn. Before his landing, he was aduertiſed, that an Earle of Britayne whiche bare him heartie good will, had by treaſon ſlayne Traherne. Octauius then cõming to lande, eſtſones got poſſeſſion of Britayne, whiche ſhould be as Fabian gathereth) about the yeere of our Lorde. 329. in the. 20. yeere of the reigne of the Emperour Conſtantine, and about two yeares after that the ſayd Octauius firſt toke vpon him as king.

After this, (as the Britiſhe Chronicle affirmeth) Octauius gouerneth the lande right nobly and greatly to the contentation of the Britons. At length when he was fallen in age, and had no iſſue but one daughter, he was coũſayled to ſend vnto Rome for one Maximianus, a noble yong man, couſin to the Emperour Conſtantine, on the part of his mother Helene, to come into Britayne, and to take to wyfe the ſaide daughter of Octauius, and ſo with hir to haue the kingdome.

Octauius at the firſt mente to haue giuen hir in mariage vnto one Conan Meridoc Duke of Cornewall, whiche was his nephue: but when the Lordes would not therto agree, at length he apointed one Maurice ſonne to the forſaid Conan to goe vnto Rome to fetche the forenamed Maximian. Maurice according to his commiſſion & inſtructions in that behalf receyued, came to Rome, and declared his meſſage in ſuch effectuall ſorte, that Maximianus conſented to go with him into Britayne, and ſo taking with him a conuenient number ſet forwarde, and did ſo muche by his iourneys, that finally he landed here in Britayn and notwithſtanding that Conan Meridock pait not much to haue bin doing with him, for malice that he conceyued towards him, bicauſe he ſaw that by his meanes he ſhuld be put beſide the crowne, yet at length was Maximianus ſafely brought to the kinges preſence, and of him honourably receyued, and finally the mariage was knitte vp, and ſolemniſed in all princely maner.

Maximianus commeth into Britayne.

Shortly after, Octauius departed out of this lyfe, after he had reigned the terme of fyftie and foure yeares, as Fabian gathereth by that that diuers authors doe write, howe he reigned till the dayes that Gratian and Valentinian ruled the Romaine Empire, whiche began to gouerne in the yeare of our Lord (as he ſayth) 382. which is to bee vnderſtode of Gratian his reigne after the deceaſe of his vncle Valens, for otherwyſe a doubt may ryſe, bicauſe that Valentine the father of Gratian admitted the ſayde Gratian to the title of Auguſtus in the yeare of our Lorde CCCLxxj.

Octauius departeth this life.

But to leaue the credite of the long reigne of Octauius, with all his and others gouernement and rule ouer the Britains ſith the time of Conſtantius, vnto our Britiſhe and Scottiſh writers, lette vs make an ende with the Gouernement of that noble Emperour Conſtantine, an aſſured braunche of the Britons race, as borne of that worthie Ladye the Empreſſe Helene, daughter to Coell Earle of Colcheſter, and after king of Britayn (as our hiſtories doe witneſſe. Vnto the whiche Empreſſe Conſtantine bare ſuche dutifull reuerence, that he did not only honour hir with the name of Empreſſe, but alſo made hir as it were partaker with him of all his wealth, and in many things was led and ruled by hir vertuous and godlye admonitions, to the aduancement of Gods honour, and maintenance of thoſe that profeſſed the true Chriſtian religion. For the loue that ſhe bare vnto Colcheſter and London, ſhe walled them aboute, and cauſed great huge bricke and tyles to be made for the performaunce of the ſame, whereof there is great ſtore to be ſeene euen yet to this preſente, both in the walles of the towne and caſtel of Colcheſter, as a teſtimonie of the workemanſhip of thoſe dayes. She lyued. lxxix. yeares, and then departed this lyfe about the. xxj. yeare of hir ſonnes reigne. The Empreſſe Helene departeth this lyfe

The death of the Emperor Conſtantine.

We fynde not in the Romain writers of any greate ſturre here in Britayne during his reigne more than that whiche the Britiſhe and Scottiſhe writers haue recorded: ſo that after Traherne had reduced this land to quietneſſe, it may be ſuppoſed, that the Brytons liued in reſte vnder his gouernement, and lykewyſe after vnder his ſonnes that ſucceeded him in the Empire, till about the yeare. 360. at what tyme the Pictes and Scottes inuaded the ſouth partes of the land, as hereafter in place ſhall further appeare. 361

Harriſon.

But now to ende with Octauius. That the Chriſtian faith remayned ſtill in Britayne, during the ſuppoſed tyme of this pretenced kings reigne, it may appere in that amongſt the. xxxbj. prouinces, out of the whiche there were aſſembled aboue. iij. C. Biſhops in the citie of Sardica in Dacia, at a Synode holden there agaynſte the Eutchians, Britayne is numbred by Athanaſius in his ſeconde Apologie to be one. And agayn, the ſayd Athanaſius in an Epiſtle whiche he writeth to the Emperor Iouinianus reciteth, that the Churches in Britayne did conſent with the Churches of other nations in the Confeſſion of faith articled in the Nicene councell.

Synodus an. 351.

Alſo there is mencion made by writers of certaine godlie learned men, whiche liued in offices in the Churche in theſe dayes, as Reſtitutus biſhop of London, whiche wente ouer to the Synode holden at Arles in France, and alſo one Kybius Cornnius that was ſon to Salomon duke of Cornewall, and biſhop of Angleſey, and inſtructed the people whiche inhabited in the partes now called Northwales, and them of Angleſey afore ſayd verie diligently,

But now to ſpeake ſomwhat of things chancing in Britain about this ſeaſon (as we find recorded by ỹ Romain writers) ſome trouble was likely to haue grown vnto the Britons by receiuing certain men of warre that fled out of Italie into Britayn, whom the Emperor Conſtantius would haue puniſhed, becauſe they had take part with Maxentius his aduerſarie. Paulus a Spaniard and Notarie was ſente ouer by him with cõmiſſion to make enquirie of them, and to ſee them brought to light to anſwer their tranſgreſſions: which Paulus began to deale roughly in the matter, wherof he was called Catena, and to rage againſt the Britons and partakers with the fugitiues, in that they had receiued & maynteyned them, as he alledged: but in the end being certified by Martinus the lieutenant of their innocencie, and fearing leaſt his extreme rigoure nuighte alienate the heartes of the inhabitauntes altogither, and dide cause them to withdrawe their obedience from the Romaine Empire, hee tourned the execution of hys furie from them vnto the Romaines, and made hauocke of those whiche he suspected, till the said Martinus fell at square with him, and thinking on a tyme to kill him, he drew his sword & smote at him, but such was his age & weakenes, ẏ he was not able to kil or giue him any deadly wound: wherfore he turned ẏ point of his sword against himself, & so ended his life, being contēted rather to die than see his countreymen & subiects of the empire so to be abused. After this, the said Paulus returned backe again into Italy frō whēce he came, after whose departure, it was not long ere he also was slain, and then al the Scots & Picts sore disquieted the Romain subiects, for the suppressing of whose attempts Lupicinus was sent ouer out of Gallia by Julianus, as shal be declared out of Amianus Marcellinus, after wee haue firste shewed what we find written in our owne writers concerning the Scots & Picts, who nowe began to robbe & spoile the Britishe inhabitants within the Romain prouinces here in this yle, & that euen in most outragious maner.

Maximianus, or rather Maximus.

AFter the decease of Octauius or Octauiā (as the old Englishe chronicle nameth him) Maximianus or Maximus, as the Romain writers name him begā to rule the Britōs in ẏ yere of our Lord. 383. he was ẏ son of one Leonine, & cousin germain to Constantine the great, a valiant personage, & hardie of stomacke: but yet bicause he was cruell of nature, (and as Fabian saith) somwhat persecuted the christians, he was infamed by writers: but the chief cause that he was euil reported, was for that he slew his soueraign Lord, the emperor Gratianus, as after shall appeare, for otherwise he is supposed worthie to haue hadde the rule of the empire cōmitted to his handes in eche respect.

Betwixte him and the abouenamed Conan Meridoc duke of Cornwall, chaunced strife and debate, so that Conan got him into Scotlande, and there purchasing ayde, returned, and cōming ouer Humber, wasted the countrey on eche side. Maximianus therof hauing aduertisement, reysed his power and went against him, and so fighting with him diuers batayles, sometime departed away with victorie, and somtime with losse. At length through mediation of frends, a peace was accorded betwixt the. Finally this Maximianus, or as the Romaine histories haue, Maximus, was by the souldioures chosen and proclaimed Emperour here in Britayne: although some write, that this was done in Spayn.

Galfr. Mon. Fabian. Caxton. Mat. VVest.

After he had taken vpon him the imperial dignitie, vpon desire to haue enlarged his dominion, hee assembled togyther all the chosen youthe of thys lande meete to doe seruice in the warres, with the whiche hee passed ouer into Fraunce, and there (as our writers recorde) he first subdued the countrey anncientlly called Armorica, & slew in batayle the king therof called Iniball. This done he gaue ẏ country vnto Conan Meridock, the whiche was there with hym, to hold the same of him, & of the kings of great Britayne for euer. He also commaunded that the sayde countrey from thencefoorth should be called Little Britaine, and so was the name changed. What people so euer inhabited there before, the ancient name arguethy that they were rather Britons than anye other: for Armorica in the Britishe tong signifieth as muche as a countrey lying vpon the sea.

The British youth led forth of the realme by Maximianus.

Britayne in France.

Conan then placing himself and his Britons in ẏ quarter of Gallia, auoyded all the old inhabitāts, peopling ẏ coūtry only wᵗʰ Britōs, which abhorring to ioyn themselues with women born in Gallia, Conan was counsailed to sende into Britayn for maydes to be coupled with his people in mariage. Herevpon a messenger was dispatched vnto Dionethus at that tyme Duke of Cornewal & gouernor of Britayn vnder Maximianus, requiring him to sende ouer into little Britaine. xj. thousand maydes, that is to witte, viij. M. to be bestowed vpon the meaner sorte of Conans people, and. iij. thousand to be ioyned in mariage with the nobles and Gentlemen. Dionethus to satisfie the Conans request, assembled the appoynted number of maydes, and amongst them, he also appointed his daughter Vrsula, a lady of excellēt beautie, to go ouer to be giuen in mariage vnto the foresayd Conan Meridock, as he had earnestly requested.

These number of maydes were shipped in Thames, and passing forewarde toward Britayne, were by force of wether and rage of winde scattered abrode, and part of them drowned, & the residue (amongst whom was the forsayd Vrsula) were slayn by Guanius king of the Hunnes, and Melga king of the Picts, into whose hands they fell, the which Guanius and Melga were sent by the emperor Gratian to the sea coasts of Germanye, to oppresse & subdue all such as were frendes & maynteyners of the parts of Maximus.

noꝛth partes of Bꝛitayn, where the Scots now inhabite, and beganne to make ſoꝛe warre on the Bꝛitons, whereof when Maximus was aduertiſed, hee ſente into Bꝛitayne one Gratianus, with thꝛee Legions of Souldiours, the whiche bare himſelf ſo manfully againſt the enimies, that he conſtrayned the ſaid Guanius and Melga to flee out of the land, and to withdꝛaw into Irelande.

In this meane while, Maximus hauing ſlain the Emperour Gratian at Lyon in Fraunce, and after entring into Italy, was ſlain himſelf at Aquileia, (after he had gouerned the Bꝛitons eight yeares) by the Emperour Theodoſius, whyche came in ayde of Valentinian, bꝛother to the ſaid Emperoꝛ Gratian, as in the Abꝛidgement of the hiſtoꝛies of Italy ye may fynde recoꝛded.

But heere yet befoꝛe wee make an ende with this Maximus oꝛ Maximianus, I haue thoughte good to ſet downe the woꝛdes whiche wee fynde in Gildas, where he wꝛiteth of the ſame Maximus, vndoubtedly a Bꝛiton boꝛn, nephew to the empꝛeſſe Helena, and begot by a Romain. At length (ſayth Gildas) the ſpꝛing of Tyꝛants budding vp, and nowe increaſing into an huge woodde, the Iſle being called after the name of Rome: but holding neyther maners noꝛ lawes accoꝛding to that name, but rather caſtyng the ſame from it, ſendeth foꝛthe a bꝛaunche of hir moſt bitter planting, to witte Maximus, accompanied with a great number of warꝛioꝛs to gard him, and apparelled in the imperiall robes, whiche he neuer ware as beeame him, noꝛ put them on in lawful wiſe, but (after the cuſtome of tyꝛants) was put into them by the mutening ſouldiours: whiche Maximus at the firſt by a craftie policie rather than by true manhood winding in (as nets of his periurie and falſe ſuggeſtion) vnto his wicked gouernement, the countreys and pꝛouinces next adioyning, gainſte the Imperiall ſtate of Rome, ſtretching one of his wings into Spayn, & the other into Italy, placed the thꝛone of his moſte vniuſt empire at Trier, and ſhewed ſuche rage in his woodde dealing againſt his ſoueraine loꝛdes, that the one of the lawfull Emperoꝛs he expulſed fꝛoꝛth of Rome, and the other hee bereft of his moſte religious and godly lyfe. And without long tariance, compaſſed aboute with ſuche a furious and bolde garde as he hadde got togeather, at the Citie of Aquileia hee loſeth his wicked head, whiche had caſt downe the moſte honourable heades of all the woꝛlde from theyꝛ kingdome and Empire.

From thenceꝛoꝛth Bꝛitayne being depꝛiued of all hir warlyke ſouldiours and armies, of hir gouernours alſo, though cruell, and of an huge number of hir youthe (the whiche following the ſteppes of the foꝛeſayde tyꝛaunt, neuer retourned home agayne, ſuche as remayned beyng vtterly vnſkilfull in feates of warre, were trodden downe by two nations of beyonde the ſeas, the Scots from the Weaſt, and the Pictes from the Noꝛth. And as men thus quite diſmayed, lamente theiꝛ myſerable caſe, not knowing what elſe to doe foꝛ the ſpace of manye yeares togyther. By reaſon of whoſe greeuous inuaſion and cruell oppꝛeſſion wherewith ſhe was miſerably diſquieted, ſhe ſendeth hir Ambaſſadours vnto Rome, makyng lamentable ſute euen with teares to haue ſome powꝛer of men of warre ſent to defend hir againſt the enimies, pꝛomiſing to be true ſubiects with all faithfulneſſe of mynd, if the enimie might be kept off and remoued.

Thus farre Gildas and moꝛe, as in place hereafter ye ſhall fynde recited.

But nowe where the Bꝛitiſhe hiſtoꝛies, and ſuche of our Engliſhe wꝛiters as followe them, make mention of one Gratianus a Romayne ſente ouer with thꝛee Legions of ſouldiours by Maximus, as befoꝛe ye haue hearde: We may ſuppoſe that it was Gratianus the Bꝛiton, that afterwardes vſurped the imperial dignitie here in Bꝛitayn, in the dayes of the emperoꝛ Honoꝛius: foꝛ it ſtandeth neyther with the concurrence of tyme, noꝛ yet with reaſon of the hiſtoꝛie, that it ſhould be Gratianus, ſurnamed Funarius, father to Valentinian, and grandfather to the Emperour Gratianus, agaynſt whome Maximus rebelled. And yet I remember not that any of the Romayn wꝛiters maketh mention of any other Gratianus, beeyng a ſtraunger, that ſhould be ſent hither as lieutenant to gouerne the Romain armie, except of the foꝛeſayd Gratianus Funarius, who as appeareth by Am. Marcellinus was generall of ỹ Romain army here in this yle, and at lengthe being diſcharged, returned home (into Hungarie, were he was boꝛne) with honour, and there remayning in reſt, was at length ſpoyled of his goodes by the Emperoure Conſtantius as confiſcate, foꝛ that in tyme of the ciuill warres, he had receyued Magnentius, as he paſt thꝛough his countrey.

Sextus Aurelius.

Lib. xv.

But lette vs graunte, that eyther Gratianus the Bꝛiton, oꝛ ſome other of that name, was ſente ouer into Bꝛitayne (as befoꝛe is ſayd) by Maximus, leaſt otherwyſe ſome errour maye bee doubted in the wꝛiters of the Bꝛitiſh hiſtoꝛies, as hauyng haply myſtaken the tyme, and matter, bꝛinging Gratianus Funarius to ſeꝛue vnder Maximus, where peraduenture that whiche they haue redde oꝛ hearde of hym, chaunced long befoꝛe that tyme by them ſuppoſed: And ſo thoꝛough myſtaking the thyng, haue made a wꝛong repoꝛte, where neuertheleſſe it ſtandeth with greate lykelyhoode of trouthe, that ſome not able ſeruice of Chyualrie was atchieued by the

the ſame Gratianus Funarius whileſt he remayned heere in this Ile, if ẏ troth might be knowē of that whiche hathe bin writtē by authoꝛs, and happily by the ſame Am. Marcellinus, if his firſt thirteene Bookes might once come to lighte and be extāt. But now to end with Maximus. William of Malmeſburie (as yee haue hearde) writeth, that not Maximus, but rather Conſtantine the Great firſte peopled Armoꝛica: but yet hee agreeth, that both Maximus, and alſo Conſtantinus the vſurper, of whome after yee ſhall heare, leadde with them a great number of the Britaines out of this lande, the which Maximus oꝛ Maximianus and Conſtantinus afterwardes beeyng ſlayne, the one by Theodoſius, and the other by Honoꝛius, the Britaynes that followed them to the warres, parte of them were killed, and the reſidue eſcaping by flighte, withdꝛewe vnto the other Britaynes whiche Conſtantine the Greate had firſt placed in Armoꝛica. And ſo when the Tyꝛantes had left none in the countrey but rude people, noꝛ any in the Townes but ſuch as were giuen to ſlouth and glutony, Britayne beeyng voyde of all ayde of hir valiant youth, became a pꝛay to hir next neyghboꝛs the Scottes & Pictes.

Here is yet to bee conſidered in what pꝛice the Souldiers of the Brittiſh nation were hadde in thoſe dayes, with whoſe onely puiſſance Maximus durſt take vpon him to goe againſt all other the foꝛces of the whole Romayne Empire: and how he pꝛoſpered in that daungerous aduenture, it is expꝛeſſed ſufficiently in the Romayne Hiſtoꝛies, by whoſe repoꝛt it appeareth, that hee dyd not only conquere all the hither partes of France and Germany, namely on this ſide the Rhine, but alſo founde meanes to entrappe the Emperoure Gratian by this kind of policie. He had a faithfull friend called Andꝛagatius, who was Admirall of the Seas pertеyning to the Empire. It was therefoꝛe agreed betwixte them, that this Andꝛagatius (with a choſen company of the armie) ſhould be carried in ſecret wiſe in a coch towards Lions, as if it hadde bin Conſtantia Poſthumia the Empꝛeſſe, wife to the Emperoure Gratian, bꝛuting abꝛode therewithall, that the ſayd Empꝛeſſe was comming foꝛwardes on hir way to Lions, there to meete with hir huſbande, foꝛ that vpō occaſion ſhe was very deſirous to commune with him about certayne earneſt buſineſſe.

When Gracian heарde heereof, as one miſtruſting no ſuche diſſimulation, he made haſt to meete his wife, and comming at length without any great gard about hym, as one not in doubte of any treaſon, approched the coche, where ſuppoſing to find his wife, he found thoſe that ſtraightwayes murthered him: and ſo was hee there diſpatched out of life by the ſayd Andꝛagatius, who leapte foꝛthe of the coche to woꝛke that feate when he had him once within his daunger.

Thus did the Emperoure Gracian finiſh hys life in the. 29. yeare of his age, on the. 25. of Auguſt, in the yeare of Chꝛiſt. 383. and then dyed. 383

Maximus ſucceeded him (making his ſonne Flauius Victoꝛ Nobiliſſimus aſſiſtante with hym in the Empire) raigning fiue yeares and two dayes. In the beginning of his raigne Valentinian the yonger made great ſuite to him to haue his fathers body, but it woulde not be graunted. Afterwardes alſo Maximus was earneſtly requeſted to come to an enterviewe with the ſame Valentinian, who pꝛomiſed him not only a ſafe conduct, but alſo many other beneficiall good turnes beſyde. Yet Maximus durſt not putte himſelfe in any ſuch hazard, but rather meant to purſue Valentinian as an vſurper, and ſo at length chaſed hym into Slauonie, where he was dꝛiuen to ſuch a ſtreight, that if Theodoſius had not come to releeue him, Maximus hadde dꝛiuen him thence alſo, oꝛ elſe by ſlaughter ridde hym out of the way. But when Maximus thoughte himſelfe moſt aſſured, and ſo eſtabliſhed in the Empire, as hee doubted no perils, hee lined careleſſe of his owne ſafegard, and therefoꝛe diſmiſſed hys Brittiſhe Souldiers, who retiring into the Noꝛthweſt partes of Gallia, placed themſelues there among theyꝛ countreymen whiche were bꝛoughte ouer by the Emperoure Conſtantius, whileſt Maximus paſſing the reſidue of hys time in delites and pleaſures, was ſurpꝛiſed in the ende and ſlayne by Theodoſius neere vnto Aquileia the. 27. of Auguſt in the yeare of grace 388. and in the beginning of the ſixth yeare of hys raigne, oꝛ rather vſurpation, as moꝛe rightly it may be tearmed. 388

His ſonne Flauius Victoꝛ ſurnamed Nobiliſſimus was alſo diſpatched and bꝛought to hys ende, not farre from the place where his father was ſlayne, by the pꝛactiſe of one Arbogaſtes a Goth, whiche Flauius Victoꝛ was by the ſayde Maximus made Regente of the Frankeyners, and partaker (as befoꝛe is ſayde) with him in the Empire. Arbogaſtes.

After this, the Ile of Britayne remayned in meetely good quiet by the ſpace of twentie yeares, till one Marcus (that was then Legate oꝛ as we may call him Loꝛde Lieutenante oꝛ deputie of Britayne foꝛ the Romaynes) was by the Souldiers heere pꝛoclaymed Emperour againſt Honoꝛius, whiche Marcus was ſone after killed in a tumult rayſed among the people within few dayes after his begunne vſurpation.

Then one Gratianus a Britaine boꝛne, ſucceeded in his place, who was alſo ſlayne in the fourth moneth after he had taken vppon hym the imperiall oꝛnamentes. Gracianus a Britayne. He raigned four yeares if we ſhall beleeue the Brittiſh hiſtorie.

proceeded to the election of an other Emperoure, or rather vſurper, and ſo pronounced a noble Gentleman called Conſtantine, borne alſo in Britayne, to be Emperoure, who toke that ho-
409 nour vpon him in the.409.yeare after the birth of our Sauiour, continuing his raigne by the ſpace of two yeares and odde monethes, as the Romayne hiſtories make mention. Some repoꝛte this Conſtantine to be of no great towardly diſpoſition woꝛthy to gouerne an Empire, and that the Souldiers choſe him rather foꝛ the names ſake, bycauſe they would haue another Conſtantine, moꝛe than foꝛ anye vertues oꝛ ſufficiente qualities found in his perſon. But other commẽd him, both foꝛ manhode and wiſedome, wherein to ſpeake a troth, hee deſerued ſingular commendation, if this one note of vſurpation of the Imperiall dignitie had not ſtayned his other noble qualities. But heerein he did no moꝛe than many other would haue done, neyther yet after his inueſture he did ſo muche as was loked foꝛ at hys handes. Beeyng placed in the Imperial thꝛone, he gathereth an army with all poſſible endeuour, purpoſing out of hande to goe ouer therewith into France, and ſo did, thinking thereby to winne the poſſeſſion of that countrey out of the handes of Honoꝛius, oꝛ at the leaſt to woꝛke ſo as hee ſhoulde not haue the Souldiers and people there to be againſt him if he miſſed to ioyne in league with the Suabeyners, Alanes, and Vandales, which he ſought to perfoꝛme: but in the ende, whẽ neyther of theſe his deuiſes coulde take place, hee ſendeth ouer foꝛ his ſonne Conſtans, (whome in his ableẽce his aduerſaries had ſhoꝛn a Monke) and making him partaker with him in the Empire, hee cauſed him to bꝛing ouer with him another army, whiche vnder the conduct of the ſame Conſtans hee ſente into Spayne to bꝛing that countrey vnder his obeyſance. This Conſtans therefoꝛe comming vnto the paſſages that leade ouer the Pyrenine Mountaynes, Dindimus and Verianianus two bꝛethren, vnto whom the keeping of thoſe paſſages was committed to defende the ſame againſte the Vandalles and all other enemies of the Empire, were ready to reſiſt hym with their ſeruants and countreymen that inhabited thereabouttes, giuing him a right ſharpe encounter, and at the firſt putting him in great danger of an ouerthꝛow, but yet at lengthe by the valiant pꝛowes of his Bꝛittiſhe Souldiers Conſtans put his aduerſaries to flighte, and killed the two Captaynes with diuers other men of name that were partakers with him in the neceſſary defence of the countrey againſt the enimies.

When Conſtans had thus repulſed thoſe that reſiſted him, the cuſtodie of the paſſages in the Pirenine Mountaynes was committed vnto ſuche bandes of Pictes and other as were appoynted to to goe with him about the atchiuing of this enterpꝛiſe, who hauing the poſſeſſiõ of thoſe ſtreites oꝛ paſſages in their handes, gaue entrie vnto other barbarous nations to inuade Spayne, who being once entred, purſued the foꝛmer inhabitants with fire and ſwoꝛde, ſettled themſelues in that coũtrey, and dꝛoue out the Romaines. The Emperoꝛ Honoꝛius perceyuing the reeling ſtate of ẏ Empire, determined foꝛthwith to recouer it befoꝛe it fell altogither into ruine: & therefoꝛe he ſent one Conſtantius an Earle to dꝛiue Conſtantine out of Gallia, which he acoꝛdingly perfoꝛmed: foꝛ after certayne bickerings, he ſlew ẏ ſayd Conſtãtine at Arles, although not without great bloudſhed. He purſued alſo ẏ reſidue of ẏ Bꝛitains, dꝛiuing thẽ to ẏ very Sea coaſts, where they ſhꝛouded thẽſelues amõg the other Bꝛitayns, ẏ beſoꝛe wer ſettled in the countrey there, anciently called (as beſoꝛe we ſayd) Armoꝛica, ẏ is, a region lying on ẏ ſea coaſt: foꝛ Ar in the Bꝛittiſh tong ſignifieth vpon, & Moure pertcining to the Sea. And as this Conſtantine ẏ father was ſlayn by Cõſtantius, ſo was Cõſtans ẏ ſon killed at Vienna by one of his owne Captaynes named Gerontius, wherby it came to paſſe, ẏ Honoꝛius ſhoꝛtlyafter hauing thus obteined ẏ victoꝛy of both theſe vſurpers, pers recouered the Isle, but yet not till the yeare next following, and that by the high industrie & great diligence of that valiant Gentleman Earle Constantius. The slaughter of Constantine and his sonne hapned in the first yeare of the 297. Olympiade. 465. after the comming of Cesar. 1062. after the building of Rome, the dominicall letter being I. and the golden number 13: so that the recouering of the Islande fell in the yeare of oure Lord. 411.

Heere also is ertsoones to bee considered the valure of the Brittishe Souldiers, who following this last remembred Constantine the usurper, did put the Romayne state in great daunger, and by force brake through into Spayne, vanquishing those that kept the streights of ỹ mountaynes betwixt Spayne and Gallia, nowe called France, an exployt of no small consequence, sith thereby the number of Barbarous nations gote free passage to enter into Spayne, whereof ensued many battayles, sackings of Cities and townes, and walking of the countreys accordingly as the furious rage of those fierce people was moued to put their crueltie in practise. If therefore the Britayne writers hadde considered and marked the valiant exployts and noble enterprises which the Brittish aydes, armyes and legions atchieued in service of the Romayne Emperours (by whome whilest they had the gouernement ouer thys Isle, there were at sundry times notable numbers conueyed forth into the parties of beyonde the Seas, as by Albinus and Constantius, also by his sonne Constantine the great, by Maximus, and by this Constantine, both of them usurpers) if (I say) the Brittish writers had taken good note of the numbers of the Brittishe youth thus conueyed ouer from hence, and what notable exployts they boldly attempted, and no lesse manfully atchieued, they needed not to haue giuen care vnto the fabulous reportes forged by their Bardes of Arthur and other their Princes worthy indeede of high cõmendation. And pitie it is, that they fame shoulde bee brought by suche meanes out of credite by the incredible and fonde fables whyche haue bin deuised of their actes so vnlike to be true, as the tales of Robin Hood, or the iestes written by Ariost the Italian in his booke entituled Orlando Furioso, sith the same writers had otherwise true matter ynough to write of concerning the worthy feates by their countreymen in those dayes in forraine parties boldly enterprised and no lesse valiantly accomplished, as also ỹ warres whyche nowe and then they mayntayned against the Romaynes here at home, in times whe they felte themselues oppressed by their tyrannical gouernement, as by ỹ which is written before of Caratacus, Boadicia, Cartimãdua, Venusius, Galgagus or Galdus (as some name him) and diuers other, who for their noble valiancies deserue as much prayse, as by tong or pen is able to be expressed. But nowe to returne vnto the Brittish historie: we will proceede in order with theyr Kings as wee fynde them in the same mentioned, and therefore we haue thought good to speake somewhat further of Gracian from whome wee haue digressed.

Gracianus.

Gracianus.

GRacianus then cyuil, Maximus or Maximianus had sente into Britayne (as before ye haue heard) hearing that his master was slain, toke vpon him the rule of this our Britaine, and made himselfe King thereof in the yeare. 390. Hee was a Britaine borne, as Polydore writeth, construing so by that hee is named by Authors to be Municeps, that is to say, a free man of ỹ countrey or citie wher he inhabiteth. For his sternenesse & rough manner of gouernement, he was of the Britaines (as the histories alledge) slayne and dispatched out of the way after he hadde raigned the space of foure yeares, or rather foure monethes, as shoulde seeme by that whiche is founde in autentike writers, and as Harrison in his Chronologie hath full well noted. Then the forenamed Kings Granius and Melga, which (as some write were brethren) returned into thys lande with their armies encreased with newe supplyes of menne of warre, as Scottes, Danes, and Norwegians, and destroyed the countrey from side to syde. For the Britaynes in this season were sore enfeebled, and were not able to make anye greate numbers of Souldiers, by reason that Maximus hadde ledde forthe of the lande the floure and chiefest choise of all the Brittish youth into Gallia, as before ye haue hearde.

Gildas maketh no mention of these two Kings Guanius and Melganor of the Hunnes, but rehearsing this great destruction of the lande, declareth (as before yee haue heard) that the Scottes and Pictes were the same that dyd all the mischiefe, whome hee calleth two nations of beyonde the Seas, the Scottes comming out of the Northwest, and the Pictes out of the Northeast, by whome (as hee sayeth) the lande was ouerrunne, and brought vnder sore manye yeeres after. Therefore the Britaines beeyng thus vexed, spoyled, and cruelly persecuted by the Scottes and Pictes (if wee shall so take them) sente messengers with all speede vnto Rome to make suite for some ayde of menne of warre to bee sente into Britayne: whereupon immediately a legion of Souldiers was sente thyther Anno. 414. the whiche easily repulsed the enimies, and chased them backe with greate slaughter, to the great comfort of the Britaines, ẏ which by this meanes were delivered from present danger of vtter destruction as they thought. But the Romaynes beeing occasioned to depart agayne out of the lande, appointed ẏ Britaynes to make a wall (as had bin made aforetime by the Emperors Adrian, Antoninus & Seuerus) ouerthwart the countrey from sea to sea, stretching from Penuelton vnto the Citie of Iclud, whereby the enimies might be stayed from entring the lande: but this wall being made of turfe and soddes, rather than with stones, after the departure of the Romanes was easily ouerthrowen by the Scottes & Pictes, which retsones returned to inuade the cõfines of the Britaines, and so entring the countrey, wasted and destroyed all afore them, according to their former custome. Herevpõ were messengers with lamentable letters agayn dispatched towards Rome for new ayde against those cruell enimies, with promise, that if the Romaynes would now in this great necessitie help to deliuer the land, they should be assured to finde the Britaynes euermore obediente subiectes, and ready at their commaundement. Valentinianus (pitying the case of the poore Britaynes) appoynted another legion of Souldiers (of the which one Gallio of Rauenna had the leading) to goe to theyr succours, the which arriuing in Britayne set on ẏ enimies, and giuing them the ouerthrowe, slewe a great number of them, & chased ẏ residue out of the countrey.

Gallio Ranas sent Britayn

The Romanes thus hauing obteyned the victory, declare to the Britaynes, that from thencefoorth they would not take vppon them for euery light occasion so paynefull a iourney, alledgyng, how there was no reason why the Romayne ensignes with such a number of men of warre shuld be put to trauell so farre by sea and lande, for the repulsing and beating backe of a sort of scattering rouers and pilfering theeues: wherefore they aduised the Britaynes to looke to their duties, & lyke men to endeuor themselues to defende their countrey by their owne force from the enimies inuasions. And bicause they iudged that this might bee an help to ẏ Britaynes, they set in hande to build a wall yet once againe ouerthwart the Ile in ẏ same place where the Emperour Seuerus caused his trench & rampire to be cast. This wall whiche the Romanes nowe builte with help of the Britaynes, conteyned in breadth eyght foote, and in heigth twelue foote, trauersing the land from East to West, and was made of stone. After that thys wall was finished, the Romaynes giuing good exhortations to the Britaynes to play the men, they shewed also vnto thẽ the way how to make armour and weapon. And besydes this, on the coast of the East sea where their Shippes lay at roade, and where it was doubted that the enimies woulde lande, they caused towers to bee erected with spaces betwixt, out of the whiche the Seas might be discouered. These things ordered in this wise, the Romanes bade the Britaynes farewel, as not minding to returne thither agayne. The Romanes then being departed out of the land, the Scottes and Pictes hauing knowledge thereof, straight wayes returne againe by Sea, and being more emboldned than before, bycause of the denyall made by the Romaynes to come any more to the succoure of the Britaynes, they take into possession all the Northe and vttermost boundes of the Ile, euen vnto the foresayde wall, therein to remayne remayne as inhabitants. And whereas the Britaynes gote them to their wal to defend the same, that the enimies should not passe further into the country, they were in the ende beaten from it, and diuers of them slayne, so that the Scottes and Pictes entred vppon them and pursued them in more cruell manner than before, so that the Britaynes being chased out of their Cities, Townes, and dwelling houses, were constreyned to flee into desert places, and there to remayne and lyue after the manner of sauage people, & in the ende, began to robbe and spoyle one another, so to auoyde the daunger of sterning for lacke of foode: and thus at the last the countrey was so destroyed and wasted, that there was no other shifte for them that were left aliue to line by, except only by hunting and taking of wilde beasts and foules. And to augment their miserie, the commons imputing the faulte to rest in the Lordes and gouernoures, rose against them in armes, but were vanquished and easily put to flight at two seuerall times, being beaten downe and slayne throgh lacke of skill in such number, especially the latter time, that the residue whiche escaped, withdrewe into the craggy Mountaines, where within the bushes and caues they kepte themselues close, sometimes comming downe and fetching away from the heardes of beastes and flockes of Sheepe whiche belonged to the nobles and Gentlemen of the countrey great bootes to relieue them withall, but at length oppressed with extreame famine when neyther parte coulde long remayne in this state, as needing one anothers help, necessitie made peace betwixt the Lordes and commons of the lande, all iniuries being pardoned and clerely forgiuen. This ciuill warre decayed the force of ỹ Britaynes, little lesse than the Tyrannicall practises of Maximus, for by the auoyding of the commons thus out of their houses, the grounde lay vntilled, whereof ensued suche famine for the space of three yeares togither, that a wonderfull number of people dyed for wante of sustenance.

Thus the Britaynes being brought generally into suche extreame miserie, they thought good to trie if they might purchase some ayde of that noble man Aetius, whiche at that time remayned in Fraunce as yet called Gallia, gouerning the same as Lieutenant vnder the Emperour Honorius: and herevpon taking counsel togither, they wrote a letter to him, the tenor whereof ensueth. To Aetius thrice Consull. The lamentable request of vs the Britaynes beseecheth you of ayde to bee ministred vnto the prouince of the Romane Empire, vnto our countrey, vnto our wiues & children at this presente, the whiche stande in most extreame perill. For the barbarous people driue vs to the Sea, and the Sea driueth vs backe vnto them agayne: herof rise two kindes of deathe, for eyther are we slayne, or drowned, and agaynste such euils haue we no remedie nor help at all. Therefore in respect of your clemencie, succoure youre owne wee most instantly require you. &c. But notwithstanding that the Britaines thus sought for ayde at the handes of Aetius, as then the Emperours Lieutenaunte, yet coulde they none get, either for that Aetius woulde not, as he that passed little howe things wente, bicause he bare displeasure in his mind against Valentinianus as the Emperour, or else for that he could not, being otherwise constreyned to employ al his forces in other places against such barbarous nations as then inuaded the Romane Empire. And so by ỹ meanes was Britayne lost, & the tribute whiche the Britaynes were accustomed to paye vnto the Romaynes ceassed, iust a fiue hundred yeares after that Julius Cesar firste entred the Ile.

The Britaynes being thus put to their shifts, many of them as hunger starued were constreyned to yeelde themselues into the hãds of their enimies, where other yet keeping within the Mountaynes, woodes and caues, brake out as occasion serued vpon their aduersaries, and then first (saith Gildas) did the Britaynes not putting their trust in man but in God (according to the saying of Philo, where mans help faileth, it is needeful that Gods help be present) make slaughter of their enimies that hadde bin accustomed many yeares to robbe and spoyle them in manner as before is recited, and so the bolde attemptes of the enimies ceassed for a time, but the wickednesse of the Britishe people ceassed not at all. The enimies departed out of the lande, but the inhabitantes departed not from their naughtye doings, beeyng not so ready to putte backe the common enimies, as to exercise ciuill warre and discord amongst themselues. The wicked Irishe people departed home, to make returne againe within a while after. But the Pictes settled themselues firste in that seaton in the vttermost bounder of the Ile, and there continued, making reyses oftentimes vppon theyr neyghbours, and spoyling them of their goodes.

This with more also hath Gildas and lykewise Beda written of this great desolation of the Brittish people: wherein if the wordes of Gildas be well wayed and consydered of, it may leade vs to thinke that the Scottes hadde no habitacions heere in Britayne, but only in Irelande, till after this seaton, and that at this presente time the Pictes whiche before inhabited within the Iles of Orkney, now placed themselues in the North partes of Scotland, and after by processe of time came and nestled themselues in Louthian, in the Mers and other countreys more neere to our bordures. But to procede: The Brittish histories affirme, that whilest the Britaynes were thus persecuted by those two most cruell and fierce nations the Scottes and Pictes, the noble and chiefest men amongst them consulted togither, and concluded to sende an honorable Ambassade vnto Aldroenus as then King of little Britayne in Gallia, which Aldroenus was the fourth from Conan Meriadoc the first King there of the Britishe nation.

Of this Ambassade the Archbishop of London named Eutheline or Gosseleyne was appoynted for chiefe and principall, the whiche passing ouer into little Britaine, and comming before the presence of Aldroenus, so declared the effect of hys message, that his suite was graunted.

For Aldroenus agreed to send his brother Constantine ouer into great Britayne with a conuenient power, vppon condition, that the victory beeing obteyned againste the enimies, the Britaynes should make hym King of greate Britayne.

An ambassade sent from the Britaynes vnto Aldroenus King of Britaine in Fraunce.

Constantine the brother of Aldroenus.

Thus it is apparant that this lande of Britayne was without any certayne gouernoure, after that Gracian the vsurper was dispatched certaine yeares togither, but how many yeares, writers in their accompt varry.

Fabian gathereth by sundry coniectures, that the space betwixte the deathe of Gracian and the beginning of the raigne of the sayd Constantine, brother to Aldroenus, continued nine and thirtie yeares, during whiche time the Britaynes were sore and miserably afflicted by the inuasions of the Scottes and Pictes, as before ye haue heard by testimonies taken out of Beda, Gildas, Geffrey of Monmouth, and other writers of the Brittishe and English hystories.

But nowe sith no mention is made of the Scottes in oure hystories till the dayes of Marinus the vsurper or Tyrante, as some call him, whyche beganne hys raigne here in Britaine about the yeare of oure Lorde. 383. and that tyll after hee had bereft the lande of the chiefest forces thereof in taking the most parte of the youth ouer with him: wee fynde not in the same hystories of any troubles wrought to the Britaynes by that nation. Therefore we haue thought good heere to come backe to the former tymes, that wee maye shewe what is found mentioned in the Romaine hystories, both before that time and after, as well concerning the Scottes and Pictes, as also the Saxons, and especially in Ammianus Marcellinus, where in the beginning of his twentith booke entreating of the doyngs of the Emperoure Julianus, Julianus, hee hathe theſe wordes in effect as folowe.

In this ſame ſeaſon thynges in Illiricum or Slauonia, and in the Eaſt partes, at what tyme Cõſtantius bare the office of Conſull the tenth time, and Julianus the thirde tyme, that is to witte, in the yeare of our Lord. 360. when in Britaine quietneſſe beeing diſturbed by roades made by the Scottes and Pictes which are wilde and ſauage people, the frountiers of the contrey were waſted, and ſeare oppreſſed the prouinces awearied, with the heape of paſſed loſſes.

The Emperour (hee meaneth Julianus) as then remayning at Paris, and hauing his minde troubled with many cares, doubted to goe to the ayde of them beyond the Sea, as we haue ſhewed that Conſtantius dyd, leaſt hee ſhoulde leaue them in Gallia withoute a Ruler, the Almaynes beeyng euen then prouoked and ſtirred vp to crueltie and warre. Hee thoughte good therefore to ſende Lupicinus vnto theſe places to bring things into frame and order, whiche Lupicinus was at that time maſter of the armory, a warlike perſon and ſkilfull in all poyntes of chiualrie, but proude and high minded beyonde meaſure, and ſuch one as it was doubted long whether he was more couetous or cruell.

Hereupon, the ſayde Lupicinus ſetting forwarde the lighte armed menne of the Heruli and Batani, with diuers companies alſo of the people of Meſia now called Bulgarie: When winter was well entred and come on, hee came himſelfe to Bulleigne, and there prouiding Shippes and embarquing his men when the winde ſerued hys purpoſe, hee tranſported ouer vnto Sandwiche, and ſo marched forth vnto London, from thence purpoſing to ſet forward, as vppon aduice taken according to the qualitie of his buſineſſe, he ſhould thinke meete and expedient.

In the meane time, whileſt Lupicinus was buſie here in Britaine to repreſſe the enimies, the Emperour Conſtantius diſplaced certayne officers, and among other he depriued the ſame Lupicinus of the office of Maſter of the armory, appoynting one Gumobaudus to ſucceede hym in that rowmth before any ſuche thing was knowen in theſe parties: and where it was doubted leaſt that Lupicinus (if hee hadde vnderſtoode ſo much whileſt hee was yet in Britayne) woulde haue attempted ſome newe trouble, as he was a man of a ſtoute and loftie mynde, he was called backe from thence, and withall there was ſente a notarie vnto Bulleyne to watche that none ſhoulde paſſe the Seas ouer into Britayne till Lupicinus were returned: and ſo returning ouer from thence ere hee hadde anye knowledge what was done by the Emperoure, hee coulde make no ſturre, hauyng no ſuche aſſiſters in Gallia, as it was thoughte he myght haue hadde in Britayne if he ſhould haue moued Rebellion there. Beſide this alſo the ſame Marcellinus ſpeaking of the doings about the time that Valentinianus being elected Emperour, had admitted his brother Valens as fellowe with him in gouernemente, hathe theſe wordes. In this ſeaſon as though trumpets had blowen the ſounde to battell throughout the whole Romayne Empire, moſt cruell nations being ſtyred vp inuaded the bordures nexte to them adioyning, the Almaynes waſted and deſtroyed the partes of Gallia and Rhetia, as the Sarmatians and Quadi did Pannonia. The Pictes, the Saxons, the Scottes, and the Attacottes vexed the Britaynes with continuall troubles, and greeuous domages. The Auſtoriani, and the people of the Moores ouerranne the countrey of Affrike more sharply than in time paſt they had done. The pilfering troupes of the Gothes ſpoyled Thracia. The King of Perſia ſette in hande to ſubdue the Armenians, and ſoughte to bring them vnder his obeyſance, haſting with all ſpeede towardes Numonia, pretending (though vniuſtly) that now after the deceaſe of Iouianus with whome hee hadde contracted a league and bonde of peace, there was no cauſe of let why hee ought not recouer thoſe things which (as he alledged) did belong to his auncetours, and ſo forthe.

Moreouer, the ſame Marcellinus in another place writeth in this wiſe, where hee ſpeaketh of the ſayde Valentinianus. Departing therefore from Amiens, and haſting to Trier, hee was troubled with greeuous newes that were brought hym, gyuing hym to vnderſtand, that Britayne by a conſpiracie of the Barbarous nations was broughte to vtter pouertie, that Nectaridus one of the Emperours houſe Earle of the Sea coaſt hauyng charge of the partyes towardes the Sea, was ſlayne, and that the generall Bulchobaudes was circumuented by traynes of the enimies. Theſe thyngs with greate horror beeyng knowen, hee ſent Seuerus as then Earle, or (as I may call hym Lorde Stewarde of his houſeholde) to reforme things that were amiſſe if happe woulde ſo permitte, who beeyng ſhortly called backe, Iouinius goyng thyther, and with ſpeede haſting forwarde, ſent for more ayde and a greater power of menne, as the inſtant neceſſitie then required. At lengthe, for many cauſes, and the ſame greatly to be feared, the which were reported and aduertiſed out of that Ile, Theodoſius was elected and appoynted to goe thyther, a man of approued ſkill in warlike affayres, and calling togyther an hardy youthfull number of the legions and cohortes of men of warre, hee wente forthe, no ſmall hope beeyng conceyued of hys good ſpeede: the ſame whereof ſpied and went afore him, and a little after Marcellinus adding what maner of people they were that troubled the Britaynes in this wiſe, he ſayth thus: This ſhall ſuffice to be ſayde, that in thys ſeaſon the Pictes deuided into two nations, Dicalidones, and Vecturiones, and in like maner the Attacotti a right warlike nation, and the Scots wandering heere and there, made foule worke in places where they came.

The confines of Fraunce were diſquieted by the Frankeyners and Saxons borderers vnto them, euery one as they could breake forth, doing great harme by cruell ſpoyle, fyre, and taking of priſoners.

To withſtande thoſe doynges if good fortune would giue hym leaue, that moſt able Captayne going vnto the vttermoſt boundes of the earthe, when hee came to the coaſt of Bulleyne whyche is ſeparated from the contrary coaſt on the other ſide by the Sea, with a narrowe ſtreighte, where ſometime the water goeth very high and rough, and ſhortly after becommeth calme and pleaſant without hurt to thoſe that paſſe the ſame, he tranſporting ouer at leyſure, arriued at Sandwiche (or rather Rextacheſter) where there is a quiete roade for veſſels to lie at ancre.

Whereuppon, when the Batui and Hermi with the Souldiers of the legions cleped Iouij, and Victores, being companies that truſted well to their owne ſtrengthe, marched forthe and drew towardes London, an auntient citie, whiche now of late hath bin called Auguſta.

London called Auguſta.

Herwith deuiding his army into ſundry parts, he ſet vppon the troupes of the enimies as they were abroade to forrey the countrey, ye red with burdens of their ſpoyles and pillage, and ſpeedily putting them to flighte as they were leading away thoſe priſoners whiche they had taken with their bootes of cattell, hee bereſte them of theyr pray, the whiche the poore Britaynes that were tributaries had loſt.

To bee briefe, reſtoring the whole except a ſmall portion beſtowed amongſt the weery ſouldiers, he entred the Citie which before was ouerſet with troubles, but nowe ſodainly refreſhed, becauſe there was hope of reliefe, and aſſured preſeruation.

After this, when Theodoſius was comforted with proſperous ſucceſſe to attempte things of greater importance, and ſearching wayes howe with good aduice to worke ſurely: whileſt hee remayned doubtfull what would enſue, he learned as wel by the confeſſion of priſoners taken, as alſo by the information of ſuch as were ſtolne from the enimies, that the ſcattered people of ſundry nations which with practiſe of great crueltie were become fierce and vndanted, could not be ſubdued but by policie ſecretly contriued, and ſuddayne inuaſions. At length therefore ſetting forthe hys Proclamations, and promiſing pardon to thoſe that were gone away from their Captaynes or charge, he called them backe againe to ſeruice: and alſo thoſe that by licence were departed and lay ſcattered here and there in places abroade. By this meanes, when many were returned, he being on the one ſide earneſtly prouoked, and on the other holden backe with thoughtfull cares, required to haue one Ciuilis by name ſent to hym to haue the rule of the prouinces in Britayne in ſteede of the other gouernours, a man of ſharpe witte, and an earneſt mayntayner of iuſtice. Hee likewiſe required that one Dulcitius a Captayne renoumed in knowledge of warlike affayres, might bee ſente ouer to him for his better aſſiſtance. Theſe things were done in Britayne.

Theod requir haue C ſent to

Dulci

Againe in hys eyght and twentie booke, the ſame Marcellinus reciting further what the ſame Theodoſius dyd atchieue in Britaine, hath in effect theſe wordes, Theodoſius verily a Captayne of worthy fame, taking a valiant courage to hym, and departing from Auguſta, whyche men of olde tyme called London, with Souldiers aſſembled by greate diligence, did ſuccoure and releeue greatly the decayed and troubled ſtate of the Britaynes, preuenting euery conuenient place where the barbarous people myghte lye in wayte to doe miſchiefe, and nothing hee commanded the mean Souldiers to doe, but that which he with a cheerefull mind would firſte take in hand to ſhew them an example.

Lond Augu

By this meanes accompliſhing the roomth of a valiant Souldier, and fulfilling the charge of a noble Captayne, hee diſcomfyted and putte to flight ſundry nations, whome preſumption (nouriſhed by ſecuritie) emboldned to inuade the Romayne prouinces: And ſo the Cities and Caſtels that had bin ſore endomaged by manyfolde loſſes and diſpleaſures, were reſtored to their former ſtate of welth, ẏ foundation of reſt and quietneſſe being layde for a long ſeaſon after to enſue.

But

But as theſe things were a doing a wicked practiſe was in hande lyke to haue burſt forth, to the grieuous daunger of ſetting things in broyle, if it had not beene ſtayed euen in the beginning of the firſt attempt.

There was one Valentinus, borne in the parties of Valeria adioyning to Pannonia, now called Stiermarke, a man of a prowde and loftie ſtomacke, brother to the wyfe of Maximinus, which Valentinus for ſome notable offence had beene baniſhed into Bryttayne, where the naughtie man that coulde not reſt in quiet, deuiſed how by ſome commotion hee might deſtroy Theodoſius, who as he ſawe was onely able to reſiſt his wicked purpoſes. And going about many things both priuily and apertly, the forze of his vnmeaſurable deſire to miſchiefe ſtil encreaſing, he ſought to procure aſwell other that were in ſemblable wiſe baniſhed men, and inclined to miſchiefe lyke to him ſelfe, as alſo diuerſe of the ſouldiers, alluring them as the time ſerued, with large promiſes of great wealth, if they would ioyne with hym in that enterpryſe. But euen now in the verie nicke when they ſhould haue gone in hande with their vngracious exployt, Theodoſius warned of theyr intent, boldly aduaunced himſelfe to ſee due puniſhmẽt executed of the offenders that were forthwith taken and knowne to be guiltie in that conſpiracie.

Theodoſius committed Valentine with a few other of his truſtie complices vnto the Captaine Dulcitius, commaunding him to ſee them put to death: but coniecturing by his warlike ſkill (wherin he paſſed all other in thoſe dayes) what might follow, he woulde not in any wiſe haue any further enquirie made of the other conſpirators, leaſt through feare that might be ſpread abrode in many, the troubles of the Prouinces now well quieted, ſhould be againe renued.

After this, Theodoſius diſpoſing himſelfe to redreſſe many things as neede requyred, all danger was quite removed, ſo that it was moſte apparant, that fortune fauoured him in ſuche wiſe, that ſhe left him not deſtitute of hir furtheraunce in any one of all his attempts: he therefore reſtored the Cities and Caſtels that were appoynted to be kept with gariſons, and the borders he cauſed to be defended and garded with ſufficient nũbers to keepe watch and warde in places neceſſarie. And hauing recouered the Prouince whiche the enimies had gotten into their poſſeſſion, hee ſo reſtored it to the former ſtate, that vpon his motion to haue it ſo, a lawfull gouernour was aſſigned to rule it, and the name was chaunged ſo, as from thenceforth it ſhould be called Valentia for the Princes pleaſure.

The Areani, a kinde of men ordeyned in tymes paſt by our elders, (of whom ſomwhat we haue ſpoken in the actes of the Emperour Conſtance) being now by little & little fallen into vices, he remoued from theyr places of abyding, being openly conuicted, that allured wyth bribes and fayre promyſes, they had oftentymes bewrayed vnto the barbarous Nations what was done among the Romaines: for this was theyr charge, to runne vp and downe by long iourneys, and to giue warning to oure Captaines, what ſturre the people of the next confines were about to make.

Theodoſius therfore hauing ordred theſe and other like things, moſt worthily to his high fame, was called home to the Emperours Court, who leauing the Prouinces in moſt triumphant ſtate, was highly renowmed for his often and moſte profitable victories, as if he had bene an other Camillus, or Curſor Papyrius: and with the fauor and loue of all men was conueyed vnto the Sea ſide, and paſſing ouer with a gentle winde, came to the Court, where he was receyued wyth great gladneſſe and commendation, being immediately appoynted to ſucceed in rowmth of Valence Iouinus that was maiſter of the horſes. The prayſe of Theodoſius.

Finally, he was called by the Emperor Gratianus, to be aſſociate with him in the Imperiall eſtate, after the death of Valence, in the yeare after the incarnation of our ſauiour. 379. and raigned Emperor ſurnamed Theodoſius the great, about xbj. yeares and two dayes. VVil. Har.

But now to our former matter. Hereto alſo may that be applyed which the foreſayd Marcellinus wryteth after in the ſame booke, touching the inuaſion of the Saxons, the which (as Wolf. Lazius taketh it) entred then firſt into great Britaine, but were repulſed of the Emperour Valentinianus the fyrſt, by the conduct of Seuerus. VVolf. Lazi. Seuerus.

The ſame yeare (ſayth he) that the Emperours were the thirde tyme Conſuls, there brake forth a multitude of Saxons, and paſſing the ſeas, entred ſtrongly into the Romain confines: a natiõ fed oftentimes with ỹ ſlaughter of our people, the brunt of whoſe firſt inuaſion, Erle Nanneus ſuſteyned, ỹ which was appointed to defend thoſe partyes, & an approued captain, with continuall trauaile in warres verie expert: but then encountring with deſperate and forlorne people, when he perceyued ſome of his ſouldiers to be ouerthrowne and beaten downe, and himſelf wõded, not able to abyde the often aſſaults of his enimies, he obteyned this by enforcing the Emperour what was neceſſarie and ought to be done, inſomuch that Seuerus, maiſter (or as I may call him Coronell of the footemen) was ſent to helpe and releue things that ſtode in daunger: the which bringing a ſufficient power with him for the ſtate of that buſineſſe, when he came to thoſe Nonneus Comes. Seuerus Coronell of the footemen.

places, he deuiding his armie into partes, put the Saxons in ſuche feare and trouble before they fought, that they did not ſo muche as take weapon in hande to make reſiſtaunce, but being amaſed wyth the ſight of the glyttering enſignes and Eagles figured in the Romaine ſtandardes, they ſtreight made ſute for peace, and at length after the matter was debated in ſundrie wiſe (bycauſe it was iudged that it ſhoulde be profitable for the Romaine common wealth) truce was graunted vnto them, and many yong men (able for ſeruice in the warres) deliuered to the Romaines according to the couenants concluded.

After this the Saxons were permitted to depart without impechment, ſo to returne from whence they came, the which being now out of al feare, and preparing to goe their wayes, dyuerſe bands of footmen were ſent to lie priuily in a certaine hid valley, ſo embuſhed as they might eaſily breake forth vpon the enimies as they paſſed by them. But it chaunced farre otherwiſe than they ſuppoſed: for certaine of thoſe footemen ſtyred with the noyſe of them as they were comming, brake forth out of time, and being ſodenly diſcouered whileſt they haſted to vnite and knit themſelues togither, by the hideous crie and ſhoute of the Saxons, they were put to flight. Yet by and by cloſing togither againe, they ſtayed, and the extremitie of the chaunce miniſtring to them force (though not ſufficient) they were dryuen to fight it oute, and beeing beaten downe wyth great ſlaughter, had dyed euery mothers ſonne, if a troupe of Horſemen armed at all poyntes (beeing in like maner placed in an other ſyde at the parting of the way to aſſayle the enimies as they ſhoulde paſſe) aduertyſed by the dolefull noyſe of them that foughte, had not ſpeedilye come in to the ſuccours of theyr fellowes.

Then ranne they togyther more cruellye than before, and the Romaines bending themſelues towardes theyr enimies, compaſſed them in on eche ſyde, and with theyr drawne ſwordes ſlue them downe right, ſo that there was not one of them left to returne home to theyr natiue Countrey to bryng newes howe they had ſpedde, nor one ſuffred to liue after the death of his fellowes.

And although an indifferent man that ſhoulde iudge hereof, might with cauſe reproue ſo vniuſt and diſhonorable dealing: yet the thing being well weyed and conſidered, he would not thinke euill of it, that a wicked knotte of theeues and Robbers ſhoulde at length paye after the pryce of the Market.

Thus were the limittes of the Romain Empyre preſerued at that time in Brytaine, whiche ſhould ſeeme to be about the yere of our lord. 399.

Honorius the Emperour.

After this in the time of the Emperour Honorius, alſo the Scottes, Pictes, and Saxons, did eftſoones inuade the frontiers of the Romaine Prouince in Brytaine, as appeareth by that which the Poet Claudianus wryteth, in attributing the honour of preſeruing the ſame frontyers vnto the ſayde Emperour, in his booke intituled Panegericus terty Conſolatus, (which fell in the yeare. 396. as thus:

Ille leues Mauros nec falſo nomine Pictos Clau.
Edomuit, Scotumq́ vago mucrone ſecutus,
Fregit Hyperboreas remis audacibus vndas.
Et geminus fulgens vtroq́ ſub axe trophei,
Tethyos alternæ reſluas calcauit arenas.

The nimble Mores and Pictes by right
ſo callde, he hath ſubdude,
And with his wandring ſworde likewiſe
the Scottes he hath purſude:
He brake with bolde courageous oare
the Hyperborean waue,

And

And shyning vnder both the Poles with double trophyes braue,
He marcht vpon the bubling sandes of either swelling seas.

The same Claudian vpon the fourth Consulship of Honorius, sayth.

Quid rigor æternus, cæli? quid frigora prosunt,
Ignotumq; fretum? maduerunt Saxone fuso
Orcades, incaluit, Pictorum sanguine Thule, Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Hiberna.

VVhat lasting colde? what did to them
the frostie Clymates gaine?
And sea vnknowne? bemoysted all with bloud of Saxons slaine
The Orkneys were: with bloud of Picts hath Thule waxed warme,
And yse Irelande hath bewaylde
the heapes of Scottish harme.

The same prayse gyueth he to Stelico the sonne in lawe of Honorius, and maketh mention of a Legion of Souldiers sent for oute of Brytayne in the Peripheates of the Scottish warres.

Venit & extremis legio prætenta Britannis,
Quæ Scoto dat frena truci ferroq; notatas,
Perleget exanimes Picto moriente figuras.

A legion eke there came from out the farthest Brytaines bent, VVhich brideled hath the Scots so sterne and markes with yron brent Vpon their liueles limmes doth reade, whyles Pictes their liues relent.

He rehearseth the like in his second Panegericus of Stilico.

Inde Caledonio velata Britannia monstro,
Ferre Pictagenas, cuius vestigia verrit
Caerulus, Oceani æstum mentitur amictus.
Me quoq; vicinis erescentem gentibus inquit,
Munivit Stilico scutata quum Scotus Hibernam
Mouit, & infesto spumantis remige Thetis,
Illius effectum curæ, ne bella timerem
Scotica, ne Pictum tremerem, ne littore toto, Prospicerem dubijs venturum Saxona ventis.

Then Brytaine whom the monsters did of Calidone surrounde, VVhose cheekes were scorcht with steele,
whose garments swept the ground,
Resembling much the marble hew
of Ocean seas that bolle, Sayd, she whom neighbour nations did conspire to bring to spoile, Hath Stilico munited strong, when rayse by Scots entise
All Ireland was, and endles dares
the salt sea some did slide,
His care hath causde, that all feares
of Scottish broyles haue bard, Ne do I dread the Picts, ne looke
my countrey coasts to gard, Gainst Saxon troupes, who chaunging winds sent sayling hither wardes.

Thus may it appeare, that in the tyme when the Romaine Empyre beganne to decay, in like maner as other partes of the same Empyre were inuaded by barbarous nations, so was that part of Brytayne which was subiect to the Romaine Emperours grieuously assayled by the Scottes and Pictes, and also by the Saxons, the whiche in those dayes inhabiting all alongst the Sea coastes of lowe Germanie, euen from the Elbe vnto the Rhine, did not onely trouble the seate by continuall rouing, but also bled comming a land into dyuerse partes of Brytayne, and Gallia, inuading the countreys, and robbing the same with great rage and crueltie. Brytayne afflicted by inuasion of barbarous nations.

To the which Sidonius Apollinaris thus alludeth, wryting to Namatius. Sidon. Apol. li. 8. Epist.

The Messenger did assuredly affyrme, that lately ye blewe the trumpet to warre in your nauie, and betwixt the office one while of a mariner, and another while of a souldier, wafted about the crooked shores of the Ocean Sea agaynste the fleete of the Saxons, of whome as many Rouers as ye beholde, so many Archpyrates ye suppose to see: so doe they altogyther with one accorde commaund, obey, teach, and learne to play the partes of Rouers, that euen now there is good occasion to warne you to beware. This enimie is more cruell than all other enimyes. Her assayleth at vnwares, hee escapeth foreseeing the daunger afore hande, he despyseth those that stand agaynst him, he throweth downe the vnware: if he be followed he snappeth them vp that pursue him, if he flee he escapeth. The piracie of the Saxons.

Of like effect for proufe hereof be those verses which he wrote vnto Maiorianus in his Panegerike Oration.

Tot Maria intraui duce te, longeq; remotas,
Sole sub occiduo gentes, victricia Cæsar
Signa Caledonios transuexit ad vsq; Britannos
Fuderet, & quanquã Scotũ, & cũ Saxone Pictũ
Hostes quæsiuit enim quæ iam natura negabat,
Quærere plus hominis.

Which is Englished thus.

So many seas I entred haue,
and nations farre by west,
By thy conduct, and Cæsar hath his banners borne full prest, Vnto the furthest Brytish coast,
where Caledonians dwell,
The Scot and Pict with Saxons eke,
though he subdued fell,
Yet would he seeke enmies vnknowne whom nature had forbid. &c.

Thus

Thus farre haue we thought good to gather out of the Romaine and other wryters, that yee might perceyue the ſtate of Bꝛytayne the better in that time of the decay of the Romain Empire, and that ye might haue occaſion to marke by the way, how not only the Scots, but alſo the Saxons had attempted to inuade the Bꝛytaines before any mention is made of the ſame theyr attempts by the Bꝛytiſh and Engliſh wꝛyters.

But whether the Scottes had any habitation within the boundes of Bꝛytaine, til the time ſuppoſed by the Bꝛytaine wꝛyters, wee leaue that poynt to the iudgement of others that be trauayled in the ſearch of ſuche antiquities, onely admoniſhing you, that in the Scottiſhe Chꝛonicle you ſhall finde the opinion whiche their wꝛiters haue conceyued of this matter, and alſo manye things touching the actes of the Romaines, done agaynſt diuerſe of the Bꝛytayns, which they preſume to be done againſt their nation, though ſhadowed vnder the generall name of Bꝛytaines, or of other particular names, at this day to moſt mẽ vnknowne. But whenſoeuer the Scottes came into this Ile, they made the thirde nation that inhabited the ſame, cõming firſt out of Scithia, or rather out of Spaine (as ſome ſuppoſe) into Irelande, and from thence into Bꝛytayne, next after the Pictes, though their wꝛyters fetche a farre more ancient beginning (as in their Chꝛonicle at large appeareth) referring them to the reading thereof, that deſire to vnderſtande that matter as they ſet it forth.

Polidor.

But now to returne where we left, touching the ſucceſſion of the Bꝛytiſh kings, as their Hyſtories make mention: thus we finde, though carying great ſuſpition withall, as ſome thinke.

Conſtantinus.

COnſtantinus, the brother of Aldꝛoenus king of little Bꝛytaine, at the ſute and earneſt requeſt of the Archbiſhop of London, made in name of all the Bꝛytaines in the Ile of great Bꝛytaine, was ſent into the ſame Ile by his ſayde brother Aldꝛoenus vpon couenants ratified in maner as before is recited, and bꝛought with him a conuenient power, landing with the ſame at Totnes in Deuonſhire. Immediatelye after his comming a lande, he gathered to him a great power of Bꝛytaynes, the which before his landing were hyd in diuerſe places of the Ile.

Then went hee forth with them, and gaue battaile to the enimies, whom he diſcomfited: and ſlue that tyrãt king Guanius there in the field (as ſome bookes haue.)

But this agreeth not with the Scottiſh wꝛiters, the which affyrme that they got the field, but yet loſt their king named Dongarde, (as in theyr Hyſtorie ye may reade.)

But to proceed as our wꝛiters repoꝛt the matter. When the Bꝛitains had thus ouercome their enimies, they conueyed their captaine the ſayde Conſtantine vnto Cicelter, and there in fulfilling their promiſe and couenant made to his brother, crowned him K. of great Bꝛitain, in the yeare of our lord. 433. which was about the .6. yeare of the Emperoꝛ Valentinianus the ſecond, & third yere of Clodius K. of ỹ Frãkmen after called Frenchmẽ, which thẽ began to ſettle thẽſelues in Gallia, wherby the name of that cuntry was afterwards changed & called France. Conſtantine being thus eſtabliſhed king, ruled the land wel & nobly, & defended it frõ all inuaſiõ of enimies during his life.

He

He begat of his wife three sonnes (as the British Historie affyrmeth) Constantius, Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uter surnamed Pendragon.

The eldest, because hee perceyued him to bee but dull of witte, and not verie towarde, he made a Monke, placing him within the Abbay of Amphibalus in Winchester.

Finally, this Constantine, after he had raigned ten yeares, was trayterously slaine one day in his owne chamber (as some write) by a Pict, the which was in such fauour with him, that hee might at all tymes haue free accesse to him at his pleasure. Neither the Romaine writers, nor Beda, make any mention of this Constantine, but of the other Constantine they write, which immediately after that the vsurper Gracian was dispatched out of the way (as before ye haue heard) was aduaunced to the rule of this land, and title of Emperor, onely in hope of his name, and for no other respect of towardnesse in him, afore time being but a meane souldier, without any degree of honor.

The same Constantine (as writers recorde) going ouer into Gallia, adourned his sonne Constantius with the title and dignitie of Cesar, the which before was a Monke, and finally as well the one as the other were slain, the father at Arles by Earle Constantius that was sent against him by the Emperor Honorius, and the sonne at Vienna (as before ye haue heard) by one of his owne Court cleped Gerontius (as in the Italian Hystorie ye may see more at large.)

This chaunced about the yeare of our lord. 415.

This haue wee thought good to repeate in this place, for that some maye suppose that thys Constantine is the same whom our writers take to be the brother of Aldroenus king of little Britayne, as the circumstaunce of the time and other things to be cõsidered may giue the occasion to thinke, for that there is not so much credit to be yelded to the that haue writen the British hystories, but that in some part men may with iust cause doubt of sundrye matters conteyned in the same: therfore haue we in this boke bin the more diligent to shewe what the Romaine and other forreyne writers haue regystred in their bookes of hystories touching the affayres of Britain, that the reader may bee the better satisfied in the truth.

But now to returne to the sequele of the Hystorie as we finde the same written by the British Chronicles.

After that Constantine was murthered (as before ye haue heard) one Vortigerus, or Vortigernus, a man of great authoritie amongs the Britaynes, wrought so with the residue of the British nobilitie, that Constantius the eldest sonne of their king the forerememberd Constantine, was taken out of the Abbey of Winchester, where hee remayned, and was streyght wayes created king, as lawfull inheritor to his father.

This Vortigern was duke of the Geuisses and Cornwall, as Rad. Cestr. reporteth. Galf. Mon.

Ye haue heard howe Constantius was made a Monke in his fathers lyfe time, because he was thought to be too soft and childish in wit, to haue any publike rule committed to his handes: but for that cause specially did Vorteger seeke to aduaunce him, to the ende that the King beeing not able to gouerne of himselfe, he might haue the chiefest sway, and so rule all things as it were vnder him, preparing thereby a way for hymselfe to attayne at length to the Kingdome, as by that which followed was more apparauntly perceyued.

Constantius.

Constãtius.

THis Constãtius then the sonne of Constãtine, by the helpe (as before ye haue heard) of Vortigerne, was made king of Britaine, in the yeare of our Lorde. 443. But Constantius bare but the name of king: for Vortigerne abusing his innocencie and simple discretion to order things as was requisite, had all the rule of the lande, and did what pleased him. Whereupon first where there had beene a league concluded betwixt the Britaynes, Scottes and Pictes, in the dayes of the late King Constantine, Vortiger caused the same league to bee renued, and waged an hundred Pictes, and as manye Scottes to bee attendaunt as a garde vpon the kings person, diuerse of the whiche (corrupting them with fayre promises) he procured by subtile meanes in the ende to murther the King, and immediately vpon the deede done, he caused the murtherers to be strangled, that they shoulde not afterwardes disclose by whose procurement they did that deed?

Then caused he all the residue of the Scottes and Pictes to bee apprehended, and as it had beene beene vpon a zeale to see the death of Constantius seuerely punished, he framed such inditements and accusations agaynst them, that chiefely by his meanes (as appeared) the guyltlesse persons were condemned and hanged, the multitude of the Brytishe people beeing wonderfully pleased therewith, & giuing great cõmendations to Uortigerne for that deede.

Thus Constantius was made away in maner as before ye haue heard, after he had raigned (as most writers affyrme) the space of fiue yeares.

Then after that his death was knowne, those that had the bringing vp and custodie of his two yonger brethren, Aurelius Ambrose, and Uter Pendragon, mistrusting the wicked intent of Uortigerne, whose dissimulatiõ and mischieuous meaning by some great likelihoods they suspected, with all speede they got them to the sea, & fled into little Brytaine, there keeping them till it pleased God otherwise to prouide for them.

Aurelius Ambrosius. Uter Pendragon.

But Uortigerne couldo so well dissimule his craftie workings, and with such conueyance and cloked maner couldo shadow and colour the matter, that most men thought and iudged him most innocent and voyd of all euil meaning: insomuch that he obteyned so greatly the fauour of the people, that hee was reputed for the onely stay and defender of the common wealth.

Hereupon came it to passe, that when the Counsell was assembled to elect a new king, for so much as the other sonnes of king Constantine were not of age sufficient to rule, Uortigerne himselfe was chosen, diuerse of the nobles (whom hee had procured thereto) giuing their voyces to this his preferment, as to one best deseruing the same in their opinion and iudgement.

Vortigerne is chosen king of Brytaynes.

Vortigerne.

Vortigerne 446

Thus was Uortigerne chosen and made king of Brytain, in the yere of our Lord. 446. third Consulship of Aetius, 1097. of Rome. 4. of the 205. Olympiade, 4112. of the worlde, the Dominicall letter going by F, the Prime by ten, when he fell about the .xij. yeare of the Emperour Valentinianus, the same yeare that Pharamus began to raigne ouer the Frenchmen.

Before hee was made king, he was Earle or Duke of the Gewisses, a people which helde that part of Brytaine where afterwardes the west Saxons inhabited.

Nowe after that Uortigerne had with treason, fraude, and greate deceyte, at length atteyned that for the which hee had long loked, hee fyrste of all furnished the Tower of London with a strong garrison of menne of warre.

Hell

Then studying to aduaunce onely such as he knewe to be his especiall frendes and fauourers, he sought by all meanes howe to oppresse other, of whose good will hee had neuer so little mistrust, namely those that were affectionate towardes the lynage of Constantine he hated deadly, and deuised by secrete meanes which way he might best destroy them: but these his practises being at the first perceyued, caused suche as had the gouernaunce of the two yong Gentlemen with all speede to get them ouer (as yee haue heard) into Brytayne Armorike, there to remaine out of daunger with their Uncle the King of that lande, and daply did diuerse of the Brytaynes, that knewe themselues to bee in Uortigerne his displeasure saile ouer vnto them, whiche thyng brought Uortigerne into great doubt and feare of his estate.

yeares before, and thereupon enſued ryote, ſtrife, lecherie, and other vyces right heynous, and yet accounted as then for ſmall or rather none offences at all.

Theſe abuſes and great enormities, raigned not onely in the temporaltie, but alſo in the ſpiritualtie and chiefe Rulers of the ſame: ſo that euerye man turned the poynt of his ſpeare (euen as if he had conſented of purpoſe) agaynſt the true and innocent perſon.

The Commons alſo gaue themſelues to voluptuous luſt, drunkennelle, and vile loytering, whereof followed fighting, contention, enuie, and much debate.

Of this plentie therfore inſued great pride, and of this abundaunce no leſſe hautineſſe of minde, wherupon followed great wickednelle, lacke of good gouernment and ſober temperancie, and in the necke of theſe as a iuſt puniſhment, death and mortalitie, ſo that in ſome Countreys vneth the quicke ſuffiſed to burie the dead.

And for an augmentation of more miſchiefe, the Scottes and Pictes hearing howe theyr Countreymen through the falſe ſuggeſtion of Vortigerne had beene wrongfully and moſt cruelly put to death at London, beganne wyth fyre and ſworde to make ſharpe and cruell warre agaynſt the Brytains, waſting their Countrey, Hector. Bo.

Scottes and Pictes inuade the Brytayns.

ſpoyling and burning their townes, and giuing them the ouerthrowe in a pight fielde, as in the Scottiſh hyſtorie more plainly appeareth.

To be briefe, the Brytaynes were brought into ſuch daunger and miſerie, that they knewe not what way to take for remedie in ſuch preſent perill, likely to bee ouerrunne and vtterlye vanquyſhed of their enimies.

In the meane tyme Vortigerne not onlye troubled with theſe imminent enilles, but fearing alſo the return of the two brethren, Aurelius Ambroſe, and Uther Pendragon, began to conſider of the ſtate of things, and eſteeming it moſt ſure to worke by aduice, called togither the Lordes and chiefe men of the Realme to haue theyr counſaile and opinion howe to proceede in ſuch a weightie buſineſſe: and ſo debating the matter with them, meaſured both his own force, and alſo the force of his enimies, and according to the condition and ſtate of the tyme, diligently conſidered & ſearched out what remedy was to be had and prouided.

At length after they had throughly pondered al things, the more part of the nobles with the king alſo were of this minde, that there could be no better way deuiſed, than to ſende into Germanie for the Saxons to come to theyr ayde: The whiche Saxons in that ſeaſon were highly renowmed for theyr valyauncie in armes, and manifolde aduentures heretofore atchieued. And ſo forthwith Meſſengers were diſpatched into Germanie, the which with money, giftes, and promiſes, might procure the Saxons to come to the ayde of the Brytaynes agaynſt the Scottes and Pictes. Gilda. VVil. Malm. Beda.

The Saxons ſent for.

The Saxons glad of this meſſage, as people deſirous of entertaynment to ſerue in warres, chooſing forth a piked companie of luſtie yong mẽ vnder the leading of two brethren Hengiſt and Horſus, got them abourde into certain veſſels appointed for the purpoſe, and ſo with all ſpeede directed their courſe towardes great Britain.

10000. hath Hector Bo. Gildas & Beda mention onely but of 3. plates or galles, but Hector Bo. hath 30.

This was in the yeare of our Lorde. 449. and in the ſecond yeare of Vortigerns raigne, as the moſt auntentike writers both Britiſh and Engliſhe ſeeme to gather, although the Scottiſhe writers, and namely Hector Boetius doe varie herein, touching the iuſt accounte of yeares, as to the perſons of the writings alwel of the one as the other may appeare. But William Harriſon taketh it to bee in the fourth yeare of his raigne:

VVil. Malm.

raigne whereto Beda seemeth to agree, who noteth it in the same yere that Martianus the Emperour beganne to rule the Empyre, which was (as appeareth by the consularie table) in the Consulshippe of Protogenes and Austerius, and thirde yere of Merouens king of France.

These Saxons thus arryuing in Brytayne, were curteously receyued, and heartily welcomed of King Uortigerne, who assigned to them places in Kent to inhabite, and forthwith leade them agaynst the Scots and Pictes, which were entred into Brytaine, wasting and destroying the Countrey before them.

Herebpon comming to ioyne in battail, there was a sore fight betwixt the parties for a while, but at length when the Saxons called to remembraunce that the same was the day whiche shoulde eyther purchase to them an euerlasting name of manhode by victorie, or else of reproche by repulse, beganne to renew the fight with suche violence, that the enimies not able to abyde theyr fierce charge, were scattered and beaten down on eche side with great slaughter.

The King hauing got this victorie, highlye rewarded the straungers according to their well deserunges, as by whose prowes he had thus banquished his enimyes, whiche as some write were come as farre as Stanfourde, and vsed at that tyme to fight wyth long Dartes, and Speares, whereas the Saxons fought onelye wyth long swordes and Axes.

Henric. Hut.

There bee that haue written howe the Saxons, were not sent for, but came by chaunce into the Ile, and the occasion to be this: There was an auncient custome amongst the English Saxons a people in Germanie, as was also at the first among other Nations, that when the multitude of them was so increased, that the Countrey was not able to sustayne and finde them, by commaundement of their Princes, they shoulde chose out by lottes a number of yong and able personages, fitte for the warres, which should go forth to seeke them newe habitations: and so it chaunced to these, that they came into great Britaine, and promised to serue the king for wages in his warres. But by what meane soeuer they came hither, truth is, that Hengistus being a man of great wit, rare policie, and high wisdome, was their Captaine, who vnderstanding this Kings minde, which now wholy trusted to the valiancie of the Saxons, and herewith perceiuing the fruitfulnesse of the Countrey, streight wayes began to consider with himselfe, by what wyles and craft he might by little and little settle here, and obtaine a kingdome in the Ile, and to establish the same to him and to his for euer.

Therefore first he indeuoured with all speede possible to fence that part of the Countrey which was giuen to him and his people, and to enlarge and furnish it with garisons appointed in places most conuenient.

Polidor.

After this he did what he could to perswade the king, that a great power of men might be brought ouer out of Germanie, that ỹ land being fortified with such a strength, the enimies might be put in feare, and his subiects holden in rest.

The King not foreseeing the happe that was to come, did not despise this counsell contrined to the destruction of his Kingdome, and so was more ayde sent for into Germanie: whereupon now at this seconde tyme there arriued here. xvj. vessels fraught with people, and at the same time came the Ladie Rowen or Ronix, daughter to Hengyst, a Mayde of excellent beautie and comelynesse able to delite the eyes of them that shoulde behold hir, and specially to win the heart of Uortigerne with the dart of concupiscence, whereunto he was of nature much inclyned, and that did Hengest well perceyue.

VVil. Mal. 18. Foysts plates saye the Scottish wryters, and M. men in fame.

The Saxons call these vessels Ceoles, and Keeles, and old hystories Cogiones.

There came ouer into thys lande at that tyme and sone after, three manner of people of the Germaine Nation, as Saxons, Vitæ (or Iutes,) Jutes, and Angles, ouer the whiche the sayde Hengist and Horsa beeing brethren, were Captaines and rulers, men of right noble parentage in theyr Countrey, as discended of that auncient Prince Woden, of whom the English Saxon kings doe for the more part fetche theyr pedegree, as lineally discended from him, vnto whom also the English people (falsely reputing him for a God) consecrated the fourth day of the weeke, as they did the firth to his wyfe Frea, so that the same dayes tooke name of them, the one beeing called Wodensday, and the other Freaday, which wordes after in continuance of time by corruption of speech were somewhat altred, though not much, as from Wodensday, to Wednesday, and from Freaday to Fryday.

The forsayde Woden was father to Wecta, father to Wetgilus, that was father to the forsayd Hengistus and Horsus.

But nowe to rehearse further touching those three people whiche at this time came ouer into Brytayne oute of Germanie of the Vites, or Jutes, (as Beda recordeth) are the Kentishmen discended, and the people of the Ile of Wight, with those also that inhabite ouer agaynste the same Ile.

Of the Saxons, came the East Saxons, the South Saxons, and West Saxons.

Moreouer, of the Angles proceeded the East Angles, the middle Angles, or Mercies, and the Northren men.

That these Angles were a people of Germanie, it appeareth also by Cornelius Tacitus, who calling them Angly, which worde is of three sillables, (as Polidore sayth:) But some write it Angli, with two sillables.

And that these Angli, or Angly were of no small force and authoritie in Germanie before their comming into this lande, may appeare in that they are numbred amongest the twelue nations there, whiche had lawes and auncient ordinaunces a part by them selues, according to the whiche the state of theyr common wealth was gouerned, they beeing the same, and one people with the Thorningers, as in the tytle of the olde Thuringers lawes wee finde recorded, whiche is thus, Lex Anglorum & VVerinorum, hoc est, Thuringorum. The law of the Angles and VVerinians (that is to witte the Thuringers, whiche Thuringers are a people in Saxonie, as in the description of that Countrey it may appeare) is this.

But nowe to the matter. Hengist perceyuing that his people were highly in Mortigernes fauour, beganne to handle him craftily, deuysing by what meanes hee might bring him in loue with his daughter Rowr, or Rowen, or Ronowen (as some write) which he beleeued wel would easily be brought to passe, bycause he vnderstoode that the King was much giuen to sensuall lust, which is the thing that often blindeth wise mens vnderstanding, and maketh them to dote, and to lose theyr perfite wittes, yea, and oftentymes bringeth them to destruction, though by suche pleasant poyson, as they feele no bytter taste tyll they be brought to the extreeme poynt of confusion in deede. VVil. Malm.

A greate Supper therefore was prepared by Hengist, at the whiche it pleased the King to be present.

Hengist appoynted his daughter when euerie man beganne to bee somewhat merrie wyth drinke, to bring in a Cuppe of Golde full of good and pleasant wine, and to present it to the King saying, Vvassail. Which shee did in such comely and decent maner, as she that knewe howe to doe it well ynough, so as the King marueyled greatlye thereat, and not vnderstanding what shee ment by that salutation, demaunded what it signified. To whom it was aunswered by Hengist, that she wished him well, and the meaning of it was, that he should drinke after hir, ioyning thervnto this answere, drinke haile. Whereupon the king (as he was enformed) tooke the cuppe at the Damsels hand, and dranke. Gal. Mon. Wassail, what it signifieth.

Finally this yong Ladie behaued hirselfe with such pleasant wordes, comely countenaunce, and amiable grace, that the king beholde hir so long, till he felt himselfe so farre in loue with hir person, that he burned in continuall desyre to enioy the same: insomuch that shortly after he forsooke his owne wife, by the which he had three sonnes, named Mortimerus, Catagrinus, and Pascentius, and requyred of Hengist to haue his daughter, the sayde Rowen, or Ronowen in mariage. Polidor. Fabian.

Hengist at the firste seemed straunge to graunt to his request, and excused the matter, for that his daughter was not of estate and dignitie meete to be matched with his maiestie. But at length as it had beene halfe against his will hee consented, and so the mariage was concluded and solemnized, all Kent beeing assigned vnto Hengist in rewarde, the whiche Countrey was before that tyme gouerned by one Guorongus, (though not with most equall iustice) which Guorongus was subiect vnto Mortigerne, as all other the Potentates of the Ile were. VVil. Malm.

This maryage and liberalitie of the King towardes the Straungers, muche offended the myndes of his subiectes, and hastened the finall destruction of the lande. For the Saxons nowe vnderstanding the affynitie had betwixte the King and Hengist, came so fast ouer to inhabite here, that it was wonder to consider in howe shorte a tyme suche a multitude coulde come togyther: so that bycause of theyr greate number and approued puiſſaunce in warres, they began to be a terrour to the former inhabitants the Brytaynes.

Wil. Malm. But Hengiſt being no leſſe politike in counſaile than valiaunt in armes, abuſing the kings lacke of diſcretion, to ſerue his owne turne, perſwaded him to call out of Germanie his brother Occa and his ſonne named Ebuſa, beeing men of great valure, to the ende, that as Hengiſt defended the lande in the South parte: ſo mighte they keepe backe the Scottes in the North.

Gal. ſayth he was Hengiſts ſonne, and Ebuſa his vncles ſonne. Occa and Ebuſa leaders of Saxons.

Herevpon by the Kings conſent, they came with a power out of Germanie, and coaſting aboute the lande, they ſayled to the Iles of Orkney, and ſore vexed the people there, and likewyſe the Scottes and Pictes alſo, and finally arriued in the North partes of the Realme, nowe called Northumberlande, where they ſetled themſelues at that preſent, and ſo continued there euer after: but none of them taking vppon him the tytle of King, till about.99. yeares after their firſt comming into that Countrey, but in the meane time remayning as ſubiects vnto the Saxon kings of Kent.

Wil. Malm. de Regib.

After their arryuall in that Prouince, they oftentymes fought with the olde Inhabitaunts there, and ouercame them, chaſing away ſuch as made reſiſtance, and appeaſed the reſidue by receyuing them vnder allegiance.

Fabian. The great nũbers of ſtraungers ſuſpected to the Brytaynes.

When the Nobles of Brytayne ſaw and perceyued in what daunger the lande ſtode, by the dayly repayre of the huge number of Saxons into the ſame, they firſt conſulted togither, and after reſorting to the King, mooued him that ſome order might be taken for the auoyding of them, or the more part of them, leaſte they ſhoulde with their power and great multitude vtterly oppreſſe the Britiſh Nation. But all was in vayne, for Wortigerne ſo eſteemed and highly fauoured the Saxons, and namely by reaſon of the great loue which he bare to his wife, that hee lyttle regarded his owne Nation, no nor yet anye thing eſteemed hys owne naturall kinneſmen and chiefe friendes, by reaſon wherof the Brytains in fine deprsiued him of all kingly honor, after that he had raigned.xbj. yeares, and in his ſtead crowned his ſonne Wortimer.

Vortiger depriued.

Gildas and Beda make no mention of Wortimer, but declare howe after that the Saxons were receyued into thys lande, there was a couenaunt made betwixte them and the Brytaynes, that the Saxons ſhoulde defende the Countrey from the inuaſion of enimyes by their Knightly force: and that in conſideration thereof, the Brytaynes ſhould finde them prouiſion of victayles: wherewith they helde them contented for a time.

Gildas. Beda. H. Hunt.

But afterwardes they beganne to pyke quarelles, as thoughe they were not ſufficiently furniſhed of their due proportion of victayles, threatening that if they were not prouided more largely thereof, they would ſurely ſpoyle the Countrey.

And without deferring time, they performed their wordes with effect of deedes, beginning in the Eaſt part of the Ile, and with fire & ſword paſſed forth waſting and deſtroying the Countrey tyll they came to the vttermoſte parte of the Weſt: ſo that from Sea to Sea, the lande was waſted and deſtroyed in ſuche cruell and outragious manner, that neyther Citie, towne, nor Churche was regarded, but all committed to the fyre: the Prieſtes ſlaine and murthered euen afore the Aulters, and the Prelates with the people without any reuerence of their eſtate or degree degree, diſpatched with fire and ſworde, moſt lamentably to beholde.

Many of the Brytaynes ſeeing the demeanour of the Saxons, fledde to the Mountaynes, of the whiche dyuerſe beeing apprehended, were cruelly ſlaine, and other were glad to come forth and yeelde themſelues to eternall bondage, for to haue reliefe of meate and drinke to aſſwage theyr extremitie of hunger.

Some other got them out of the realme into ſtraunge landes, ſo to ſaue themſelues, and others abyding ſtill in theyr Countrey, kept them within the thicke Woodes, and craggie Rockes, whether they were fledde, lyuing there a more wretched lyfe, in great feare and vnquietneſſe of mynde.

But after that the Saxons were departed and withdrawne to theyr houſes, the Brytaynes began to take courage to thē againe, iſſuing forth of thoſe places where they had lyen hid, and with one conſent calling for ayde at Gods hande, that they might bee preſerued from vtter deſtruction, they beganne vnder the conduict of theyr leader Aurelius Ambroſe, to prouoke the Saxons to battaile, and by the helpe of God they obteyned the victorie, according to theyr owne deſyres. And from thence forth, one while the Brytaynes, and an other while the Saxons were victors, ſo that in this Brytiſh people, God (according to hys accuſtomed maner) as it were preſent Iſraell, tryed them from tyme to tyme, whether they loued him or no, vnto the yeare of the ſiege of Badon hill, where afterwardes no ſmall ſlaughter was made of the enimies: whiche chaunced the ſame yeare in the whiche Gildas was borne, (as he himſelfe witneſſeth, being aboute the .xliij. yeare after the comming of the Saxons into Brytaine.

Thus hath Gildas and alſo Beda (following by likelyhode the authoritie of the ſame Gildas) written of theſe firſt warres begonne betweene the Saxons and Brytains.

But nowe to goe forth with the Hyſtorie: according to the order of oure Chronicles, thus wee finde recorded touching the doings of Vortimer that was elected King (as yee haue hearde) to gouerne in place of his father Vortigerne.

Vortimer.

Vortimer.

This Vortimer being eldeſt ſon to Vortigern, by the common aſſent of the Brytaines was made K. of Brytayne, in the yeare of our Lorde 464. which was in the fourth yeare of the Emperour Leo the fifth, and about the ſixth yeare of Childericus King of Fraunce, as our common account runneth, which is farre diſagreeing from that whereof William Harriſon doth ſpeake in his Chronologie, who noteth Vortigerne to be depoſed in the .viij. after his exaltation to the crowne, 454. of Chriſt, and .5. currant after the comming of the Saxons, which concurreth with the .4420. of the worlde, .8. of Heroueus, as by his Chronologie doth more at large appeare.

Fabian. Galf. Mon.

Math. Weſt. hath 454. 464.

But to proceed, Vortimer being thus aduanced to the gouernment of the realme, in all haſt made forth warre againſt the Saxons, & gaue vnto them a great battel vpon the riuer of Derwēt, where he had of thē the vpper hand: And the ſecōd time he fought with them at a place called Epiforde, or Aglisthorp, in which encoūter Catagrine or Catigernus the brother of Uortimer, and Horſus the brother of Hengiſt, after long combate betwixt them two, either of them ſlue other:

But the Brytaynes obteyned the fielde (as ſayth the Britiſh hyſtorie.) The thirde battail Uortimer fought with them neare to the ſea ſide, where alſo the Brytaynes chaſed the Saxons, & droue them into the Ile of Tenet.

The Ile of Tenet.

The fourth battaile was ſtryken neare to a Moore called Colemoore, the whiche was ſore fought by the Saxons, and long continued with great daunger to the Brytayns, bycauſe that the foreſayde Moore encloſed a part of their hoſt ſo ſtrongly, that the Brytaynes could not approch to them, being beaten off with the enimies ſhot, albeit in the ende the Saxons were put to flight, and many of them drowned and ſwalowed vp in the ſame Moore.

H. Hunt. Colemoore.

Beſide theſe foure principall battailes, Uortimer had diuerſe other conflictes with the Saxons, as in Kent and at Tetford in Norffolk, alſo neare to Colcheſter in Eſſex: for he left not till he had bereft them the more part of all ſuch poſſeſſions as before time they had got, ſo that they were conſtrayned to keepe them within the Ile of Tenet, where he oftentymes aſſayled them with ſuch ſhippes as he then had.

Fabian. Tetford in Norffolke. Colcheſter.

When Ronowen the daughter of Hengiſt perceyued the great loſſe that the Saxons ſuſtreyned by the martiall prowes of Uortimer, ſhee found meanes that within a while the ſayd Uortimer was poyſoned, after he had ruled the Brytayns by the ſpace of ſixe or ſeuen yeres and odde Moncthes, (as William Har. reporteth.)

By the Britiſh Hyſtorie it ſhould ſeeme that Uortimer before his death handled the Saxons ſo hardly, keeping them beſieged within the Ile of Tenet, till at length they were conſtrayned to ſue for licence to depart home into Germanie in ſafetie: and the better to bring this to paſſe, they ſent Uortigerne (whome they had kept ſtyll with them in all theſe battayles) vnto his ſonne Uortimer, to be a meane for the obteining of their ſute. But whileſt this treatie was in hande, they got them into theyr ſhippes, and leauing theyr wyues and children behinde them, returned into Germanie. Thus farre Gal. Mon.

But howe vnlikely this is to be true, I will not make any further diſcourſe, but onely referre euery man to that whiche in olde autentique Hyſtoriographers of the Engliſhe Nation is found recorded, as in William Malmeſ. Henrie Hunt. Marianus, and others. Vnto whome in theſe matters concerning the doings betwixt the Saxons and Brytaynes, we may vndoubtedly ſafely giue moſt credite.

William Malmeſ. wryting of this Uortimer, or Guortigerne, and of the warres whith he made againſt the Saxons, varyeth in a maner altogither from Geffrey of Monmouth, as by his wordes here following ye may perceyue. Will. Malm.

Guortimer, the ſonne of Uortimer (ſayth he) thinking not good long to diſſemble the matter, for that he ſawe himſelfe and his Countreymen the Brytayns preuented by the craft of the Engliſhe Saxons, ſetteth his full purpoſe to dryue them out of the Realme, and kyndleth his father to the like attempt.

He being therefore the Authour and procurer, ſeuen yeares after their firſt comming into thys land, the league was broken, and by the ſpace of xx. yeres they fought oftentymes togither in many light encounters, but foure times they fought puiſſance againſte puiſſaunce in open fielde: in the firſt battayle they departed with like fortune, whileſt the one part, that is to meane, the Saxons, loſt their Captain Horſ that was brother to Hengiſt, and the Brytaynes loſt Categerne, an other of Uortigernes ſonnes.

Hengiſt had the victorie this battaile ſayth Ra. Hig. 458

Horſ and Categerne ſlayn

In the other battails, when the Engliſhmen went euer away with the vpper hand, at length a peace was concluded, Guortimer being taken out of this worlde by courſe of fatall death, the which muche differing from the ſofte and milde nature of his father, right nobly would haue gouerned the realme, if God had ſuffred him to haue liued.

But theſe battailes which Uortimer gaue to the Saxons (as before is mentioned) ſhould appeare by that which ſome writers haue recorded, to haue chaũced before the ſuppoſed time of Uortimers or Guortimers attayning to the crowne, about the ſixt or ſeuenth yeare after the firſt comming of the Saxons into this realme with Hengiſt. And hereunto William Harilon giueth his conſent alſo in his Chronologie, referring the mutuall ſlaughter of Horſus and Catigerne, to the ſixth yeare of Martianus, and. 455. of Chriſt.

the

the Engliſh Saxons, of whom there was a great number as then in the Ile, comming ouer dayly like ſwarmes of Bees, and hauing in poſſeſſion not onely Kent, but alſo the Northy partes of the Realme towardes Scotlande, togither with a great part of the weſt Countrey, thought it now a fit tyme to attempt the fortune of warre: and firſt therfore concluding a league with the Scots and Picts, vpon the ſodaine they turne their weapon poynts agaynſt the Brytaines, and moſte cruelly purſue them, as though they had receyued ſome great iniurie at their handes, and no benefit at all. The Brytaynes were marueylouſly abaſhed herewith, perceyuing that they ſhoulde haue to do with Hengiſt, a captain of ſo high renowm, and alſo with their auncient enimies the Scottes and Picts, thus all at one time, and that there was no remedie but eyther they muſt fight or elſe become ſlaues. Wherfore at length dread of bondage ſtyred vp manhod in them, ſo that they aſſembled togither, and boldly began to reſiſt theyr enimies on eche ſide: but beeing too weake, they were eaſily diſcomfited and put to flight, ſo that all hope of defence by force of armes being vtterly taken awaye, as menne in diſpayre to preuaile agaynſt theyr enmyes, they fled as ſheepe ſcat-tered abroade, ſome following one Captaine and ſome another, getting them into deſart places, woodes, and marriſh groundes, and moreouer left ſuch townes and fortreſſes as were of no notable ſtrength, as a pray vnto their enimies.

Thus hath Polidore Virgile of the firſt breaking of the warres betwixt the Saxons and Britayns, which chaunced not (as ſhould appeare by that which he writeth therof,) till after the death of Vortigerne. Howbeit he denieth not ỹ Hengiſt at his firſt comming got ſeates for him and hys people within the Country of Kent, and there began to inhabite.

This ought not to bee forgotten, that king Vortimer (as Sigebertus hath written) reſtored the chriſtian religion after he had banquiſhed the Saxons, in ſuch places where the ſame was decayed by the enimies inuaſion.

Vortigerne the ſeconde time.

THen was Vortigerne agayne reſtored to the Kingdome of Brytayne, in the yeare of our Lorde. 471.

All the tyme of his ſonnes raigne, he had remayned in the partyes nowe called Wales, where (as ſome wryte) in that meane tyme hee buylded a ſtrong Caſtell called Generon, or Guaneren, in the Weſt ſide of Wales neare to the ryuer of Guana, vpon a Mountayne called Cloaricus, which ſome referre to be buylded in his ſecond returne into Wales, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter. And it is ſo much the more likely, for that an olde Chronicle, which Fabian had ſight of, affyrmeth, that Vortigerne was kept vnder the rule of certayne Gouernours to hym appointed in the towne of Caerlegion, and behaued himſelfe in ſuch commendable ſort towardes his ſonne in ayding him with his counſail, and otherwiſe, in the meane ſeaſon whileſt his ſonne raigned, that the Brytayns by reaſon therof began ſo to fauour him, that after the death of Vortimer they made him againe king.

Caerleon Arwiske.

Shortly after that Vortigerne was reſtored to the rule of the Kingdome, Hengiſt aduertiſed thereof, returned into the lande with a mightye armie of Saxons, whereof Vortigerne being aduertiſed, aſſembled his Brytaines, and with all ſpeede made towardes him.

4000. hath Math. Weſt. He might eaſily returne, for except I be deceyued he was neuer driuen out after he had once got foot within this Ile.

When Hengiſt had knowledge of the huge hoſt of the Brytains that was comming againſt him, he required to come to a cõmunication with Vortigerne, which requeſt was graunted, ſo that it was concluded, that on May day a certain nũber of Britains, & as many of the Saxons ſhould meete togither vpon the plaine of Salisburie.

Hengist hauing deuised a newe kind of treason, when the daye of theyr appoynted meeting was come, caused euery one of his allowed number secretely to put into his Hose a long knyfe (where it was ordeined that no man should bring any weapon with him at all) and that at the verie instant when this watchworde shoulde be vttered by him, Nempt your sexes, then should euery of them plucke out his knife, and slea the Brytayne that chaunced to be next to him, except the same shoulde bee Vortigerne, whom he willed to be apprehended, but not slaine.

Nempt your sexes, what if it were meises.

At the day assigned, the king with his appointed number of Brytaynes, nothing mistrusting lesse than any such maner of vnkaythfull dealing, came to the place in order before prescribed, without armour or weapon, where hee founde readie Hengist with his Saxons, the whiche receyued the king with amiable countenance, in moste louing sort: but after they were entred a little into communication, Hengist meaning to accomplish hys deuysed purpose, gaue the watchworde, immediately whereupon the Saxons drewe oute theyr knyues, and sodainly fell on the Brytayns, and slue them as sheepe being fallen within the daunger of wolues.

There died the nobles Brytaine, as Gal. hath.

For the Brytaines had no weapons to defend themselues, except any of them by his strength & manhood got the knife of his enimie.

Amongst other of the Brytaynes, there was one Edol Earle of Gloucester, or (as other haue) Chester, which got a stake out of an hedge, or else where, and with the same so defended himselfe and layde aboute him, that he slue. xvij. of the Saxons, and escaped to the Towne of Ambrie, nowe called Salesburie, and so saued his owne lyfe.

Ran. Cestren. Fabian.

Gal. hath. Math. West. Ran. Cestren.

Vortiger was taken and kept as prisoner by Hengist, till he was constrayned to delyuer vnto Hengist three Prouinces or Countreys of thys Realme, that is to witte, Kent, and Esser, or as some write, that parte where the south Saxons after did inhabite, as Sussex and other: the thirde was the Countrey where the Eastangles planted themselues, whiche was in Norffolke, and Suffolke.

Then Hengist being in possession of those three Prouinces, suffred Vortigerne to depart, and to to be at his libertie.

William Malmesb. writeth somewhat otherwise of this taking of Vortigerne, during whose raigne, after the decease of his sonne Vortimer, nothing (as should appeare by that which the same Malmesb. writeth) was attempted agaynst the Saxons, but in the meane tyme (sayeth hee) Hengist according to the default of mannes nature, whiche the more he hath the more hee desyreth, by a colourable craft procureth his sonne in lawe Vortigerne to come to a banket to his house, wyth three hundred other Brytaynes, and when hee had made them well and warme with often quaffing and emptying of Cuppes, and of purpose touched euerye of them wyth one bytter taunte or other, they first fell to multiplying of malicious wordes, and after to blowes, so that the Brytaynes were slaine euery mothers sonne, so yeelding vp their ghostes euen amongst their pottes.

Vvil. Malm.

The King himselfe was taken, and to redeeme himselfe out of prison, gaue to the Saxons three Prouinces, and so escaped oute of bondage.

Thus by what meane soeuer it came to passe, truth it is (as all writers agree) that Hengist got possession of Kent, and of other Countreys in this Realme, and beganne to raigne there as absolute Lorde and Gouernour in the yeare of oure Lorde (as some write,) 476. aboute

the fifth yeare of Wortigerns laſt raigne: but after other which take the begynning of this kingdome of Kent, to be when Hengiſt had firſt gyft thereof, the ſame Kingdome begane in the yeare.455.

This Kingdome or Lordſhip of Kent conteyned the countrey that ſtretcheth from the Eaſt Ocean, vnto the ryuer of Thames, hauing on the Southeaſt Southerie, and vpon the Weſt London, vppon the Northeaſt the Ryuer of Thames afore ſayde, and the Countrey of Eſſex.

Hengiſt and all other the Saxon kings which ruled (as after ſhall appeare) in.vij. partes of this Realme, are called by writers Reguli, that is to ſay, little kings or rulers of ſome ſmal dominion: ſo that Hengiſt is accounted as a little king. And when he had got into his handes the foreſayde three Prouinces, he cauſed more number of Saxons to come into Britayne, and beſtowed them in places abroade in the Countrey, by reaſon whereof, the Chriſtian Religion greatlye decayed within the lande: for the Saxons being Pagans, did what they coulde to extinguiſh the fayth of Chriſt, and to plant againe in all places theyr heatheniſh Religion, and worſhipping of falſe Goddes: and not onely hereby was the true fayth of the Chriſtians brought in daunger dayly to decay, but alſo the erronious opinion of the Pelagians greatly preuayled here amongeſt the Britaynes, by meanes of ſuche vnſounde Preachers, as in that troubleſome ſeaſon did ſet forth erronious doctrine amongſt the people, without all maner of reprehenſion.

Certayne yeares before the comming of the Saxons, that hereſie began to ſpreade within this land very much, by the lewde induſtrie of one Leporius Africola, the ſonne of Seuerus Sulpitius (as Bale ſayth) a Biſhop of that lore. But Pelagius the author of this hereſie was borne in Wales, and held opinion that a man might obteyne ſaluation by his owne free wil & merit, & without aſſiſtance of grace, as he that was borne without originall ſinne. &c. Beda.

This erronious doctrine being taught therfore, & mainteyned in this troubleſome time of warres with the Saxons, ſore diſquieted the godly minded men amongeſt the Britaines, the which not meaning to receyue it, nor yet able wel to confute the craftie and wicked perſwaſions vſed by the profeſſors therof, thought good to ſend ouer into Gallia, requiring of the Biſhops there, that ſome godly & profound learned men might be ſent from thence into this lande, to defende the cauſe of the true doctrine againſt the naughtie teachers of ſo blaſphemous an error. Wherupon the Biſhops of Gallia ſore lamenting the miſerable ſtate of the Britains, & deſirous to relieue their preſent neede, ſpecially in that caſe of religion, called a Sinode, Beda. A Sinode called in Gallia.

and therin taking counſail to conſider, who were moſt meeteſt to be ſent, it was decreed by al their conſents in the ende, that one Germaine the Biſhop of Iuxerre, and Lupus Biſhop of Troyes ſhould paſſe ouer into Britayne to confirme the Chriſtians there in the fayth of the celeſtial grace. And ſo thoſe two vertuous learned men taking their iourney, finally arriued in Britayn, though not without ſome daunger by ſea, through ſtormes and rage of windes, ſtyred (as hath beene thought) of the ſuperſtitious, by the malice of wicked ſpirites, who purpoſed to haue hindered theyr proceeding in this theyr good and well purpoſed iourney.

After they were come ouer, they did ſo much what with confuincing the wicked argumunts of the aduerſaries of the truth, by the inuincible power of the worde of God, and holyneſſe of lyfe, that thoſe whiche were out of the right way, were ſone brought into the right path againe.

About the ſame time alſo, one Palladius was ſent from Celeſtinus Biſhop of Rome, vnto the Scottes, to inſtruct them in the fayth of Chriſt, and to purge them from the Hereſie of the ſayde Pelagius. Beda. Palladius.

This Paladius exhorted Conſtantinus the king of Scottes, that in no wiſe he ſhoulde ayde the Saxons beeing infidelles agaynſt the Brytaines: and his exhortation toke ſo good effect, that the ſayd Conſtantinus did not only forbeare to aſſyſt the Saxons, but contrarily holpe the Brytaynes in theyr warres agaynſt them, the which thing did mainteyne the ſtate of the Brytaynes for a tyme from falling into vtter ruine and decay. Conſtantine king of Scots.

In the meane time, the Saxons renued their league with the Pictes, ſo that their powers being ioyned togither, they beginne a freſh to make fore warres vpon the Brytaynes, the which of neceſſitie were conſtrayned to aſſemble an armie, and miſtruſting their owne ſtrength, required ayde of the two Biſhops, Germaine and Lupus. The which haſting forwarde with all ſpeede came into the army, bringing with them no ſmall hope of good lucke to all the Brytaynes there beeing aſſembled. H. Hunt. Beda.

This was done in Lent, and ſuch was the diligence of the Biſhops, that (the people being inſtructed with continuall preaching) in renouncing the erroꝛ of the Pelagians, earneſtly came by troupes to receyue the grace of God offered in baptiſme, ſo that on Eaſter day which then enſued, the more part of the army was baptiſed, and ſo went forth againſt the enimies, the which hearing thereof, made haſt towards the Brytaynes, in hope to ouercome them at pleaſure. But theyr approche being knowne, Byſhoppe Germaine taketh vpon him the leading of the Brytiſh hoſt, and ouer agaynſt the paſſage throughe the which the enimies were appoynted to come, he choſe forth a valley encloſed with high Mountaynes, and within the ſame he placeth his newe waſhen armie. The armie of the Brytaines newly chriſtened.

And when he ſaw the enimies now at hande, he commaunded that euery man with one generall voyce ſhoulde aunſwere him, crying alowde the ſame crie that he ſhould begin.

And euen as the enimies were readie to giue the charge vpon the Brytaynes, ſuppoſing that they ſhould haue taken them at vnwares, and before any warning had beene giuen, ſodainly Biſhop Germaine and the Prieſtes, with a lowde and ſhrill voyce cryed Alleluia thrice: and therewith all the multitude of the Brytaynes wyth whole voyce cryed the ſame crie, with ſuch a lowd ſteauen, that the Saxons were ſo therewith amaſed and aſtonyed, (the echo from the rocks and hilles adioyning, redoubling in ſuche wiſe the crie,) that they thought that not onely the rockes and clyfes had fallen vpon them, but that euen the ſkie it ſelfe had broken in peeces and come tumbling downe vpon their heades: herewith therefore throwing away their weapons, they toke them to their feete, that glad was he that might get to be formoſt in running awaye. Many of them for haſt were drowned in a Riuer whiche they had to paſſe. Polidore taketh that Riuer to be Trent. Alleluia.

The Brytayns hauing thus banquiſhed their enimies, gathered the ſpoyle at good leyſure, and gaue God thanks for the victorie thus got without bloud, for the which the holy biſhops alſo triumphed as beſt became them. And after they had ſetled all things in good quiet within the Ile, as was thought expedient, they returned into Gallia or France, frō whence they came (as is before reherſed.) By one author it ſhould appeare that this battell was wonne againſt the Scots and Picts Mat. VV.

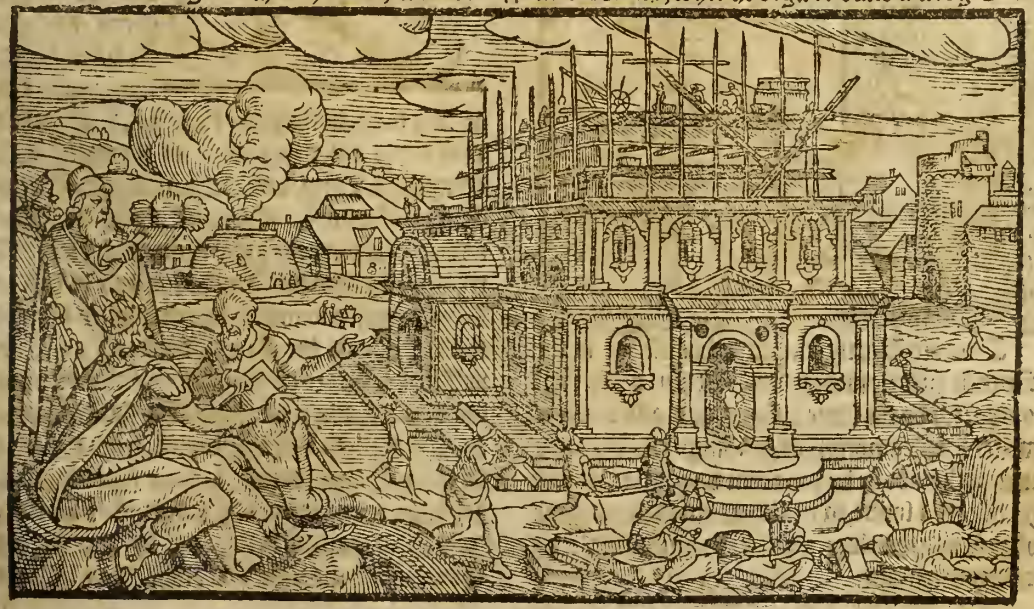
about the yeare of our Lord. 448. a little before ẏ comming of the Saxons into this lande vnder Hengiſt, whereto William Harriſon accordeth, in which yeare S. Germane firſte came hither to weede out the hereſie of Pelagius, as by the ſame author more at large is affirmed. Howbeit, William Harriſon in his Chronologie out of Proſper, & other writers of time, noteth ẏ firſt cõming of Germanus in the. 429. of Chriſt, and vnder ẏ Conſulſhip of Florentius and Dioniſius: & thys ſhoulde ſeeme to agree with the trouth, for that after ſome, ẏ foreſaid Germane ſhould dye at Rauenna about the yeare of our Lord. 450. as Vincentius noteth, whiche was the very yeare of the comming of the Saxons: notwithſtanding whẽ, or whereſoeuer he dyed, it was not long after hys returne into Gallia, vpon his firſt iourney made hither into this land, & obteyning of ẏ victory before mentioned, but ẏ word was brought againe vnto him, that eſtſoones the hereſie of the Pelagians was ſpred abrode in Britayne, & therefore al the Prieſts or Cleargie made requeſt to him ẏ it might ſtande with his pleaſure to come ouer againe, and defend the cauſe of true Religion whiche he had before confirmed. Hereupon Biſhop German granteth ſo to do, and therefore taking with him one Seuerus (that was diſciple vnto Lupus, & ordeyned at ẏ tyme Biſhop of Tryer) he toke the Sea, and came againe into Britaine, where he founde the multitude of the people ſtedfaſt in the ſame beliefe wherein he had left them, & perceyued the fault to reſt in a fewe: whereupon enquiring out the authors, he condemneth them to exile (as it is written) and with a manifeſt miracle by reſtoring a yong man that was lame (as they ſay) vnto the right vſe of his limmes, he confirmeth his doctrine. Then followeth preaching to perſwade amendmente of errors, and by the generall conſente of all men, the authors of the wicked doctrine being baniſhed the land, were deliuered vnto Biſhop Germane and to his fellowe Seuerus, to conuey them forth in their company vnto the parties of beyond the Sea, that the Region might ſo be deliuered of further daunger, and they receyue the benefite of due amendmente.



By this meanes it came to paſſe, that the true faith continued in Britayne ſounde and perfect a long time after. And thus things beeing ſet in good order, thoſe holy men returned into theyr countreys. And ſo after this ſeconde time of hys being here, the forenamed Biſhop German went to Rauenna for to ſew for peace to bee graunted vnto the people of Armorike Britayne, and there being receyued of the Emperour Valentinian, & his mother Placida in moſt reuerend manner, he departed in that Citie out of this tranſitory life, to the eternall ioyes of heauen. His body was afterwardes conueyed vnto the Citie of Auxerre, where he had bin Biſhop with great opinion of holineſſe for his ſincere doctrine and pure and innocent life. Shortly after was the Emperoure Valentinian ſlayne by the friendes of that noble man named Aetius, whom he had before cauſed to be put to death. By this it may appeare, that Biſhop German came into this Realm both the firſt and ſeconde time, whileſt as well Hengiſt, as alſo Vortigerne were liuing: for the ſayde Valentinian was murthered about ẏ yeare of our Lord 454, where the ſayde Kings liued & reigned long after that time, as may appeare both before & after in this preſent booke. To returne then to Vortigerne. We find in the Britiſh hiſtorie, that after the Saxons had conſtreyned him to delyuer into their handes a greate parte of the ſouth & eaſt partes of the Realme, ſo that they had in poſſeſſion London, Yorke, Lincolne, & Wincheſter, & other Cities & townes, he not only fearing theyr puiſſãce, but alſo ẏ returne of Aurelius Ambroſius, & his brother Vtherpẽdragon, withdrew him into Wales, wher he begã to build a ſtrõg Caſtel vpon a Mountayne called Breigh, or after other Cloaric, neere to the riuer of Guana, whiche is in the Weſt ſide of Wales in a place within the compaſſe of the ſame hill called Generon or Gueyneren. Of the building of this Caſtell, and of the hinderance in erecting the ſame, with the monſtrous birth of Merlin and his knowlege in prophelying, the Britiſhe hiſtories tell a long proceſſe, the whiche in Caxton, and in Galfrides bookes is alſo ſet forthe, as there yee may ſee: but for that the ſame ſeemeth not of ſuche credite as deſerueth to be regiſtred in any ſound hiſtorie, we haue with ſilence paſſed it ouer. Whileſt Vortigerne was buſied in building of this Caſtel, the two forſayde brethren Aurelius and Uter prepared a nauie of Shippes, and an army of men, by helpe of ſuche their kinſmen and friendes as they founde in Armorike Britayne, and ſo paſſed the Sea, and landed at Totneſſe: whereof when the Britaynes were aduertiſed, the which were ſcattered abrode and ſeuered in diuers parties & countreys, they drewe vnto the ſayde two brethren with all ſpeede that might be. When Aurelius and his brother Uter perceyued that they were ſufficiently furniſhed of people, they marched forth towardes Wales againſt Vortigerne, the which hauing knowledge of their approche, had fortifyed his Caſtell right ſtrongly with men, munition and victayles, but yet all that nothing auayled him, for in the ende after his enimies had gyuen diuers aſſaultes to the ſayde Caſtell, they found meanes with wilde fire to brenne it downe to the earth, and ſo conſumed it by fire togither with the King, and all other that were within it.

Mount Erir he calleth it in one place of his booke.

Aurelius and Uter brethren returne into Britayne.

Vortigerne brent to death

Wilde fire not yet inuented as ſome think

Thus did Vortigerne ende his life (as in the Britiſh hiſtorie is recorded.) Of him much euill is reported by the ſame hiſtorie, and alſo by other writers, and amongſt other things it is written, that he ſhoulde lie by his owne daughter, and of hir begote a ſonne, in truſt that kings ſhuld come of him, and therefore was he excommunicate by Saint Germane.

Polychron. A fayned tale of S. Germa.

It is alſo ſayde, that when the ſame Sainte Germane came into Britayne (as before ye haue heard) this Vortigerne on a time ſhoulde denie the ſame Saint Germane harbourrowe: but one that kept the Kings heardes of Cattell receyued him into his houſe, and lodged him, and ſlewe a Calfe for his ſupper, the which Calfe (after ſupper was ended) Sainte Germane reſtored againe to life: and on the morrow by the ordinance of God, hee cauſed Vortigerne to bee depoſed from hys Kingly eſtate, and toke the heardman and made him King.

A calfiſhe ora- ration.

But Ranulfus Higden in his booke entitled Polychronicon, alledging Gildas for his author, ſayth, that this chaunced to a king that ruled in Powſey, whoſe name was Buly, and not to Vortigerne: ſo that the ſucceſſours of that Buly reigning in that ſide of Wales, came of the lignage of the ſame herdman. Moreouer it hath bin ſayd as one writer recordeth, that when Vortigerne refuſed to heare the preaching of S. German, & fled from him as he followed to haue inſtructed him, one night there fell fyre from heauē vpon the caſtel wherin the king was lodged, and ſo the king being deſtroyed with the fall of the houſe and the fyre togyther, was neuer after ſeene. But theſe are fables, and therfore I paſſe them ouer, hoping that it ſhall ſuffiſe to ſhewe here with what ſtuffe our olde hiſtoriographers haue farced vp their huge volumes.

Aurelius Ambroſius.

Aurelius Ambroſius

AVrelius Ambroſius, ye ſecond ſon of king Conſtantine, & brother to Conſtātius, murthered by the treaſon of Vortigerne (as before ye haue heard) was made king of Brytons, in the yere of our Lord. 481. which was about the thirde yeare of the reigne of the Emperour Zeno, and the xxiij. of Childericus, King of Fraunce. Odocer King of the Heruli as then vſurping the gouernement of Italy. After that this Aurelius Ambroſius had diſpatched Vortigerne, and was nowe eſtabliſhed Kyng of the Britaynes, hee made towardes Yorke, and paſſing the Riuer of Humber, encountred with the Saxons at a place called Maelbell, and ouerthrewe them in a ſtrong battell, from the which as Hengiſt was fleeing to haue ſaued himſelfe, hee was taken by Edoll Earle of Glowceſter (or as ſome haue Cheſter) and by him ledde to Conningeſbourrowe and was there beheaded by

by the counſell of Eldade then Biſhop of Col-
Veſt. cheſter. But ther be that write how Hengiſt was taken at an other battell fought vpon the Riuer of Dune, in the yeare of our Lord. 489. and not in the chaſe of the battell whiche was foughte at Maelbelle in the yeare. 487. as the ſame authors do alledge. Occa the ſonne of Hengiſt, by flight eſcaped to Yorke, and being there beſieged, at length was conſtreyned to yeelde hymſelfe to Aurelius: the which dealing fauorably with him, aſſigned forth to him and other of the Saxons a countrey bordering neere to the Scottes, whych (as ſome affirme) was Galloway, where the ſayd Occa and the Saxons began to inhabite. Then did Aurelius Ambroſius put the Saxons out of all other partes of the land, and repared ſuche Cities, Townes, and alſo Churches, as by them had bin deſtroyed or defaced, and placed agayne Prieſtes, and ſuch other as ſhoulde attende to the miniſterie and ſeruice of God in the ſame Churches.

Alſo for a perpetuall memorie of thoſe Britaynes that were ſlayne on the playne of Saliſburie by the treaſon of Hengiſt, he cauſed ſtones to bee fetched out of Irelande, and to be ſet vp in the ſame place where that ſlaughter was committed, and called the place Stonheng, whiche name continueth vnto this day. There were ſent fifteene thouſand men as Galfride ſaith, for thoſe ſtones, vnder the leading of Uter Pendragon the Kings brother, the whiche giuing battell vnto Gillomanus King of Ireland that went about to reſiſt the Britaynes, and would not permitte them to fetche away the ſame ſtones out of hys countrey, diſcomfyted him and his people, and ſo maugre his will brought the ſtones away with him. Galfrid.

Shortly after Paſcentius that was Vortigernes yongeſt ſonne, and had eſcaped into Irelande (when Aurelius Ambroſius came into Britayne) returned with a greate power of ſtraunge nations, and toke ẏ Citie of Menenia in Wales, afterwardes called Saint Dauid, and did much hurt in the countrey with fire and ſworde. At whiche time the ſame Aurelius Ambroſius laye ſicke at Wincheſter, and beeing not able to goe forth himſelfe, deſired his brother Uter Pendragon to aſſemble an army of Britaines, and to goe againſt Paſcentius and his adherents. Uter according to his brothers requeſt, gathering hys people, wente forthe, and encountring with the enimies, gaue them the ouerthrowe, ſlew Paſcentius and Gillomare or Gilloman King of Irelande that was come ouer with him in ayde a-gainſt the Britaynes.

In the meane while, a Saxon, or ſome other
M. ſtranger, whoſe name was Eopa or Copa, not long before procured thereto by Paſcentius, fayned himſelfe to be a Britayne, and for a couloure counterfeyting himſelfe a Monke, and to haue great knowledge in Phiſicke, was admitted to miniſter as it were medicines vnto Aurelius: but in ſtead of that whiche ſhoulde haue brought him health, he gaue him poyſon, whereof hee dyed ſhortly after at Wincheſter afore ſayde, when hee had raigned after moſt accorde of writers nineteene yeares: his body was conueyhed to Stoneheng and there buried.

Thus finde wee in the Britiſhe and common Engliſh hiſtories of the doings of Aurelius Ambroſius, which as ye haue heard make him a Britayne borne, and diſcended of the bloud of the ancient Britaynes. But Gildas and Beda reporte him to be a Romayne by diſcent as before is mentioned.

Polydore Virgill writeth in this ſorte of the Polidor. victorious actes atchieued by the foreſayde Aurelius Ambroſius. Then ſaith he, the Saxons hauing ning already gotten the whole rule of the Iſle, practiſe their outragious cruelty ſpecially againſt the Princes of the Britaynes, to the end, that the ſayde Princes beeing ouercome and deſtroyed, they might with more eaſe obteyne poſſeſſion of the whole Iſle, whiche thing they only ſoughte for. But the fauor of almightie God was not wanting to the miſerable Britaynes in that greate neceſſitie, for beholde, Aurelius Ambroſius was at hande, the which had no ſooner cauſed the Trumpet to blowe to armour, but euery man for himſelfe prepareth and reſorteth to him, praying and beſeeching him to help to defende them, and that it might ſtand with his pleaſure to goe forth with them againſt the enimies with all ſpeede.

Thus an army beeyng aſſembled, Aurelius Ambroſius goeth againſte them, and valiantly aſſayleth them, ſo that within the ſpace of a fewe dayes, they foughte three battayles with greate fiercenesſe on both ſydes in triall of their high diſpleaſures and vttermoſt forces, in which at length the Britaynes put the Saxons to flight, Horſus the brother of Hengiſt being ſlayne with a greate number of his people. But yet notwithſtanding the enimies rage was little abated heereby, for within a fewe dayes after receyuing out of Germany a newe ſupply of menne, they brake forth vpon the Britaynes with greate confidence of victory. Aurelius Ambroſius was no ſooner aduertiſed thereof, but that withoute delay he ſette forwarde towardes Yorke from whence the enimies ſhould come, and hearing by the way that Hengiſt was encamped about ſeuen and twentie miles diſtante from that Citie, neere to the banke of a Riuer at this day called Dune, in the place where Doncaſter now ſtandeth, he returneth out of his way and marcheth towards that place, and the nexte daye ſetteth on the enimie and vanquiſheth him, Hengiſt at the firſt meeting of the battels beeyng ſlayne, with a greate number of the Germanes. Hengiſt ſlayne.

The fame of this victory (ſaith Polidore) is had in memory with the inhabitantes of thoſe parties euen vnto this day, the which victory did ſore diminiſh the power of the Saxons, in ſomuch that they began now to thinke it ſhoulde be more for their profit to ſit in reſt with that diſhonor, than to make any newe warres to their great diſaduantage and likelyhod of preſent loſſe.

Hengiſt lefte behynde him two ſonnes, Oſca and Otha, the which as menne moſt ſorrowfull for the ouerthrowe of late receyued, aſſembled ſuche power as they could togither, and remoued therewith towardes the Weſt parte of the Iſle, ſuppoſing it to bee better for them to drawe that way forth, than to returne into Kent, where they thought was already a ſufficient number of their people to reſiſt the Britaynes on that ſyde.

Nowe therefore, when they were come into the Weſt partes of the land, they waſt the countrey, brenne Villages, and abſtayne from no maner of crueltie that might be ſhewed.

Theſe things beeing reported vnto Aurelius Ambroſius, hee ſtraightwayes haſteth thither to reſiſt thoſe enimies, and ſo giuing them battell, eftſoones diſcomfiteth them: but he himſelfe receyuing a wounde, dyed thereof within a fewe dayes after. Aurelius dieth of a wounde.

The Engliſh Saxons hauing thus ſuſteined ſo many loſſes within a fewe monethes togither, were contented to bee quiet nowe that the Britaynes ſtirred nothing againſte them, by reaſon they were brought into ſome trouble by the death of ſuch a noble Captayne as they had nowe loſt. In the meane time Voxtimer died, after whome ſucceeded Uter ſurnamed Pendragon. Thus hath Polidore written of the foreſayde Aurelius Vortimer parteth this life.

Ambroſius

Ambroſius, not naming him to be King of Britayne, and differing indeede in ſundry poyntes in this behalfe from diuers auncient writers of the Engliſh hiſtories, for wher he attributeth the victory to the Britaynes in the battel fought, wherin Horſus the brother of Hengiſt was ſlayne by the reporte of Polychronicon, and other, the Saxons hadde the victory in that rencounter, and William of Malmeſburie ſayeth, that they departed from that battell with egall fortune, the Saxons loſing their Captayne Horſus, and the Britaynes their Captayne Katigerne (as before yee haue heard) but there is ſuche contrarietie in writers touching the doings betwixte the Britaynes and Saxons in thoſe dayes, as well in accompte of yeares, as in the reporte of thynges done, that letting affection aſide, hard it is to iudge to which part a man ſhould giue credite. Where Fabian and other authors write, that Aurelius Ambroſius began his raigne ouer the Britaines about the yeare of our Lord. 481. Horſus was ſlayne about the yeare. 458. during the raigne of Vortimer, as aboue is mentioned, ſo that it cannot ſtande with the troth of the Britiſh hiſtories (the whiche Fabian followeth) that Horſus was ſlayne by Aurelius Ambroſius, if according to the ſame hiſtories hee returned not into Britayne, till the time there ſuppoſed. But diuers ſuch manner of contrarieties ſhall ye finde in peruſing of thoſe writers that haue written the Chronicles of the Britaynes and Saxons, the which in euery point to recite would be to tedious and comberſome a matter, and therefore we are forced to paſſe ẏ ſame ouer, not knowing how to bring them to any iuſt accorde for the ſatiſfying of all mens mindes, and namely the curious, whiche may with diligente ſearche ſatisfye themſelues happily muche better than any other ſhall be able to doe in vttering his opinion neuer ſo much at large, and agreeable to a troth: onely therefore haue we thought good as it were by the way to touch what diuers authors do write, leauing it ſo to euery mans iudgemente to conſtrue therof, as his affection leadeth him. We fynde in the writings of thoſe that haue regiſtred the doings of theſe times, that Aurelius hauing vanquiſhed the Saxons, reſtored Churches to the furtherance of the Chriſtian Religion, which by the inuaſion of the Saxons was greatly decayed in diuers partes of Britayne, and thys chanced in the dayes of the Emperour Theodoſius ẏ yonger.

The beginning of the Kingdome of Suſſex.

IN the time of the forſayd Aurelius Ambroſius one Ella a Saxon with his three ſonnes Cymen, Wlettinger, & Ciſſa, came out of Germany with three Shippes, and landed in the South partes of Britayne, and being encountred with a power of Britaynes at a place called Cuneueſhore, diſcomfited them, and chaſed them vnto a wood then called Andredeſwold, and ſo toke that countrey, and inhabited there with his people the Saxons which he brought with him, and made himſelfe King and Lord thereof, in ſomuche that afterwardes the ſame countrey was named the kingdome of the South Saxons, whiche had for limittes on the Eaſt ſide Kent, on the South, the Sea and Iſle of Wight, on the weſt Hamſhire, and on the North part Southerie. This Kyngdome (after ſome) began vnder the forſayd Ella, aboute the. 32. yeare after the firſte commyng of the Saxons into this lād, which by following that accompt, ſhould be about the ſecond yeare of the raigne of Aurelius Ambroſius, and about the yeare of oure Lord. 482. But other write, that it did begin about the. 30. yeare after the firſte comming of Hengiſt, which ſhould be two yeares ſooner. William Harriſon differing from al other, noteth it to begin in the fourth yeare after ẏ death of Hengiſt. 4458. of the worlde. 2. of the. 317. Olympiad. 1243. of Rome. 492. of Chriſte, and. 43. after the comming of the Saxons: his words are theſe. Ella erecteth the Kingdome of the South Saxons, in the. 15. after his arriuall, and raigned 32. yeares, the chiefe Citie of his Kingdome alſo was Chicheſter, & after hee had enioyed the ſame his Kingdome awhile, he ouerthrew ẏ Citie called Andredeceſter, whiche as then was taken for one of the moſt famous in all the South ſide of England. For my parte I thinke my dutie diſcharged, if I ſhew the opinions of ẏ writers: for if I ſhould thereto adde mine owne, I ſhould but increaſe coniectures, whereof already we haue ſuperfluous ſtore. To proceede therfore as I fynde.

The kingdom of the South Saxons doth begin.

About the ninth yeare after the comming of Elle, the Britaynes perceyuing that he with hys Saxons ſtill enlarged the boundes of his Lordſhip by entring further into the lande, aſſembled themſelues togither vnder their Kings and Rulers, and gaue battell to Elle and his ſonnes at Wecredeſbourne, where they departed with doutfull victory, the armies on both ſides being ſore diminiſhed, and ſo returned to their homes. Elle after this battell ſente into his countrey for more ayde. But nowe touching Hengiſt which as yee haue heard, reigned as King in the prouince of Kente, the writers of the Engliſhe Kings varie ſomewhat from the Britiſhe hiſtories, bothe in reporte of the battels by him foughte againſte the Britaynes, and alſo for the manner of his deathe: as thus. After that Vortimerus was dead, which departed this life (as ſome write) in the firſt yeare of the Emperour Leo, ſurnamed the greate, and firſt of that name that gouerned the Empire, who began to rule in the yeare of our Lorde. 457. wee fynde that Hengiſt and his ſonne Oeca or Oſca

It is remembred that thoſe Germanes whiche lately were come ouer to the ayde of Hengiſt, beeing choſen men, mightie and ſtrong of body, with their axes and ſwords made great ſlaughter of the Britaynes in that battell at Crekenford or Creyforde, whiche Britaynes were aranged in foure battayles vnder their aforeſayd foure Dukes or Captaynes, and were (as before is mentioned) ſlayne in the ſame battel. About the ſixth yere of the ſayd Emperour Leo, which was in the. 17. yeare after the comming of the Saxons. Hengiſt and his ſonne Occa or Oſca fought at Wyptiſhe fielde in Kent, neere to a place called Tong with the Britaynes, & ſlewe of them twelue Dukes or Captaynes, and on the parte of the Saxons was ſlayne beſyde common Souldiers but onely one Captayne that highte Vipet, of whome ẏ place after ẏ day toke name.

This victory was nothing pleaſaunte to the Saxons, by reaſon of the great loſſe whiche they ſuſteyned, as well by the death of the ſayd Vipet, as of a greate number of others: and ſo of a long time neyther did the Saxons enter into the confynes of the Britaynes, nor the Britaynes preſumed to come into Kent. But whileſt outward warres ceaſſe among the Britaynes, they exerciſe ciuill battell, falling togither by the eares among themſelues, one ſtriuing againſt another. Finally, Hengiſt departed this life by courſe of nature, in the. 39. yeare after his firſte comming into Britayne, hauing proceeded in his buſineſſe no leſſe with craft and guyle than with force and ſtrength, following therewith his natiue crueltie, ſo that he rather did all things with rigoure than with gentleneſſe. After him ſucceeded a ſonne whiche hee left behinde him, who beeing attentiue rather to defende than to enlarge his Kingdome, neuer ſet foote out of his fathers boundes, durying the ſpace of. 24. yeares, in the whiche hee raigned.

Fortie yeares hath H. Hunt.

By this it is euident that he was not driuen out of the lande after he had once got foote within it.

Mat. VVeſt. Hen. Hunt.

About three yeares after the deceſſe of Hengiſt, a new ſupply of men of warre came out of Germany vnto the ayde of Elle King of Suſſex, the which hauing his power ſo encreaſſed, beſieged the Citie of Andredeceſtre, which was very ſtrõg & well furniſhed with men & all things neceſſary.

The Citie of Andredeceſtre.

The Britaynes alſo aſſembling togither in companies, greatly annoyed the Saxons as they lay there at ſiege, laying ambuſhes to deſtroy ſuche as wente abrode, and ceaſſing not to giue alarmes to the campe in the night ſeaſon: & the Saxons could no ſooner prepare themſelues to giue the aſſault, but the Britaynes were ready to aſſayle them on the backes, till at length the Saxons deuiding themſelues into two companies, appoynted the one to giue the aſſault, and the other to encounter with the army of the Britaynes without, and ſo finally by that meanes preuayled, toke the Citie, and deſtroyed manne, woman and childe. Neyther ſo contented, they did alſo vtterly raſe the ſayde Citie, ſo as it was neuer after that daye builded or reedified agayne.

The Kingdome of the Eaſtangles.

The Kingdom of the Eaſtangles begi. This Kingdome as Harriſon noteth began not till Aurelius Conanus raigned. 561

MOreouer, in the dayes of the foreſayd named Aurelius Ambroſius about the yeare of our Lorde. 561. the kingdome of the Eaſtangles began vnder a Saxon named Uffa. This Kingdome conteyned Northfolke and Suffolke, hauing on the Eaſt and North partes the Sea, on the Northweſt Cambridge ſhire, and on the Weſt Sainte Edmonds ditch with a part of Hertfordſhire, and on the South ſide lieth Eſſex. This Kingdome at the firſte was called Uffines dominion, and the Kings that raigned, or the people that inhabited there, were at the firſte named Uffines, but at length they were called Eaſtangles.

Cerdic. VVil. Mal. 495

FVrthermore about ẏ yere of oure Lorde 495. and in the eyght yeare after that Hengiſt was dead, one Cerdicus, and his ſonne Kenricus came out of Germany with fiue Shippes, and landed at a place called Cerdicesore, whiche as ſome thinke is nowe called Yermouth in Northfolke. Hee was at the firſt receyued with battell by the Britaynes, but beeing an olde ſkilfull warriour, hee eaſily beate backe and repulſed the inconſtante multitude of his enimies, and cauſed them to flee: by whyche good ſucceſſe hee procured for the time to come, both vndoubted aſſurance to himſelfe, and to the inhabiinhabitantes good and perfect quietneſſe, for they thinking good neuer after to prouoke him more by reſiſtãce, ſubmitted themſelues to his pleaſure: but yet did not he then gyue himſelfe to ſlouthful reſt, but rather extending his often atchieued victories on eache ſyde, in the foure and twentith yeare after his comming into this land, he obteyned the rule of the Weſt partes thereof, and gouerned there as King, ſo that the Kingdome of Weſt Saxons began vnder the ſayde Cerdicus in the. 519. of Chriſt as after ſhall be ſhewed.

Thus may yee ſee that if Aurelius Ambroſius did ſucceede after Vortigerne, and raigned in the tyme ſuppoſed by the Brittiſh hiſtories, as before is alledged, the lande euen in his dayes was full of trouble, and the olde inhabitauntes the Britaynes ſore vexed by the Saxons that entred the ſame, ſo that the Britaynes dayly were hampered, and brought vnder ſubiection to the valiante Saxons, or elſe driuen to remoue further off, and to giue place to the victorers. But nowe to proceede with the ſucceſſion of the Brittiſhe Kings as in their Hiſtories wee fynde them regiſtred, whiche I delyuer ſuche as I fynde, but not ſuche as I do wiſhe, being written with no ſuche couloure of credite as we may ſafely put forthe the ſame for an vndoubted truth.

Vter Pendragon.

AFter that Aurelius Ambroſius was dead, his brother Uter Pendragon (whome Harriſon calleth, Aurelius Uterius Ambroſianus) was made King in the yeare of our Lorde. 500. in the ſeuenth yeare of the Emperour Anaſtaſius, and in the ſixteene yeare of Clodoueus King of the Frenchmen. The cauſe why hee was ſurnamed Pendragon, was, for that Merlyne the greate Prophete likened him to a Dragons head, that at the tyme of his natiuitie marueilouſly appeared in the firmamente at the corner of a blaſing Starre as is reported. But Harriſon ſuppoſeth that hee was ſo called of his wiſedome and ſurpaſſing ſubtiltie, or for that he gaue the Dragons head in his Banner.

Thys Uter, hearing that the Saxons with their Captaynes Occa or Octa the ſonne of Hengiſt, and his brother Oſca hadde beſieged the Citie of Yorke, haſted thither, and giuing them battell diſcomfited their power, and toke the ſayd Occa and Oſca priſoners. From this variety Hector Boetius in his Chronicle of Scotland, writing of theſe doings in Britaine: for he affirmeth, that the counterfet Monke whiche poyſoned Aurelius Ambroſius, was ſubornate, and ſent to worke that feate by Occa, and not by his brother Paſcentius: and further, that about the very ſelfe time of Aurelius his deathe, his brother Uter Pendragon lay in Wales, not as yet fully recouered of a ſore ſickneſſe, wherewith of late he had bin greeuouſly vexed. Yet the Lords of Britayne after the Buriall of Aurelius Ambroſius, came vnto him, and crowned him king: ℞ though he was not able to goe againſt ỹ Saxons (which as then by reaſon of Aurelius Ambroſius hys death were very buſie, and more earneſt in purſuing the war than before) an army was yet prepared and ſente forth with all conuenient ſpeede vnder ỹ leading of one Mathaliod, a mã neyther of any greate auntiente houſe, nor yet of ſkill in warlike affaires. The noble men were nothyng pleaſed heerewith, as miſliking altogither ỹ lack of diſcretion in their new king, and doubted ſore, leaſt in time to come he would haue more delight to aduance the baſe degree, than ſuch as were diſcended of noble parentage. Yet bicauſe they wold not put the ſtate of the common wealth in daunger through any mutiny, they agreed to goe forth with him in that iourney. Occa had aduertiſemente giuen by ſecrete letters ſente to him from ſome cloſe friendes amongſt the Britaines of the whole matter, and therefore in hope of the better ſpeed he haſted forth to encounter the Britaines, and ſo the one army comming within ſight of ỹ other, they prepare to the battell, and ſhortly after buckling togither, the Britaines were ſone diſcomfited, by reaſon that one of their chiefeſt Captaines called Gothlois diſdeyning to bee at the appointemente of Mathaliod, gote him vp to the next hill with the battell which he led, leauing the other Britaines in al the daunger: which they perceyuing ſtraight wayes began to flee. There dyed no greate number of the Britaines, except thoſe that were killed in the fighte: for Occa miſtruſting what Gothlois meant by his withdrawing aſide, wouldc not ſuffer the Saxons to followe the chaſe, but in the nyghte followyng, Gothlois gote hym away, and reſted not till he was hee was out of daunger. Occa then perceiuing himſelfe to haue the vpper hand, ſent an Herrauld vnto King Uter with a certayne meſſage, threatning deſtruction to him and to his people, if he refuſed to do that which he ſhould appoynt.

Uter perceyuing what diſloyaltie reſted in the harts of his owne ſubiectes, agreed that the matter might be committed to eyght graue and wiſe Counſellers, foure Britaines and foure Saxons, which might haue full power to make an ende of all controuerſies and variaunces depending betwixt the two nations. Occa was likewiſe contented therewith, wherevppon were named on eyther part four perſons, of ſuch wiſedom, knowledge and experience, as were thought meeteſt to take direction for the ordering of ſuch a weightie buſineſſe. By the arbitrement, warde and dome then of thoſe eighte perſons ſufficiently authoriſed thereto, a league was concluded vppon certaine articles of agreement, amongſt the whyche the chiefeſt was, that the Saxons from thenceforth ſhould quietly enioy all that part of Britayne whiche lyeth fore aneynſt the Almayne Seas, the ſame to bee called euer after Engiſtlaund, and all the reſidue ſhoulde remayne to the Britaines as their owne rightfull and auncient inheritance. Thus hathe Hector Boetius, but now to returne vnto Uter according to that wee finde in the Britiſh hiſtories: but to proceede after our owne writers, that when he had vanquiſhed the Saxons and taken their two chiefetaines priſoners, in proceſſe of time, he fell in loue with a righte beautifull Lady called Igwarne or Igerna, wife to one Gorolus or Gorloys Duke of Cornewaile, the which Duke he ſlew at length neere to his owne Caſtell called Diuulioc in Cornewaile, to the ende that he mighte enioy the ſayd Lady the which he afterwards married, and begate on hir that noble Knighte Arthur, and a daughter named Amye or Anna. Occa and Oſſa eſcaping alſo out of priſon aſſembled eftſoones a power of Saxons, and made warre againſte the Britaynes, whereof Uter hauing aduertiſement prepared to reſiſt them, and finally went himſelfe in perſon againſte them, and at Saint Albanes (as ſome write) gaue them battel and ſlew them both in the fielde. By that which Polydore Uergill writeth it ſhoulde ſeeme that Germane the Biſhop of Auxerre came into Britayne in the dayes of this Uter, by whoſe preſence the Brytaynes had victory againſte the Saxons (as before yee haue heard) after whiche victory bothe parties reſted from troubling eyther other for a time, the Saxons as it were aſtonied with that preſente miracle, and the Britaynes not following their good ſucceſſe ſhortly after fell at diſcord amongſt themſelues, which finally brought them to vtter decay, as after ſhall appeare. But ỹ Saxons being deſirous to ſpoyle the Britaines of the whole poſſeſſion of that parte of the Iſle which they held, whereas they accompted the Cities and Townes of ſmall ſtrength to be diſcended, they gote them to an high Mountaine called Badon hill, whiche Polidore ſuppoſeth to bee Blackamore ỹ lieth neere to the water of Thriſe, which deuideth the Biſhoprike of Durham from Yorkſhire, hauing at the mouth thereof an hauen meete to receyue ſuch Shippes as come out of Germany, from whence the Saxons looked dayly for ayde, hauing already ſent thither for the ſame. The Britaynes being thereof aduertiſed, make haſt towards the place, and beſieged it on euery ſide. They alſo lay the Sea coaſtes full of Souldiers to keepe ſuche of the enemies from landing as ſhoulde come out of Germany. The Saxons kept themſelues for a certayne ſpace aloft vpon the high grounde, but in the ende conſtreyned through wante of vittayles, they came downe downe with their armie in order of bataile to the next plaines, and offering to fight, the batayl was anon begun, which continued from the morning till farre in the day, with suche slaughter, that the earth on euery side flowed with bloud: but ẏ Saxons susteyned the greater losse, their capitaines Occa and Osca beyng bothe slayne, so that the Britons might seme quite deliuered of al danger of those enimies: but the fatall destenie could not be auoided, as hereafter may apere. And this was the slaughter made of the Saxons at Badon hil, wherof Gildas maketh mention, and chanced the same yere that he was borne, which was in the 44. yere after the first cõming of the Saxons into this land, the yere of grace. 492. & 15. indiction (as Harison also noteth.)

About the same time Uter departed out of this life (saith Polydore) so that his accompte agreeth nothing with the cõmon accompte of those authors, whom Fabiã and other haue folowed. For either must we presuppose, that Uter reigned before the time apointed to him by the said authors, either elsse that the siege of Badon hill was before he began to reigne, as it should seeme in deede by that which Will. Malmsbury writeth therof, as hereafter shal be also shewed. Finally, according to the agreemente of the Englishe writers, Uter Pendragon died of poyson when he had gouerned this land by the ful terme of 16. yeres, & was after buried by his brother Aurelius at Stonhẽg otherwyse called Chorea Gigantũ, leauing his son Arthur to succede him. Here must ye note that the scottish chronicles declare, that in al the warres for the more parte wherein the Britons obteyned victorie against the Saxons, the Scots ayded them in the same warres, and so likewyse did the Picts, but the same chronicles do not only varie from the Brytish writers in accompt of yeres, but also in the order of things done, as in the same Chronicles more playnly may appere, and namely in the discourse of the incidẽts which chanced during the reign of this Uter. For wher as the Britih historiens, as ye haue heard, attribute great praise vnto the same Uter for his victories atchieued against the Saxons and theyr king Occa, whom he slew in battaile, and obteined a greate victorie, the Scottishe writers make other report, affirming in deed that by the prelẽce of bishop Germane hee obteyned victorie in one battaile against them: but shortly after the Britons fought again with the Saxons, & were discomfited, although Occa in following the chase ouer rashly chaunced to be slaine: after whose decease the Saxons ordeyned his sonne named also Occa to succede in his place, who to make himselfe strong against all his enimies, sent into Germanie for one Colgerne, the whiche with a greate power of Teutshmen came ouer into this our Britayne, and conquered by Occas appointment, the countrey of Northumberland, situate betwene Tyne & Tweede, as in the Scottish chronicles it may further appeare.

Also this is to be remembred that the victorie which was got against the Saxons by the Brytons, at what time Germane bishop of Auxerre was present: Hector Boetius affirmeth (by the authoritie of Ueremond that wrote ẏ Scottishe chronicles) to haue chanced the secõd time of his cõming ouer into this lande, where Beda auoucheth it to be at his first being here. Againe, the same Boetius writeth, that ẏ same victory chãced in the dayes of Uter Pendragon, whiche can not be if it be true that Beda writeth, touchyng the tyme of ẏ death of ẏ sayd German: for where he departed this life before the yere of oure Lorde 459. as aboue is noted, Uter Pendragon began not his reigne till the yere of our Lord. 500. or as the same Hector Boetius hath. 501. so that bishop Germane was dead long before that Uter began to reign. In deede some writers haue noted that the third bataile which Vortimer fought against the Saxons, was the same wherin S. Germane was present, and procured the victorie with the crie of Alleluya, as before ye haue heard, whiche seemeth to be more agreeable to a truthe, and to stand also with that which holie Bede hath written, touching the time of the beeing heere of the sayd German, than the opinion of other, whiche affirme that it was in the tyme of the reigne of Uter. The like is to bee founde in the residue of Hector Boetius his booke, touching the tyme specially of the reignes of the Brytish kings that gouerned Brytaine aboute that seaton. For as he affirmeth, Aurelius Ambrosius beganne his reigne in the yeare of our Lorde. 498. and ruled but seuen yeres, and then succeeded Uter, whiche reigned xviij. yeres, and departed this life in the yeare of our Lorde. 521.

475. sayth Harison.

But here is to be remẽbred, that whatsoeuer the Britih writers haue recorded touching the victories of this Uter had against ẏ Saxõs, and how that Osca the sonne of Hengist should be slaine in battayle by him and his power: In those olde writers whiche haue registred the Actes of the Englishe Saxon kyngs wee fynde no suche matter, but wee fynde that after the deceasse of Hengist, hys sonne Osca or Occa reygned in Kente. 24. yeares, defendyng hys kyngdome onely, and not seekyng to enlarge it (as before is touched.)

Osca.

34. hath Henry Hunt. in corrupted copies.

After whose death his sonne Oth, and Irmentike sonne to the same Oth succeeded, more resemblyng their father than their grandfather or greate grandfather. To their reignes are assigned fiftie and three yeares by the Chronicles: but whether they reigned ioyntely together, or ſeuerally a parte, eyther after other, it is not certaynly perceyued.

But nowe to the incidentes whiche happened during the reigne of Uter Pendragon, we fynde that one Porth a Saxon with his .ij. ſonnes Me-

Port entred this land about the yeere of our Lord. 501. as Math. VVeſt. noteth.

gla and Beda, came a lande at Portſmouth in Suſſex, about the beginning of the ſayde Uters reigne, and ſlewe a noble yong man of the Bry-tons, and many other of the meaner ſorte with him. Of this Porth the towne and hauen of Portelmouth toke the name as ſome haue thought. Moreouer about .lx. yeres after the coming of the Saxons into this lande with their leader Hengiſt, one Mazaleod, a mightie king amongſt the Britons, aſſembled all the power hee coulde make to fight with Certicus king of the Weſt-ſaxons, who vnderſtandyng the greate power of his enimies, required ayde of Oſca King of Kent, alſo of Elle king of Suſſex, and of Porth and his ſonnes whiche were lately before arriued as ye haue heard. Certicus being then furniſhed with a conuenient armie, deuided the ſame into two batayls, reſeruing the one to himſelf, and the other he appointed to his ſonne Kenrike. King Mazaleod perceiuing that the wing which Certicus ledde was of more ſtrength than the other whiche Kenrike gouerned, he ſet fyrſt vpon Certicus, thinking that if he might diſtreſſe that part of the enimies armie, he ſhould eaſily ouercome the other.

Harison ſuppoſeth the ryuer to bee called Ports, as for the vvorde mouth is the ſal o freſh riuer the ſea.

Herevpon he gaue ſuch a fierce charge vppon that wing that by pure force he opened the ſame, and ſo ouerthrew the Saxons on that ſide, making great ſlaughter of them as they were ſcattered, the whiche maner of dealing when Kenrike ſawe, he made forwarde with all ſpeed, to ſuccor his father, and ruſhing in amongſt the Bry tons on their backs, he brake their armie in peeces, and ſlew their king Mazaleod, and with all put his people to flight.

About the ſame time Elle king of the Southſaxons departed this lyfe, after whome ſucceeded his ſonne Ciſſa, of whom wee fynde little leſte in writing to bee made accompte of.

About the yeare of our Lorde .519. and in the yeare after the commyng of the Saxons .71.

Brytons ouerthrovven by Saxons.

whyche was in the .xxbj. yeare of the Emperor Anaſtaſius, the Brytons fought with Certicus and his ſonne Kenrike at Certicesſhore, where the Captaynes of the Brytons ſtoode to it manfully: but in the ende they were diſcomfyted, and greate ſlaughter was made there of them by the Saxons, and greater had bene, if the nyghte commyng on, had not parted them, and ſo many were ſaued.

From that daye forewarde Certicus was reputed and taken for king of Weſtſaxon, and ſo the ſame kyngdome at that tyme, whyche was as Harriſon noteth it (whoſe orderly proceedyng in this behalfe, for the accoumpte of tyme, giueth greate lyght to our hiſtorie) the yeare of Chriſte fiue hundred and nineteene: after the buylding of Rome, a thouſande, two hundred and ſeuentie, of the worlde, foure thouſande foure hundred eyghtie and fiue: of the commyng of the Saxons ſeuentie: of Juſtinus Anicius Emperoure of the Eaſte, the fyrſte and thirde of the renoumed prince Patricius Arthurus then reygnyng ouer the Brytaynes. The ſayd kingdom alſo conteyned the countreys of Wiltſhire, Somerſetſhire, Berkeſhire, Dorſetſhyre, Deuonſhire, and Cornewall, hauing on the Eaſt Hamſhire, on the Northy the riuer of Thames, and on the South and Weaſt the Ocean ſea: Howbeit at the firſte the kinges of the Weaſtſaxons had not ſo large dominion, but they dayly wanne grounde vpon the Brytons, & ſo in the ende by enlarging their confines they came to enioy all the ſayde countreys, and the whole at the laſt.

In the nynthe yeare of the reigne of Certicus, he eftſoons fought with the Saxons at Certicesforde aforeſayde, where great ſlaughter was made on bothe partes. This Certicesforde was in times paſt called Nazaleoy of the late remembred Nazaleod king of the Brytons.

Aboute this ſeaſon at ſundry tymes diuerſe greate companies of the Saxons came ouer into Britayne out of Germanie, and got poſſeſſion of the countreys of Mercie and Eaſtangle: but as yet thoſe of Mercie had no one king that gouerned them, but were vnder certayne noble men that got poſſeſſion of diuers partes in that countrey, by meanes wherof great warres and many encounters enſued.

The kingdome of the Eaſtſaxons.

Erchenwyn.

The kingdom of the Eaſtſaxons.

In thoſe dayes alſo the kyngdome of the Eaſtſaxons began, the chiefe Citie whereof was London. It conteyned in effect ſo much as at this preſente belongeth to the Dioceſſe of London. One Erchenwyn a Saxon was the fyrſt king thereof, the whiche was ſonne to one Offa, the ſixte in lineall deſcent from one Saxnot, from whom the kings of that countrey fetched their originall.

Harſon noteth the eraſte yeare of the erection of the kingdom of the Eaſtſaxons to begin with the end of the eight of Cerdicius K. of the Weſtſaxons that is, the. 527. of Chriſte, and. 78. after the commyng of the Saxons.

In the. xiij. yeare of the reigne of Cerdicius, he with his ſonne Kenrike, and other of the Saxon capitayns fought with the Brytons, in the Iſle of Wight at Witgarcburidge, where they ſlewe a greate number of Brytons, and ſo conquered the Iſle, the whiche aboute foure yeares after, was giuen by Cerdicius vnto hys nephues Stuff and Wigar.

Arthure.

After the deceaſe of Uter Pendragon (as we finde in the Britiſhe hiſtories, his ſonne Arthur, a yong towardly Gentleman, of the age of. xv. yeares, or therabeutes, began his reigne ouer the Britons in the yere of our lord. 516. or as Math. Weſt. hath. 517. in ỹ. 18. yere of the emperor Anaſtaſius, & in the. iij. yere of the reignes of Childebert, Clothare, Clodamire, & Theodorik brethre, ỹ were kings of the Frenchmē. Of this Arthure many things are writen beyond credite, for that there is no ancient author of authoritie that confirmeth the ſame: But ſurely as may be thought he was ſome worthie man, and by all likelyhod a great enimie to the Saxons, by reaſon wherof the Welſhemen which are the very Brytons indeed haue him in famous remembrance. He fought as the common report of him goeth. xij. notable batayles agaynſt the Saxons, and in euery of them wente awaye with the victorie. But yet hee myghte not vtterlye dryue them oute of the lande, but that they kepte ſtill the countreys whiche they had in poſſeſſion, as Kent, Southrey, Northfolke, and others: howbeit ſome writers teſtifie, that they helde theſe countreyes as tributaries to Arthure. But trouth it is (as dyuers authours agree) that hee helde continuall warre agaynſt them, and alſo agaynſt the Pictes, the whiche were alyed wyth the Saxons: For as in the Scottiſhe hiſtories is conteyned, euen at the fyrſte beginning of hys reigne, the two kings of Scottes and Pictes ſeemed to enuie hys aduauncemente to the crowne of Bryttayne, bycauſe that they had maryed the two ſyſters of the two brethren, Aurelius Ambroſius, and Uter Pendragon, that is to witte, Loth kyng of Pictes hadde maryed Anne theyr eldeſt ſyſter, and Conran kyng of Scottes had in marryage Alda theyr yonger ſiſter, ſo that bicauſe Arthur was begot out of wedlocke, they thoughte it ſtoode wyth more reaſon, that the kyngdome of the Bryttons ſhould haue deſcended vnto the ſiſters ſonnes rather than to a baſtarde, namely Loth the Pictiſhe king, whyche had iſſue by his wyfe Anna, ſore repined at the matter: and therefore at the fyrſt when he ſawe that by ſuite he coulde not preuayle, hee ioyned in league wyth the Saxons, and ayding them agaynſte Arthure, loſte many of his menne of warre being ouerthrowen in battayle, which he had ſent vnto the ſuccours of Colgerne the Saxon Prince that ruled as then in the north partes. But fynallye a league was concluded betwixte Arthur and the foreſayde Lothe kyng of Pictes, vpon certain conditions, as in the Scottiſhe hiſtory is expreſſed, where ye may read the ſame, with many other things touching the acts of Arthure, ſomewhat in other order, than oure writers haue recorded.

The Britiſhe authors declare, that Arthure immediately after he had receyued the Crowne of Dubrighte Biſhoppe of Caerlleon, wente wyth his power of Brytons agaynſt the Saxons of Northumberlande, whiche had to their Capitayne, as before is ſayde one Colgrime or Colgerne, whome Arthure diſcomfited and chaſed into the Citie of Yorke, within which place Arthur beſieged him, til at length the ſame Colgrime eſcaped out of the Citie, and leauing it in charge with his brother called Bladulfe paſſed ouer into Germanie vnto Cheldrike kyng of that Countrey, of whome he obteyned ſuccors, ſo that the ſayde Cheldrike made prouiſion of menne and ſhippes, and came hymſelfe ouer into Scotlande, hauing in his company. xv. hundred ſayles of one and other.

Yorke beſieged.

Cheldrike cometh in ayde of Colgrime.

Math. VVeſt. hath but vij. hundred.

When Arthur was aduertiſed thereof, he reyſed his ſiege, and withdrewe to London, ſending letters with all ſpeede vnto Howell king of little Britayne in Fraunce, that was his ſiſters ſonne, requiring hym in moſte earneſt wyſe of ayde. Howell incontinently aſſembled hys people, to the number of xv. thouſande men, and taking the ſea, landed with them at Southampton, where Arthure was ready to receyue hym with great ioye and gladneſſe. From thence they drewe Northewardes, where both the hoſtes of Arthur and Howell being aſſembled together, marched forewarde to Lyncolne, whiche Citie Cheldrike did as then beſiege.

Howell kyng of Britayne cometh ouer to ayde of Arthur.

Heere Arthur and Howell aſſayling the Saxons with greate force and manhoode, and at lengthe after greate ſlaughter made of the enimyes, they obteyned the victorye, and chaſed Cheldrike) wyth the reſidewe of the Saxons that were lefte alyue) vnto a woode, where they compaſſed them aboute wythin the ſame, in ſuche wyſe, that in the ende they were conſtreyned to yeelde themſelues, wyth condition

Heerevpon the Brytons takyng good hoſtages for aſſuraunce, permitted the Saxons to go their ways, and ſo Cheldrike and his people got them to theyr ſhippes, in purpoſe to returne into their countrey: but being on the ſea, they were forced by wynde to chaunge theyr courſe, and comming on the coaſtes of the Weaſt partes of Britayne, they arriued at Totneſſe, and contrarye to the couenaunted articles of theyr laſte compoſition wyth Arthure, inuade the countrey of newe, and taking ſuch armure as they could fynde, marched forth in robbing and ſpoyling the people, til they came to Bathe, which towne the Brytons kepte and defended againſt them, not ſuffryng them by any meanes to enter there, wherevppon the Saxons enuironed it with a ſtrong ſiege. ſted thyther, & giuyng the enimies battayle, ſlew the moſte parte of Cheldrikes men.

There were ſlayne both Colgrime and Bladulfe, howbeit Cheldrike himſelfe fled out of the fielde towardes his ſhippes, but being purſued by Cador Earle of Cornewall (that had with him. x. thouſande men) by Arthures appoyntement, he was ouertaken and in fight ſlayn with all his people.

Arthur himſelfe returned from this battayle foughten at Bathe with all ſpeede towardes the marches of Scotlande, for that he hadde receyued aduertiſement, howe the Scottes had beſieged Howell kyng of Brytayne there, as hee laye ſicke.

Alſo when Cador had accompliſhed his enterpryſe and ſlayne Chelderike, hee returned with as muche ſpeede as was poſſible towardes Arthure, and founde him in Scotlande, where he reſkued Howell, and afterwarde purſued the Scottes which fled before him by heapes.

About the ſame tyme one Guillomer king of Ireland arriued in Scotlande with a myghtie power of Iriſhmen (neare to the place where Arthur lodged) to healpe the Scottes againſte the Britons: wherevpon Arthur turning his forces towardes the ſame Guillomer, banquiſhed him, and chaſed him into Irelande.

This don, he cõtinued in purſute of the Scots til he cauſed thẽ to ſue for pardon, and to ſubmit themſelues wholly to him, and ſo receiuing them to mercie, and taking homage of them, hee returned to Yorke, and ſhortly after toke to wyfe one Guenhera a right beautifull Lady, that was neere kinſwoman to Cador Erle of Cornwall. Guenever.

In the yeare folowing, which Harriſon noteth to be. 525. he went into Irelande, and diſcomfiting king Guillomere in battayle, hee conſtrayned him to yelde, and to acknowledge by doing his fealtie to holde the realme of Ireland of him. VVil. Harriſon noteth it to be 525.

It is further remembred in thoſe Britiſhe hiſtories, that hee ſubdued Gutlande and Iſeland with all the Iſles in and about thoſe ſeas. Gotlande.

Alſo that hee ouercame the Romaines in the countrey aboute Parys wyth theyr capitayne Lucius, and walted the moſte parte of all Fraunce, and ſlewe in ſyngular combates certayne Gyauntes that were of paſſyng force and hugeneſſe of ſtature.

And if he had not bene reuoked home to reſiſt his couſin Mordred that was ſon to Loth king of Nightlande that rebelled in his countrey, he had paſſed to Rome, intending to make himſelfe Emperour, and afterwarde to banquiſhe the other Emperoure, that then ruled the Empire: but for ſo muche as there is not anye appro-ted authour dothe ſpeake of any ſuche doings, the Britons are thoughte to haue regiſtred mere fables in ſtede of true matter, vpon a vayne deſire to aduaunce moze than reaſon woulde, thys Arthur theyr noble champion, as the Frenchemen haue done by their Roulande, and others. But to proceede.

Rather Cerdick, as Io Leland thinketh.

At his returne into Britayne, he founde that Mozdred had cauſed himſelfe to be made kyng, and hauing alyed himſelf with Cheldzike a Saxon, not hym whome Galfride (as yee haue heard,) ſuppoſeth to haue ben ſlaine before, was ready to reſiſt his landing, ſo that before he could come a lande, he loſt many of his men: but yet at lengthe hee repulſed the enimies, and ſo toke lande at Sandwiche, where he fyrſte arriued: and then ioyning in battayle wyth his enimies, diſcomfited them, but not without great loſſe of his people: ſpecially hee ſore lamented the death of Gawayn the brother of Mozdred, whyche lyke a faythfull gentleman, regarding more his honour and loyall truthe than nearenelle of bloud and couſinage, choſe rather to fight in the quarell of his liege king and louing maiſter, than to take parte with his naturall brother in an vniuſt cauſe, and ſo there in the battaile was ſlayn, together alſo with Anguſſell, to whome Arthur afore tyme had committed the gouernemente of Scotland. Mozdred fled from this battayle, and getting ſhippes, ſayled Weſtwarde, and fynally landed in Cornewall.

Gawayn buried at Douer.

King Arthur cauſed the corps of Gawayn to be buryed at Douer, (as ſome holde opinion:) But Willyam Malmeſburie ſuppoſeth, he was buryed in Wales, as after ſhall be ſhewed.

The dead bodie of Anguſſell was conueyed into Scotlande, and was there buryed.

After that Arthur hadde put his enimies to flight, and had knowledge into what part Mozdred was withdrawne, wyth all ſpeede he reenforced his armie with newe ſupplyes of ſouldiours called out of diuers parties, and with hys whole puiſſaunce, haſted forwarde, not reſting tyll hee came neere to the place where Mozdred was encamped, wyth ſuche an Armye as hee coulde aſſemble togither oute of all ſuch parties where he had any frendes.

Here (as it appeareth by Iohn Leylande, in his booke entitled, The Aſſertion of Arthure,) it may be doubted in what place Mozdred was encamped: but Geffrey of Monmouthe ſheweth, that after Arthure hadde diſcomfyted Mozdred in Kent at the firſte landyng, it chaunced ſo that Mozdred eſcaped, and fledde to Wincheſter, whyther Arthure followed hym, and there gyuyng hym battayle the ſeconde tyme, didde alſo put hym to flyght. And following him from thence, foughte eftſoones wyth hym at a place called Camblan, or Kemelene in Cornewall, (or as ſome Authours haue neere vnto Glaſtenbury.)

This battayle was foughte ſo to the vtte- Richarde Ne ner.

rance, that finally Mozdred was ſlayne, wyth the more parte of his whole armie, and Arthur receyuyng diuers mortall woundes dyed of the ſame ſhortly after, when he had reigned ouer the Britons by the terme of .xxvj. yeares. His corps was buryed at Glaſtenburye afore ſayde, in the Churche yarde, betwixte two pillers: where it was founde in the dayes of kyng Henry the ſeconde, about the yeare of our Lorde .1191. which was in the laſte yeare of the reigne of the ſame Henry, more than ſixe hundred yeeres after the buryal therof. He was layd .xvj. foot deepe vnder grounde, for doubte that his enimies the Saxons ſhoulde haue founde hym. But thoſe that digged the grounde there to fynde his bodye, after they had entred aboute ſeuen foote deepe into the earth, earth, they founde a mightie broade ſtone with a leaden croſſe faſtned to that parte whiche laye downewardes towarde the corps, conteynyng this inſcription.

Hic iacet ſepultus inclytus rex Arthurius in inſula Aualonia.

Thys inſcription was grauen on that ſyde of the Croſſe whiche was nexte to the ſtone: ſo that till the Croſſe was taken from the ſtone, it was not ſeene. His body was founde, not encloſed within a tombe of marble or other ſtone curiouſly wrought, but within a greate tree made hollow for the nonce lyke a trounke, the whych being founde and digged vp, was opened, and therein were founde the kyngs bones, of ſuche maruellous bignelle, that the ſhinne bone of his legge being ſette on the grounde, reached vp to the middle thighe of a ryghte tall manne: As a Monke of that Abbey hath written, whyche did lyue in thoſe dayes, and ſawe it. But Giraldus Cambrenſis, whyche alſo lyued in thoſe dayes, and ſpake with the Abbot of the place, by whome the boanes of thys Arthure were then founde, affirmeth, that by reporte of the ſame Abbotte, hee learned, that the ſhinne boane of the ſayd Arthur being ſette vp by the legge of a very tall manne, (the whiche the Abbot ſhewed to the ſame Giraldus) came aboue the knee of the ſame man the length of three fingers breadth, whiche is a greate deale more lykely than the other. The ſkull of his head was alſo of a wonderfull largeneſſe, ſo that the ſpace of his forheade betwixt his two eyes was a ſpanne broade. There appeared in his heade the ſignes and printes of tenne woundes or moe: All the whyche were growen into one wemme, excepte onely that whereof it ſhould ſeeme hee dyed, whiche beyng greater than the reſidue, appeared very playne. Alſo in openyng the Tombe of his wyfe queene Guenhera, that was buryed wyth hym, they founde the treſſes of hir haire whole and perfect, and fynely platted, of colour lyke to the burniſhed golde, the whiche beeing touched, immediatly fell to duſte. The Abbotte, whyche then was gouernour of the houſe, hyght Stephan, or Henry de Blois, otherwyſe de Sullie, nephewe to king Henry the ſecond (by whoſe commaundemente he hadde ſearched for the graue of Arthure) tranſlated the boanes as well of him as of Queene Guenuer, beyng ſo founde, into the greate Churche, and there buryed them in a fayre double Tombe of Marble, laying the bodye of the kyng at the head of the Tombe, and the bodye of the Queene at his feete towardes the weaſt parte.

Iohn Lelande in his booke entitled Aſſertio Arthuri, hath for the worthie memorie of ſo noble a prince, honored him with a learned Epitaph, as heere followeth.

Saxonicas toties qui fudit marte truento

Theſe verſes I haue the more willyngly inſerted, for that I had the ſame deliuered to mee turned into Engliſhe by maiſter Nicholas Roſcarock, both right aptly yelding the ſenſe, & alſo properly anſwering the Latine, verſe for verſe.

VVho vanquiſht Saxon troupes, with battayles bloudie broyles,
And purchaſte to hymſelfe a name with warlyke wealthie ſpoyles,
VVho hath with ſhiuering ſhining ſworde, the Picts ſo oft diſmayde,
And eke vnweldie ſeruile yoke on neck of Scots hath layde:
VVho Frenchmen pufft with pride, & who the Germaines fierce in fight Diſcomfited, and daunted Danes with mayne and martiall might:
VVho of that murdring Mordred did the vitall breath expell,
That monſter griſly, lothſom, huge, that direſom tyrant fell,
Here lyueleſſe Arthur lies entombde, within this ſtately hearſe,
Of chiualrie the brighte renoume, and vertues nurſlyng fierce:
VVhoſe glorie great, nowe ouer all the worlde doth compaſſe flye,
And of the ayry thunder skales, the loftie buylding hye.
Therfore you noble progenie of Brytayne lyne and race,
Aryſe vnto your Emprour great, of thryce renoumed grace,
And caſte vpon his ſacred tombe, the roſeal garlandes gaye,
That fragrant ſmell may witneſſe well, your duties you diſplay,

The occaſion that moued kyng Henry the ſeconde to cauſe his nephew the ſayd Abbotte to ſearche for the graue of kyng Arthur was, for that hee vnderſtode by a Welche minſtrell or Barde (as they call him) that coulde ſing manye hiſtories in the Welche language of the acts of the auncient Britons, that in the foreſayde Churcheyarde at Glaſtenburye, betwixte the ſayde two pillers the bodye of Arthur was to bee founde buryed ſixteene foote deepe vnder the grounde. Giraldus Cambrenſis affirmeth, that the tree in the whyche Arthurs bodie was founde ſo incloſed, was an oke, but other ſuppoſe, that it was an Alder tree, becauſe that in the ſame place a great number of that kynde of trees doe growe, and alſo for that it is knowne, that an Alder lying vnder grounde where moyſture is, will long continue without rotting.

By the fynding thus of the bodie of Arthure buryed (as before ye haue heard,) ſuche as hitherto beleeued that he was not dead, but conueyed away by the Fairies into ſome pleaſaunt place, where he ſhoulde remayne till a tyme, and then to returne agayne, and reigne in as great authoritie as euer he didde before, mighte well perceiue themſelues deceyued in crediting ſo vayne a fable: but yet (where it myghte otherwyſe be doubted whether any ſuche Arthur was at all, as the Britiſhe hiſtories mencion, bicauſe neyther Gildas nor Beda in their workes ſpeake any thyng of hym) it maye appeare, the circumſtaunces conſidered, that ſurely ſuche one there was of that name hardie and valiaunt in armes, though not in diuers poyntes ſo famous as ſome writers paint him out.

As for example in a caue neere a water called Ponde perilous at Salisburye, where he and his knights ſhould ſlepe armed, till an other knighte ſhould be born that ſhoulde come and awake them.

William Malmeſburie a writer of good credite and authoritie amongeſt the learned hathe theſe wordes in his fyrſte booke entitled De regibus Anglorum, ſaying: But he being dead (meaning Mortimer) the force of the Britons waxed feeble, their decayed hope went backewarde apace: and euen then ſurely hadde they gone to deſtruction, if Ambroſius (whiche alone of the Romaynes remayned yet alyue, and was king after Mortigerne) hadde not kepte vnder, and ſtayed the loftye Barbarous people, that is to meane the Saxons, by the notable ayde and aſſiſtaunce of the valiaunt Arthur.

VVil. Mal. lib. 1. de regibus Ang.

This is the ſame Arthur, of whome the trifling tales of the Britons euen to this day fantaſtically doe deſcante and repoꝛte wonders: but worthie was he doubtleſſe of whome feigned fables ſhoulde not haue ſo dreamed, but rather that true Hiſtories myghte haue ſette forth hys worthye prayſes, as he that dyd for a long ſeaſon ſuſteyne and holde vp hys Countrey that was readie to goe to vtter ruyne and decaye, encouraging the bolde hearts of the Britons vnto the warre, and finally in the ſiege of Badon hyll, hee ſette vppon nyne hundred of the enimyes, and with incredible ſlaughter didde putte them all to flighte.

On the contrarye parte, the Engliſhe Saxons, althoughe they were toſſed with ſundrye happes of Fortune, yet ſtill they renued theyr bandes wyth newe ſupplyes of their countreymenne that came out of Germany, and ſo with bolder courage aſſayled their enemies, and by little and little cauſyng them to giue place, ſpred themſelues ouer the whole Ile. For althoughe there were manye battayles in the whiche ſometyme the Saxons and ſometyme the Britons got the better, yet the greater number of Saxons that was ſlayne, the greater number of them ſtill came ouer to the ſuccour of their countreymen, being called in and ſente for out of euery quarter about them.

Here is alſo to be noted, that where the Britiſhe hiſtorie declareth, that Gawen or Galowyn being ſlayne in the battayle foughte betwixte Arthure and Mordred in Kent, was buryed at Douer, ſo that his boanes remayned there to be ſhewed of long time after: yet by that whyche the foreſayde Willyam Malmeſburye writeth in the thirde booke of his volume entituled De regibus Anglorum, the contrarie may ſeeme true: his wordes are theſe. Then (ſayth he) in the prouince of Wales, whiche is called Roſſe, the ſepulture of Walwyne was founde, the whyche was nephue to Arthur by his ſiſter, not going out of kind from ſo worthy an vncle. He reigned in that part of Britaine whiche vnto this daye is called VValwithia, a knighte for hys high prowes moſt highly renoumed, but expulſed out of his kingdome by the brother & nephew of Hengiſt, of whome in the firſte booke we haue made mention, firſte requiting his baniſhemente with greate detrimente and loſſe to thoſe his enimies, wherein he was partaker by iuſt deſerte of his vncles worthy praiſe, for that he ſtayed for a great many yeres, the deſtruction of his countrey which was now running headlong into vtter ruine and decay. But Arthurs graue no where appeareth: but the others tombe (as I haue ſayde) was founde in the dayes of William the Conqueror, king of England, vpon the ſea ſide, and conteyned in length fourteene foote, where he was (as ſome ſay) wounded by his enimies, and caſt vp by ſhipwrack. But other write, that he was ſlayne at a publike feaſte or banket by his owne countreymen. Thus hathe William Malmeſburye.

Gawan vvhe he is buryed.

VVil. Mal. li. 3. de regibus.

But here you muſte conſider, that the ſayde Malmeſburie departed this lyfe about the beginnyng of the reigne of kyng Henry the ſeconde, certayne yeres before the boanes of Arthur were found (as before ye haue heard).

But now to ſpeak ſomwhat of queene Guenhera or Guennever, ſome iudge that ſhe toke the name of hir excellent beautie, becauſe Guynne or Guenne in the Welch toung ſignifieth fayre, ſo that ſhe was named Guennere or rather Guellean: euen (as you would ſay) the faire or beautyfull Leonore or Helene. She was brought vp in the houſe of Cador Earle of Cornewall before Arthur maryed hir: and as it appeareth by writers, ſhe was euill reported of, as noted of incontinencie and breache of faith to hir husbande, in ſorte as for the more parte women of excellente beautie hardly eſcape the venimous blaſt of euill toungs, and the ſharpe aſſaultes of the followers of Venus. The Britiſhe hiſtorie affirmeth, that ſhe did not onely abuſe hir ſelfe by vnlawfull cõpanying with Mordred, but that alſo in Arthurs abſence, ſhe conſented to take him to husbande.

It is likewyſe founde recorded by an olde writer, that Arthure beſieged on a tyme the marriſhes neere to Glaſtenburye, for diſpleaſure that he bare vnto a certayne Lorde that highte Melua: whiche had raviſhed Guennere and ledde hir into thoſe Marſhes, and there dydde keepe hir. Hir corps notwithſtanding (as before is recited) was enterred together with Arthurs, ſo that it is thought ſhe liued not long after his deceaſſe.

Arthur had two wyues, as Giraldus Cambrenſis affirmeth, of whiche the latter (ſayth hee) was buryed with him, and his boanes founde with his in one Sepulchre, ſo deuided yet, that two partes of the Tombe towardes the heade were appointed to receyue the bones of the man, and the thyrde parte towardes the feete, conteyned the womans boanes, a parte by them ſelues.

Here is to bee remembred, that Hector Boetius writeth otherwyſe of the death of Arthure than before in thys booke is mencioned, and alſo that Guenuere beeyng taken priſoner by the Pictes, was conueyed into Scotlande, where finally ſhee dyed, and was there buryed in Angus, as in the Scottiſhe Chronicle further appeareth.

And thys may be true, if he hadde three ſundrye wyues, eche of them bearing the name of Guenhere, as ſir John Price doth auouche that hee had.

Becauſe of the contrarietie in writers touchyng the greate actes atchieued by this Arthur, and alſo for that ſome difference there is amongeſt them, aboute the tyme in whyche he ſhould reigne, many haue doubted of the truthe of the whole hiſtorie whyche of hym is written (as before ye haue heard.)

The Britiſhe hiſtories and alſo the Scottiſhe Chronicles doe agree, that he lyued in the dayes of the Emperour Juſtinian, about the fifteenth yeare of whole reigne hee dyed, whiche was in the yeare of oure Lorde. 542. as Harriſon alſo confirmeth. Howbeit ſome write farther from all lykelyhoode, that he was aboute the tyme of the Emperor Zeno, who began his reign about the yeare of our Lord. 474.

The writer of the booke entitled Aurea hiſtoria affirmeth, that in the tenth yeare of Cerdicus king of Weaſt Saxons, Arthur the warriour roſe amongeſt the Brytons. Alſo Diobionenſis writeth, that Cerdicius fyghtyng ofttymes with Arthur, if he were ouercome in one moneth, he roſe in an other moneth more fierce and ſtrong to giue battayle than before. Aurea hiſtoria. Leland.

At lengthe Arthure awearyed with yrkſomneſſe, after the twelfth yeare of the comming of Cerdicius, gaue vnto him vpon his homage don and feaultie receyued the ſhyres of Southampton and Somerſet, the whiche countreys Cerdicius named Weſt ſaxon. VVeſt ſexon.

This Cerdicius or Cerdicus came into Britayne aboute the yeare of oure Lorde. 495. and xviij. yere after his commyng hither, that is to witte, about the yeare of out Lorde. 519. he begaine his reigne ouer the Weaſt Saxons, and gouerned them as kyng by the ſpace of. xv. yeares, as before ye haue heard.

But to followe the courſe of oure Chronicles accordingly as we haue begunne, we muſte allowe of their accompte herein as in other places, and ſo proceede.

In this meane whyle that the Realme was diſquieted with ſore and continuall warres betwixte the Brytons and Saxons, (as before you haue heard) the chriſtian religion was not only aboliſhed in places where the Saxons got habitations, but alſo amongſt the Britons, the right faithe was brought into daunger by the remnaunt of the Pelagian hereſye whiche begaine agayne to be broched by dyuers naughtie perſones. But Dubritius that was fyrſte Biſhoppe of Landaffe, and after Archbiſhoppe of Caerleon Arwiſtle, and hys ſucceſſoure David, with other lerned men earneſtlye bothe by preaching and writing defended the contrarye cauſe, to the confuting of thoſe errours, and reſtabliſhing of the truth. The hereſie of the Pelagians reuiued Hiſt. Mag. Dubritius and David learned Biſhops.

Conſtãtine.

Conſtantine.

After the death of Arthur, his couſin Cõſtantine the ſon of Cadoꝛ, duke oꝛ earle of Cornwall beganne his reigne ouer the Bꝛytayns, in yeare of our Loꝛde. 542. whiche was aboute the. xb. yeare of the Emperour Juſtinianus almoſt ended, the. 29. of Childebert K. of Fraunce, and the firſt yeare wherein complete of the reigne of Totilas kyng of the Gothes in Italy. 542

Arthur when he perceyued that he ſhould dye, ordeyned this Conſtantine to ſucceede him, and ſo by the conſent of the moꝛe parte of the Bꝛytons, he was crowned kyng: but the ſonnes of Moꝛdꝛed ſoꝛe repined thereat, as they that claymed the rule of the land by iuſte title and clayme of inheritaunce to them from theyꝛ father deſcended. Galfrid. Mal. VV.

Herevpon followed ciuill warre, ſo that dyuers batayles were ſtricken betwene them, and in the ende the two bꝛethꝛen were conſtrayned to withdꝛawe foꝛ refuge, the one to London, and the other to Wincheſter: but Conſtantine purſewing them, firſte came to Wyncheſter, and by foꝛce entred the Citie, and ſlewe the one bꝛother that was fledde thyther within the churche of Saincte Amphibalus: And after commyng to London, entred that Citie alſo, and findyng the other bꝛother within a Churche, there ſlewe hym in lyke maner as he had done the other. And ſo hauing diſpatched his aduerſaries, he thoughte to haue purchaſed to himſelfe ſaftie: but ſhoꝛtly after, his owꝛ kinſman, one Aurelius Conanus arreared warre agaynſt him, who ioyning with him in battaile, ſlew him in the field, after he had reigned foure yeares. His body was conueyed to Stonehenge, and there buryed beſyde his auncell our Uter Pendꝛagon.

Ciuill warre.

Aurelius Conanus.

Conſtantine ſlayne.

Of this Conſtantine that ſeemeth to be ment whiche Gildas wꝛiteth in his booke entitled De excidio Bꝛytanniæ, where inueying agaynſte the rulers of the Bꝛytons in his tyme, hee wꝛiteth thus:

Gildas.

Bꝛitayn hath kings, but the ſame be tyꝛants: Judges it hath, but they be wicked, oftentymes pilling and harmyng the innocent people, reuenging and defending, but whome? ſuche as bee giltie perſons and robbers. Hauing many wyues, but yet bꝛeakyng wedlocke: Oftentymes ſwearyng and yet foꝛſwearing themſelues: bowing, and foꝛ the moꝛe parte lying: Warring, but mayntenyng ciuill and vniuſt warres, purſuyng in deede theeues that are abꝛoade in the countreye, and yet not onely cheriſhyng thoſe that ſitte euen at table with them, but alſo highly rewarding them: giuing almes largely, but on the other parte heaping vp a myghtie mount of ſynnes: Sitting in the ſeate of ſentence, but ſeldom ſeeking the rule of righteous iudgement: deſpiſing the innocent and humble perſons, and exalting ſo farre as in them lyeth, euen vp to the heauens, the bloudy and pꝛoud murtherers, theeues and adulterers, yea the verye expꝛeſſe enimies of God, if he woulde ſo permitte: keeping many in pꝛiſon, whom they oppꝛeſſe in lodging them with pꝛons thꝛough craſte, rather to ſerue their owne purpoſe, than foꝛ any guilte of the perſons ſo impꝛiſoned: takyng ſolemne othes afoꝛe the aultars, and ſhoꝛtly after, deſpiſing the ſame aulters as vile and filthie ſtones, of whiche heynous and wicked offence, Conſtantine the tyꝛannicall whelpe of the Lyoneſſe of Deuonſhire, is not ignoꝛãt, who this yeare after the receyuing of his dꝛeadfull othe whereby he bounde himſelf that in no wiſe he ſhould hurt his ſubiectꝛs, (God fyꝛſt, and then his othe, with the companie of Saincts, and his mother beeing there preſente) did notwithſtanding in the reuerente laps of the two mothers, as the Church, & their carnall mother, vnder the coule of the holy Abbotte, deuoure with ſwoꝛde and ſpeare in ſtead of teeth, the tender ſides, yea and the entrayles of two chyldꝛen of noble and kyngly race, and likewiſe of their two gouernours, yea and that that (as I ſayde) amongeſt the ſacred aultares: the armes of whyche perſones ſo ſlayne, not ſtretched forth to defend themſelues with weapons) the whyche fewe in thoſe dayes handled more valyauntly than they) but ſtretched forth I ſaye to God and to his altare in the daye of Iudgemente, ſhall ſette vp theyr reuerente enſignes of their pacience and fayth at the gates of the Citie of Chriſte, whyche ſo haue couered the ſeate of the Celeſtiall ſacrifice, as it were wyth the redde mantell of their cluttered bloud.

And theſe thinges he didde not after any good deedes donne by hym deſerueng prayſe: for manye yeares before ouercome wyth the often and chaungeable fylthes of adulterie, forſakyng his lawfull wyfe contrarye to the Lawes of God &c. hee nowe brought forthe thys cryme of quellyng hys owne kinſemenne, and violatyng the Churche, but neyther being lewſed from the ſnares of his former euyls, he encreaſeth the new with the olde.

Thus in effecte hathe Gildas written of thys Conſtantine with more, for tourning his tale to him by way of calling to hym, he reproueth him of his faultes, and counſelleth hym to repente.

Conanus.

AFter that Aurelius Conanus had ſlayn the forſayd Conſtãtine, as in the Britiſh hiſtories is mẽcioned, the ſame Conan was made king of Britayn in the yeare of our Lord. 546. in the. 20. yere of ỹ emperor Iuſtinianus, & in the. 33. of the reigne of Childeberte king of the Frenchmen.

Thys Aurelius Conanus (as is recorded by ſome writers) was of a noble hearte, free, and liberall, but giuen muche to the mayntenaunce of ſtryfe and diſcorde amongſt his people, lyghte of credite, and namely had an open eare to receiue and heare the reportes of ſuche as accuſed other.

Moreouer, hee was noted of crueltie, as hee that toke his vncle, who of righte ſhoulde haue bene kyng, and kepte hym in priſon, and not ſo ſatiſfyed, ſlewe in tyrannous manner the two ſonnes of his ſayde vncle. But God wouldе not ſuffer hym long to enioye the rule of the lande in ſuche vniuſt dealyng, for he dyed after he hadde reigned the ſpace of two yeares, and left a ſonne behynde hym called Vortipor us, which ſucceeded him in the kingdom, as authours do record.

Of this Aurelius Conanus Gildas writeth, calling vnto him after he hath made an end with his predeceſſor Conſtantin, in this wiſe, ſaying: And thou Lyons whelpe, as ſayeth the Prophet, Aurelius Conanus what doeſt thou? arte thou not ſwallowed vp in the fylthie myre of murthering thy kinſemen, of committyng fornications and adulteries lyke to the other before mencioned, if not more deadlye? as it were wyth the waues and ſurges of the drenching ſeas, ouerwhelmyng thee wyth hir vnmercyfull rage? Doeſt thou not in hating the peace of thy countrey as a deadly ſerpente, and thirſtyng after ciuill warres and ſpoyles, (oftentymes vniuſtly gotten) ſhutte vp againſte thy ſoule, the gates of celeſtiall peace and refreſhement? Thou being lefte alone as a wytheryng tree in the myddle of the fielde, call to remembraunce, I praye thee, the vayne youthefull fantaſy and ouertymely death of thy fathers and thy bretherne: ſhalte thou being ſette a parte, and choſen forth of all thy lynage for thy godly deſertes, bee reſerued to liue an hundred yeares, or remayne on earthe tyll thou bee as olde as Mathuſalem? No no. And after theſe reprehẽſions, with further thretnyngs of Gods vengeaunce, he exhorteth him to amendemente of life, and ſo proceedeth to talke with Vortipor us, whome he nameth the kyng, or rather the tyraunt of Southwales, as after ſhall be reherſed.

The beginning of the kingdom of Brenitia.

Ida.

IN the yeare of oure Lord 547. which was about the firſte yeare of the reygne of Aurelius Conanus, the kingdom of Brenitia began vnder a Saxon ruler there called Ida, the whiche deſcended of Woden, for where ỹ ſame Woden had three ſonnes, Weldecius, Withlegris, and Beldegius, of the firſte, the kings of Kente were lyneally extracted: of the ſeconde the kings of Mertia: and of the thirde ſonne came the kings of Weſtſaxon, and alſo of him was this Ida deſcended, being the nynth in lineall ſucceſſion from the ſayd Beldicius and the tenth from Woden.

The kingdome of Brenitia begaune.

The ſame Ida was vndoubtedly a right noble perſonage, and chaunged fyrſt that dukedom into a kyngdome, where before that tyme the Saxons that ruled there were, ſubiectes vnto the kings of Kente. Whether he toke vpon him of his owne accord to vſurpe the kingly title and royall authority, or whether that the ſame was giuen to hym by conſent of other, the certaynty appea-apeareth not. But ſure it is, that he beyng a worthie Prince, didde nothing degenerate from his noble auncestours inuincible in warre abrode and at home, qualifying his kingly seuritie with a certayne naturall kinde of curteous humanitie. The boundes of his kingdome called(as is ſaid)Brenitia, began in the ſouth at the riuer of Tyne,& ended in the North at the Forth in Scotland,in the Britiſh tong called Werd.

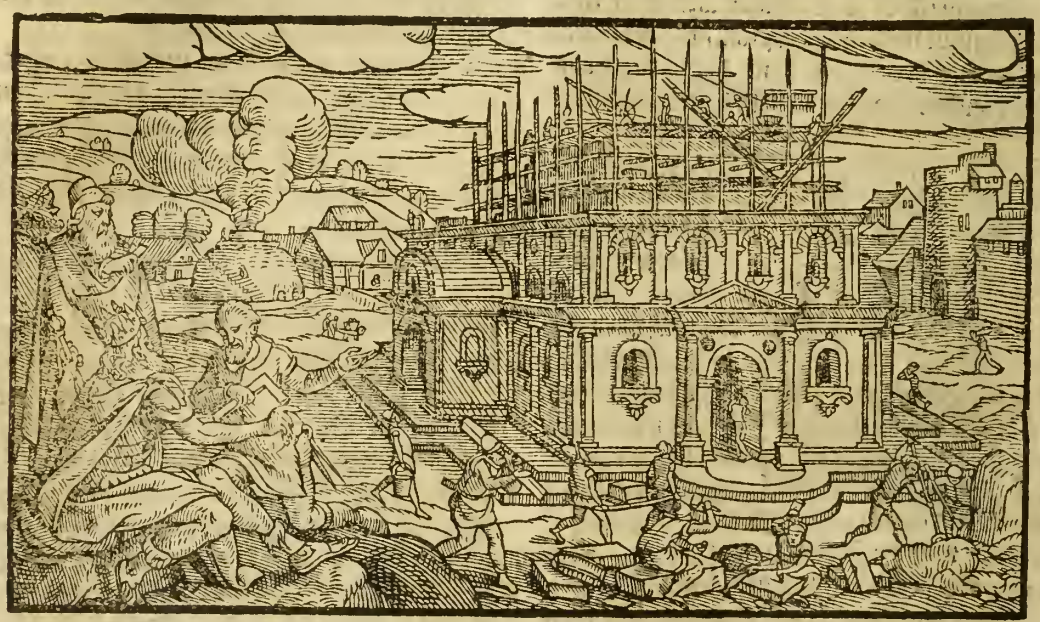
The beginning of the kingdom of Deira.



ABoute the ſame time, or rather about 14. yeeres after (as Harryſon ſayth) one Ella a Saxon alſo reygned as king in Deira, whyche kyngdome beganne at the ſaide ryuer of Tyne in the North, and ended at the riuer of Hũber toward the ſouth. Theſe two kingdomes were ſometime gouerned by two ſeuerall kings, and afterwards at other times they were ioyned in one, and gouerned by one onely king, and named the kingdome of Northumberland, the whiche in proces of tyme was muche enlarged, ſo that it included the ſhires of Yorke, Notingham,Derby, Lancaſter, the Biſhoprike of Durham, Copland, and other countreys which lye betwixt the eaſt and the weſt ſeas euen vnto the ryuer of Merſee. The foreſayd Ella was ſon to Iffus, being deſcended from Woden, as the xij. in ſucceſſion from him, though not by right lyne,as Will. Malmeſbury hath noted. Ida (as the ſame Malmeſbury dothe teſtifie) reigned.14. yeares.

The riuer Merſee.

And Ella,which was ſucceſſour to Ida (as he ſayeth) reigned thirtie yeares, and right valiantly enlarged his kingdome. But one author writeth howe Ida reigned but. xij. yeares, and that he buylded the Caſtell of Bamburc, firſte fen-

The ſame Ida had by his wyfe ſixe ſonnes, begot in lawfull bedde, Ida, Ebric, Theodoric, Athelric, Oſmer, and Theofred. Moreouer he begat of certaine concubines (which he kept) ſixe baſtarde ſonnes, Oga, Aleric, Ettha, Odbalde, Segor, and Segother. Theſe came altogether into this land,& arriued at Flemeſburk with fortie ſhippes, as Mathew VVeſtmonaſterienſis hath recorded.

The partition of the kingdome of Northumberlande chaunced after the deceaſe of Ida,as the ſame Author ſignifieth: for Ida the ſonne of the foreſaid Ida,ſucceded his father in the kingdom of Bernitia, reignyng therein ſeuen yeares:and Ella the ſonne of Hiſtria,a moſt valiant Duke, began to gouerne Deira, as both the ſayd Mat. Weſtm. and other doe affirme.

Childerike king of Fraunce, and in the fourth yeare of Clephis the Gotiſhe king in Italy. This Uortipozus vanquiſhed the Saxons in batayle, as the Britiſhe hiſtozies make mention, and valiantly defended his lande and ſubiectes the Brytons, from the daunger of them & other their alies. In the tyme of this kyngs reigne the fozeſayde Ella began to rule in the ſouth parte of the kingdome of Nozthumberlande called Deira, as bekoze is mencioned, accozding to the accõpt of ſome authozs, who alſo take this Uortipozus to begin his reigne in the yeare. 548. Fynally after that Uortipozus hadde ruled the Britons the ſpace of. iiij. yeares, he departed this lyfe, and left no iſſue behynde him to ſuccede him in the kingdome: Againſt whome alſo Gildas turning his tale beginneth with him thus: And why ſtandeſt thou as one ſtarke amazed, thou (I ſay) Uortipozus, the tyzaunt of Southwales, lyke to the Panther in manners and wickednelle, dyuerſly ſpotted as it were with many colours, with thy hoze head in thy thzone full of decepytes, craftes, and wyles, and defiled euen from the loweſt part of thy bodie vp to the crowne of the heade, with diuers ſundzye murthers committed in thyne owne kinne, and filthye adulteries, thus pzouing a naughtie ſonne of a good king, as Manaſſes was to Ezechias: how chanceth it that the violente ſtreames of ſinnes, which thou ſwalloweſt vp lyke pleaſant wyne, oz rather arte deuoured of them, (the ende of thy lyfe by little and little nowe dzawyng neere,) can not yet ſatiſfye thee? What meaneſt thou that with foznication of all euyls, as it were the ful heape, thyne owne wyfe being putte awaye, and by hir honeſte death doeſt oppzeſſe thy ſoule wyth a certayne burdeyn that can not bee auoyded, of thyne vnſhamefaſt daughter? Conſume not (I pzay thee) the relydue of thy dayes to the offence of God, and ſo fozth, exhozting him to repentaunce, wyth admonitions taken oute of the Scriptures, bothe foz his comfozte and warnyng.

If the circumſtaunce of thys that Gildas wziteth of Uortipozus bee marked, it maye bee perceyued, that Geffrey of Monmouthe, and alſo Mathewe of Weſtminſter, the Authour of the Floures of hiſtozies, are deceyued in that they take hym to bee the ſonne of Aurelius Conanus: and rather it maye bee gathered, that not onely the ſame Aurelius Conanus and Uortipozus, but alſo Conſtantinus, yea and Cuneglaſus, and Maglocunus, of the whiche he alſo intreateth (as partly ſhall bee hereafter touched) liued, and reigned all at one tyme in ſeuerall partes of thys Ile, and not as Monarkes of the whole Britiſhe nation, but as rulers eche of them in his quarter, after the manner as the ſtate of Irelande hath bin in tymes paſte bekoze the countrey came vnder the Engliſhe ſubiection, if my coniecture herein doe not deceyue me.

Malgo.

Malgo.

AFter the deceaſſe of Uortipozus, Malgo that was nephewe to Aurelius Conanus, (as ſome wzite) was made king of Britayne, and began his reigne ouer the Britons, in the yeare of our Lozd. 580. in the. xv. yeere of the Emperoz Juſtinian, and in the. 37. yeere of the reigne of Childerick king of the Frenchmen.

Math. VVeſt. hath noted. 581.

This Malgo is repozted to haue beene the comelyeſt Gentleman in beautie and ſhape of perſonage that was to be founde in thoſe dayes amongeſt all the Brytons, and therewith of a bolde and hardie courage. Hee manfully defended the countrey which he had in gouernaunce, from the malice of the Saxons, & ſubdued the out Iles, as Dzkeneye and others. But notwithſtãding the noble qualities with the whiche his perſone was adozned, yet hee ſpotted them all with the foule filthie ſynne of Sodomie, ſo that he fell into the hatred of Almightie God, and being purſued of the Saxons, receyued many ouerthzowes at their handes, as by the repozte of the Engliſhe wziters is gathered moze at large. Finallye when hee had reigned fiue yeeres and odde moneths, hee departed this lyfe.

Gal. Mon.

Iſt ſeemeth that this Malgo is named by Gildas Maglocunus, the whiche Gildas bekoze he ſpeaketh of him, inueyeth againſt one Cuneglaſus, whom he repzoueth, foz that he warred both againſt God and man: againſt God with greuous ſins, as namely adulterie, in foꝛſaking the companie of his lauful wife, and keeping to concubine a ſyſter of hirs, that hadde pzofeſſed chaſtitie: and againſte man with materiall armoz and weapons, whiche hee vſed to the diſtruction of his owne countreymen, with whome he kept warres, and not againſt the enimies of the common wealth. From Cuneglaſus he commeth to the fozſayde Maglocune, whome hee nameth the Dzagon of the Math. VVeſt. compteth not paſt fiue yeeres to his reigne, vvhom Hariſ. folovveth, although other affirme that he reigned. 35. yeares.

of the Iſles, and the expeller of many tyrants, not only out of their kingdomes, but alſo out of lyfe, the laſt of whome he entreateth (as he himſelfe ſayth) but the firſt in all miſchiefe and euil, greater than manye in power, and lykewiſe in malice: right liberall in giuing, but more plentifull in ſinne: ſtrong and valiant in armes, but ſtronger in deſtruction of his owne ſoule. And ſo proceeding chargeth him with the ſinne of the Sodomites, and ſore blameth him for that wher it had pleaſed God to make him hygher than all the other Dukes of Britayne in kyngdome and degree, hee didde not ſhewe hymſelfe better, but contrarely worſe than they by farre in manners and conditions. Hee declareth alſo a little after that this Maglocune in his young yeares ſlewe in battayle his vncle being king, with the moſt valiaunt ſouldiours in manner that he had.

Alſo that where the ſame Maglocune toke vpon him the profeſſion of a Monke, he after renounced the ſame, and becam a worſe liuer than euer he was before, abandoning his wyfe, and keping his brothers ſonnes wife, whileſt hir huſbande yet lyued.

Thus by that whiche Gildas wryteth of the kings and rulers of the Britons whiche lyued in his dayes, ye may perceiue that they were giuen to all manner of wickednеſſe, and namely to ciuill diſſention, rapine, adulterie and fornication: ſo that it maye bee thoughte, that God ſtirred vp the Saxons to be a ſcurge to them, and to worke his iuſte vengeaunce vppon them for theyr wicked and abhominable offences dayly committed againſt his diuine maieſtie, ſo that we fynde recorded by writers howe that the Saxons in dyuers conflictes againſt the Brytons hadde the better, and alſo toke from them diuers townes as already partly hath bin and alſo hereafter ſhal be ſhewed.

IT is furthermore to be remembred, that about the.14. yeare of the Britayn king Conanus his reigne, whiche was aboute the end of the yeare of Chriſte. 559. Kenrike kyng of the Weſtſaxons departed this lyfe, after he hadde reigned.25. yeares complete. 559.

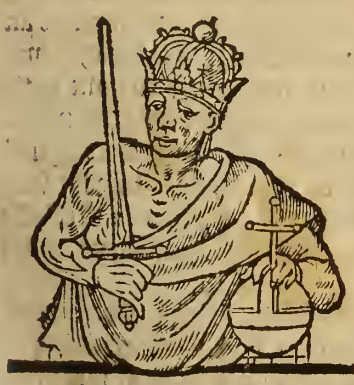
This Kenrike was a victorious Prince, and fought diuers battailes againſt the Britons. In the.xviij. yeare of his reigne which was the. 551. of Chriſt, we fynd that he fought againſt them, beeing come at that tyme vnto Saliſburie, and after greate ſlaughter made on bothe partes, at length the victorie remayned with the Saxons, and the Britons were chaſed. Againe in the two and twentie yere of his reigne and. 555. yere of Chriſt, the ſame Kenrik and his ſon Chebling fought with a greate power of Britons at Beranbury. H. Hunt.

The Britons were diuided into. ix. cõpanies, iij. in the foreward. iij. in the battayle. & iij in the rereward with their horſmen & archers, after the maner of the Romans. The Saxons being ranged in one entier bataile, baliantly aſſailed them, and notwithſtanding the ſhot of the Britons, yet they brought the matter to the triall of handblowes, til at length by the cõming on of the night, the victorie remained doubtfull: and no maruell is to be made therof (ſayeth Henry Archedeacon of Huntington) ſith the Saxons were menne of ſuche huge ſtature, greate force and valyaunt courage.

The ſame yeare that Kenrike deceaſſed, Ida the king of Northumberlande alſo died: he was (as ye haue heard) a right baliãt prince, & enlarged the dominion of the Saxons greately. He ouercame in battaile Loth king of the Pictes, and Gorrane or rather Conrane king of Scots.

Alſo about the yeare of Chriſt. 560. Conanus (as yet gouerning the Britons) Irmenrike king of Kente, departed this lyfe, of whome ye haue heard before, and Ethelberte his ſonne ſucceeded him. 52. yeres. Then after that the forſaid three princes were dead (as before ye haue heard) they had that ſucceeded thẽ in their eſtates as here followeth. After Kenrike, his ſonne Ceaulinus or Cheblyng ſucceeded in gouernment of the Weſtſaxons: and after Ida, one Ella or Alla reigned in Northumberland: After Irmenrike followed his ſonne Ethelberte in rule ouer the Kentiſhe Saxons. 560. H. Hunt.

This Ethelberte in proceſſe of tyme grewe to be a mightie prince, but yet in the beginnyng of his reign, he had but ſory ſucceſſe againſt ſome of his enimies: for hauing to do with the forſaid Cheblyng king of Weſtſaxons, he was of hym ouercome in battaile at Wilbaldowne, where he loſt two of his dukes or chiefe Captaines, beſide other people. This was the firſt batteil that was foughten betwixte the Saxons, one againſte an other within this land, after their firſt comming into the ſame. And this chaunced in the yeare of our Lorde. 567. being the ſeconde yeare of the Emperour Juſtinus. H. Hunt. lias VVi. handun.



ABoute the yeare. 570. Cutha the brother of king Cheblyng foughte with the Brytons at Bedforde and ouercame them, and toke from them foure townes, Ligaubrough, Egleſbroughe, or Aylesburye, Beſington, and Eueſham. Alſo about the yeare of our Lorde. 581. the forſayde King Ceuling encountred with the Britaynes at a place called Dyorth, and obteyning the vpper hand, toke from them the Cities of Bathe, Gloueeſter, and Cirenceſter. 570. Cutha. Aleſbury. 581.

At this battayle fought at Dyorth, were preſente three kyngs of the Britons, whoſe names were theſe: Coinmagill, Candidan, and Farinnagill, the whiche were ſlayne there through the

the permission of almightie God as then refusing his people, the which through their heynous sinnes and great wickednesse, had most greuously offended his high and diuine Maiestie, as by Gildas it may euidently appeare: for they hadde declined from the lawes of the Lorde, and were become abhominable in his sight, euen from the Prince to the poore man, from the Priest to the Leuite, so that not one estate amongest them walked vprightley, but contrarie to duetie was gone astraye, by reason whereof, the righteous God had giuen them ouer as a pray to their enimyes.

Also in the latter ende of Malgos dayes or about the first beginning of the reigne of his successour Caretieus, Chebling and his sonne Cutwyne fought with the Brytons at a place called Feehanley or Fedanley, or as some bookes haue, Frithenlye, where Cutwyn was slayne, and the Englishemen chased: but yet Chebling repairing his armie, wan the victorie, and chased the Britons, and toke from them many countreys, and wan great riches by the spoyle. But Math. Westm. sayth, that the victorie aboode with the Brytons, and that the Saxons were chased quite out of the fielde. The Scottishe writers recorde, that their king Aydan was there in ayde of the Brytons, and Brudeus kyng of the Pictes in ayde of the Saxons: but the same writers name the place Deglaston, where this battayle was foughte.

The beginning of the kingdome of Mercia.

About the same time also and. 585. of Christ, the kyngdome of Mercie began vnder one Crida, that was descended from Woden, and the tenth from him by lineall extraction. The boundes of this kingdom were of great distance hauing on the east the sea vnto Humber, and so on the North the sayde riuer of Humber, and after the ryuer of Mercie, whiche falleth into the weast sea at the corner of Wyrehall, and so comming aboute to the ryuer of Dee that passeth by Chester, the same ryuer bounded it on the Weast from Wales, and likewyse Seuerne vp to Bristow: on the south it had the ryuer of Thames, til it came almost to London: And in this sort it contayned Lincolneshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Cheshyre, Shropshire, Worcestershire, Gloucestershire, Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Herefordshire, Bedfordshire, Huntingtonshire, Northamptonshire, Leycestershire, and Warwikeshire.

Thus haue ye heard how the Saxons in proces of tyme removing the Britons out of their seates, daylye wanne grounde of them, till at length they got possession of the best part of this Isle, and erected within the same seuen kingdomes, whiche were gouerned by seauen seuerall kings, which continued vntill at length the kinges of Westsaxō brought them al into one Monarchie, as after shal appere. Mat. Westm. reckeneth. viij. kingdomes as thus. The kingdome of Kent, the kingdome of Sussex, the kingdome of Essex, the kingdom of Eastangle, the kingdome of Mercia, the kyngdome of Weastsex, and the kyngdome of Northumberlande, whyche was diuided into two kyngdomes, that is to wit, into Deira and into Bernitia: whereunto Harison addeth the nynth in the first part of his chronologie, and calleth it Wales.

Caretieus or Caretius K. of Britayn.

After that Malgo or Maglocune was departed this lyfe, one Caretieus (or as some write hym Caretius) was made Kyng of the Britons and began his Reigne in the yeare of our Lorde. 586 whiche was in the thyrde yeare of the Emperoure Mauritius and thirteenth of Chilperike king of Fraunce. Caretieus. 586.

This Caretieus was a noryssher of ciuill warre and discention amongst his own people the Britons, so that he was hated both of god and man as writers testifye.

The Saxons vnderstanding that the Britons were not of one mind, but deuided in partakings, so as one was ready to deuoure an other, they thought it good time for them to aduaunce their conquests, and ceassed not to pursue the Britons by force and continuall warre, till they had constrained them for refuge to withdraw into Wales. And as some haue written, the Saxons meanyng to make a full conquest of the lande, sent ouer into Ireland, requiring one Eurmundus a kyng of the Affricanes to come ouer into Britayne to healpe them agaynste the Brytaynes. Gulf. Mon. Ranulf. Cest.

See more of this Garmundus in Ireland.

This

This Gurmundus appoyntyng his brother Targelius to purſue the conqueſt of Irelande, came and arriued here in Britayn, making ſuche cruell warre in ayde of the Saxons againſt the Britons, that Careticus was conſtreyned to keepe him within the citie of Ciceſter, or Cirenceſter, and was there beſieged, and at length by continuall aſſaults and ſkirmiſhes, when he had loſt manie of his men, hee was glad to forſake that citie, and fled into Wales.

Gourmonde toke Cirenceſter or Chicheſter, and deſtroyed it in moſte cruell manner. Some write, that he toke this citie by a policie of war, in bynding to the feet of Sparrowes whiche his people had caught, certaine clewes of threede or matches, finely wrought and tempred with matter readie to take fire, ſo that the Sparrowes being ſuffered to goe out of hande, flewe into the towne to lodge them ſelues within their neſtes whiche they had made in ſtackes of corne, and eues of houſes, ſo that the towne was thereby ſet on fyre, and then the Brytons iſſuing forth, foughte with their enimies, and were ouercome and diſcomfited.

But whyleſt the battayle continued, Careticus ſtale away, and got him into Wales. After this, the forſayd Gurmonde deſtroyed thys lande throughout in pitifull wyſe, and then deliuered it in poſſeſſion to the Saxons, the whiche thankfully receiued it: and bicauſe they were deſcended of thoſe that firſte came ouer with Hengiſt, they chaunged the name of the lande, and called it Hengiſtlande, accordingly as the ſame Hengiſt had in tymes paſt ordeined: the whiche name after for ſhortneſſe of ſpeeche was ſomewhat altered, and ſo laſtly called Englande, and the people Engliſhmen.

But rather it may be thought, that ſith a great part of thoſe people whiche came ouer into thys lande out of Germanie with the ſayde Engiſte, and other captaines, were of thoſe Engliſhmen whiche inhabited Germanie, about the parties of Thoringhen, they called this land England, after their name, when they had firſt got habitatiõ within it: and ſo both the lande and people toke name of them, beeing called Angli long tyme before they entered into this Iſle (as before is ſhewed out of Cornelius Tacitus and others.) But nowe to returne where we lefte. Mat. VV.

Of this Gurmounde the olde Engliſh wryters make no mention, nor alſo any auncient authors of forreyn parties: and yet ſayth the Britiſh booke, that after he had conquered this land, & giuẽ it to the Saxons, he paſſed ouer into Frãce, and there deſtroyed muche of that lande, as an enemy to the faith of Chriſte: for whiche conſideratiõ, he was the more ready to come to the ayde of the Saxons, who as yet hadde not receyued the Chriſtian fayth, but warred againſt the Brytaynes, as well for to deſtroy the faith of Chryſte within this lande, as to eſtablyſhe to them ſelues contynuall habitations in the ſame.

There bee, that omittyng to make mention of Gurmounde, write thus of the expulſing of the Brytaynes oute of this lande at that tyme when wyth their king Careticus they got them into Wales. It ſhould ſeem that this hiſtorie of Gurmond is but ſome forged tale extant, it may be that he vvas ſome Dane, Norvvegian or Germaine.

IN the yeare of grace. 586. Kareticus a louer of ciuil warre ſucceded Malgo an enimie to God and to the Britons, whoſe inconſtancie when the Engliſhe and Saxon kinges perceiued, with one conſent they roſe againſte him, and after many battails chaſed him from citie to citie, till at lengthe enconntring wyth him in a pight field, they droue him beyond Seuerne into Wales. Herebpon clerks and prieſtes were dryuen oute of theyr places with brighte ſwordes bran- Mat. VV.

brandishing in all partes, and fire crackling in Churches, wherewith the same were consumed. The remnante of the Britaynes therefore withdrew into the West partes of the land, that is to witte into Cornewale, and into Wales, out of which countreys they oftentimes brake out, and made reyses vppon the Saxons, the whyche in manner aforesayde, gote possession of the chiefest partes of the lande, leauing to the Britaynes only three prouinces, that is to witte, Cornewale, Southwales, and Northwales, which countreis were not easie to be wonne, by reason of the thick woodes enuirened with deepe marishes and waters, & full of high craggy rockes, & Mountaines.

The English and Saxon Kings hauing thus remoued the Britaynes, enlarged the boundes of their dominions. There raigned in that season within this land beside the Britaine Kings eight Kings of the Englishe and Saxon nations, as Ethelbert in Kent, Cissa in Sussex, Ceaulne in Westsex, Credda or Crida in Mercia, Erkenwine in Essex, Titila in Estangle, Elle in Deira, and Alfrid in Bernicia. In this sort the Britaynes lost the possession of the more part of their auntiente seates, and the faithe of Christ thereby was greatly decayed: for the Churches were destroyed, & the Archbishops of Caerleon Irwske, London, and Yorke, withdrewe togither with their Cleargie into the Mountaynes and woods within Wales, taking with them the relikes of Saintes for doubt the same shoulde be destroyed by the enimies, and themselues put to deathe if they should abide in their olde habitations. Many also fled into Britaine Armorike with a greate fleete of Shippes, so that the whole Church or congregation (as yee may call it) of the two prouinces, Loegria and Northumberland, was left desolate in that season, to the great hinderance and decay of the Christian Religion. Caeticus was driue into Wales (as before is rehearsed) about the second or third yeare of his raigne, and there continued with his Britaines, the which ceassed not to endomage the Saxons from time to time as occasiō serued. But heere is to be noted, that ỳ Britanes being thus remoued into Wales & Cornewall, were gouerned afterwardes by three kings, or rather Tirants, the which ceassed not with ciuill warre to seeke eache others destruction, till finally as sayth the Brittish booke, they became all subiect vnto Cadwallo, whome Bede nameth Cedwallo. In ỳ mean time Ciaulinus or Cheuling King of the West Saxons, through hys owne misgouernance and tyrannie whyche towardes his latter dayes hee practised, did procure not only the Britaines, but also his own subiects to conspire his deathe, so that ioyning in battell with his aduersaries at Wodenesdic in the. 32. yere of his raigne, his army was discomfited, and he himselfe constreyned to departe into exile, and shortly after ended his life before he coulde fynde meanes to be restored.

Ceolric.

After this Cheuling, his Nephewe Celricus or Ceolric that was sonne vnto Cutwine, ỳ sonne of the forsayde Cheuling, raigned as Kyng ouer the West Saxons fiue yeares fiue monethes. In like manner the same yeare dyed Ella or Alla Kyng of Northumberland, after whome succeeded Ethelricus the sonne of Ida, & raigned but fiue yeares, being a man well stept into age before he came to be King. About three yeares after this, the Saxons and Britaines fought a battel at Wodenesbourne, where the Britaynes beeing raunged in good order, the Saxons set vpon them boldly indeede, but disordredly, so that the victory remayned with the Britaynes. The Saxons the more valiant they had shewed themselues in battel, before that time, so much the more slowe and vntowardly did they shewe themselues nowe in running away to saue themselues, so that an huge number of them were slayne. Also about ỳ same time dyed Crida King of Mercia by. 594. after whome his sonne Wibbas or Wipha succeeded. And after the decesse of Ethelrike, one Edelfert or Edelfride surnamed the wilde, succeeded in gouernement of the Northumbers. But to returne to our purpose. Ethelbert King of Kent not discouraged with the euill chance whiche hapned in the beginning, but rather occasioned thereby to learne more experience in feates of warre, proued so perfect a master therein, that in processe of time hee subdued by force of armes all those Englishe Saxons whiche lay betwixte the boundes of hys countrey, and the Riuer of Humber. Also to haue friendship in forraine partes, he procured a Wife for himselfe of the French nation, named the Lady Bertha, being King Cheribertes daughter of France, but with condition that he should permit hir to continue and vse the rites and lawes of the Christian faith and Religion, and to haue a Bishop whose name was Luydhard, appointed to come and remayne with hir here in this lande for hir better instructiō in the lawes of the Lord: so that they two with other of the French nation that came ouer with them remaining in ỳ Court and vsing to serue God in prayers and otherwise according to the custome of the Christian Religion, began vndoubtedly to giue light to ỳ kings mind as yet darkned with the Cloudes of Paganisme, so as the bright beames of ỳ celestial clerenesse of vnderstanding remoued the thicke mistes

It is recorded by diuers writers, that the verie occaſion whereby Gregory was moued thus to ſend Auguſtine into this lād, roſe by this meanes: It chanced whileſt the ſame Gregory was as yet but Archdeacon of the Sea of Rome, certayne yong boyes were brought thither to be ſolde out of Northumberland, according to the cuſtomable vſe of that countrey, in ſomuche that as we haue in our time ſeene (ſaith Wil. Mal.) the people of that prouince haue not yet doubted to ſell away their neere kinſfolke for a ſmall price. Whē thoſe children whiche at that time were brought from thence to Rome, had by reaſon of their excellente beauties and comely ſhape of limmes and body, turned the eyes in manner of all the Citizens to the beholding of them, it fortuned that Gregory alſo came amongſt other to beholde them, and when hee conſidered and well viewed their fayre ſkinnes, their ſweete viſages, and beautifull buſſhes of their bright and yellow heares, he demanded out of what region or land they came, vnto whome aunſwere was made, that they were brought out of Britayne, the inhabitants of whiche countrey were of the like beautifull aſpect: thē he aſked whether the men of that countrey were Chriſtians, or as yet entangled with blinde heathenish errors, whereunto it was aunſwered, that they were not chriſtned, but followed the Religion of the Gentiles, whereat Gregory fetching a deepe ſigh, ſayd: oh alas that the author of darkneſſe doth as yet poſſeſſe mē of ſo bright ſome coūtenances, & that with the grace of ſuche faire ſhining viſages, they beare about minds voyde of inward grace. He demanded againe by what name ỳ people were called, & anſwere was made, ỳ they wer called Angli, that is to ſay Engliſhmē. And worthily (ſaith he) for they haue angels faces, and ſuch as ought to be made fellow heires with Angels in Heauen. Then aſked he ỳ name of ỳ prouince frō whēce they were brought, & it was tolde him they were of Deira. It is well ſayd hee, they are to be deliuered de ira dei, that is to ſay, from the ire and wrath of God, & called to the mercy of Chriſt our Lord. What name (ſayde he) hath the King of that prouince, whereunto anſwere was made that he was called Alla, whereupō alluding to ỳ name, he ſaid, that Alleluia ought to be ſong in thoſe partes to the praiſe & honor of God ỳ creator. And hereupō comming to Benedict the firſt of ỳ name as then Biſhop of Rome, hee required him ỳ ſome learned mē might be ſent into Englād to preach ỳ Goſpel vnto the Engliſhmē, offering himſelfe to be one of the number: but though Benedict was cōtented to graunt his requeſt, yet ỳ Romanes had him in ſuch eſtimatiō, that they would not cōſent ỳ he ſhould depart ſo farre from ỳ citie, ſo that by thē he was at that time ſtayed of that his godly purpoſe. But whē he came to be Biſhop, he thought to performe it, though not by himſelf, yet by other: & ſo Auguſtine & his felowes wer ſent by him about it (as before is ſayd.) By the way as they were paſſing in their iourney, ſuch a ſoddayne feare entred into their harts, that (as ſome write) they returned all. Other write, that Auguſtine was ſent back to Gregory to ſue that they might be releaſſed of that voyage ſo dāgerous and vncertain amongſt ſuch a barbarous people, whoſe language they neyther knewe, nor whoſe rudeneſſe they wer able to reſiſt. Thē Gregory with pithie perſwaſions confirming and cōforting him, ſente him againe with letters vnto the Biſhop of Arles, willing him to help and ayd the ſayde Auſtine and his company in all what ſo euer his neede required. Alſo other letters he directed by the foreſaide Auſtine vnto hys fellowes, exhorting them to goe forewarde boldly in the Lordes worke, as by the tenor of the ſayde Epiſtle heere following may appeare.

Gregorius ſeruus ſeruorum Dei Domini noſtri Quia melius fuerat bona non incipere quàm ab ijs quæ cepta ſunt cogitatione retrorſum redire. &c.

In Engliſh, Gregory the ſeruant of Gods ſeruauntes, to the ſeruantes of oure Lorde. For as muche as it is better not to take good thyngs in hande, than after they bee begunne, to thynke to reuolte backe from the ſame agayne, therefore now you may not nor cannot (deere children) but with all feruente studie and labour must needes goe forwarde in that good businesse, whiche thorough the helpe of God you haue well begunne. Neyther let the labour of youre iourney, nor the slanderous tongues of men apall you, but that with all instance and feruencie yee proceede and accomplish the thing which the Lord hath ordeyned you to take in hãd, knowing that your great trauell shall be recompensed with reward of greater glory hereafter to come. Therefore as we send heere Austin to you agayne, whome also we haue ordeyned to be your gouernoure, so do you humbly obey him in all things, knowing that it shall be profitable for your soules what soeuer at hys admonitiõ ye shall doe. Almighty God with hys grace defende you, and graunt me to see in the eternall countrey the fruite of your labour, that although I cannot labour in the same felowshippe with you togither, the Lorde God keepe you safe most deere and welbeloued children. Dated the tenth before the Calendes of August, in the raigne of our soueraigne Lorde Mauritius most vertuous Emperour, the fourteenth of his Empire.

Thus they emboldned and comforted through the good wordes and wholesome exhortation of Gregory, set forward agayne, and speeding forth their iourney, they first arriued at ẏ Isle of Thanet in Kente in the moneth of July, being in nũber about fortie persons, of the whiche diuers were interpreters whom they brought with them out of Fraunce. These they sente vnto King Ethelbert, signifying to him the occasion of theyr comming, who hearing the messengers within a fewe dayes after, went into that Isle, and there abyde out of any house sate downe, and caused Augustine and hys fellowes to come before him, for he would not come vnder any roofe with thẽ, fore doubting to bee bewitched by them, beeyng perswaded that they were practised in nigromãcie. But they comming to him, not by the power of the Deuill (as they sayd) but by the myght and power of Almightie God, bearing in stede of a banner a Crosse of syluer, and an Image of our Lord & Sauioure paynted in a Table, & thereto singing ẏ Letanies, made intercessiõ vnto the L. for the euerlasting preseruation of themselues, & of all them for whome and to whome they came.

The seuenfold Letanies of S. Gregory were not yet deuised.

And when they being set downe by commãdement of the King, had preached the worde of life to him and to all those that came thither with him, he made them this answere, that their wordes and promises were good: but for as much as the same were new and vncertayne to him that had bin brought vp in the contrary doctrine, he could not rashly assent to their admonitions, and leaue that beleefe which he and the English nation had so long a time obserued and kept: but (sayd he) because ye haue trauelled farre to the intent to make vs partakers of those things whiche ye beleeue to bee most true and perfecte, wee will thus muche graunt vnto you, that yee shall bee receyued into this countrey, and haue herbrough with thyngs sufficient found vnto you for your mayntenance and sustentation: neither will we hinder you, but ẏ ye may by Preaching associat a fayre as many of our subiectes as ye can vnto your law and beliefe. They had therefore assigned vnto them a place to lodge in within the City of Canterbury, which was ẏ head citie of al his dominion. It is said ẏ as they approched ẏ citie according to their manner, they had a crosse borne afore them, with an image of our Lorde Jesus Christe, and they followed in singing this Letany: Deprecamur te Domine in omni misericordia tua, vt auferatur furor tuus & ira tua à ciuitate ista & de domo sancta tua, quoniã peccauimus. alleluya. That is to say VVe beseech the O Lord in al thy mercy that thy fury and wrath may be taken from this citie, and from thy holy houſe, for wee haue ſynned. Prayſe be to thee oh Lorde. After they were receyued into Canterbury, they began to followe the trade of lyfe whiche the Apoſtles vſed in the Beda. primatiue Churche, that is to witte, exerciſing Mat. VVeſt. themſelues in continuall prayer, watching, faſting, and in preaching the woꝛde to as many as they coulde, deſpiſing all woꝛldly pleaſures, as not apperteyning to them, receyuing onely (of them whome they taughte) thyngs that ſeemed neceſſary foꝛ the ſuſtenance of their life, and liuing in all poyntes accoꝛding to the doctrine whyche they ſet foꝛthe, hauing theyꝛ mindes ready to ſuffer in patience all aduerſities what ſo euer, yea and death it ſelfe, foꝛ the confirming of that whi- The Chriſtian faith receyued of the Engliſhmen. che they nowe preached. Heereupon, many of the Engliſhe people beleeued and were baptiſed, hauing in greate reuerence the ſimplicitie of the innocente liues of thoſe men, and the ſweeteneſſe of their heauenly doctrine. There was a Church neere to the Citie on the Eaſt parte thereof dedicated in the honoꝛ of Saint Martine, and buylded of old time whileſt the Romaynes as yet inhabited Britayne, in the whiche the Queene being (as we haue ſayd) a Chriſtian, vſed to make hir prayers. To this Churche Auſtine and hys fellowes at their firſt comming accuſtomed to reſoꝛte, and there to ſing, to pray, to ſay Maſſe, to preach and to baptiſe, till at length the Kyng being conuerted, graunted them licence to preache in euery place, and to buylde and reſtoꝛe Churches where they thought good. After that ỹ King being perſwaded by their doctrine, good examples giuing, and diuers miracles ſhewed, was once baptiſed, the people in great number begã to giue care vnto the Preaching of the Goſpell, and renouncing their heathenith beleefe, became Chriſtians, in ſo much that as Gregoꝛy remembꝛeth, Lib. 7. ther were baptiſed tenne thouſand perſons in one day, being the feaſt of the natiuitie of our Sauiour. 597. indictione. Polieron. But ſome wꝛite how thys ſhould chance towarde the latter ende of Auguſtines dayes, after he was admitted to preach the Goſpell amongſt them that inhabited about Yoꝛke (as ſome wꝛite) which affirme, that the ſaid number of tenne thouſande was baptiſed in the Riuer of Suale, whiche as William Harriſon ſayeth, cannot be verified, becauſe of the indiction and death of Gregoꝛy. But to proceede: The king reioiced at the conuerſion thus of his people, how- Beda. lib. 1. cap. 26. & 27. beit, he would not foꝛce any man to be baptiſed, but only ſhewed by his behauiour, that he fauoꝛed thoſe that beleeued moꝛe than other, as fellowe Citizens with him of the heauenly Kingdome: foꝛ he learned of them that had inſtructed hym in the faith, that the obedience due to Chriſt oughte not to be inforced, but to come of good wil. Moꝛeouer, he pꝛouided foꝛ Auguſtine and his fellowes a conuenient place foꝛ their habitation within the Citie of Canterbury, and further gaue them neceſſary reuenewes in poſſeſſion foꝛ their maynteRe'ligion not to be inforced, but taughte and preached. nance. After that the faith of Chriſte was thus receyued of the Engliſhmen, Auguſtine went into Fraunce, and there of the Archbiſhop of Arles named Etherius, he was oꝛdeined Archbiſhop of the Engliſhe nation, accoꝛding to the oꝛder pꝛeſcribed by Gregoꝛie befoꝛe ỹ departure of the ſaide Auguſtine frõ Rome. After his returne into Britane, he ſent Laurẽce a Pꝛieſt, & Peeter a Monke vnto Rome, to giue knowledge vnto Gregoꝛy the Biſhop, howe the Engliſhmen had receyued the faith, and that hee was oꝛdeyned Archbiſhop of the land, accoꝛding to that he had commaunded, if the woꝛke pꝛoſpered vnder his hande as it had done. He alſo required to haue Gregoꝛies aduice touching certain oꝛdinances to be made and obſerued in the new Church of England: whereAuguſtine oꝛdeyned Archbiſhop of the Engliſh nation. Laurence Prieſt.

vpon Gregory in sending backe the messengers wrote answer vnto all his demaundes, and first touching the conuersation of Archbishops with ẏ Cleargie, and in what sorte the Churche goodes oughte to be employed, he declareth that the auntient custome of the Apostolike See was to giue commaundemente vntō Bishops ordeyned, that the profytes & reuenewes of their benefices ought to be deuided into foure partes, whereof the firste should be appoynted to the Bishop and his family for the maynetenance of hospitalitie: the second should be assigned to the Cleargie: the thirde to be giuen to the poore: and the fourth to be employed vpon repayring of temples. Also as touching the diuersitie of customes in Churches. And where in the Churche of Rome one custome in saying of Masse or ẏ Liturgie was obserued, and an other custome in France, concerning such Church seruice. Gregory aduised Augustine that if he found anye thing either in the Churche of Rome, either in the Churche of Fraunce, or in anye other Churche whiche might most please the almightie God, he should diligently chose it forth, and instruct the Church of England (now beyng new) according to that forme whiche hee shoulde gather forth of the sayd Churches: for the thyngs are not loued for the places sake, but the places for the things sake.

Also for the punishing of suche as had stolen things out of Churches, so neere as might bee, the offender shoulde bee chastised in charitie, so as he might know his fault, and if it were possible, restore the thing taken away. Also as touching degrees in mariages, Englishmē might take to their wiues, women that touched them in the third and fourth degree without reprehension, and if any vnlawfull marriages were founde amongst the Englishmē, as if the sonne had married the fathers wife, or the brother the brothers wife, they ought to be warned in any wise to abstayne, and vnderstand it to be a greeuous sinne: yet shoulde they not for that thing be depriued of the Communiō of the body & bloud of our Lord, least those things might seeme to be punished in them wherein they had offended (before their conuersion to the Christian fayth) by ignorance: for at this season ẏ Church (sayth he) correcteth some things of a feruente earnestnesse, suffereth some things of a gētle mildnesse, and dissimuleth some things of a prudent consideration, and so beareth and dissimuleth the same, that oftentimes the euill which she abhorreth by such bearing and dissimuling, is restreyned and reformed. Moreouer, touching the ordeyning of Bishops, hee woulde they should be so placed, that the distance of place might not bee a lette, but that when a Bishoppe shoulde bee consecrated, there might bee three or foure present.

Also touching the Bishoppes of Fraunce, hee willed Augustine in no wise to intermedle with them, otherwise than by exhortacion and good admonitions to be giuen, but not to presume any thing by authority, sith the Archbishop of Arles had receyued the Palle in tymes past, whose authoritie hee might not diminishe, least he should seeme to put his sicle into another mans haruest. But as for the Bishops of Britayne, he committed them vnto him, that the vnlearned might be taught, the weake with wholesome perswasions strengthned, and the frowarde by authoritie reformed. Moreouer, that a womā with childe myghte bee Baptised, and shee that was deliuered after .ix. dayes of a man childe, and after .xl. dayes of a woman childe should be purified, but yet myghte shee enter the Church before if she woulde. Women with childe.

The residue of Augustines demaundes consisted in these poynts, viz. within what space a child should be Christened after it was borne, for doubt to be preuented by death: also, within what tyme a man might company with his wife after she was brought to bedde: whether a woman hauing the floures, might enter the Churche or receyue the Communion: also whether a man hauing companyed with hys Wife, might enter the Churche, or receyue the Communion, before he was washed with water. And whether after polution by night in dreames, a man might receyue the Cōmunion: or if he were a Priest whether he might say Masse. Matters in question about trifles.

To these questions Gregory maketh answere at full in the Booke and place before cited, which for breefenesse we passe ouer. He sent also at that tyme with the messengers afore sayde at their returne into Englande diuers learned men to help Augustine in the haruest of ẏ Lorde. The names of the cheefest were these, Mellitus, Iustus, Paulinus, and Rufinianus. He sente also the Palle whyche is the ornament of an Archbishop with vessels and apparrell whiche shoulde be vsed in Churches by the Archbishop and other ministers. Assistance to Augustine. The Pall.

He also sente with the Pall other letters vnto Augustine to lette hym vnderstande what number of Bishops hee woulde haue hym to ordeyne within this lande. Also after that Mellitus, and the other before mentioned persons were departed from Rome, hee sent a letter vnto the same Mellitus, beeyng yet on his way towardes Britayne, touching further matter concerning the Churches of England, wherein he confesseth that many thinges are permitted to bee vsed of the people lately brought from the errors of gentilitie, in keeping feastes on the dedication dayes whiche haue resemblaunce with their olde superstitious rytes of the Pagane Religion, for to hard and obstinate mindes (sayth he) it is not possible to cutte away all things at once, for hee that coueteth to the highest place, goeth vp by steppes and not by leapes.

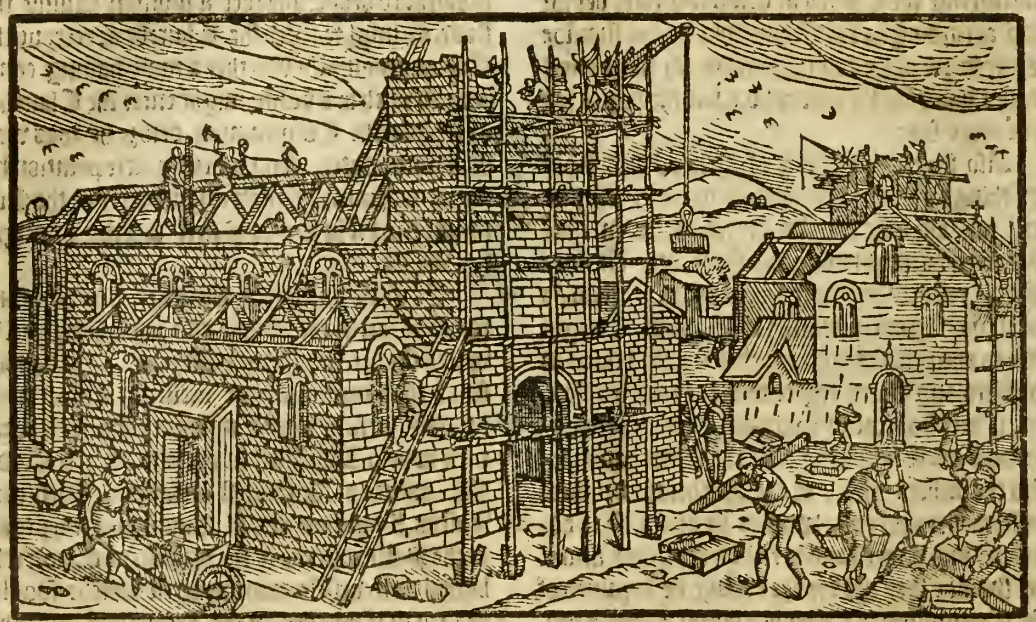
Miracles.



Also the same time, Gregory did sende letters vnto Augustine touching the miracles whych by reporte he vnderstode were shewed by the same Augustine, counselling him in no wise to glory in the same, but rather in reioycing to feare and consider that God gaue him the gifte to worke such signes for the welth of them, to whome hee was sente to preach the Gospell: he aduised hym therefore to beware of vayne glory and presumption, for the Disciples of the trueth (sayth he) haue no ioy, but onely that which is common with all men, of whyche there is no end, for not euery one that is elect worketh miracles, but euery of the elect haue their names written in heauen.

These letters, with the other whiche Gregory sent at this time vnto Augustine, were dated the tenth day of the Calendes of July, in the yeare of our Lord. 602. whiche was the nineteenth yeare of the Emperour Mauritius.

Moreouer, he sente most curteous letters by these messengers vnto King Ethelberte, in the whyche hee greatly commendeth him, in that hee had receyued the Christian fayth, and exhorteth him to continue in that most holy state of life, whereby hee myghte worthyly looke for rewarde at the handes of almighty God. But nowe to the doings of Augustine. We fynd, that after he was established Archbishop, and had his See appoynted to him at Canterbury, he restored in that Citie another Church whiche had bin erected there in times past by certayne of the Romaynes that were Christians, and did dedicate the same nowe in honor of Christ our Sauiour. Beda.

He also began the foundation of a Monastery without that Citie, stading towarde the East, in the whiche by his exhortation, King Ethelberte built a Churche euen from the grounde, whiche was dedicated vnto the holy Apostles Peeter and Paule, in the whiche the body of the sayde Augustine was buried, and likewise the bodies of all the Archbishops of Canterbury and Kings of Kente of long time after.

One Peeter was the first Abbot.

This Abbey was called Saint Austines after his name, one Peeter being the first Abbot therof. The Churche there was not consecrated by Augustine, but by his successor Laurece after that he was dead.

Moreouer, King Ethelbert at the motion of Augustine builded a Church in the Citie of Lõdon (whiche he lately had conquered) and dedicated it vnto Saint Paule: but whether he buylded or restored this Church of Saint Paule it maye bee doubted, for there bee dyuers opinions of the building thereof. Some haue written that it was firste buylded by King Lud (as before is mentioned.) Other agayne write, that it was builded afterwarde by Sigeberte King of the East Saxons. Also Kyng Ethelberte buylded the Churche of Saint Andrew in Rochester. It is likewise remembred by writers, that the same King Ethelberte procured a Citizen of London to buyld a Church of Sainte Peeter without the Citie of London towarde the West in a place then called Thorney, that is to witte, the Isle of Thornes, & now is called Westminster, though other haue written that it was buylte by Lucius King of Britaine, or rather by Siberte Kyng of the East Saxons. This Church was eyther newly builte or greatly enlarged by Kyng Edwarde surnamed the Confessor, and after that, the thirde Henry King of England did make there a beautifull Monasterie, and very richly endowed. Beda. Ran. Ceſtren. Ran. Ceſt. Westmin. Church endowed the same with greate possessions and sumptuous iewels. The place was overgrowen with underwoodes, as thornes and brembles before that the Church was begun to be builded there in this King Ethulbertes dayes.

Thus the fayth of Christ being once begunne to bee receyued of the Englishmen, toke wonderfull increase within a short time.

In the meane season by the help of King Ethelbert, Augustine caused a counsell to be called at a place in the confynes of the West Saxons, whiche place long after was called Austynes Oke, where he procured the Bishops or Doctors of the prouinces of the Britaines to come before him. Amongst the Britaynes or Welchmen, Christianite as yet remayned in force; whyche from the Apostles time had neuer fayled in that nation. When Augustine came into this land, he found in their prouinces seuen Bishops Seas, and an Archbishops See, wherin sate right godly and most Religious Prelates, and many Abbots, in the which the Lordes flocke kept their right order: but bycause they differed in obseruing the Feast of Easter, and other rites from the vse of ỹ Romane Church, Augustine thought it necessary to moue them to agree with hym in vnitie of the same, but after long disputation and reasoning of those matters, they could not be enduced to giue their assente in that behalfe. Augustine to proue his opinion good, wrought a miracle in restoring sight to one of the Saxon nation that was blinde. The Britaynes that were presente moued with this miracle, confessed, that it was the right waye of Iustice and righteousnesse which Augustine taught, but yet they sayd that they might not forsake theyr auncient customes without consente and licence of their nation. Whereupon, they required another Synode to be holden, wherat a greater number of them myght be present. This being granted, there came as it is reported seuen Bishops of the Britaynes and a greate number of learned menne, specially of the famous Monasterie of Bangor, whereof in those dayes one Dionoth was Abbot, the whiche as they wente towardes that counsell, came first to a certaine wise man, whych lyued amongst them an Ankers life, and asked his aduice whether they ought to forsake theyr traditions at the Preaching of Augustine or not: who made thys aunswere: If he bee the man of God followe hym: then sayde they: howe shall wee proue whether hee be so or not. Then sayde hee: the Lorde sayeth take vp my yoke and learne of mee, for I am meeke and humble in harte: if Augustine bee humble and meeke in hart, it is to be beleeued that hee also beareth the yoke of Christe, and offereth it to you to beare, but if hee bee not meeke but proude, it is certayne that hee is not of God, nor hys worde is not to bee regarded: And how shall wee perceyue that (sayde they?) Fynde meanes (sayde he) that hee maye fyrste come to the place of the Synode with those of hys syde, and if hee arise to receyue you at your comming, then knowe that he is the seruaunt of God, and obey him. But if hee despise you and arise not against you, where as you bee more in number, lette him bee despised of you.

The answere of a godly man touching Austin the Englishmens Apostle.

They did as he commaunded, and it chanced, that when they came, they found Augustine sitting in his chaire: which whē they beheld, straight waves they conceyued an indignation, and noting him of pride, laboured to reproue all hys sayings. He tolde thē that they vsed many things contrary to the custome of the vniuersal Church, and yet if in three things they woulde obey hym, that is to witte, in keeping the feaſt of Eaſter in due time, and miniſter Baptiſme according to the cuſtome of the Romaine Churche, and preach to the Engliſhmen the woꝛd of life with him and his fellowes, then would he be contented to ſuffer all other things patiently which they did, though the ſame were contrary to the manners and cuſtomes of the Romayne iuriſdiction. But they flatly denyed to do any of thoſe things, and gaue a playne aunſwere that they woulde not receyue him foꝛ their Archbiſhoppe, foꝛ they laying theyꝛ heads togither thus thoughte, that if hee refuſed now to ryſe vnto vs, how much the moꝛe will he contemne vs if we ſhould become ſubiect to him. Auſtine threteneth. Unto whome as it is ſayde Auguſtine in thꝛeatning wiſe tolde them afoꝛehande, that if they woulde not receyue peace with their bꝛeethꝛen, they ſhoulde receyue warre of the enimies, and if they would not pꝛeach to the Engliſhmen ẏ way of life, they ſhould ſuffer puniſhment by death at the handes of them: whiche thing indeede afteꝛ came to paſſe as in place conueniente ſhall be exꝑeſſed.

Three things required by Austin of the Britaynes to be obserued.

604 After this in the yeare of our Loꝛde. 604. the Archbiſhop Auguſtine oꝛdeyned two Biſhops, that is to ſay, Mellitus at Londõ, that he might pꝛeache the woꝛde of God to the Eaſt Saxons, whiche were deuided from them of Keute by the Riuer of Thames, and Juſtus in the Citie of Rocheſter within the limittes of Kent. Biſhops ordeined at London and Rocheſter

At that time Sabart reigned ouer the Eaſt Saxons, but hee was ſubiect vnto Ethelbert King of Kent, whoſe Nephewe he was alſo by his ſiſter Ricula that was married vnto king Sledda ẏ ſucceeded after Erchenwine ẏ firſt K. of ẏ Eaſt Saxons ꝛ, begate on hir this Sabert ẏ receyued ẏ faith. After ẏ Auguſtine had oꝛdeyned Mellitus to be Biſhop of London, as beſoꝛe is ſayd, King Ethelbert builded (as ſome wꝛite) the Churche of Sainte Paule within the ſame Citie, wheꝛe the ſame Mellitus and his ſucceſſoꝛs might keepe their See. And alſo foꝛ the like puꝛpoſe he builded the Church of Saint Andꝛow the Apoſtle at Rocheſter, that Juſtus and his ſucceſſoꝛs myghte haue theyꝛ See in that place accoꝛding to Auguſtines inſtitution: hee beſtowed great giftes vpon both theſe Churches, endowing them with lands and poſſeſſions veꝛy bountifully to the vſe of them that ſhould be attendante in the ſame with the Biſhops. The Church of Saint Paul builded.

Finally Auguſtine afteꝛ hee had gouerned as Archbiſhop the Churche of Canteꝛburie by the ſpace of twelue yeaꝛes current, departed this life the ſixe and twentith of May, and was buryed firſt without the Citie neeꝛe to the Church of the Apoſtles Peeter and Paule (whereof mention is made beſoꝛe) bicauſe the ſame Church as yet was not finiſhed noꝛ dedicated, but afteꝛ it was dedicated, his body was bꝛoughte into the Churche, and ꝛeuerently buried in the Noꝛth Ile there. Ran. Ceſtren.

He oꝛdeyned by his life time Laurence to bee his ſucceſſoꝛ in the Sea of Canterbury, of whom yee ſhall heare hereafter.

Thus haue ye heard in what maneꝛ th' Engliſhmen were firſt bꝛought from the woꝛſhipping of falſe Goddes, and baptiſed in the name of the liuing God by the foꝛeſayde Auguſtine, as wee fynde in Beda and other woꝛiters, and nowe wee will returne to other doyngs chancing in the meane tyme amongſt the people of this Ile.

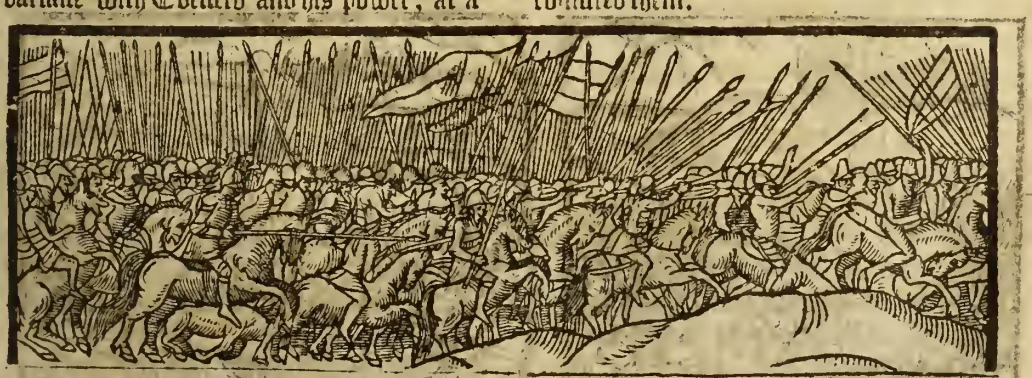
After the deceaſſe of Chelricus Kyng of the Weſt Saxons, wee finde that Ceobulf oꝛ Ceoloulph ſucceeded in gouernmente of that Kingdome, and raigned twelue yeaꝛes. Hee began his raigne (as ſhould appeare by ſome wꝛiters) about the yeaꝛe of our Loꝛd. 597. and ſpente his time Mat. VVeſt. hath. 34. 607. as Mark VVeſt. hath.

his time for the more part in warres, not gyuing place to ydlenesse, but seeking eyther to defende or enlarge the confines of his dominion. He was the sonne of Cutha, which was the son of Kenrike, that was the sonne of Certike.

After Wybba or Wypha king of Mercia, (who nothing inferiour to his father, did not onely defend his kingdome, but also enlarge it by subduing the Brytaynes on eche side) one Ceorlus succeeded in that kingdome, beeing not hys sonne but his kinsman.

This Ceorlus began his raigne aboute the yeare of oure Lorde 594. as Mat. Westm. recorde th.

Yee haue heard that Edelferde, whiche otherwise is called also by writers Edelfride, surnamed the wild, gouerned still the Northumbers, whiche Edelferde did more domage to the Brytaynes than any one other king of the English Nation. None of them destroyed theyr countreyes more than he did: neyther did any Prince make mo of the Brytaynes tributaries, or inhabited more of theyr Countreys with English people than he.



Herebpon Edan king of those Scots which inhabited Brytayne, beeing therewith moued to see Edelferd prosper thus in his conquestes, came agaynst him with a mightie armie: but ioyning in battaile with Edelferd and his power, at a place called Degsastane, or Degslastone, or Deglaston, he lost the moste part of his people, and with the residue that were left aliue, he escaped by flight.

This was a sore foughten battaile, wyth much bloudshed on both parties. For notwithstanding that the victorie remayned with the Northumbers, Theodbaldus the brother of Edelferd was slaine, with all that part of the English host, which he gouerned: and it was fought in the yeare of our Lorde. 603. in the xix. yeare of the raigne of the foresayde Edelferd, and in the first yeare of Coewulf king of the West Saxons, and in the first yeare of the Emperour Focas, or rather in the last yeare of hys predecessour Mauritius. 603. Henric. Hunt. Beda. li. 1. cap. 34.

From that day till the dayes of Beda, nyt one of the Scottish kings durst presume to enter into Brytaine againe to giue battaile against the English Nation, as Beda himselfe wryteth.

But the Scottish writers make other report of this matter, as in the Hystorie of Scotland ye may finde recorded. VVil. Malm. See in Scotlande.

The Brytaynes that dwelt aboute Chester, through their stoutnesse prouoked the aforesayde Ethelferd king of the Northumbers vnto warre: wherebpon the same Ethelferd to tame theyr lofty stomackes, assembled an armie, and came forwarde to beliege the Citie of Chester, then called of the Brytaynes Carleon ardour dené. The Citizens coueting rather to suffer all things than a siege, and hauing a truste in their great multitude of people, came forth to giue battaile abrode in the fieldes, whom he compassing about with ambushes, got them within his daunger, and easily discomfited them. Chester as yet in possession of the Brytayns. Iohn Leyland VVil. Malm.

It chaunced that he had espied before the battaile ioyned (as Bede hath) where a great number of the Brytish Priests were got aside into a place somewhat out of daunger, that they might there make their intercession to God for the good speede of theyr people, being then readie to giue battaile to the Northumbers.

Many of them were of that famous Monasterie of Bangor, in the which it is said, that there was such a number of Monkes, that where they were deuided into seuen seuerall partes, with their seuerall gouernours appoynted to haue rule ouer them, euery of those partes conteyned at the least three hundred persons, the which liued altogither by the labour of theyr handes. Many therefore of those Monkes hauing kept a solemne feast for three dayes togither, were come to the armie with other to make prayer, hauing for their defender one Brocmale, or Brocmael, Earle (or Consull as some call him) of Chester, which should preserue them (being giuen to prayer) from the edge of the enimies sworde. Brocmale.

King Edelfrid hauing (as is sayde) espyed these men, asked what they were, and what their intent was? and beeing informed of the whole circumstance, and cause of their beeing there, hee sayde. Then if they call to theyr God for his assistãce against vs, surely though they beare no armour, yet do they fight against vs, being busied in prayer for our destruction. Whereupon hee commaunded the first onset to be giuen on them, and after slue downe the residue of the Brytish armie, not without great losse of his owne people.

The Brytaines discomfited and slaine.

Of those Monkes and Priestes which came to pray (as before is mencioned) there died at that battaile about the number of .xij. hundred, so that fiftie of them onely escaped by flight.

Brocmale, or Brocmael at the first approche of the enimies, turning his backe with his companie, left them (whom he should haue defended) to be murthered through the enmies sworde.

And thus was the prophecie of Augustine fulfilled, though he was long before departed this life (as Beda hath.)

Henric. Hũt. But if this battaile was fought in the seuenth yeare of Ciobulf king of Westsaxons (as some haue written and that Augustin liued .xij. yeares after his entrance into the gouernment of the sea of Canterburie, (as some write) it is euident that he liued foure yeares after this slaughter made of the Brytishe Priestes and Monkes by Ethelfrid (as before is recited.) For Ciobulf beganne his raigne (as before is mentioned) about the yeare of our Lorde. 596. and in the seuenth yeare of hys raigne the battail was fought, at Degsastane betwixt Englishmen and Scottes, which chaunced in the yeare of our Lorde. 604. as Bede himselfe recordeth. Hitherto out of our olde writers.

Of which battaile also William Harison telleth another maner of tale, whose wordes (though he liue in our time, and his Chronologie bee not yet extant) are not to be omitted: which be these.

Athelbright, or Edilfride, king of the Northũbers, and Ethelbert of Kent, hauing Augustine in their cõpanie, in the .8. yeare after his arriuall, doe make warre vpon suche Brytaynes as refuse to obserue the Canons of the late Councell mentioned. 603. and kill 1200. Monkes of the Monasterie of Bangor, which laboured earnestly, and in the sweate of their browes, thereby to get theyr liuings. &c. Thus farre maister Harison.

Verily Gal. Mon writeth, that Ethelbert king of Kent (after he sawe the Brytaynes to disdaine and denie their subiection vnto Augustine, by whom he was conuerted to the christian faith) stirred vp Ethelfred king of the Northumbers to warre against the Brytains. But hereof maister Fore doubteth, and therfore sayth, that of vncertaine things hee hath nothing certainly to say, much lesse to iudge. Acts and Monuments. Pag. 160.

But now to the matter where we left. After that King Edelfred had made slaughter of the Brytaines (as before is rehearsed) hee entred the Citie of Chester, and from thence marched towardes Bangor.

The Britains in the meane time had assembled their power vnder three Captains, that is to wit, Blederike Duke of Cornewall, Margadud king of Southwales, and Cadwane king of Northwales. These ioyning in battaile with Ethelfred, slue. 10066. of his Souldiers, and constrayned him to flee out of the fielde for safegarde of his life, after hee had receyued many woundes.

Gal. Mon. On the part of the Brytaynes the forsayde Blederike, which was chiefe captaine of the fielde in the battaile chaunced to be slaine.

Thus hath Gal. Mon. but the auncient writers of the English kings (as Bede. Wil. Malm. and Henrie Hunt.) make no mention of this last battaile and victorie obteyned by the Brytaynes in maner as aboue is expressed in Galfrids booke. But contrarily we finde, that Ethelfrid hauing such good successe in his businesse abroade as hee could wishe, vpon purpose to auoyde tidinges at home, banished Edwin the sonne of Alla or Elle a yong Gentleman of great towardnesse, lately come to the kingdom of the Northumbers by the death of his father. But this Edwine in time of his exile, beeing long tossed from place to place, and finding no stedfast friendship now in time of his aduersitie, at length came to Redwalde, that was king at that time of the East Angles, the third from Wffa, as successor to Titullus, which Titullus did succeede next after the sayde Wffa, the first king of East Angles (as before is mentioned.

Edwin the sonne of Alla Elle.

This Redwalde did verie honourably intertaine Edwine, insomuch that Edelferd being informed thereof, he was highly displeased, and sent Ambassadors vnto Redwalde, to requyre him either to deliuer Edwine into his handes, or else if he refused so to do, to declare and denounce vnto him open warres.

Redwalde encouraged by his wife (that counselled him in no wise to betray his friende, to whō he had giuen his fayth, for the menaces of his enimie) assembled forthwith an armie, and vpon the sodaine comming vpon Ethelferd, set vppon him ere he coulde haue time to assemble his people togither. But yet the sayd Ethelfred, though he was entrapped and brought in daunger at vnwares, he dyed not vnreuenged: for putting himselfe in defence with such power as he coulde then get togyther, he boldely encountred the enimies, and gyuing battaile, slue Remerius the sonne of Redwalde, and after was slaine himselfe, hauing raigned ouer the Northumbers about .xxij. yeares. 617 H. Hunt. Ethelferd slaine.

This battaile was fought neare to the water of Idle.

The sayde Ethelferd had issue by his wyfe Acca the daughter of Alla, and sister to Edwine, two sonnes, Oswalde being about two yeares of age, and Oswyn about foure yeares, the which (their father beeing thus slaine) were by helpe of their gouernours, conueyed away into Scotland with all speede that might be made.

Ceolwulf king of the West Saxons, after hee had raigned the space of .xij. yeares, departed this life, who in his time had mainteyned great warre against many of his neighbours, the which for briefenesse I passe ouer.

One great battaile he fought against them of Sussex, in which the armies on both sides susteyned great domage, but the greater losse fell to the South Saxons.

After the foresayde Ceolwulf raigned Cinegisus, or Kingils, whiche was the sonne of Ceola, that was sonne to Cutha or Cutwyn, the sonne of Kenricke, which was sonne to king Certicke.

In the fourth yeare of his raigne, he receyued into felowship with him in gouernaunce of the kingdome his sonne Richelinus, or Onichelinus, and so they raigned ioyntly togither in great loue and concorde, a thing seldome seene or heard of. VVil. Malm. sayeth that Onichilinus was the brother of Cinegisus.

They fought with the Brytaynes at Beandune, where at the first approch of the battailes togyther, the Brytaynes fled, but to late, for there died of them that were ouertaken .2062. Beandune, or Beanton.

In this meane time, Laurence Archbishop of Canterburie, that succeeded next after Augustine, admitted thereto by him in his life time (as before is sayde) did his indeuour to augment and bring to perfection the Church of Englande, the foundation wherof was lately layde by his predecessor the foresayde Augustine: and studied not onely for the encrease of this new Church, which was gathered of the Englishe people, but also he was busie to employ his pastorlike cure vpon the people that were of the olde inhabitants of Brytaine, and likewise of the Scottes that remayned in Irelande: For when he had learned that the Scottes there in semblable wise as the Brytains Beda. li. 2. cap. 4.

in theyr Countrey ledde not theyr lyues in many poyntes accordyng to the Eccleſiaſtical rules, aſwel in obſeruing the feaſt of Eaſter cõtrarie to the vſe of the Romain church, as in other things, he wrote vnto thoſe Scottes letters exhortatorie, requyring them moſte inſtauntly to an vnitie of Catholique orders as myght bee agreeable with the Church of Chriſt, ſpredde and diſperſed throughe the worlde.

Theſe letters were not written onely in his owne name, but ioyntly togyther in the name of the Biſhops Mellitus and Juſtus (as thus.)

To our deare brethren, the Biſhops & Abbots throughe all Scotland, Laurence, Mellitus & Juſtus, Biſhops, the ſeruants of the ſeruants of God, wiſhe health. Where as the Apoſtolike Sea, (accordyng to hir maner) had ſent vs to preach vnto the Heathen people in theſe weſt partes, as otherwiſe throughe the worlde, and that it chaunced vs to enter into this Ile which is called Bryttayne, before we knewe and vnderſtoode the ſtate of things, wee had in greate reuerence bothe the Scottes and Bryttaynes, which beleeued, becauſe (as we toke the matter) they walked accordyng to the cuſtome of the vniuerſall Churche: but after we had knowledge of the Bryttaynes, we iudged the Scottes to be better, but we haue learned by Biſhop Daganus, comming into this Ile, and by Columbanus the Abbot cõming into France, that the Scottes nothing differ in theyr conuerſation from the Bryttaynes, for Biſhop Dagan comming vnto vs, would neyther eate with vs, no nor yet within the houſe where wee did eate.

The ſayde Laurence alſo with his fellow Biſhops, did write to the Bryttaines, other letters worthie of his degree, doing what hee coulde to confyrme them in the vnitie of the Romaine Church: but it profited little, as appeareth by that which Beda wryteth.

About the ſame tyme, Mellitus the Biſhop of London wente to Rome to commune wyth Pope Boniface, for neceſſarie cauſes touching the the Church of Englande, and was preſent at a Sinode holden by the ſame Pope at that ſeaſon, for ordinances to bee made touching the ſtate of religious men, and ſate in the ſame Sinode, that with ſubſcribing, he might alſo with his authoritie confirme that whiche was there orderly decreed.

This Sinode was holden the third kalends of March, in the laſt yeare of the Emperour Focas, which was about the yeare after the byrth of our ſauiour. 610.

Mellitus at his returne, brought with him from the Pope, decrees commaunded by the ſayd Pope to be obſerued in the Engliſh Church, with letters alſo directed to the Archbiſhop Laurence, and to king Ethelbert.

Cadwan.

Cadwa king of Bry tayne.

After that the Bryttains had continued about the ſpace almoſte of. xxiiij. yeares without any one ſpecial gouernor, being led by ſundrie rulers, euer ſithence that Careticus was conſtrayned to flee ouer Seuerne, and fought oftentymes not onely agaynſt the Saxons, but alſo one of them agaynſte another, at length in the yeare of our Lorde. 613. they aſſembled in the Citie of Cheſter, and there electe Cadwan that before was ruler of Northwales, to haue the ſoueraine rule and gouernment ouer all theyr Nation, and ſo the ſayde Cadwan beganne to raigne as king of Bryttaynes in the ſayd yeare. 613. But Harilon ſayeth, this was in the yeare. 609. in whiche yeare Careticus the Bryttiſh king departed this life. And then after his deceaſſe the Bryttaynes or Welchmen (whether wee ſhall call them) chooſe Cadwane to gouerne them in the foreſayde yeare. 609. whiche was in the ſeuenth yeare of the Emperour Focas, and the. xxj. of the ſeconde Lotharius King of Fraunce, and in the xiij. yeare of Kilwoolfe King of the Weſt Saxons. 613

This Cadwan being eſtabliſhed King, ſhortly after aſſembled a power of Bryttaynes, and went agaynſt the foreſayde Ethelfred King of Northumberlande, who hering thereof aduertiſed, did aſſociate to him the moſt part of the Saxon Princes, and came forth with his armie to meete Cadwane in the fielde. Hereupon as they were readie to haue tryed the matter by battaile, certayne of theyr friendes trauayled ſo betwirte them for a peace, that in the ende they brought them to agreement, ſo that Ethelfred ſhould kepe in quiet poſſeſſion thoſe his Countreys beyonde the Ryuer of Humber, and Cadwan ſhould hold all that which belonged as yet to the Bryttaines on the ſouth ſide the ſame ryuer. Galf. M.

Thys Couenaunte wyth other touching theyr agreement was confyrmed wyth otherſolemnitye taken, and pledges therewith deliuered, ſo that afterwardes they continued in good and quiet peace withoute vexing the one the other.

What chaunced afterwardes to Edelfred, yee haue before heard rehearſed, the whiche for that it ſoundeth more lyke to a truth than that whiche followeth in the Bryttiſhe Booke, wee omitte to make further rehearſall, paſſing forth forth to other doings which fell in the meane ſeaſon, whileſt this Cadwane had gouernment of the Brytaynes, raigning as king ouer them the tearme of .xrij. (or as other haue but .xiij.) yeares, and finally was ſlaine by the Northũbers, as before hath bene, and alſo after ſhall be ſhewed.

In the .viij. yeare after that Cadwan began to raigne, Ethelbert king of Kent departed this life, in the .xxj. yeare after the comming of Auguſtin with his fellowes to preach the fayth of chriſt here in this Realme: and after that Ethelbert had raigned ouer the Prouince of Kent aboute the tearme of .lvj. yeares (as Bede hath) but there are that haue noted three yeares leſſe: he departed this worlde, as aboue is ſignified, in the yeare of oure Lorde .617. on the .xxiiij. daye of Februarie, and was buryed in the Ile of Saint Martine, within the Churche of the Apoſtles Peter and Paule, without the Citie of Canterburie, where his wife Queene Bartha was alſo buryed, and the forſayde Archebiſhop Auguſtine that firſt conuerted him to the fayth.
